He walked out, even as Cord-Hislop Aerospace began a massive series of buy and sell transactions on the stock market. Orders for mass system deletions in the mainframes and backup locations were triggered. The programmers and network admins who would prevent such catastrophes were unable to, as the same command triggered halon fire suppression systems, locking the doors. The QEC set into the table of his office smouldered and collapsed, rendering any tracking of his messages impossible.

Jack Harper wasn't a terrorist, but he couldn't leave behind loose ends either. Knowing that he'd just executed forty two people in three buildings, he wasn't happy, his face set in grim lines. He'd told himself so many times that the costs had to be paid that , some days, he almost believed it.

That never made him feel any cleaner.

He walked to the elevator, pausing to look back over his office, the business he'd built and named after his closest friends, before entering. Sliding the now activated keycard into the slot, it took him to a sub-basement that could not be found on any blueprint or map of the building. The elevator was silent, it's rich wood panels muted in their color in the dim light, and his mind walked through the steps he would have to take to proceed with.

The room that was revealed when he stepped off the elevator was bare, gleaming white. Equipment lay shrouded under plastic throws with a thin layer of dust over them, making him sneeze once as he threw them off. He paused, opening up one wall panel to reveal an incinerator, which he switched on. He waited patiently for it to begin to glow, then tossed in his PDA, phone, and wallet. He began to pull off his fine suit, tossing each piece in as he went, until he was stark naked, shivering a bit in the cold, dry air.

Another wall yielded a slender valise and a shelf of clothing, which he put on – plain slacks, a shirt open to the stomach and a light jacket. From the valise he pulled out a bottle of hair-coloration gel, running it through his hair thoroughly, darkening the gray and silver to black, before walking over to a sink built into one wall and rinsing them off. He noted with approval that the water ran clear and cool the moment he touched the control – his engineers had done well.

He glanced up as a wall panel illuminated on the far wall, scrolling a series of codes. His eyes narrowed as he took in their meaning. There were already hackers in the financial systems, looking for clues, seeking answers.

STG, most likely. I have less time than I thought. A chill ran up his spine as he realized that, if he had waited a few days to implement his separation, the hackers shredding through Earth's data-sphere would certainly have tracked he and his connections almost instantly.

He wasn't out of danger yet, either. More codes illuminated – turian units on Vurta, assaulting the Iron Cell dockyard there. Landings on Parit, Cold Water and mass translations into the empty system of Dighiris, where a deep space facility that was one of the hold fasts of the entire organization was located.

The view screen was dancing with more and more updates, and demands from field operatives coming under attack, all of them screaming interrogatives from the network. Jack chuckled, drying his hands, and returned to the valise, applying a slender, false beard, and rubbing a tanning agent over his exposed face and hands. A moment later, he applied false-color contacts to his eyes, sealing away the blue-glowing reminder of his experience at the hands of the Arca Device.

He pitied some of the agents out there, dying as he let the contacts and beard set on his face, but there was nothing to be done.

Survival was it's own reward.

Jack Harper was gone. In his stead was a tanned vacationer named Des Solas from – he paused to think back about the documents he'd prepared years ago, against this very eventuality – Eden Prime. How ironic. He laughed quietly at the name he'd picked as well, before he carefully put the materials he'd used to alter his appearance back into the valise. He turned, putting the entire valise into the incinerator as well.

Opening a second panel flush with the white-steel wall, he pulled down a harness, and a slightly battered mark V Predator pistol. He slipped out of his jacket, put the harness on, and then holstered the weapon, before putting the light brown jacket back on. As usual, its soft leather fell loosely over him, the pistol invisible at a casual glance. He reached into the jacket – a new PDA was in one pocket, a light shield generator in the other, spare ID and cash tucked neatly into the interior lining.

The screen on the wall flashed again. "Incoming Typhonet communication string detected – Shadow Hand". A moment later the screen lit up, displaying the angry, wide features of the leader of Cerberus's science division. "Jack! What the hell is going on? Half of our comms are jammed. A third of my intel teams are down or under attack, and we have assaults coming in from all bases!"

The Illusive Man sighed, knowing his image was not being transmitted back to the man sending the transmission. This connection was secure, since the room would soon be gone, but there was no point taking chances in letting his new appearance be known. "Sorry, Richard. I'm afraid it's come time for us to part ways. The Citadel is going to take us down, and I'm not interested in being offered up to the aliens to make peace. You're on your own."

Richard's face flushed. "You... traitor! You spit on humanity!"

Jack smiled faintly. "I'm surviving to fight another day. I've made plans for it to happen, and I'm aware you have your own orders from the SA to keep me in line. That ... arraignment has ended. In the ever so eloquent words of Dr. Mintha, 'I'm not a goddamned terrorist.'" Jack touched the screen, killing the connection, then noted the next batch of status updates, frowning.

The assaults were moving too fast. This was more than some all-out assault on every known Cerberus location. This spoke to either a traitor... or the Shadow Broker. Yet his own asset in that creepy organization made no indication that the Broker Network had reached out or been contacted by the Citadel for anything aside from the hunt for Saren. He'd miscalculated, somewhere. There must be another channel, something he'd missed ....

No matter.

He sighed, then finished his preparations. He picked up a suitcase from the shelf which had held his gun, and a pair of sunglasses, then walked over to the final alcove. He hit the keyboard there, tapping in commands, and six pairs of AESIR light mechs powered on, rising up in front of a glass-filled tank.

Within floated a clone of Jack Harper.

With a sigh, he turned to the mechs. "Implement program BAIT". Turning away, he slapped a final control on the wall, revealing a tunnel that lead to the Denver Spaceport.

The mechs began to move as Jack Harper walked away. They drained the clone tank, laying the unconscious being out, drying him with cloths they took from a nearby shelf. They dressed him in spare clothes, an expensive jacket and a name brand shirt. They sat him up and spoke pre-programmed subliminal messages to him. The nearly-mindless thing smoked two cigarettes, ate part of an energy bar, and drank several glasses of scotch.

Other bots gathered up everything in the room, spraying it down with bleach even as two escorted the clone to the elevator. They shut the tunnel behind their master, the mechanism doing so dumping a mass of water and quick-setting cement to plug the gap behind the wall, the motors burning out as they lowered the tunnel door. The robots then finished sterilizing the room, before standing around an explosive charge built into the floor.

The two accompanying the clone barely swayed as an explosion rumbled through the Cord-Hislop building. People were running around, the horrible tragedy of the 'malfunctioning' fire-suppressant system in IT having summoned both medical personal and police. But no one but the CEO used his private elevator, and thus the robots and their charge reached his office unmolested.

Following subconscious programmed commands burned into its virgin mind, the clone sat down at the desk, pulling out a pen and paper. It waited as one of the robots, programmed to mimic Jack Harper's writing perfectly, wrote out a suicide note, and then handed him a pistol – a replica of the pistol now resting in the real Jack Harper's holster.

The two robots then departed the office, taking the elevator down to the maintenance level, and stood in a corner, their memory cores wiping clean then exploding. A moment later, a single shot rang out in the CEO's office.

Half a mile away, the Illusive Man smiled as the PDA in his pocket beeped once.

O-OSaBC-O

The two Systems Alliance intelligence agents were not happy as they accompanied Spectre Vasir and Spectre Bau through the lobby of Cord-Hislop Aerospace, but they had little choice. STG hackers were convinced that, despite a series of brilliant defensive hacks and illusions, that the CEO of CHA, one Jack Harper, was in truth the leader of Cerberus.

Already, even while STG units hunted for Cerberus forces and turian strike teams crushed what military infrastructure they had, the Spectres were going after the leaders. They had no idea who this "Shadow Hand" might be, or even clues to his location, but supposedly Rear Admiral Kahoku did, and so that target had been left to Spectre Shepard. The "Iron General" was believed to be on Seppra, in a massive military facility and warehouse with over almost a battalion of Cerberus soldiers – facing down the entire force of the 9th Turian Infantry. More installations and space stations had been crushed.

Volus C-SEC FINCIN hackers and specialists had identified dozens of companies, banks, and probable backers of Cerberus. No one very big, but a lot of little people. Thankfully, all indications showed Cerberus had not penetrated any of the SA leadership at all. Bau wasn't sure he believed that fully, but that's what the data seemed to indicate. He and others had worried there was a direct link between the SA and Cerberus, which might have lead to war.

Now, all that remained was the leader. They'd sealed off the building but according to employees and police – already there due to an unexplained accident in the IT center – no one had seen him leave the building, and his private lift-jet was still on the roof. As gunships circled the building, and news crews began to arrive, the Spectres entered the CEO's private elevator and took the ride up to his penthouse.

Jondam Bau took the safety off his gun, as did Tela Vasir, her hands moving over her heavy shotgun carefully in the confined spaces of the elevator. The two intelligence agents from the SA, wearing only their uniforms instead of battle armor, glanced at each other uncertainly. "We're not equipped for a fight. You said arrest and interrogation, asari."

Vasir gave them an arch look. "We cannot be sure this one won't put up a fight, and he was... quite a handful in his younger days." She prepared herself, ready to make a biotic dash if need be, when the elevator doors opened.

The gun had fallen from his hand, but there was no doubt – Jack Harper was dead. The four fanned out, Bau already running DNA scans and sensor examinations. "...signs of bone trauma. Food, alcohol in the stomach." He bent down, sampling the drying, darkening blood on the rich carpet, before sighing. "DNA match confirmed." The two intelligence agents shook their head and departed, leaving the Spectres alone – Harper's death had been the only thing they needed to see.

Vasir grunted. "Damn. Lunatics." She glanced over the note, spattered with droplets of blood, and then at the human slumped in the expensive chair. The office still smelled of cigarette smoke, the glass on the desk still wet with condensation. "We didn't miss him by much, either. We'll check his computers ___"

Bau snorted. "Waste of time. Accident in company IT center was probably to cover tracks. Always admired Illusive Man's skill, if not his methods and focus. A very worthy opponent." The slender salarian sighed, taking pictures with his omni-tool, as Vasir walked to the window, gazing out over the city, the mountains visible through the huge shield dome of the arcology.

She smiled. Cerberus had no idea of her ties and links with the Shadow Broker, a conduit that had allowed that mysterious figure to pass critical information about Cerberus' operations directly to her, and through the Spectre Network. With only one human Spectre, there was no way Cerberus could infiltrate their ranks. Thus the strike against the human terrorist group was led by many Spectre teams. While this was a drain on other operations – the Spectre group was already tasked well beyond capacity – it was likely to take up only a few days, and thus acceptable. Indeed, with the first strike having gone so well, Spectre presence was hardly needed any longer.

"Anything else, Bau?"

The salarian agent, as close as a leader to the Spectre ranks as any other, shrugged weakly, his large black eyes distant in thought. "Surprising turn of events. . Would have suspected Illusive Man to have contingency plans."

Vasir laughed, walking towards the elevator. "You give these humans too much credit, Bau."

O-OSaBC-O

Sitting in a cafe at the spaceport, waiting on his pilot to finish preflight checks so he could board, the disguised Jack Harper listened to the news reports of his own death, a suicide in the service of Cerberus. He paused, laughing softly to himself, before looking up as a slender asari matriarch in a pale gray and black dress walked up. "So, you slipped the net after all. You look... more youthful like this."

Jack tilted his head. "Ah, but Trellani, you shouldn't be surprised." He stood, linking arms with the willowy asari, and the two began walking towards the docks. "After all, those seeking me have a very limited, narrow – and, by design, flawed – understanding of their foe."

Trellani snorted. "Most underestimate and overestimate humans at the same time. No matter. While you are with me, no one will recognize you ... which is no doubt why you so graciously invited me to accompany you on your little jaunt."

Jack shrugged. The relationship between himself and the alien woman had surprised him endless times over the decade and a half they had known each other. Trellani was an outcast, an asari who had rejected the sensual, manipulative and wheeling social games and byzantine politics of her race. Her faith in her people had been shattered through the study of ancient documents that indicated the asari were nothing more than pawns of the Protheans, cast aside for an unknown reason near the time of the Prothean extinction. Rather than accept her concepts, the Council of Matriarchs had not only exiled her but attempted to have her assassinated more than once.

Jack had never really understood how the asari had concealed Prothean involvement in their history. Most asari didn't even know about it – the only way he knew was from Trellani herself, and she'd known nothing until her years in the temple had let her rise to such a rank that she could find things out for herself. Her inability to deal with the destruction of her faith had led her to many dark roads, and eventually to Cerberus, and to Jack.

Trellani was not exactly a lover, as Jack Harper didn't really believe in love any more. Love had blinded him to the truth long ago, had twisted his heart and left him unready for the tragedy that was life. And Trellani had seen her own bond-mate murdered by asari assassins, a mark that would never heal for two people so linked.

Still, they were more than friends. Melding was a process that was invasive and alien to the Illusive Man, but it gave him the most insight into the mindset of the asari, and Trellani had centuries of experience in manipulating, wheeling, dealing, and treachery. He knew she was bitter and hateful, and had her own ideas and plans... and for the moment, those were somewhere in the next century or two. No threat to humanity.

And while Jack Harper was no believer in mingling human and alien culture ... Trellani was that rarest of things – someone he could trust implicitly, who could tell him better than any other when hate or disdain, or even mere racism, was clouding his vision. He turned to her now, arching an eyebrow, pulling them to a stop. "Am I doing the right thing?"

Trellani paused, glancing around but finding no one nearby. The spaceport was nearly abandoned, as there were not many passenger departures at this time of night, and she shrugged. "Your group has done some vile things, and we have argued over them many times. That being said... you are doing what should have been done years ago. Those other two cretins are little more than the same sort of narrow-minded bigots that turned the First Contact War from a misunderstanding to a war crime, and your government..." Her eyes narrowed, and the soft lines of her face hardened before she fixed her gaze on Harper. "There are too many old wounds in the history of humanity for your race to heal."

The Illusive Man nodded, then glanced at his pocket, as his PDA suddenly vibrated. He pulled it out, examining the screen, then stood, holding out an arm. "The ship is ready, beautiful matriarch. Shall we depart? The falls of Horizon are brilliant in the summer, and I do so love the uncomfortable, vaguely put out look Ms. Lawson gets when you hang off my arm, as if I've made love to the hired help or something."

Trellani laughed, and gestured. "It should be interesting. But really, did you have to pick such a ridiculous name, 'Des Solas'? I know Desolas Arterius cost you a great deal, but ..."

The Illusive Man only smiled wider. "Yes, he did, for which he paid. Still, in a way, I owe him a great deal. If he had not opened my eyes, there would never have been a Cerberus. It is only fitting his brother is the excuse I needed to cut myself free from the bonds I've been ensnared in... may he come to the same end as his sibling."

Twenty minutes later, the yacht was gone from the Denver Spaceport, already headed for the Charon Relay. It would be nearly six weeks before a detailed autopsy found that the body in the top of the Cord-Hislop tower might or might not have been a clone, and another two months before the ruins of the hidden chamber and escape tunnel were located by SA investigators.

By that time, the Illusive Man would be well and truly free again.

---

Chapter 72: Chapter 63: Cerberus, the Hunt Begins

---

A/N: Sorry for the delay – end of the month is always hectic for me. I'm not usually a big fan of making an OC take up a big chunk of a chapter, much less two chapters, but Telanya is a special case in that she'll be used for some time to come.

You may note I'm starting to incorporate concepts from the various documentation files I've put up , including things about asari culture. If you haven't read "A Season of Sorrows Unending" you may wish to check it out. And if you're tired of me plugging my own work, then give Mighty Crouton's What the Water Gave Me a try.

---

Telanya took a deep breath as she entered the Normandy, eyes darting all around her. The angles of the ship were strange. The humans and turians alike had a fixation on elongated, angular shapes, but this ship was curved gracefully, like a hunting raptor. The metal gleamed faint, cold blue-white in the lights of the Citadel docks, reflecting back the shimmering cityscape spread below in lurid colors.

Telanya bit her lip and stepped aboard, following the two thick-set human drop soldiers lugging their gear. The corridor beyond was lined with haptic control stations, most already manned as the ship prepped for departure, and a huge control map dominated the CIC, flanked by more humans, looking grimly competent in their dark blue uniforms. Telanya had been dealing with humans for years, of course, but she mostly dealt with criminals, traders, or cretins like Harkin.

These humans, on the other hand, looked proud, professional, and vaguely suspicious of her, giving her dark looks before turning back to their duties. She would have to watch her tone, and maybe Garrus could help her blend in with the crew. She sighed, following the soldiers down stairs leading behind the CIC, thinking back on how she'd ended up here.

It had started innocently enough – she'd been trying to reach Garrus in the confusion of the Normandy's return, frantic to make sure he was alright. After being stonewalled by the SA and the Spectre offices, she'd asked her best friend, Imaelia of Hearthwatch Clan, for advice. The older asari had smiled and gotten in touch with an old friend, who put her in touch with the Consort...

Ending up with little Telanya of no clan standing before Councilor Tevos, on a tight-beam link with the Council of Matriarchs of the Thirty Families, high rulers of the noble houses of Thessia. She had no clue what was happening, she'd been summoned and so she had obeyed. Executor Palin had been strangely gentle when he'd told her that the Councilor wanted to see her, and she had expected something, but not what actually occurred.

Tevos had let her know Garrus was alright, but that there was another concern. A princess of the Thirty, Liara T'Soni, was aboard the Normandy. Due to the actions of Benezia T'Soni, the asari race as a whole, and the Thirty in particular, had been shamed. Worse, many of Benezia's former devotees had rebelled – using force against other asari.

Not in ten thousand years had there been armed resistance to the Thirty.

There was concern that Benezia was smart enough to have made contingency plans for being exposed. The Thirty (and the Justicars) wanted to put Liara to the Question, to force a hard, deep link and scour her mind to ensure she wasn't part of Benezia's plans. The humans, fools to the last of them, thought that Liara fighting against geth or her mother and her forces indicated her innocence, but the Thirty worried that was just a gambit, and that Liara might still answer to her mother – they found it astonishing a daughter would even agree to fight her mother in any circumstances.

The SA had denied letting the Thirty take custody of Liara, and the Justicars had been quite rudely told they had no authority in Citadel Space off of the asari worlds. The Thirty needed eyes on Liara T'Soni, and Tevos had found a way to deliver that. The Council had given Telanya her charge – watch Dr. T'Soni, and watch how she influenced the humans. If T'Soni was truly an innocent, well and good – she was the SA's problem now. But if she was indeed in collusion with her mother, Telanya was to take Liara's life.

Telanya snorted. She figured her chances in combat against a member of the Thirty were about on par with her chances at killing a krogan with a bottle of crest gel, but she was too overawed by the Thirty to even suggest such a thing. Telanya had no idea what arms were twisted or eternities embraced, but the next day, she'd been gruffly approached by SA soldiers and a commissar at her workplace in C-Sec, and told the SA had approved an asari commission for her to join the Normandy.

Now she was here, and nervous. Garrus would be upset, she knew. His whole turian background called out for him to protect his mate, and bonding had only made that desire more paramount. It was going to make his job harder, and he would worry about her constantly. She felt ashamed, and bitter at that, and realized belatedly that she didn't have any kind of kathess mind discipline training to prevent him from picking up on the fact that the Thirty had placed her here to spy on T'Soni. He'd like that even less. As she followed the soldiers, she nervously wrung her hands – her life was empty and bleak enough without losing Garrus, too.

And then there was the human, Shepard, who had not looked entirely displeased at her arrival, but was clearly unsure of her ability to fight in an infantry platoon. Telanya had only hoped she had looked competent and that she hadn't stared too much, the human was stupidly good looking in a way that made it hard to tear your eyes from. And the stories about the Butcher were horrifying, the kind of stuff Matriarch Silana used to make up about batarians and krogan. She'd read the C-SEC reports of the aftermath at Chora's Den, where they were sure Shepard had been – broken necks, people burned alive, Goddess only knew what else...

She was no longer playing with stupid freight scammers and two-bit red sand smugglers.

The stairs opened into a broad area with tables and a small kitchen – mess decks, she figured – with a giant figure standing in the middle, looking over the soldiers in front of him. He must have topped her by a good two and a half feet, thick with muscle. His features were dark and craggy, one eye covered with patch, and he smiled as she came to a stop next to the other soldiers. "And you must be Telanya. I'm Master Chief Cole, command master chief of the Normandy's ground command."

She nodded, coming to an asari attention stance – legs parted, arms behind the back, head raised. "Sergeant Telanya Nasan, C-SEC Customs Officer." Cole just nodded and folded his arms. "They told me to report to you, sir."

Cole glanced over the other three soldiers. "You apes already know what to do. Pick a coffin and stow your gear on the lower level, Gunnery Chief Williams is the armory officer. Then report to Lieutenant Alenko for force briefing." The soldiers moved off, lugging their gear, and Cole turned his attention back to Telanya. "According to the manifest, you're a replacement for one of my infantrymen. I see you have your own gear, that's good, but we'll still issue you a new rifle." He paused, frowning. "And we should be able to fit you with one of the suits of armor we have, that C-sec riot crap won't stop the kind of shit we get thrown our way."

Cole sat down on top of the nearest table, his massive bulk making it creak, and rubbed an eyebrow with his thumb. "Most of the infantrymen are deployed when we do a ground-side op. Command structure is simple. Lieutenant Alenko commands the unit over all. Right now, I handle one section;

Gunnery Chief Williams handles the other section. With Chief Vega here, we are going to shift that around some, but more on that later. You any good with biotics?"

A dry voice, a bit exasperated sounding, rang across the mess decks. "Oh, yes, Master Chief. She's very good with her biotics... in some situations." Garrus stalked across the deck from the battery, wearing only clothing instead of his armor, chest still bound in bandages visible under the thin cloth, limping a bit. "The question is not if she's any good, but why is she here?"

Telanya sighed. "I'm here on the orders of the Councilor and the Republic, Garrus. Can this wait? We're in the middle of a conversation."

Cole grinned, holding up both hands; one flesh, one cybernetic. "Whoa, now. I don't need to interrupt anything, Miss. When you get a moment, just head on down to the lower level, I'll be going over some things with the other new guys, and we can discuss Systems Alliance battle and comms protocol. Sleeper pod six has been keyed to your ID, and Doctor T'Soni offered to let you stash your gear in the lab forward of medical –" he paused, jerking a thumb behind him and off to his left" – if you need more space than a gear locker."

Cole paused to trade a look with Garrus that she couldn't interpret, before patting her on the shoulder with a massive hand. "Also, Commander Shepard wants to see you before you settle in. Report to her quarters sometime today, those are right there." He gestured to the far wall, and smiled. "Don't forget." With that, the big man walked off, leaving Telanya in the middle of the mess decks with Garrus staring at her.

With a huff, she glared right back at him, and he motioned her forward. She merely followed, past the rows of stasis sleeper pods affixed to the walls. She shuddered at the idea of sleeping alone in such a device, and resolved then and there to just crash on the floor somewhere, anywhere. Garrus continued to walk forward, moving into a small room at the end of the corridor – a gunnery control station, it seemed. A turian-style cot was propped up in one corner, and a large, heavy sniper rifle hung from hand-driven hooks in the far wall.

Garrus came to a halt, shutting the doors behind her, and growled. "What the hells is going on, Tel? You were supposed to call me, after they released me from the hospital, and I got nothing. No replies to my message, no call backs – I thought something had happened to you, that you'd been shot. C-SEC said they couldn't comment!"

She set her pack down, rubbing her hand over her crests wearily, and then slumped down to sit on a crate in one corner. She smiled, ruefully. "Now you know how it feels, huh? Garrus. I just... I wanted to find a way to get in touch with you. I reached out through a friend to... the Councilor, Lady Tevos, and before I knew it they'd decided that I should be here on the ship."

Garrus' eyes – always so piercing, so clear – were clouded with worry and confusion, and narrowed as she spoke. "Who is 'they', Tel?"

Telanya whispered in response, an undercurrent of stammering awe seeping into her voice. "The... The Thirty, sins recoil from their houses. The Council of Matriarchs on Thessia wanted me here. They... they needed someone to keep an eye on things."

Garrus frowned, then grimaced. "Shepard told me the asari had made a lot of demands that we turn over Doctor T'Soni to them. So they sent you here to spy on her, tell them if she's a bad piece of plating? Why didn't they just take Shepard's word for it?"

Telanya snorted. "Garrus, don't be silly. If a Palavanus or a Thanvanus family member went rogue, wouldn't you want to question his family about it? Wouldn't you be suspicious if that was denied? She's not just some clanless, after all...she's important. Just because Shepard vouches for her means nothing at all – from the viewpoint of the asari, Shepard is a reckless killing machine, not known for her political acumen."

Telanya shrugged, folding her arms. "Also, I think it's a knee jerk reaction to what Liara has done by renouncing her house. The news was full of the story that she'd given her House rights over to her aunt, but everyone knows that Matriarch Mithra was never of the High Line of the House. Liara could snatch back the reins of House T'Soni whenever she felt like it, and it just feels staged to some people."

Garrus sighed. "Asari politics? I can't make fringe or spur of it. I do know that this isn't like you. You've been shaken ever since you managed to settle on the Citadel, and you avoid your own people like the plague, most days." He paused, and she shrugged, and he shook his head. "I suppose I should be happy that you are here." His voice rumbled soothingly as he let himself relax, tracing his hands over her shoulders. "I am happy, just worried. This mission... it's not safe for you to be here, Tel. You could have turned them down."

She shook her head. "No, I couldn't. I can't just sit on the Citadel not knowing if you've been blown into pieces on some alien world. And I can't just... deny the Matriarchy, Garrus. I'd lose my position at C-SEC, and probably worse." She sighed, trailing her hand against the sharp angle of his jaw. "And I don't think the Matriarchy is going to take Shepard's word for it that she isn't a threat. There's stuff going on that has them spooked, I think. They... they sounded angry, and worried. What in the name of the Goddess worries the Council of Matriarchs, Garrus? I've seen one of them slap a pirate fighter out of the sky with a wave of her hand like it was a gnat."

Garrus leaned back against the wall. "I've never interacted much with matriarchs. But we tangled with Benezia on Feros, at least, Shepard and her team did. Liara fought her own mother. I don't think she's any kind of threat, honestly. She's... well, she's shy. Benezia sent geth and krogan to try to kill her when we found her on Feros..."

Telanya shrugged. "I'm sure this is all a waste of time, which is why I agreed to it. It was a way to be here...with you. That's my goal." She sighed, and glanced up. "That's...not what I came down here to talk about. I just... I wanted you to know why I am here... and to understand I'm not just here because they want me here. I don't want you to die, Garrus. I want us to have something. To heal, to... I don't know, sail on the seas of Palaven, or raise children in the hills of Thessia, or something... calm. Away from all this."

Garrus nodded, opening his mouth to speak, but she held up her hand. "I know, I know, Garrus. This isn't going to be easy. But I can't live in fear the rest of my life, and I'm not going to heal anytime soon. I know this." Her smile was sad, her eyes seeking his. "You know this."

Garrus bowed his head. Telanya's mind was wounded, he knew. The asari stalker that had nearly killed her had done something to her. She woke with nightmares often, whimpering, sometimes crying or just shaking helplessly. Garrus was there when he could be, but that wasn't often enough. "I'm... not doing a real hot job at being your bond-mate, Tel. I'm sorry."

Small blue fingers wrapped around his hands. "You're doing just fine, Garrus. If you weren't, I wouldn't need to be here."

O-OSABC-O

Telanya spent another half hour with Garrus, deciding that she was going to camp out in the gunnery room with him, and if that bothered anyone they could just deal with it. After dumping off her gear, she decided to report first to Cole, and then to Shepard.

As she traversed the mess deck, she saw the curious glances of some of the crew, and more than one set of eyes flicked from her over to the medical bay. She wondered why, as she entered the elevator, along with a strongly built human male, who triggered the lift control.

"So, ah... er, do you know Doctor T'Soni?" The human's face was set in what Tel assumed was a pleasant expression, but there was a nervous note to it. His name tag read Jackson, so she shrugged a bit and answered him.

"Goddess, no. She's asari royalty; I'm just a beat cop. I got tapped for this because I work in Customs and I can help track Saren, plus Garrus is my partner." She used an ambiguous word, not that she was ashamed of her relationship with Garrus, but not wanting to feed rumors either. She didn't have a good feel for humans.

"Huh. Maybe that's why she's so quiet and doesn't talk much." The big man rubbed his jaw. "I'm Gabe Jackson, marine platoon one. The top kick – uh, Master Chief Cole, said you'd be working with us."

The elevator slid open, revealing the cargo bay of the Normandy, and two lines of marines standing at attention in full armor, with Cole and a more slender, younger man next to him. Cole arched his eyebrow at the two as they stepped off. "Sergeant Jackson, how goddamned good of you to finally join us. And Sergeant Telanya, welcome to the unit." He motioned for her to stand at the end of one of the lines of marines, and cleared his throat.

"Alright, boys and girls. We had our teeth kicked in on Eingana, and that shit is not going to happen again. Each of you has been issued a new set of armor and a Crossfire rifle. The Crossfire is superior in every aspect to that piece of crap stock rifle you've been using since boot. Your armor will bounce rounds that would have gone through Onyx armor. Shepard has spent her own funds and her entire operational budget on outfitting you apes and you will not disappoint the commander." He paused. "Will you?"

"No, Master Chief!" Telanya was shocked by the thunder of 13-odd marines shouting in unison. This was completely alien to the calm, joking camaraderie of an asari militia unit. These humans were hard, violent, and drenched in adrenaline. Even the women looked chipped out of stone, every member of the unit towering a good foot above her. Cole glanced at Telanya, then at the two men at either end of the unit. "You've noticed our new members. That is why the LT is here, to discuss some organizational changes. Sir." He nodded, and the slender man stepped forward.

"I'm Lieutenant Kaidan Alenko, and until today I was the battle duty officer of the Normandy. Due to some holes in our ranks and the danger of the missions we're going into, Commander Shepard is changing up our organization ranks. Effective immediately, the Master Chief here is brevetted to First Lieutenant. That makes him the BDO. I will be leading a two man team consisting of Specialist Tali'Zorah and Specialist Urdnor Wrex, alongside Commander Shepard's team of Specialist Garrus Vakarian and Specialist Liara T'Soni. This gives both of our main teams a technical specialist, a biotic specialist, and someone who can do both."

Alenko paused. "Since Cole is now the BDO, Senior Chief Vega will be replacing him in Platoon One. As Platoon Chief, Gunnery Chief Williams will continue to oversee Platoon Two. Each platoon will get a specialist. Since platoon one is down only one person, you get Sergeant Telanya. She's trained in the asari military for over twenty years, been in C-SEC for five, and has more kills than any of us. Additionally she has biotic abilities, so your group will have a better defensive balance."

Telanya didn't react, although she knew her barriers were a bit rusty from not using them much. Alenko continued. "Our two DACT troopers will go into Platoon Two, acting as a rapid-reaction strike force. They will deploy with the Mako from orbital drop or act as emergency backup when needed."

Alenko turned to Cole, who smiled, before slapping the big man on the shoulder. "You have all done the Normandy, and the Corps, proud. I'll leave you to your briefing now, but you can still talk to me if you have questions."

Alenko exited the cargo-bay, and then Cole shrugged. "Alright, listen up. The fact they put fancy silverware on my collar does not mean I will not put my foot up your ass if you screw up in the field. We have a lot of prep to do in the next day. Shepard is taking us up against Cerberus. I want you all to field-strip those weapons, check all the seals on your armor, and make sure you are five by five before the ship casts off today." He paused. "Get hopping. Sergeant Telanya, Chief Williams a moment, please."

She followed him across the cargo bay, alongside a strongly built human woman. They were all so tall! Telanya looked up, taking in the woman's hard, muscled form, and her open, blunt face. Pretty, I suppose, if you like a touch of coarseness, but by the Goddess, what is the gravity on this barbaric Earth place to raise such sturdy natives?

Cole stopped at a series of lockers set into the wall. "Sergeant, Chief Williams is our armorer. We just got upgraded with some top of the line armor, and new weapons. As I said before, the light stuff you have on is not going to cut the mustard when it comes to fighting geth, or worse."

Telanya chuckled. "You'll forgive me if I'm not familiar with human idiom, but I am guessing that means you think this armor is too weak to stop geth rounds. Fair enough. I'm not sure about using your weapons, though." She unfolded her assault rifle from her back. "This is an asari weapon, a ... well, I guess you'd call it a plasma gun. I've seen the direct kinetic assault weapons your race uses. They work well against barriers, but they won't put holes in asari matriarchs very well."

Williams narrowed her eyes. "We'll be fighting geth and humans pretty soon too, Blue."

Telanya laughed. "And no doubt you'll slaughter them. I've seen the Eden Prime tapes, you are a fearsome warrior... so is Shepard... but I've trained with this weapon too many years to set it aside now, although I am interested in new armor. C-SEC," she said dryly, "can be... cheap."

Both Cole and Williams grunted, almost in unison, then glanced at each other. "Yeah, so can the Systems Alliance. That's why Shepard had to upgrade everything herself. You've fitted armor before, I presume?" Williams voice was still cool, but less so than a moment before.

Telanya nodded. "I have. Shouldn't be much of a problem, assuming it's not too big for me to wear."

Cole nodded, activating his omni-tool. "I'm going to start uploading the SA command frequencies and communications package to your omni-tool now. For the rest of the day just get settled in. When we're traveling, there's not much for the marine contingent to do. We'll set up the firing range later on tonight, see how good you are with a gun. Chow for the marines is at 0800, 1300 and 1900. We get up at 0600 and do morning PT from 0700 to breakfast, then drills from 1000 to lunch, and finally evening training from 1700 to 1900. The rest of the time is yours to use as you see fit."

Telanya nodded. "Thank you, Master Chief – is that the correct form of address? Or should I call you Lieutenant?"

Cole shook his head, even as Williams grinned. "Don't call me Lieutenant. Not thrilled 'bout being kicked upstairs, I like being in the line of fire, not standing back shouting orders. Williams, fix her up with her armor, then come find me, we need to review the jump-lunatic's armor packages." Cole strode away, but then paused. "Oh. Just a reminder. Make sure you talk to the Commander after you get squared up, Sergeant."

Telanya turned to Williams, who shrugged and began to lug out armor.

O-OSABC-O

Telanya had been on board an hour, and the ship was moving, beginning the undocking process. Now fully kitted out and equipped, she reported to the Mess Deck, looking around and finally locating the single door that lead to Shepard's quarters.

She activated the door control, which chimed and flashed yellow. A moment later the door slid open, revealing the Commander's quarters. They were very small and compact, with little decoration. The Commander sat in a chair in the corner, dressed in light BDU's, and next to her stood an asari.

The asari was beautiful, in a cold manner. Telanya took in the classical features and the fact that this asari was a head taller than she was. She glanced back over her shoulder, eyes widening in surprise, and Telanya first saluted the commander before bowing formally to the asari. "Commander Shepard, Sergeant Telanya Nasan, C-SEC Customs. I hail from the colonies, of no clan and of only minor achievement. I assume this is Lady Liara of House T'Soni?"

The commander and Liara traded a strange, almost guilty look, before the asari turned and faced Telanya fully. "I will let you conclude your business with the commander in private, Sergeant." Without another word or even a hint of an introduction, she walked past Telanya and vanished.

The sheer rudeness of such an act – not even bothering to identify herself, so unlike an asari – left Telanya speechless for a long second, enough time for Shepard to stand and address her directly. "Sergeant, welcome aboard. I can only assume you've been briefed on our mission and your place here." Shepard turned to face Telanya squarely. "That being said, you're not here for me to discuss that, but to ask you exactly how you can help us bring down Saren. I asked the SA for replacement infantrymen and I'm still not exactly sure how you got here .. or how best to use you."

Telanya gave a small nod. "I'm not sure about who made the calls or decisions, Commander, but in short, I believe that I can provide essential assistance. When C-SEC was investigating Saren, Garrus's partner was researching the movement of Saren's money. He wasn't able to pin down exactly what was going on, but Saren had investments in a number of companies, as did Matriarch Benezia. Many of these companies were either related to genetic research or in stellar cartography."

Shepard rubbed her chin, a thoughtful expression crossing her otherwise calm features. "We have intelligence suggesting Saren is looking for an old Prothean world of legend, called Ilos. So the stellar cartography makes sense...but why genetic research?"

Telanya shrugged. "He may be just using the companies as a front to launder money or hide resources he plans to use in some other fashion. So far, everything has been legal, and the companies claim they haven't had any contact with Saren or Benezia since the Council outlawed them. However, since the largest two companies are based on Noveria, which is outside the Citadel's jurisdiction, we have no real way of knowing."

Shepard tilted her head. "Noveria, huh? I think after we clean up Cerberus, we'll take a joyride out to Noveria and see if we can't shake anything loose. We haven't had any leads since we ran into Saren and Benezia on Feros." Shepard paused, thinking, and Telanya shifted from foot to foot before biting her lip and asking a question.

"Commander, about Matriarch Benezia. . . we plan to engage her in combat? She is one of the most powerful asari in the galaxy and your team .. seems a bit light on biotics."

Shepard laughed at that, but it was a rueful, bitter laugh. "You are correct, Sergeant. We had Saren cold on Feros, my team had dropped one of his allies, most of his geth, and I had him dead to rights. Benezia basically defeated myself, Liara, a krogan battlemaster, and a SA N7 special forces soldier in about three seconds. I think she was holding back because of Liara, but... I don't have a good answer for your question. Liara would like to capture her rather than kill her obviously, but I'm not totally sure we can do either. Do you have a suggestion?"

Telanya was surprised the Commander would ask her opinion, but after a moment she shrugged. "Appeal to the Asari Republic for assistance."

Shepard tilted her head, black hair shifting to fall across her face a moment before she pushed it back behind one ear. "I get the feeling the Asari Republic would like to see her dead, and maybe Liara with her. They don't seem keen on embarrassment. Unfortunately, we may have to take her out on our own, which is going to be very rough. I hope you're up for that."

Telanya had no real answer for that, and a moment later the intercom barked. "Commander, we've got clearance to the Widow Relay. What are your orders?" Joker's voice sounded tense, and Shepard smiled grimly.

"Is Pressly in ops yet?"

Pressly's voice sounded, a bit weak but steady. "I'm here, Commander. Doctor Chakwas isn't happy about it, and I'll have to stay off my feet and run things from a station, but I should be up for this. We're getting updates from the STG and the 9th Citadel Fleet about their assault on Cerberus...they've just started."

Shepard clicked off, and turned to Telanya. "You should head down to see Cole and get ready for combat, Sergeant. We'll finish this conversation later, and you can tell me the best ways to annoy Garrus." She smiled then, and Telanya couldn't help but smile back, before saluting and turning to go.

"Telanya."

The asari paused, turning to face Shepard, who'd lost her smile all of a sudden. "Garrus is going to be in harm's way quite a bit. Usually the SA doesn't let spouses serve on the same ship, but he's an integral part of my fighting team. You're sure you can handle this?"

Telanya shrugged. "I'd rather be here and in the fight than wringing my hands on the Citadel not knowing he's dead or alive, Commander. He's never been safe, not in C-SEC, and this is no different. I'm just thankful you've allowed me to be on board where I can help make sure he... that we all get out of this alive."

Shepard nodded. "Fair enough."

O-OSABC-O

Twenty minutes later, Shepard had emerged onto the CIC, and was reviewing intel from the STG and Council assault on Cerberus as the Normandy pulled away from the Citadel. Flashes of blue and silver blinked over ominous orange and black circles, data streams erupting from each one on the galaxy map. Shepard gritted her teeth and tapped the control panel next to the railing. "Joker, do we have comms with Admiral Kahoku?"

Pressly had processed out of the medbay and was sitting at the ops alley station closest to the CIC, Doctor Chakwas standing next to him and applying a medical package. While he could at least run the ops alley, Pressly would still be too weak to run around handling navigation, leaving the inexperienced Friggs to act as navigator. Alenko was on the ops alley as well, brushing the rust off his tactical officer skills, but everyone knew that if Pressly wasn't really fit for this task, the Normandy would be in trouble.

Joker's voice was flat, unusual for the volatile pilot. "We have a com-link to the SSV Phoenix, the Admiral's cruiser. Patching you through." There was a pause and a blast of static, then the strong voice of a man could be heard. "This is Captain Parker, SSV Phoenix."

Shepard cleared her throat. "Captain, this is Commander Shepard. It's my understanding the main assault on Cerberus positions known to the Council has started. The admiral was supposed to have a lead on their HQ for us – is he available?"

The captain's voice dropped an octave. "No, Commander, he is not. He lit out about ten hours ago on a combat shuttle with a DACT drop team to investigate a fragmentary return on a distress beacon from his regiment, and we have... we have not been able to regain contact. There's a Cerberus cruiser in this damned system and we're playing hide and go seek with her. She's got us outgunned."

Shepard grunted. "Our ETA is 44 minutes. The Theta Relay drops us right into your system. We'll help you take out the cruiser and then we need to find Admiral Kahoku. I'll patch you through to my tactical officer. Shepard out." She slapped her controls and glanced to Kaidan, who nodded and picked up the comm to figure out details of the assault.

Shepard turned back to the map, grimacing. After dealing with Pressly (and a charming mid-morning call from Udina's office, with him sourly applauding Shepard on neither shooting anyone nor starting a street battle), she'd been sent a briefing packet on the assault on the Cerberus organization. Since her recommendation of such an assault, the STG had worked closely with elements of the Shadow Broker, routed through a Spectre and kept entirely off normal comms channels. Except for Shepard and Kahoku, no one in the Systems Alliance expected the assault to occur until months in the future, but the STG had scouted as many positions as they could.

Lead by Spectres and combining asari commandos, STG snipers, and turian Deathwatch special ops, the Council Fleets had rushed almost thirty such locations. Most were supply depots, comm relays, or caches of weapons, armors, and supplies. But three such locations were forward bases, defended by Cerberus soldiers.

Initial approach to most of the facilities had been easy. The outlying areas were guarded by little more than poorly armed conscripts, but the comms information had all been deleted. The STG got partial returns on one base, rushing in two asari commando units. Cerberus met these with an entire tank division with gunship support, falling back to a huge fortified base on one system and a dug-in series of bunkers on another, standing off two entire armies.

The STG planners of the assault were convinced that the central core of Cerberus operations had not been located, and that Kahoku's regiment had stumbled on it, based on fragmented messages they salvaged from the Cerberus comms system. Launching full assaults on the two known military locations would be suicide – each was protected by Cerberus's own fleets and GTS missile batteries, anti-air mass accelerators, and nearly 15,000 Cerberus troops. The STG were stunned at Cerberus's strength. So the decision was made to hope Kahoku's intel - whatever it's source - would allow Shepard to find and take out the HQ, perhaps triggering a surrender of other Cerberus forces.

Shepard worried more about the battle reports. The Cerberus forces were light on armor, heavy on snipers, close quarters fighters, tech-saboteurs, and the like. In open battle, she was confident the Citadel military would slaughter the Cerberus forces. The turian generals advising the STG agreed with that assessment, but they were holding off such assaults until they could be sure nothing could get away. But the generals and Shepard were both wondering why Cerberus's military was more suited to urban assaults than general battle, and in her own mind, Shepard had come to some disturbing conclusions.

Shepard straightened. Even assuming Kahoku's men had found Cerberus HQ, taking it would not be easy. She had the authority and comms links to request heavy backup, including 4 units of asari commandos and 2 entire turian infantry regiments, but she was not the best at direct assault tactics and couldn't afford her usual attritional assault tactics, since getting half of an alien force killed to stop human terrorists would not end well.

And yet, she might not have any choice. Ground assault on a hardened defensive facility, with what was sure to be heavy ground to space defenses? People – aliens – were going to die in heaps and piles taking that Cerberus HQ out, if the information was even valid . And if it wasn't, she fully expected Cerberus to scramble a cruiser or worse try to stop her ship.

It didn't help she was still wondering why Saren had made no moves recently. Was the stupid bastard dead? What did they learn from the Cipher that she hadn't? Shepard pinched the bridge of her nose and made a small, frustrated noise. Too many questions, too few answers, too many expectations.

One of the orange and black circles flickered and died on the galaxy map, and one of her tech-ops snorted. "Goddamned lunatics detonated a tac nuke on themselves, Ma'am. They took about 300 turians with them."

Shepard shook her head in a mix of disgust and awe. How did you convince people to throw their lives away like that? Willingly? Or did Cerberus HQ just blow the place up remotely, with the defenders not even knowing they were going to die? Would taking out the HQ really make the rest of the forces surrender, or would they fight on?

She couldn't answer those questions. She had to find her inner coldness again. There wasn't room or time for her to be Sara Shepard, Commander, or Sara Shepard, N7 leader, or even Sara Shepard, Spectre. These Cerberus assholes were powerful, well trained, fanatic, and lead by the most immoral and evil fuckers she'd ever heard of, men who would possibly kill an entire regiment of human soldiers to keep their location secret.

No, it was time for the Butcher to handle business.

O-OSABC-O

The Normandy emerged in the Sparta system and deployed its heat emissions gear quickly, as the CIC was filled with tactical and nav personnel. Finally cleared by Chakwas and left alone, Pressly was sitting in one of the ops alley stations, wearing a T-shirt and marine camo pants, a medical package over his shoulder, a drawn expression on his face. "Commander, we have the Phoenix on primary sensors...and an additional contact."

Shepard glanced at the tac plot even as the tactical team started its track. "New contact, Hotel zero one. Bearing, zero zero six, mark two, range 45 thousand. Initial firing solution ready". The tac ops voice was steady, and Shepard nodded grimly. "Joker, full IES stealth, take us in under that Cerberus cruiser."

The Normandy arced out and down, the faint light of Sparta's sun glimmering off the curves of her hull as the lights dimmed. Shepard pulled down the 1MC communicator from the station overhead and announced "All hands, man battle stations. Marine contingent, prepare for insertion in one five minutes."

In the cargo bay, marines put on their new armor for the first time, slapping each other with high fives and strapping on flat-pack grenades and other tactical gear. Telanya's eyes widened as she took in the power armored suits of the two DACT marines, now hulking seven foot tall giants with coaxial mass accelerators on each arm. The two huge marines gave wolf-like howls and crashed their helmets together with a sharp crack, and Wrex grunted his approval.

Telanya shot a glance at Senior Chief Vega, her face set in amazed curiosity, and the big man just laughed. "Ignore them, there's a reason we call them lunatics." Vega lifted his 774 series Typhoon LMG, and barked out loudly. "Marines! Are you hot?"

"Hot, locked, and ready to rock, SIR!" The booming voices echoed around the cargo bay, and Vega nodded to Master Chief Cole, who jerked his head towards Mako's.

"Alright apes, pile on. You two jump lunatics can find your own way down when we go in, till then, let the fly-boys clear the skies." Vega gestured to the rightmost MAKO. "Sergeant Telanya, we're gonna load into the back of that Mako. They're orbital drop vehicles."

Telanya's blue eyes regarded the two slab-like tanks, then turned back to face the human sergeant. "Garrus is right. You people really are crazy."

The ship lurched, sending Marines skidding. Telanya reflexively used her biotics, anchoring herself and dropping a weak barrier over the Marines to keep them from flying down the length of the temporarily vertical cargo hold. The ship righted, creaking from stress, and Williams grunted out her thanks for the save. The IMC boomed again, Shepard's icy calm voice sounding almost bored. "Prepare for high speed evasive maneuvers." She apparently forgot to click it off as a blast shook the ship, roaring out questions, followed by "Joker, I want that fucker dead, now."

On the CIC deck, Pressly's fingers were moving over his haptic display, as the Normandy pulled another turn. The Cerberus cruiser was agile, built to some kind of heavily armored spec that wasn't any Alliance standard. It had pasted the SSV Phoenix pretty hard, and that ship was drifting without power now, its drive core knocked offline.

The Normandy's speed and maneuverability was matched against the cruiser's firepower and armor, but so far the contest was uneven. Shepard's mind considered the possibilities as the Normandy power-skidded past two more missile salvos, but a third clipped their shields, drawing curses from Joker that weren't even remotely anatomically possible.

Shepard grimaced, and looked across the deck to Pressly. "I need options, XO."

The man nodded, his face drawn with pain and ashen looking, his forehead sheened with sweat. "Trying, Commander. He's just got too many missiles." His hands moved across the haptic keyboard, trying jamming and e-chaff, but the expression on his face told Shepard that he wasn't finding much success.

Shepard grunted, then grimaced as the entire ship shook, as missiles crashed into the underbelly of the ship and shook every deck. The lights flickered as the shields quick-booted and restored themselves.

She'd had enough of this cat and mouse game. "Joker, get us in close. Once you get below him, do a deflection, spin the ship, and nail him with the guns." She ignored the pilot as he began to squawk about the order and instead punched up the target plot. "Fire a spread of torpedoes, detonate them at half effective range. I need this guy blind for this to work."

The silver hawk of the Normandy slashed past the ugly white Cerberus cruiser's flank, taking two shots from a broadside as she did, nearly shattering the shields and one shot skipping through them to crease the armor on the wing. Torpedoes lanced out even as this happened, gleaming silver nodules promising death, and the Cerberus ship shifted its aspect, GARDIAN batteries opening up in a blaze of defensive fire.

Joker gritted his teeth as he twisted the ship to the angle below the field of fire, the mass core pulsing weirdly as it allowed the ship to ignore its own inertia, skidding across empty space like skipping a stone across a pond. With a series of taps he angled the ship's main engines to the right and fired, throwing the Normandy into a counter-clockwise spin, even while he forced the reaction control thrusters to elevate the nose.

For about half a second, the Normandy was bow-on to the underbelly of the Cerberus cruiser, still knocking down torpedoes. In that half second, the main gun spat six mass rounds with full power. The Cerberus cruiser, its tac ops staff having taken the Normandy's maneuver for a cut-and-run, was not expecting the shots.

The first three flared impotently against the cruiser's shields, the fourth shattering them but skidding off harmlessly. The fifth slug slammed directly into the belly of the cruiser, splintering armor plating and punching through with tremendous kinetic force. The last shot, unhindered, smashed deep into the ship itself.

The result was catastrophic for the cruiser. The slug had blown apart every control surface link and the ship's computer, leaving the cruiser dead and without power for a few seconds while backups tried to kick in. The shots themselves had not been too bad, and under any other circumstances the Cruiser would have rebooted its disrupted systems, turned, and probably crushed the Normandy.

But it had only shot down five of the six torpedoes. The sixth arced in, slamming into the top of the cruiser, and detonated, a weapon designed to crack dreadnaught shielding after hitting bare hull. Grainy, almost silvery light spilled out like some poorly animated special effect as matter and antimatter annihilated each other, and ball of pure energy tore through the center of the Cerberus cruiser.

The Normandy rattled and shook with the blast, as the entire front half of the enemy ship simply atomized under the tremendous blast, and a moment later, the back half blew apart in a titanic explosion, sending debris everywhere. The ops alley cheered as Joker brought the ship around, and Shepard exhaled quietly. "Good work. Joker, bring us alongside the Phoenix and let's get them back online."

Pressly cleared his board, then gave the Commander a weak smile. "Looks like you have a better grasp of the tactics than I do, ma'am."

Shepard snorted. "If it hadn't been for you working your magic with the ECM and chaff we'd have gotten pasted just like the SSV Phoenix." She took in his drawn appearance and the sheen of sweat dampening his t-shirt and sighed. "For now, I want you back in the med bay. I know you're tough, but I need you at top performance, XO."

Pressly sighed and nodded, and Shepard turned back to the galaxy map, waiting to dock with the Phoenix and grimacing as orange and black lights flashed and faded under the tide of silver and blue lights.

---

Chapter 73: Chapter 64: Cerberus, Ambush

---

A/N: I don't know how often I'll be updating for a while. A lot of stuff just kind of went bad for me all at once. I had a .. really bad interaction with someone I was trying to open up to, as hard as that was. I just found out I'll be out of my job on Friday. My mother's insurance is all messed up so that will, of course, not fix financial issues much either. And it's the anniversary of my wife's death, which is, as you can expect, always an emotionally great time to be fucking alive.

I didn't use my normal beta-reader (Owelpost) for most of this, because of work and other difficulties on both our parts, so if the wordage is clunky or there's misspellings, that's my own stupidity coming out. I wanted to get this chapter out since it was pretty much done since I'm not sure I will feel like writing for a week or two. I'm about half done with the chapter beyond it and we'll see where things go from there.

I know that AU's aren't exactly ... popular. The fact that SI's, humor fics and the like seem to have a lot more popularity doesn't really bother me. But I got a fairly rude PM about my 'dismantling of canon' and how 'disrespectful' it is to change things around so much that sorta makes you question why you bother in the first place.

Anyway, just wanted to let whoever reads this to know that the next chapter may be a ways in the future.

---

The SSV Phoenix was a much larger ship than the Normandy, but it had still not been a match for the Cerberus cruiser. As the Phoenix finished extending the docking tube to link the two ships, Shepard took in the heavy blast damage along the starboard side of the ship, noting places where the armor had been melted or blasted away.

Beside her, Kaidan was pulling up the Cerberus data packet sent by the Citadel onto his omni-tool. Although he would be leading a team of his own alongside Shepard, he still would be in charge of relating battle strategy to the Marine contingent, and as such, she wanted him to hear the briefing from the captain of the Phoenix about whatever new clusterfuck they were about to step into.

The Normandy shuddered once as the tube clicked into place, and the airlock light cycled from red to yellow as air was pumped into the docking gangway between the ships. Shepard smoothed back her hair and glanced over her shoulder at Kaidan. "Anything of interest, Lieutenant?"

Alenko shrugged, eyes narrowed as he scanned through the documents. "Not really, ma'am. It looks like the turians have hit some serious problems in their assault on the two Cerberus bases – several more of these over-armored cruisers jumped in and savaged a troop transport before being driven off by the Fleet." He tabbed over on the haptic screen his omnitool was displaying. "As far as ground forces, it's pretty nasty stuff. Lots of snipers, mixed with close-quarters fighters and heavy infantry."

Shepard huffed, as the airlock door cycled open, the light shifting to green. The two Alliance officers crossed over quickly, the airlock shutting behind them. Shepard had never shifted from ship to ship in deep space, and the flimsy feeling of the docking tube wasn't very comforting.

They entered the Phoenix's airlock, both giving small sighs of relief as the airlock shut behind them, and then the doors opened into the Phoenix itself.

Like most SA ships that didn't have turian influence, the airlock opened into a open room, with waist-high defensive barriers and automated turrets to deal with boarding parties. Waiting for them was a single lieutenant, young and dressed in BDU's. "Lieutenant Chalmes, ma'am. If you'll follow me, the Captain is in the CIC."

They followed him out into the main corridor, and Shepard winced. The corridor was wider than anything on the cramped Normandy, lined with storage lockers and illuminated with track-lights. Many lockers were askew, their contents hastily shoved back to clear a walkway, and two injured sailors were on the ground, being tended to by medics. Melted paneling and jagged fragments of blackened shrapnel littered the ground, and a haze of acrid, bitter smoke still hung in the air.

The three officers walked down the corridor, taking steps down into the center of the ship, which showed no battle damage. Kaidan glanced around and sighed. "You look like you got hit pretty hard, Lieutenant."

Their guide sighed, using a pass-card to open two heavy blast doors, and nodded. "We thought we had them pinned down, but they had some kind of multimunitions torpedo that ended up frying most of our systems. Once the drive core went down they landed some direct hits on us. The medbay is wrecked, decks 2 and 3 are mostly in ruins, and part of hydroponics is just a waterlogged mess, so we'll have to fall back to resupply – we don't have O2 reserves or enough food to last without hydroponics being up."

Shepard nodded, as they passed through a tunnel of thick armor banding into a circular room, with two levels. The upper level was manned by tac-ops on various consoles, much like the ops alley on the Normandy, and the lower level was dominated by a large, circular information console and war map. Standing in front of it was a craggy-faced older man, with spiky dark hair only barely cut into Alliance spec, and piercing, angry black eyes. His otherwise pale features were lined with stress, and his dress blue command uniform was spattered with blood on the right arm, which was wrapped in a medical package.

"Captain Chris Parker. Welcome aboard, Commander." He extended his hand for a shake, and Shepard took it, frowning at the shake but shrugging a moment later as the man turned away. "We're really glad you guys showed up when you did, that bastard pretty much had us dead-bang."

Shepard glanced at the tactical map, a cool smile lighting her features. "They didn't know who they were fucking with."

Parker gave a bark of amused laughter, and faced her from the far side of the map. "Clearly. Alright, here's what we have. We jumped into this system based on intel from the Admiral. What kind, we have no clue – he wasn't being very chatty about it, and he sounded as if he expected Cerberus traitors to have riddled the entire command structure." Parker grunted. "As if I'd let that kind of shit happen on the Phoenix..."

Shepard folded her arms, letting her weight fall back onto one leg. "Underestimating a foe is the first step towards letting them get the drop on you, Captain. Cerberus isn't a pack of biotic terrorists blowing up a food station, or Earth First goons going after colony ships."

Parker sighed. "I know that. But I know my crew. And we didn't have any issues getting in system. Kahoku took his personal battle transport and said he was going to check out the third planet, as he'd gotten a ping response from his regiment's emergency transponder. Apparently it was so weak that it didn't have the juice to even reach the comm buoy near the mass relay. We were supposed to pick him up about two hours ago, but three hours ago we lost all comms."

Kaidan looked up. "Suddenly, or was it planned?"

Parker shrugged. "The last comm we had with his ground team indicated they'd found something weird in the ruins of an old pre-FCW colony on the planet. We were going to wait for clarification...then we got the message from High Command to pull back to the relay and hold position, waiting for you. So we hauled ass here, high speed, and came in blind, that is when that Cerberus cruiser dropped in from FTL and unloaded on us."

Shepard nodded. "How many men did Kahoku take with him?"

Parker pulled his omnitool up, tapping on its screen. "He had two squads of DACT jump troopers with him, a couple of AISholes, and 3 squads of A's from the 11th RRU." Parker shrugged. "The shuttle was equipped with a JOTUN mech as well. I can't imagine what could take out that many men so fast they couldn't get a damned message off."

Kaidan frowned. The Alliance Intelligence Services – or "AISholes", to people that didn't care for their under-handed tactics – were all highly trained at spotting traps and ambushes. DACT teams were power-armored maniacs with heavy machine guns and plasma throwers, most with at least 15 years experience, and were some of the hardest fighters in the entire Alliance. A-rank marines were all veterans, and if they were in the Rapid Reaction Units, they would have also had heavy training, likely having seen heavy combat and ready for anything. Finally, a JOTUN mech was a towering 14 foot tall battle robot, equipped with a high powered grenade launcher, coaxial mass accelerators, and shielding that could bounce light mortar fire.

Even if they were outnumbered as much as ten to one, they should have been able to get off some kind of message...unless they were jammed. Kaidan turned to Shepard. "A force of that size is a lot stronger than anything the Normandy can bring to bear, ma'am. And if they couldn't get a message off... they might be jammed."

Shepard shook her head. "If there was a jamming field, how is the beacon's signal getting through even after they lost comms? As for the numbers, well, if whatever is down there took down an entire regiment of 800 or so men, numbers won't help." She examined the map, thinking, then looked up at Parker. "The Normandy is going to drop both MAKOs on the surface and check it out. How much longer until your engineers restore full power?"

Parker scratched his ear. "The core is back up, we're mostly rerouting blown circuits and bypassing the computer core that got wrecked. But we don't have a working medbay and I have over eighty casualties and about forty dead. We're not going to be much help, Commander."

Shepard sniffed. "Alright. After we get dropped off, the Normandy will circle back to help with repairs, until reinforcements show up. We can't figure out what happened up here, we'll drop a good ways out and try to do reconnaissance in force. Get your ship patched up enough to jump out and then withdraw, Captain."

Parker frowned. "Commander, you should probably wait for back-up units to arrive..." He paused as Shepard gestured to the map, where another black orange circle flickered and vanished, along with a blue square.

Shepard's face was set in cold lines. "They're blowing themselves trying to take a few aliens with them when they go. We don't know what's happened to Kahoku, his men, or even why the fuck his men were in this empty shithole of a system to begin with. The more time we take to find Cerberus HQ and put a bullet in those fucks, the more time they have to cover their tracks." Shepard's eyes were hard and cold. "Fix your ship and withdraw, Captain. Spectre authority."

The older captain grimaced and nodded reluctantly, and Shepard waved a hand in Kaidan's direction. "Patch all this through to your combat net, Lieutenant, then let's get to killing." She swiveled on a heel with lithe quickness, stalking off in her usual pantherine gait, and Kaidan hurried after her, updating his omni-tool's links as he went.

O-OSABC-O

Telanya was more than a little nervous.

The inside of the MAKO tank was cramped, with hard, square seats and too much useless information scrolling on small haptic screens on the ceiling of the vehicle. The marine squad was crammed into the seats in full armor, slapping on seal patches, checking extra weapons, and tightening armor straps. She'd turned her translator off for a moment, and she could hear their native language, sounding like a pack of angry shanda-beasts hooting to one another before moving in for a kill.

She'd seen plenty of humans before, but that was as a C-SEC officer – watching them from cameras, or across the desk of a customs station, elevated a good 4 feet off the ground and staring down at them. They seemed small and timid then, most of them from the colonies, blinded by the Citadel's opulence. Up close with their soldiers, they didn't seem tame at all.

The angles of the MAKO set her teeth on edge, all lines and edges, not a single curve to be seen. There was no grace in it, no elegance, just threatening, sheer raw power and blocky endurance. Like the humans. She gave a private laugh to herself, thinking about her friends back on Thessia, and how they saw humans as little more than entertaining sex partners.

They were dangerous in the extreme. She cut her omnitool back on, the guttural growling being seamlessly translated to the elegance of the asari language, but she could still hear it, the strange clicking and growling noises in the background like some kind of demented echo. The Master Chief was speaking to the platoon, even while the tank shifted, the Normandy obviously angling to go into the atmosphere.

Cole was dressed in different armor from the rest of the soldiers. They – and now, she – wore suits of armor, heavy and thick, with a blue-scale camo pattern on black bodysuits. The left shoulder contained an integral heavy shield generator, and every marine had on a belt of grenades and a high-powered pistol as a sidearm. She held Tithas, her Spear of Athame battle rifle – it had belonged to her mother, and was her only possession of value. The other marines held Crossfire heavy rifles, each one equipped with a haptic swing-out targeting sight and an under-barrel disc grenade launcher.

Cole grunted, then a smile crossed his craggy features. "We're going to drop in a few minutes, so you apes need to get hot and ready. We're dropping as Vengeful Shield – this is a rescue mission, defensive options only. An Alliance admiral is down there somewhere, so is the transponder of a ship that carried an entire regiment of Marines."

Cole lit one of his trademark cigars, aromatic blue smoke wafting around the tiny compartment. "I don't know if he's still alive or dead, and that doesn't matter. I want you to put your foot up the ass of whoever took him out if he is dead, and I want you to defend him with your lives if he's still alive. No heroics, no bullshit." Cole paused, locking eyes with each of them. She met his gaze evenly, and Cole finally nodded. "Now, Platoon Two is going to be down two men because our goddamned DACT think it would be fun to orbital drop first as scouts, so I'll be working with Chief Williams. Chief Vega, these apes are yours. Deploy forward defense and hold."

Senior Chief Vega nodded. "Got it, ese -"

He was cut off by the 1MC announcement circuit, the voice of the Commander speaking. "All hands, stand by for extreme high speed maneuvers and hot drop. All hands, man battle station condition one, set defenses for repel hostile boarding parties. Carry on."

Telanya glanced at Vega, who shrugged and continued. "I got this, top." Turning back to the men and women of Platoon One, Vega's voice was softer, more ... nuanced. "We already have complications, so let's not fuck this up. Jackson, you'll take point. Telanya, take rear guard, and keep an eye out." He proceeded to give everyone in the group a main and a fallback task, as the ship began to shudder and buck.

Shepard's cold voice echoed across the MAKO again, across the 1MC. "All hands, brace for extreme high speed maneuvers." Vega grinned, sitting into his seat and bringing the restraint bar down across his chest. "Alright, Marines. Get hot!"

The squad loaded ammo blocks and engaged the spin-ups of their assault rifles mass generators, and Telanya flicked the safety on her own weapon, a faint blue glow creeping up the translucent barrel. The woman next to her slotted three HE grenades into her weapon, while across from her, a male marine unclipped his shotgun and checked its loads before rolling his shoulders and cradling the weapon across his chest.

Vega glanced up as Telanya spoke. "Senior Chief, when Master Chief Cole said your DACT troopers were planning to orbital drop, did he mean they have their own small landing vehicles?"

Vega's good-natured grin only widened as he triggered the multifunction display in the ceiling of the MAKO. "Not quite, Sergeant." Telanya glanced up, looking at the telemetry.

Outside, the two DACT troopers sealed their massive ICARUS jump armor, flaring mass effect jets on the back glowing blue and white. As the Normandy began to scream through the atmosphere, the two once again cracked their helmets together, then gave blood-curdling howls as they were launched from the small drop bay in the Normandy's nose, hurtling into the atmosphere.

The ICARUS armor immediately deployed omni-gel, the gel building ablative shielding around each trooper, as their shields kicked in, angling to slip them through the atmosphere. Powerful computers in the armor adjusted the mass effect jets and fields of the armor, as the two men scythed through the lower atmosphere, trailing a blazing corona of crumbling ablative armor. The omni-gel generators in the suits continued to pump out new ablative coatings as they broke through the lower atmosphere, blasting through faint gray clouds.

The suits jerked as mass effect jets reversed their flow direction, and a series of breakaway parachutes erupted from the heavy packs on each trooper's back, halting their momentum. A few seconds later the two DACT troopers crashed to the ground in a ball of omni-gel shock cushioning, which detonated and flew apart in a hail of shrapnel a moment later, reacting to a pulse coming from the armor's shield generator to clear an area.

The two men popped up, one lifting a heavy mass acceleration minigun, the other a plasma incinerator, and they swept the area in slow circles. "Normandy, this is Angel One. We are dirtside, we have no hostiles, and no indicators of combat. Area is clear, drop beacon is hot." The other soldier triggered a beacon on his belt, generating a guide-path for the Normandy, and the frigate turned into the atmosphere, the cargo bay doors opening.

Telanya's eyes were still wide as she watched the telemetry. "You people are insane."

Vega grinned wider before slapping his faceplate shut. "Marines! Are you hot!" Once again, the inside of the MAKO resounded with shouting – "Hot, locked, and ready to rock, SIR!"

The MAKO gave a surging thrust, and Telanya's eyes widened in horror as she realized exactly what Vega meant by a combat drop. "What is wrong with you lunatics! Don't you humans have fucking ramps?"

Garrus's dry voice cut into the comm. "You know, Tel, I asked them that, and Shepard just laughed at me. I'm not sure they advanced enough to get that far..."

Chief Williams' acerbic voice sounded. "We evolved far enough to put our foot up your ass, Vakarian." Telanya winced, but Garrus just laughed. "Well, Chief Williams-"

Shepard's icy voice cut off the chatter. "You can make 'yo mamma' jokes, later, battle chicken. Landing in fifteen seconds. Squads deploy upon landing, defensive perimeter." Telanya grit her teeth and a few seconds later, the MAKO landed in a shaking, jolting cessation of movement that left her wondering if she'd broken her neck.

Of course, the marines around her just howled in exultation. Frightful.

O-OSABC-O

The terrain of Edolus was not particularly inviting. The area they'd landed in was flat, almost unnaturally so, with large lumps of terrain breaking the monotony ever few hundred feet. The sky was a pale gray, even in daylight, with wispy, sullen looking darker gray clouds skittering along in the high wind. To the west, the lip of a massive impact crater could be seen, along with ancient lines of ejecta from the impact.

Shepard consulted the map in her omni-tool, Liara and Garrus crouched next to her. She'd split her teams up for maximum effectiveness. She, Garrus, and Liara would take 1st Squad to the site of the beacon, while Kaidan would lead Wrex, Tali and 2nd Squad in the other MAKO to the last known fix they had on Kahoku.

Shepard had reviewed the comms Kahoku's team had engaged in with the Phoenix, and nothing stood out as abnormal. Edolus had been a small human colony before the First Contact War, but after the war it had been abandoned as not profitable and difficult to defend. That meant the terraforming wasn't completed, and the air wasn't quite safe to breathe. There could be anything here, as humanity had hardly paid the place any attention in twenty years.

Shepard was tempted to call the Normandy back to do orbital scans, but hesitated. Mainly because the Phoenix was a sitting duck – the Normandy could stealth, after all, but the Phoenix couldn't, and if more of those Cerberus cruisers showed up, she was done. But also, something was nagging at her. The men of Kahoku's regiment would have been traveling in either a battle transport or a cruiser. Yet there was no sign of the ship in orbit.

That either meant it had been taken – and what the hell could board and capture a ship packed full of Marines – or it had been shot down trying to land. If it had been taken out trying to land, that meant serious ground-to-space guns, probably powerful enough to turn the Normandy into so much silver and black confetti if it came in for a landing. Best to find out what happened, neutralize any threat, and then call for backup if needed.

Tali broke into her ruminations. "Commander, I have both drones up. The beacon is about half a mile north, while the last transmission of Admiral Kahoku is a mile past that, in the direction of the old colony site. There.. there's some kind of energy emission in that direction, but I can't get a good fix on it."

Shepard glanced over the little quarian. "Interference?"

Tali shook her head, nervously twisting her hands together. "N-no. It's... it's like a localized jamming field. The drop beacon is outside of its range, but Kahoku's last transmission is within it. I've never seen anything like it.

Shepard's eyes narrowed as she took in this new information, running the scenario through her mind. A regiment hunting Cerberus goes missing on an abandoned planet, but manages to get off a beacon, which Kahoku somehow finds out about and goes chasing after. Once he lands, his ship is ambushed and nearly destroyed, while he gets jammed and just ... vanishes.

Garrus growled, and his stance shifted, becoming almost .. predatory. The legs tensed, and the blank plate of his helmet whipped around to face her. "This is a trap, Shepard."

Shepard snorted. "What was your first clue? Alright, change of plans. Everybody mount up into the MAKO, we're checking this damned beacon out. " It took a few minutes for everything to get put into place, but soon the two MAKOs were rolling along, the ride surprisingly smooth for once, given the level nature of the terrain.

Liara, no stranger to abandoned sites, was a bit confused by this. "Why is the ground so ... level?"

Telanya, in the back of the MAKO, rolled her eyes, but it was Kaidan who answered on the team's comm channel. "Most likely it was leveled in planning for the colony. I guess they didn't finish entirely, when they pulled out they just left things like they were."

Wrex was glancing around the terrain too, from the canopy gun mount of the MAKO. Something about the area set his teeth on edge. He triggered his comm link. "Maybe. But for once, I agree with the asari... something feels off." His eyes flicked back and forth over the area, making out not much of anything as the bland landscape rolled by, and he focused his attention to the beacon.

The two MAKOs slewed around it, each about thirty feet away, and the hatch doors opened, letting marines spill out in a semicircle. Master Chief Cole, hefting his Revenant in one cybernetic hand, made deployment hand signs with his free hand. Shepard approached the Beacon even as her squad began making a defensive perimeter, rifles aimed outwards.

The beacon, she saw, was not just an evac beacon, but the kind ejected from a ship when it was in distress and going down. The beacon was in transmit mode, but it was just broadcasting a general distress signal, not the recorded message that should have told them what caused the beacon to be launched in the first place. Shepard knelt down, wiping a patina of dust from the control panel, and used her omnitool to interface with the Beacon. "Keep a sharp lookout", she said, as she began to work.

It took her only a few seconds to access the beacon's command menu, and she recoiled in shock as she realized the message on the beacon had been deliberately deleted. She fished around in the small file system the beacon had, but whoever had done this had been very thorough. Frowning, she moved to see if she could access the beacon's sensor pod, when she realized that it had also been modified.

A single mass pulse generator was hooked to the sensors. She puzzled over this, before calling out. "Tali, come look at this...the hell?"

The quarian trotted over, kneeling next to Shepard and bringing up her own omnitool. After several seconds, Tali gave a small, confused sound. "It looks like someone has cross-linked this beacons' sensor pod to this MFG... so when you trigger it to download the telemetry, it sends out a large subterranean pulse. "

Shepard arched an eyebrow, her mirrored faceplate hiding the gesture. "This isn't stock. Someone modified it to let .. someone know .. when someone accessed it. And if they went to the trouble to wipe the logs, I doubt they left the sensor data intact."

Tali nodded, and Shepard stood. "Kaidan, draw everyone back. Put both MAKO's on the ridge back there, with someone manning the guns, and move everyone else into Prudent Fist assault formation. I think this damned thing is a signal emitter, and when I set it off, we're gonna get hit by whatever took out Kahoku's group."

Kaidan did so, leaving Shepard alone with Garrus and Liara. The turian unlimbered his sniper rifle, glancing around. "You realize this plan has us being caught in the trap with you, right, Sheep?"

Shepard only nodded, and there was something ... cold ... in how she did it. Her hands slipped to her back, drawing forth the ODIN shotgun, shifting it into slug-shot mode. Garrus uneasily stepped back, almost unconsciously falling into his old turian military assault stance. Liara glanced around nervously, hesitantly drawing her pistol, eyes wide as she turned her head left and right.

A few moments passed, a weak breeze kicking up faint trails and smears of dust in the air, and then Kaidan's voice sounded. "Position set, Commander."

Shepard nodded and tapped several controls, bringing up the sensor telemetry. Both she and Liara winced as the mass effect pulse went out, an almost subsonic rumble mostly felt in the bones, and then the sensor data turned from static to a Cerberus symbol.

A moment later, a voice spoke, recorded, calm, amused. "Congratulations, Admiral Kahoku. We knew you'd never give up on your men, so we decided to draw you in. We know you remember Akuze, so this should be a fitting goodbye." The sensor unit blanked, and Shepard stepped back.

Akuze...the colony wrecked by –

She wasn't even able to finish the thought as a titanic roar shattered the air, and it was only her reflexes that saved them. With savage might she used her biotics to throw Garrus and Liara backwards, both shouting in alarm, and then used the kanquess to charge backwards blindly, stumbling as she came out of it.

Where she had stood a few seconds before, a toothy maw erupted, teeth the size of her leg trailed by long, milky tentacles. A body emerged, slick with liquefied mud and mucous, barrel shaped and as wide as a city bus, higher and higher, until that vast head tilted to look in her direction.

She could hear Wrex cursing over the comm link. "Thresher Maw!"

Before anyone else could do anything, Shepard sprang to her feet. "Get to the MAKO, GO!" She shoved Garrus into Liara and, lifting her shotgun, performed a biotic charge.

The streak of blue light slammed into the thresher maw's deformed skull, erupting into the blinding flash of a nova, making the worm screech in agony. Shepard anchored herself to the thing with a biotic pull, and began emptying her shotgun into it's head at point blank range, trying to distract it from Garrus and Liara, who were running full out even as the two MAKOs surged forward.

The maw screamed, and Shepard quickly charged back to the ground as its mouth erupted into a torrent of acidic bile, spraying through the air to land impotently sixty feet away. The dirt under the messy vomit just evaporated under the acidity of the mix. Shepard landed about ten feet beyond the edge of the muck with a skid, sliding back a few feet as she came to a stop.

"Now, fire!" She called, and both MAKOs opened fire with the main guns, shells crashing into the beast's flank and head. The first shot enraged it, but it turned into the second blast and screamed loud enough to shake the ground. A torrential jet of green ichor splashed out from a gory crater three feet wide in its head, and with a shuddering shiver, the massive thing collapsed to the ground, smashing into the terrain hard enough to nearly jolt Shepard from her feet.

She panted for a long moment, grinning to herself. She was still grinning and thinking of what she could say when she turned to see both MAKOs flipped through the air, as two more thresher maws erupted from the earth, sending both the heavy tanks flying...

... leaving Garrus and Liara standing in the open, with no where to run.

O-OSABC-O

The MAKO was tumbling, but Master Chief Cole was not out of the fight yet. He triggered the mass effect jets, turning the tumble into a wild spin, making the Marines in the back yell in alarm. With a grunt, he shifted the top jets to full, slamming the tank downwards toward the ground. The MAKO impacted with a lurch and slowly skidded to a stop.

Even as he did so, on top of the MAKO, Chief Williams gritted her teeth and opened fire with the main gun on the closest thresher maw, blasting it in the torso. The explosion of the mass accelerated HE shell was satisfying, but the maw just swayed in place before turning to face them and diving down into the ground.

Cole shook his head, throwing the MAKO into a hard reverse, then swinging the tank wide. His eyes scanned the smooth ground, and he cursed himself for not remembering the same, unnaturally smooth terrain on Akuze when he was assigned to do cleanup after the Massacre. The lone survivor, the now famous Captain Delacor, had defeated a swarm of maws by detonating the fusion generator of the destroyed colony, but not before he lost his entire unit trying to fight the maws conventionally.

Cole wasn't about to make the same mistake. He triggered the jets, shifting the MAKO to the side, and a few seconds later the maw erupted very close to where the MAKO would have been otherwise. Grinning, he felt the tank shake as Williams planted two more rounds into the beast. Having learned from the lack of effect of a body shot, Williams targeted the head this time. The first shot blew off a fifteen-foot long tentacle and drew an angry roar, but Williams second shot flew right into its mouth and detonated, blowing the back of its head apart in a spray of ichor and chunks of bone that pattered down to the ground in a grisly rain. The Marines cheered as Williams blew the thing a mock kiss.

Meanwhile, the other MAKO was in serious trouble. Hit more directly, the drive train was seizing up, and Kaidan couldn't get the vehicle out of the way of the towering creature coming at them like a freight train.

Wrex, still in the turret, fired at the maw a couple of times as the MAKO finally bounced to a shaky stop. The two hits were minor, blasting a way a chunk of flesh, and Wrex knew that only a direct shot to the head would stop the thing.

As Kaidan tried to back the MAKO out of the flat area towards one of the exposed rock spars off in the distance, Wrex grinned as the other MAKO blew the head off of the thresher maw they were facing. The one pursuing them broke off, erupting from the ground angrily and spitting a wad of corrosive bile at the distant vehicle.

Wrex cursed, as the other MAKO was hit directly, one of the tires warping under the assault. He cursed again, this time nervously, as yet another thresher maw erupted from the west – only to laugh a biotic blast lit up the entire battlefield, warp fire spilling over the thrashing animal's head.

Wrex concentrated, focusing in on the maw that was slewing back and forth towards the other MAKO, before firing once. His shot was true, the massive shell catching the maw in the back of the head just as it erupted again from the ground, blasting it back down to the dirt. The other MAKO fired its own guns, blowing the front of the beast apart.

On the ground, Garrus reloaded his sniper rifle, having put out both of the thresher's huge eyes, while Liara panted shallowly next to him, having thrown all her might into a powerful biotic strike that staggered the huge, worm like beast. It was now spitting at Shepard, who was dodging and rolling, flashing in and out the kanquess biotic charge with almost effortless grace.

With a grimace, Liara gathered her strength once more, exhaling as she forced her energies into a single bright line of biotic force. A large slash erupted on the 'face' of the beast, shearing off several massive teeth and two tentacles, and the maw retreated back into the ground. Shepard performed a charge, erupting about ten feet behind Garrus and Liara, her armor still spotless except for a splash of mud on the knee. "Jesus fucking Christ! Wrex, blow that fucking beacon apart!"

Wrex complied, the MAKO's main gun barking its fire forth a moment later, and the ringing pulse of noise that had echoed through Liara's bones the whole time finally fell silent. They waited several seconds, looking around nervously, before realizing the maw was not coming back. Shepard activated her comm again and spoke quickly. "Shut the MAKO engines down, and dismount. From what we know about these beasts, they're attracted to vibration. Meet up near Kaidan's MAKO."

It took about five minutes for everyone to gather. Miraculously, the acid that had nearly wrecked Master Chief Cole's MAKO did not eat completely through the armor plate, and no one was injured. Wrex leapt down lightly from the turret, landing in a crouch. "Shepard, you faced two thresher maws on foot. You trying to be a krogan again?"

Despite his good-natured tone, there was a note of displeasure in his voice, but Shepard merely shrugged. "We had to react to the situation as it happened...I sorta doubt anyone is prepared to fight multiple thresher maws." She sighed, then turned to the group. "Alright, listen up. Based on what we just saw, it's pretty fucking clear what happened to Kahoku and his men. They probably touched down some distance away, and got eaten alive by the maws. Given that we just killed three of them and there's at least one more, we have no way of knowing if additional maws are roaming around."

She gestured angrily towards the two MAKOs, one wrecked and the other one badly damaged. "In any event, our rides are too shot up to risk. We can probably get them up high enough for pickup, but that's about it. Florez, Montoya." She pointed to the two DACT troopers. "Split up and recon in the direction of the last comms with the Phoenix from Kahoku's group. You're the only fast movers we have now, so stay alert and in comms."

The two nodded, and triggered their mass-packs, leaping off into the sky. Shepard turned to Tali. "Your drones didn't pick up anything?"

Tali shrugged, ducking her head. "No... I'm sorry. I didn't think to have them scan the ground, and they didn't pick up anything suspicious within range. I couldn't send them into the area of the jamming field or I'd lose control..."

Shepard nodded, and then sighed. "Put them up now, that will give us some warning if another maw shows up." She turned to Master Chief Cole, even as two balls of haptic light erupted and began circling the group. "Master Chief, modifying the plan a bit. Leave four men here to guard the MAKOs and man the comms relay. Two men from each squad, I guess. Squad 1 will accompany myself, Liara and Garrus in the direction of the last known position of Kahoku."

She rounded on Kaidan. "Squad 2 will accompany Kaidan, Tali and Wrex, and using Tali's drones, identify the source of the jamming. Once you locate it, do not engage, plot its location and fall back to comms range. If we get into trouble, we'll call you. Questions?" She glanced around, then nodded. "Move."

Telanya was pleased that her squad would be the one attached to Garrus, and she opened a private comm channel with him as the two groups split up. "That was...pretty crazy."

Garrus glanced nervously at Shepard before responding on the private channel. "Yeah, even crazier than usual, Tel. Shepard's been on edge since we had that mess on Eingana, and she's hard to read at the best of times. But I've never heard of anyone going up against a Maw on foot." He paused. "Then again, like she pointed out, what else was there to do?"

Telanya thought on that as they began walking, only to come to a stop as the voice of Sergeant Montoya sounded on the scouting comm channel. "Commander, I'm at the old colony site...and I've found what's left of Kahoku's team. There's nine dead thresher maws that I can see, but it looks like the unit was overwhelmed. Their shuttle is overturned and wrecked. I see eleven dead DACT and about a dozen others. The JOTUN mech is down, tangled up in a maw, but it may be online if we can get to it to repair it."

Shepard nodded. "Anything else?"

The trooper's voice was worried. "Yeah. There's not enough bodies, so I'm assuming the maws ... well, ate some of them, ma'am. I don't see Kah-" He stopped, and there was the distinct sound of him arming his minigun. When he spoke again his voice was grim. "I think you'd better double time it, Commander. I can't find Kahoku's body, but I just found two more Marines, and both were killed with shots to the head by a weapon. There are footprints that don't match SA boot patterns as well."

Shepard narrowed her eyes. "Get to cover and keep your eyes open, Sergeant. We'll be there shortly. Shepard out."

---

Chapter 74: Chapter 65: Cerberus, Trap

---

A/N: I hadn't planned to update this story anytime soon, and given the changes I've had in my schedule (and the fact that I'm working on some other stuff) it will be some time before I get back to it. That being said, I decided I'd get this chapter out even if I don't update it again anytime this year.

I'm undecided as to the ultimate fate of everyone in the story, but I can say that the modifications I've made are pretty extreme – and haven't been done by any other author prior to this. This chapter is a bit short, but there it is.

The JOTUN mech is the forerunner to the ODIN mechs seen in ME2, but built bigger and tougher since they had weaker weapons.

Warning: my beta reader didn't have a chance to go over this wreck of a chapter, so expect rampant comma abuse.

---

Liara had not been sheltered her entire life, but even the roughest archeology trip couldn't prepare her for the carnage that was the last stand of Admiral Kahoku's small strike team. Nine massive thresher maws, all of them bigger than the ones who had attacked the Normandy's MAKO's, were shattered and lay dead around the ruined buildings of the old colony site.

Here and there were torn bodies, half melted due to thresher maw spit, or bitten in half with giant chunks splattered near their ravaged corpses. The DACT troopers had clearly fought the hardest, most of them were so ruined it was hard to make out if they were men or women. But the rest of Kahoku's marines had obviously fought as hard as they could as well.

There was a massive splatter of blood and viscera next to a group of several marines and two soldiers in jet black armor with a silver stripe down the left arm and the letters "A I S" printed neatly on the stripe. The group had been in a firefight, as they were riddled with bullets and plasma burns.

Liara closed her eyes , not wanting to see their tortured positions. She heard Shepard's voice over the radio, cold and blunt. "They died hard, they died standing." Liara never could grasp the human fascination with how one died, but could certainly hear the undercurrent of anger in Shepard's voice.

Tali was off to one side, along with Senior Chief Vega, accessing the remains of the JOTUN mech. With a grunt , Vega wrenched a badly warped panel off of the frame of the ruined mech, and Tali went to work with her omni-tool. After several seconds, the JOTUN shuddered, and moved slightly.

"Joint Tactical Unit 5530-X online. Warning: this warframe has suffered catastrophic damage."

Shepard walked over to it, lifting her Spectre badge into the battered mech's range of optical sensors. "Commander Sara Shepard, SCV Normandy. Council Spectre. Battle readiness report, now."

The JOTUN heaved itself free of the corpse of the thresher maw it was entangled with, coming to most of it's 14-foot height. Its entire left arm was gone, the right half melted, most of it's torso also battered or scorched by acid, and the left leg bent at a sharp angle, but the mech managed to step clear of the corpse nonetheless. Tali's eyes widened. "H-how is that even possible!?"

A faint smile crossed Vega's face under his helmet's faceplate. "We built JOTUN's tough, chiquita. They're rated to take almost anything...but that is one seriously hacked-off mech to survive a thresher maw."

The JOTUN , for its part , immediately queried Shepard's omnitoool. Once it had confirmed her status, the mech it began speaking. "This unit is at 22% capacity. All armor segments have been damaged. Primary power core offline. Secondary power core at 54% stability and falling. Emergency battery power sufficient for nine hours of full operations. Primary weapons disabled. Secondary weapons disabled. Sensors at 9% capacity. Mobility at 15% capacity. This unit is unable to perform primary mission specifications." With a grumble of gears, the machine shut down again.

Shepard sighed. The JOTUN was a powerful war machine, but the VI's in them tended towards what some would call having a stick up the ass. Namely, it took orders in a very liberal fashion. She spoke again, tapping her comms to reactivate the unit. "Acknowledged. I am assuming command. Stand down from combat readiness and provide after action debrief."

The JOTUN's motors ground inside, something making an electrical frying sound for a moment before the massive mech knelt to the ground. "Complying. Mission parameters set at Cryptic Spear. Known information: command designate Admiral Kahoku received tight-beam transmission from unknown comms source. Immediately requested backup from dedicated units not defined by organizational charter. Units transferred to SCV Phoenix, transition to Edolus surface."

The mech paused, as its mechanical voice garbled for a moment, before clearing. "Landing on Edolus completed successfully. Beacon at landing site clear trap, bypassed for old colony site. Upon arrival, two ground to space missiles impacted landing craft, resulting in uncontrolled landing. Several personnel injured by uncontrolled landing. Exiting the craft, Admiral Kahoku was immediately targeted by unknown enemy sniper and shot in the knee."

Shepard grimaced, but focused as the machine continued in a monotone. "DACT and Marine infantry immediately shifted to Midnight Shield defensive posture. Units engaged in small arms fire with unknown assailants. During this, a cylindrical object was fired into assault group by unknown assailant. Cylinder began emitting high-pitched supersonic tone, harmonic vibrations. Arrival of sixteen thresher maws in eleven minutes."

"Sixteen!?" Master Chief Cole's voice was filled with horror.

The mech took no notice of the interruption. "DACT ground troops were able to destroy multiple targets using combined heavy weapons. Severe losses were incurred by the assault group. This unit destroyed four thresher maws in direct combat before incapacitation. Last sensor records indicate Admiral Kahoku's defenders were 96.5% likely to be overwhelmed."

Shepard sighed, shaking her head and glancing around the battlefield. "I can only presume, seeing as I don't see his body, that the 'unknown assailants' must have captured him. I need information on what we are facing here."

Both Garrus and Telyana were looking over the bodies, and with a clucking sound Garrus gave one of his not-quite shrugs. "Snipers, mostly, it looks like. Your soldiers were caught in a heavy cross fire, and they must have had their formation and cover disrupted by the thresher maws." He gestured to one sprawled marine, the man's helmet cleanly pierced by a hole in the back. "They were being sniped at even while they were fighting the maws. This was a massacre..."

Telayna knelt next to one of the AIS agents, scanning with her omni-tool. "Whatever weapons these humans got killed with, they were very powerful. This man's armor was buckled at the point of impact."

Vega shrugged. "So?"

Telayna looked up, blue eyes visible through her visor. "The round that hit him was either phasic and bypassed his shields, or was powerful enough that they overloaded and fell and the round hit hard enough to crumple and splinter the armor. Phasic rounds leave a pulse residue behind – gangers on the Citadel love to use them against C-Sec. This person was only hit once, so the shot was that strong."

Shepard made a circling motion with her arm, and everyone gathered around. "Alright, listen up. Mission parameters are still on from the briefing on the ship – we have a missing admiral, and at a minimum, an enemy force with extremely high powered sniper rifles and good aim."

Shepard tapped her omnitool comm unit. "Lieutenant Alenko, status on finding that jamming device."

Alenko's voice sounded somewhat thin and stressed. "We've located it , commander. Disguised as colony wreckage. Tali's deactivated it, but it was powered and anyone monitoring it is going to know we've cut it off. We didn't see any signs of battle...or installations, either. We're headed back to your location now."

Shepard nodded, glancing at Cole. "Thoughts, Master Chief?"

The older man adjusted his grip on his Revenant LMG and made a tsk sound. "I don't like it, Commander. The Admiral went in with a stronger , heavier group and got his ass handed to him on a silver platter. We don't have a fix on where this headquarters might be – or if it's really on this planet at all. This may have just been a mental fuckjob – draw the guy here and kill him nice and quiet."

Shepard glanced at Garrus and Telanya. "How about you two?"

Garrus rolled his neck and then made a clacking sound with his mandibles, as if in counterpoint to Cole. "I .. am not sure. I mean, this is a pretty clean killzone, and the thing with the thresher maws seems kinda ... crazy and difficult to set up. I'm not saying it's not a trap. . . but why go to all the trouble to kill an Admiral like this when they could have just , you know, had him shot or something on the Citadel?"

Telanya nodded, and Garrus continued. "I'd say it's legit, because it's just too much preparation for a trap. I mean, the guy was a rear admiral, not someone critical to the Systems Alliance, after all."

Shepard took in Garrus words, thinking back to what the JOTON mech had said. "...they knew they were coming. They knew Kahoku was coming...but he somehow knew the site we landed at was a 'clear trap'. She blinked. "Shit."

Cole and Vega immediately snapped to attention, the tone of her voice drawing them alert. "Ma'am?"

Shepard exhaled, almost savagely, and reduced the choke on her ODIN shotgun. "I'm an idiot. This wasn't a trap for Kahoku. They fucking knew he was coming and they had it all planned out, and they had someone on his ship to guide him right where they wanted him! This was a trap for whoever got sent to look for Kahoku." She snarled. "A trap for me." She slapped her omni. "Lieutenant! Double time it. This is a goddamned set up -"

The omni buzzed. "Commander, this is Pressly! Three Cerberus cruisers just jumped in system!"

O-OSABC-O

The room that Rachel Florez stood in was a testament to coordination, to control, and above all to information. A circular pit , broken by two ramps and lined by forty information and command stations, dominated the room, with a narrow railing encircling it. Large haptic screens on the walls detailed Cerberus's desperate fight with the entire might of the Citadel Navy and several field armies, a fight they were losing. And yet, from this one room, she could command the entire military forces of the entire Organization, moving ships here and there, deflecting the thrusts of the Citadel Navy to try to flank her remaining cruisers.

The Iron General paced slowly, her night-black uniform trimmed in orange swishing faintly as she did so. Her face was drawn, her eyes flicking back and forth between displays, occasionally quietly giving an order to one of the operators in the room. Above her, at a large command plinth, the Shadow Hand stood impassively, monitoring financial transactions on six different worlds.

"That fucking traitor has spiked our investment net, Rachel. Tens of billions of credits pissed away in bad trades and useless futures, more just ... gone... laundered through a net of temporary shell corporations owned by a conglomerate on Bekenstein that just had it's HQ and financial records destroyed in a 'terrorist bomb' attack. He's been planning this for years, and we didn't even see it!" The big man clenched his fist, and Rachel gave a tiny smile.

"Richard, you knew it would come to this sooner or later. Relax. The aliens have only found one of our five hold fasts. We've got six deep space fallback positions in the Shadow Sea that haven't had any non-Cerberus traffic for the past nine years. The Agamemnon is docked and ready to go as soon as we finish this stupid farce here, and the second mass relay in this system isn't even mapped, no one but us knows about it. It's not like we're in any danger."

Richard sighed, punching the desk. "I know that. That isn't the point. Neutralizing the threat Shepard poses was important, but the plan to do so was HIS plan. I don't know if it will fly, or if Jack has set this up to fail as well. "

Rachel moved up the stairs towards the command plinth, wincing as the data maps showed another Cerberus position – this one on Bekenstein – overrun by Spectres and turian special forces. "It's a good plan. Kahoku was dirty enough, and the stuff that's Shepard will 'uncover' will support our story. " She laughed. "And what a story it is. Rogue elements in the SA , wanting to move humanity away from the Citadel and Council control, plot with a rogue Spectre in terrorist acts. When it blows up, they frame Cerberus, and Kahoku is put in charge to make sure it all sticks. But it all goes bad when he tries to take out the leadership and he's killed, but alas, so are the Cerberus leaders."

She snickered, and Richard grunted. "Like I said, it's one of Jack's overly complicated, too-many-moving pieces plans, and given that he's just stabbed us in the back, I don't think it's a wise idea to depend on it not going wrong." He paused, then tapped at a data console. "Prepare the Agamemnon for immediate departure."

Rachael leaned over the command console. "The pincer force just arrived in system, the Normandy is gone stealth. Excellent timing. We'll have to make this quick, if you actually plan to leave now. And I don't really see the reason. There's no way Jack could have known things would blow up just when Shepard got here – "

Richard snorted. "I'm not taking any chances. Jack may have poison pillled this plan too. The fucker is like a snake made of goddamned teflon. What's the status on the surface?"

Florez snorted. "As expected. We lost the jammer about ten minutes ago. Surface sensors show Shepard is moving her people back into one group. Their tanks are too damaged to use, and they're about five minutes out from the mockup." She tapped at a haptic control, smiling tightly. "In a few minutes, once they figure out they've been baited, we'll have the 'malfunction' and stage the 'escape' to attract their attention. No, we'll wait until they've reunited their ground force...yes. " She tapped in a few more orders, concentrating.

Richard glanced up at her. "You're sure this stupidity will work?"

Rachel folded her arms behind her and fell into a parade rest stance, almost unconsciously. "I know my student, Richard. Shepard is constantly paranoid. She will expect traps, so we give her traps, just enough that she doesn't ask herself the questions that would lead to bringing down the entire Navy on our heads. She'll expect to be lured, to be betrayed – hell, she'll probably go into this expecting something horrible. When she finds out that Kahoku was 'dirty' and the fallback story, it will just play to her own biases. As a plus, the figure we have for the 'escape' is .. of personal significance to her. He will ensure she doesn't dig too deep."

Florez paused, glancing back at the elevator. "Besides, the risk is minimal. The rigged up site we're faking as HQ is over six hundred miles from here. As long as we can convince her that she's wiped out our HQ, and of course, write off our existing forces once that happens, we will be free. We can always come back and pick up our abandoned stuff. "

Richard shook his head. "And if she sees through it, figures out it's a big scam?"

The Iron General smiled. "Well, the best way to cover anything up is explosives. Shepard's important, but not irreplaceable. The chance at actually controlling the geth and the ship Saren has discovered is far more important than humanity having a Spectre. If things go out of control, or if somehow she realizes the people she's killing aren't the actual leadership of Cerberus, we've got a 10 megaton nuke charge ready for demolition." With an almost languid gesture, she pointed to one of the sub-control consoles off to one side, hazard glyphs flashing. "Relax."

Richard nodded, his tension settling. "Alright." With a shrug and a large exhalation of breath, he gave a wry smile. "Alright, you win. I'm still prepping the ship to get the hell out of here, but chances are, she'll take what she sees as a fait accompli and roll with it. But your mention of explosives brings up another point."

He pointed to the map of Cerberus positions across space, flaring blue and red. "The organization is being devoured alive. Some of the outlying bases, not to mention the one hold-fast they've found so far, have a lot of sensitive information on them. Why not just blow the compromised facilities now? We can't rescue them, and it would hurt the aliens even more."

Rachel glanced around at the various tactical operators in the Cerberus Command Pit, but not a single one flinched at the cold-blooded declaration. She then ran through the choices in her head, privately, not moving a muscle. After a long few seconds, she sighed. "You're right." She turned to the tactician sitting next to her in one of the tactical consoles. "Execute 'Aegis Ignus Purgatio'."

The various men and women at the stations nodded, triggering commands cunningly transmitted through a series of buried transceivers and bounced via several tight beam laser-link nets to a stealth satellite in the system's one gas giant. The delay took several minutes, due to the long distance and the fact that lasers were limited to lightspeed, but once it hit the satellite, that device whirled into action, firing up its QEC relay.

Across the galaxy, thirty seven Cerberus installations suddenly underwent uncontrolled explosions, as the 10 grams of pure antimatter below each base had its magnetic shielding suddenly cut off. Megaton explosions shattered thirty seven landscapes, killing tens of thousands of alien infantry and Cerberus soldiers alike, denying the enemy any further intelligence or captives.

O-OSABC-O

"Evasive maneuvers!"

The Normandy barrel rolled through scattering debris, feathering drive output, as the explosion from the SSV Phoenix radiated through space. The damaged ship had barely managed to limp back to the mass relay when the three white and gold cruisers emerged, firing almost immediately. The Phoenix's shields splintered almost immediately as dozens of mass rounds tore through the ship's superstructure and engines. A spread of missiles blasted the ship apart in a single flare of searing light, nearly catching the Normandy in the blast radius.

Joker cursed, fingers dancing across the haptic control console as he adjusted the ship's pitch. "Damage reports?" Sparks rained down from overhead as a power junction blew out, skittering across his arms and leaving trails of faintly burning pain along them.

Adams' voice came across the damage control comm line, scratchy and tired. "Power blowouts from the shockwaves but no hull breaches. Minor fluctuation in field strength, and some debris pattering damage to the starboard control surface, looks like. Core is nominal, we are at zero fluctuation. IES engaged at full, about four hours of sustainability before we have to break stealth."

Behind Joker, Pressly nodded. "Joker, keep your distance from the cruisers, take us back towards the planet and let's hope Shepard finds something helpful down there. Tac Alley! Bring up a target evasion plot on the main console in the CIC and stand by for ECCM warfare package six." He turned back crisply to the comm-link to the surface. "Commander, we have three cruisers, moving in system at mark 40. They've taken down the Phoenix. No survivors, ma'am. We have taken minimal damage and are moving clear."

Shepard's voice crackled angrily. "What a clusterfuck. You've gone stealth?"

Pressly gave a thin smile. "Yes, ma'am. We're also powering up the jamming packages and loading torpedoes for counterfire if needed. Hopefully we can get clear so we can maneuver to orbit, to make sure we're close enough for a pickup if needed. I know you were concerned about GTS fire but right now..."

"Never mind that. Get back here and tuck into a low-observable orbit, Pressly. We'll figure this shit out one way or the other. Prep a buoy just in case. Contact me when you get into orbit and I'll tight-beam you a data package to load up on it. Shepard out."

The Normandy heeled down, as Joker adjusted the ship's course to take advantage of the natural sensor diffusion offered by the solar wind, and Pressly exhaled. "Set battle stations for silent running, and load all tubes. Set condition 1SQ, full readiness."

With a glance at the tac board, he turned to the CIC. "All we can do now is wait."

O-OSABC-O

"Tali, anything?"

The small quarian was examining the intake from her recon drones intensely. "I think so. There's a weak power spike about fifteen minutes north, under what looks to be a collapsed colony tower. It's probably very well shielded, maybe using double-phase wrapping, so that -"

Shepard sighed. "I get it, it's secure. And it's north, which is where the most of the gunfire that hit the admiral's party seems to have come from." Shepard glanced over her command, sighing, and waved up Cole and Vega.

"Alright, we're going to assume that Kahoku was onto something and they took him. We know this is a trap. I'm thinking they lead Kahoku here to get massacred, and expected the worms to finish him and us off." She glanced around the battlefield, especially at the corpses of the massive threshers, and shuddered. "Regardless, that didn't take, so maybe we can get some answers."

She thrust her thumb into her chest-plate. "I'm taking Liara, Wrex, and Garrus with Vega's squad. Lieutenant Alenko will take Tali, Ash, and Squad one, and both of the DATC troopers, under Cole. We'll swing west, you go east. I want suppressive crossfire setup once we locate an entrance."

She turned to Tali. "Get a comm link going to the four soldiers we left behind with the MAKO's and have them set weapons for GTS mode. If those cruisers come looking, have them ripple fire the M7M GTS standoff missiles. There's only two for each MAKO, but that should give the marines there time to get to cover. Other than that, slave one of your drones to the less beat up MAKO and have them scan for anything out of place. Like giant fucking worms." Tali bobbed her head nervously in acknowledgment, and Alenko glanced over his squad, tapping on his omni tool.

She turned to Liara. "We have some people with first aid and medigel, and the MAKO's have a medical booth that can stabilize some wounds, but Kahoku – assuming he is even alive – is likely to be badly wounded. Can you do a stasis field?"

Liara licked her lips and nodded "Yes, Commander...I can hold one for several hours." She looked as if she would say more, but Shepard merely nodded, and then pulled a mod out of her ODIN shotgun and slotted in another. "Form up and get ready to move out. Lieutenant Alenko, with me."

Walking a short distance away from the group, she turned on her point-to-point comm and lashed it to Kaiden. "Alright, Lieutenant, I'll make this quick : don't fuck this up. No heroics. Straight and clean."

Kaiden nodded "Yes , Commander." His voice had a note of confusion in it, and Shepard sighed.

"Alenko, right now we are dealing with a political clusterfuck. I've recently had my ass-reamed by no less than the Fleet Master himself on such things, and I don't want to have a repeat of having several admirals telling me that I'm little more than a jumped – up street thug. Whatever we find inside is probably going to be bad. What I say, goes, no arguments, no questions. Don't fuck it up."

Alenko nodded more slowly this time, the gears in his head turning, before answering. "Yes, ma'am. Do you have any additional tactical instructions?"

Shepard glanced around. "Yeah, don't get scragged. Move your team out, fastest speed. The quicker this shit is over the quicker we can ghost the fuck out of this system."

---

Chapter 75: Chapter 66: Cerberus, Strike

---

A/N: This shit's about to get on like Galvatron, folks. Didn't think I had another chapter in me, but a few hours of listening to the TRON soundtrack produced the following.

---

O-OSABC-O

The drone flew high overhead, gleaming only faintly in the dim sun that filtered down through the clouds, and behind it Shepard's squad marched along gamely, rifles leveled and omni-tools scanning in all directions. The move from the last stand of Kahoku's men was a grim one, and everyone was listening to the advice given by Wrex on avoiding vibration, which might attract thresher maws.

The ground beyond the broken remains of the colony was a tumbled mix of broken hills and collapsed, shattered roadways, torn to pieces here and there by the passage of thresher maws. A couple of massive, coiled skeletons, like bizarre giant snake-skins lined with loops of bone, could be seen in the distance, yellowing and almost translucent in the light. The hulking remains only made Shepard clutch her ODIN more tightly and glare balefully at the drone of Tali's making that spun about in mid air, as if puzzled.

"Energy signature detected. Explosive release, class two biotics. Distance, 3013 meters. Bearing, 159 tac six." The drones digitized voice synched with data streaming across Shepard's omni, red glyphs flaring across the map projection to the west. Shepard raised an eyebrow, and tapped the comm-link.

"Alenko, your drone picking that up, near your position?"

Alenko's return transmission was somewhat scratchy but understandable. "Affirmative, ma'am. Already moving towards it. Scanning for organics..I think we have traces of human blood. Probably from Kahoku's party." A long pause, then a curse from Alenko. "Our drone spotted some kind of artificial structure ahead ma'am, range 220 meters. Permission to engage?"

Shepard nodded, thinking. "You've got the DACT troopers, with the heavy weapons. Send 'em up and let them come down on the location hard, then move up in the confusion and let Williams set up a sniping position. We'll flank from the south west at top speed." She cut the transmission, getting a click of static from Alenko as an acknowledgment, and swung her finger over the omni in a circular motion, connecting her to the rest of her squad.

"Tactical change. We've got an explosion, an energy reading, and blood trails leading in the direction of both. Alenko's squad is going to check it out, we need to get there fast to back them. It's a three click run, so double time it, people." With that, the squad broke into a run, following Shepard, the drone trailing overhead.

O-OSABC-O

The ridge that Alenko placed his team on was mostly rock, but there were veins of some milky gray metal that the omnitool identified as lead. Alenko figured metal ore might help stop incoming fire, so he backstopped his assault squad there, setting Williams on a higher hill with her sniper rifle.

He looked ahead, over the ridge. The ground beyond was more of the broken, tumbled terrain he'd seen since landing, but the area around the small cliff was more smooth. Two broken ridges of rock encircled the cliff, shielding it from direct view, but the entire arrangement of rocks looked off. Artificial.

A couple of droplets of blood stood out starkly in the bone-dry dust of the footpath leading to the cliff, making Alenko grimace, and he turned to Florez and Montoya, the two DACT troopers. "You ready?"

Montoya's pitted faceplate was blank, broken only by the red-gleaming haptic lines of his armor, but he nodded in a way that made Alenko sure the man was grinning like a lunatic. "We got this, LT. You ready for us to hit it?"

Alenko nodded. "Hit for maximum confusion, if anyone's there. If no one is visible, hold position and cover our approach. The marines will rush, I follow. Williams, stay up here and cover us with sniper fire until I give the all-clear." She gave a "yes" sign with her free hand, continuing to dial in her sniper rifle.

With that, Alenko nodded to the two DACTs, who tapped at their armor. Florez roared out a battle cry that sounded like incoherent screaming, while Montoya let go with "Jump up, jump up and get down!"

With a roar of mass effect jets, the two power-leaped away, flaring as their shields kicked on and angled downwards even as they flew through the air. Tali watched the two in amazement, shaking her head, and then jumping as lines of mass effect fire began scything through the sky, seeking to hit the DACTs.

"Angel One, incoming fire. Repeat, I have incoming fire. Angling down for DFA strike in three." The radio voice of Florez was cool, as if he wasn't being shot at with heavy mass accelerators, and a moment later he streaked downwards from the sky in a bolt of blue, slamming into a well concealed breastwork. Almost immediately, there was a massive explosion.

A moment later, coughing broke the radio silence. "Angel Two, Angel One is down, life signs vital but his jump pack is out of commission. DFAing, need reinforcement, we have approximately two squads of Cerberus hostiles."

Alenko cursed, and motioned forward. "Shit. Squad! Fervent spear, full charge. Go go go!"

Williams fired, the sniper in her hands lashing out to blow the head off of one Cerberus soldier, sending him to the ground, and the marines charged, Tali following. They crested the next rise, the breastwork now fully revealed, concrete walls carefully stained the exact color as the ground, and a heavy plug of a steel door cut into a short cliff side wall framed by the concrete bunker. Tucked into both corners of the breastwork were two heavy mass accelerator cannon, one of which was now a smoking wreck, it's operator smeared across the ground by the DACT trooper standing atop what was left of his corpse, one heavy armored foot buried in the man's skull.

The other was glowing cherry red, as was the wall behind it, from the full plasma discharge from the second DACT troopers assault cannon as he slammed down in the midst of the Cerberus soldiers, his mass effect field pulsing out to send them stumbling or falling away. He spun, firing the weapon, rapid-fire mass accelerator slugs tearing into the ranks of the enemy.

Alenko leapt the wall with a biotic leap, coming down next to a Cerberus soldier. His hand alight with warpfire, he merely pressed it against the back of the man's armor, sinking through the thin material and severing his spinal cord almost instantly, then ducking under a wild slash from an omniblade and firing his pistol three times point blank range into another Cerberus goon.

The fight was a close – range, chaotic mess, and Tali'Zorah's vicious shotgun put an end to three of the enemy, all lined up and attempting to reform some kind of defensive posture. A disk grenade and a discharge of electrical energy into their weapons made them defenseless, and she simply walked past each one, firing point blank into the backs of their heads. A fourth tried to take her out before Alenko caught him with a throw, hurling the man over the wreckage of one of the turrets with enough force to break his spine.

The marine line was in full possession of the fight now, spraying short bursts mixed with grenades into the Cerberus ranks. With their heavier armor and much stronger weapons, the SA marines were able to shrug off most of the return fire from the Cerberus troops and answer with near impunity. Six Cerberus soldiers went down in seconds, and Cole cut down two more with his Revenant. The remainder were taken out by massed fire from the Marines. Two marines had light wounds and one had caught an omniblade to the thigh, but was patching it with medigel already.

Alenko looked around and frowned. "That was...awfully easy."

Cole glanced around as well and shrugged, examining the corpses. "These guys look like shit, LT. Most of them have medigel patches on 'em already, or bloodstains. I think the Admiral's boys kicked the crap out of them and this butch was half dead even before two DACTs did a goomba stomp on their head, sir. We didn't give 'em a lot of time to get ready, after all. "

The lead DACT kicked the corpse in front of him again, growling. "Piece of shit shot up my damned jump pack." The man turned to Alenko, heaving his assault cannon. "I got a door opener for that door sir."

Alenko smirked. "Hold that thought, Marine. Williams, all clear." He paused, tapping at his omni-tool connection. "Commander, Alenko here. Outer door secured, hostiles down, no casualties. Door is hardened but my DACTs tell me they can take it down, your orders?"

Shepard's voice was as cool as ever, if a bit shaky from her running. "We're six minutes out, hold and wait for us to arrive."

Alenko nodded, then started as a heavy explosion sounded from within the base, and then another, atop the faint sound of an alarm. "Ma'am, we may have a problem. Two more explosions from within the base, and I can hear alarms out here. Unsure of source..."

"Hold position, Alenko." Shepard's voice was colder, and Alenko winced.

"Yes, ma'am." He turned to his squad. "Move to defensive positions and wait for the Commander, boys and girls." He almost laughed at the way the two DACTs hung their heads in disappointment, but frowned when yet another explosion rattled the ground.

Those blasts are getting closer.

O-OSABC-O

Shepard's team arrived a few minutes later at a run, mostly grouped together, followed by a clearly out of breath Liara. The asari glanced around, eyes wide as she heaved for air, then gave an apologetic look at Shepard. "I'm sorry I – "

The Spectre waved it away with one black-armored hand. "You did good enough for a civilian, Liara." Swinging around the far edge of the breastwork, she took in the two ruined turrets, the contorted positions of several of the dead Cerberus soldiers, and the cracked half-moon of two DACT impacts, and shook her head.

"I see the boys had some fun, Lieutenant. Status."

Alenko nodded. "These troopers were already badly wounded or exhausted before the fight, and between being charged by DACTs and caught in our crossfire, didn't stand much chance. Miss Zorah downed three of them with her shotgun."

Shepard gave a surprised glance at the little quarian, who shuffled her feet and looked away. "I see Ash is a bad influence on you, Tali." She put humor in her voice, ignoring an indignant squawk from Williams, and turned to the door. "Any more explosions?"

Alenko nodded. "Several...they're getting a lot closer, ma'am. You think it's Kahoku?"

Shepard shrugged, walking towards the door. "If he's badass enough to fuck up an entire base of bad guys after being captured in that fight we saw back there, he's no one to mess with, but I somehow doubt it's him. We'll find out once we get this door open." She opened her omni-tool and directed her Spectre programs at the electronic locks. In five seconds, the door gave a shudder and opened smoothly.

Tali and Garrus both looked at the door and back at the gauntlet on Shepard's arm, who only grinned. "Spectres get neat toys."

Garrus's voice was dry. "Why don't I have one of those?"

Shepard lead the team in, followed by Garrus, then Wrex, and then by squad. The ceiling and walls were bare, bone white, with black and orange trim, while the floor was rubberized black panels. Two armory lockers were set against the far wall, open, empty. The entry room was about twenty feet long, and high enough even Wrex could stand up straight. A pair of low barricades bisected the room, flanked by some kind of scanning equipment.

Shepard nodded towards the far door. "Squad two, stack up, squad one, trailing firing positions. Garrus, Liara, Wrex, Williams, form on me. Alenko, Cole, Vega, Tali, form up across from Squad one. When we breach, my team and squad two goes left, Alenko and squad one head right. Move!"

The soldiers rushed across the room, glancing around nervously as another explosion shook the base. A bland alarm suddenly droned. "Alert. Security section six has been compromised. Entry access has been compromised. All security teams, respond."

Shepard slammed against the door, using a biotic slam to tear it out of its sockets and send it flying ahead. It flew through the air, bisecting a single Cerberus soldier and crashing into the far side of the corridor. "Tali, drones, scout 'em!"

Tali sent her pair of drones up and ahead, one left, one right, and the squads followed. The base corridors were almost identical to the entry room, with slanted walls and lots of hexagons and panels of reinforced combat glass fronting the entry to rooms.

Shepard swept ahead, panning her ODIN around. There was a long scream and a series of shots from down the hallway, and a Cerberus soldier stumbled into view, bloody and panicked. A moment later, his head was blown off by Garrus, sending the corpse flying back and down to the ground.

Shepard held up a hand in a 'ready weapons' posture, as the sound of footsteps got stronger and rounded the corner.

It was an asari, dressed in the remains of some kind of armored bodysuit of deep black trimmed in silver and white. Heavy curved plates of blue steel covered one arm and both shins, and her features were rather sharp for an asari, with a pair of narrowed blue eyes and full lips. She wore only minimal face markings, and she glanced at the team in confusion, before her gaze fell upon the clear face plates of Liara and, behind Garrus, Telanya.

"Thank the Goddess. You aren't Cerberus."

Shepard tilted her head, examining the asari closely. Her stance seemed ... off, somehow. Less graceful than most asari, and she was built very heavy for an asari as well. The heavy shotgun in her hands was blood spattered, as was her face and body, but none of the blood seemed to be hers.

"No. I'm Commander Shepard, Council Spectre. What the hell is going on?"

The asari exhaled sharply, then glanced behind her and with a firm shrug walked towards Shepard's group, shipping her shotgun as she walked. "Long story. I was a freelance mercenary, when I and the rest of my unit were hired ad-hoc to provide recon support for some big shot human admiral. Next thing I know, my ship is taken out in high orbit the moment we arrive and Cerberus goons are storming it. Sixteen of my sisters died, and I was .. taken captive."

She looked up, something ugly in her eyes. "It wasn't pleasant, human. Your kind can be truly vile when they chose to be."

Shepard glanced at Liara, who looked back helplessly, and sighed. "Cerberus isn't exactly in the good books with humanity right now either. How long have you been captured..and what is your name?"

The asari gave a thin, mocking smile. "I'm Eylana, clanless. I've been here about a week. Like I said, we were supposed to provide support to the admiral that hired us, but I don't know much about that. Captain S'era had all the details, and she's dead." The asari sighed, and gestured with her shotgun to the Cerberus soldiers dead on the floor. "I've been locked up tight – Goddess only knows why they didn't kill me – for days, but yesterday there was a lot of movement of soldiers. They came back all shot up and there was a lot of talk about "fighting to the end to protect command."

Shepard exhaled softly. "Then this is their HQ, good. How did you get free?"

Eylana smiled. "They injected me with something that has been suppressing my biotics, but someone got sloppy and it must have worn off. I still don't feel quite right, but when they dropped the force field to my cell to feed me, I hit them with a slam and shunted power into the field generator to blow it up. I got lucky, the explosion shredded the other two guards."

She gestured to the other hallway, and smiled. "I know I can't survive outside without a suit, but I heard one of them talking about a comm link. I was planning on making my way there and calling for help."

Garrus swept his gaze around. "If this is HQ where are all their soldiers? How many did you kill?"

She shrugged. "Not many. Eight or nine, most in single combat. These guys weren't that good, most of them were already hurt, and none of them were biotic. Whoever they got into a fight with must have given them heavy casualties, but I also overheard something about the 'worms going crazy' – not sure what that means."

Shepard gave a crooked grin. "It means the whole planet is lousy with thresher maws, but some of them may have taken out Cerberus forces. Is everything behind you clear?"

Eylana nodded but also frowned. "Yes, but there's not much back that way except storage and cells. I didn't imagine I'd make it this far, but I figure the commander and comms sections will be close together, and there are probably more soldiers ahead." She paused. "I can only assume you guys are here to stop them, and I'd like to tag along if I could - I owe them some payback, and you're the best chance I have for getting out of this place."

Tali touched her omni and nodded along with Eylana. "Commander, the drones I sent out – the one I sent to the left has scouted out the wing of the building she came from – no life signs, but nine dead Cerberus soldiers along the way and about ten more in the prison area. The explosions being picked up were probably from her detonating their force field generators for the cells, it looks like they hooked into base power. That means power to a lot of the base is knocked out. The other drone made it about 30 feet before it was blown up by heavy fire."

Shepard nodded. "Eylana, you're clearly a good fighter if you dropped nine of the Cerberus bastards, but you only have a barrier. Stay behind my men. Cole, Vega, move squads one and two up in Sunset Arrow three man fire teams. Alenko, Wrex, Tali, stick with Cole's squad. Liara, Garrus, we're moving with Vega's squad. Shift up to close-in weapons."

It took a few minutes to get everything reorganized, but after that Shepard got her people moving along. The corridor lead another forty feet down to a blind turn, and in the corner was the smoking remains of Tali's other drone.

Shepard held up a hand, and then moved it forward with two fingers extended and made a 'pistol' shape with her hand. Engaging her comm-link, she spoke. "Squad one, rush with full auto. Garrus, Ash, sniper position. Wrex, Alenko, Liara, throw shockwaves. Everyone else, suppressive fire. On three...two..one...MOVE!"

The group stormed around the corner, which opened up into a large security staging area. The ceiling was twenty feet up, festooned with a pair of security turrets in dull-black armor pods. On the floor, a waist-high armored barrier was broken in two places by archways and two squads of Cerberus troops were in position behind them. They opened fire as soon as Shepard's soldiers came into view, and the fight was on.

Without good cover, squad one rushed ahead, firing their Crossfire rifles in short bursts, mixed with grenades. Several soldiers took hits, but the heavier armor and shielding they now had allowed them to shrug them off. Five grenades exploded across the Cerberus lines, sending three of the white-armored soldiers to the ground. Squad one broke left, Cole's Revenant spraying heavy fire across the entire barricade, sending sparks skittering from the steel walls and punching gory holes in a Cerberus soldier.

Squad two broke right, going full auto with their weapons and focus-firing on the turrets in the ceiling. Senior Chief Vega was hit directly by a blast from one of the turrets, sending him skidding away, rifle flying from his hands, but a moment later Tali aimed her omni-tool at the turret, sending cascading sensor disruptions through it's sensor pod. The turret jerked erratically and opened fire on the other turret pod, detonating it in a flash of fire and a rain of blackened debris. Three marines opened up on the hacked turret and streams of mass accelerator fire tore into it before it could shake off the hack.

Liara, Wrex, and Alenko all knelt to kick off their biotic attacks, and cascades of blue suddenly stormed across the floor. The entire defensive line buckled as Cerberus soldiers went flying, stumbled to their knees or were knocked flat. Garrus and Ashley lined up shots as quickly as they could, and they each dropped two, even as Shepard flashed forward in a biotic charge.

She erupted into the Cerberus lines, her impact crashing into one soldier and sending his broken body to the deck. Pulling her ODIN she placed two shots into the back of one Cerberus fighter, the weapon creating gory tunnels in the man's chest and blowing his leg completely off. He staggered back and collapsed, dragging down another soldier with him, and Shepard put a shot into that man's faceplate.

The thin armor plating splintered into a crimson-misted mess as the man's entire head came apart and splashed on the decking.

Feeling movement behind her, Shepard channeled biotic energy into her leg kicking back. The charging Cerberus sergeant took the kick on his knee, which simply folded under four hundred pounds of sudden pressure. The man's armor deformed under the kick, cutting into his muscles, and as he overbalanced from the brutal kick, Shepard swung all the way around with a roundhouse kick from the other leg, slamming her armored foot into the man's head while it was still augmented with biotic energy.

The soldier screamed as his arm was snapped like a twig and his forearm bones were driven along with pieces of armor, right into his rib cage. The man slid across the floor to slam hard into the waist high barricade, breaking his neck as he impacted it head first. Shepard didn't even slow down, reaching out with her free hand to grab the leading arm of another Cerberus soldier, pulling it out of socket almost casually before wrenching the man around to face her.

His terrified features, visible through his clear faceplate, turned horrified as she crunched the barrel of her ODIN into his belly and fired. He staggered back, blood flooding his torso from a huge five inch wide crater in his flesh, and her second shot aimed at his throat, sent him careening back, arms windmilling as his body died before he could even realize it.

Two more Cerberus soldiers came through the far security door, both instantly killed as they did so by sniper shots from Garrus and Ash. Another soldier was hit several times by Wrex's shotgun and marine rifle fire and slithered down the wall, leaving gory blood smears behind him.

The last four Cerberus soldiers were in the corner, before a huge ball of biotic force from Liara slammed into them. Two simply collapsed, the sheer power of the attack snapping their spines. The other two, less lucky, were thrown from the corner with multiple broken bones. The first landed in front of Wrex, who, with a grin, stomped on the man's head. There was a crunch of breaking armor and the snap of breaking bone, and the man shuddered and fell still.

The other soldier, landed in a bloodied heap in front of Shepard, and found his chin tilted up by the barrel of her ODIN. She leaned forward, armored black silhouetted in the dim light from the ceiling and the flickering radiance of the fires from the destroyed turrets, as her squad of marines and allies slowly walked up behind her.

The soldier swallowed, tasting his own blood, spikes of agony from his broken legs drawing tears from his eyes, but he couldn't look away from the cavernous barrel of the ODIN as it almost gently traced it's way along his jaw. Shepard's voice was cold.

"You can either answer my questions quickly and truthfully..."

She tilted her head, then with her free hand, lifted the last Cerberus soldier up into the air. His legs kicked reflexively as she hoisted him with almost arrogant ease into the air, his hands weakly scrabbling at her forearm to loosen her grip with no effect.

"... or I can feed you to my krogan ally, here. "

Wrex drew a long bladed, ugly black knife from his armor's boot. "I've never had barbecued human before. Always went for fried."

The man shuddered and Shepard's smile widened behind her mirrored helmet. "Now tell me who's in charge, and where are the communications in this base."

O-OSABC-O

"Sir, we've reached the QEC repeater node as you asked."

Jack turned his head at the voice, pausing to glance over the haptic information panel on the wall. "Thank you, Miranda. Tell Hughman to go ahead and set up the omnidirectional link and load the Benedict packages for transmission." The Illusive Man stood, brushing a piece of lint from the neo-silk sleeve of his coat, and his smoothly handsome features twisted into something that was almost a smile.

He'd correctly anticipated the actions of the Citadel, if only with minutes to spare, and gotten away from Earth scot-free. His private cruiser, reconverted to look like a civilian liner, had translated from Alliance space to a fall-back position he always kept ready at Horizon. Now in high orbit above the world, he had enough time to better evaluate the situation he was in, and that Cerberus was in.

The plans of Richard and Rachel were, in his evaluation, childish. Richard might as well cultivate an evil goatee and swirl a black cape around his shoulders, given all the banality of evil his actions caused, and Rachel really thought her stupid storm-trooper corps could take the Citadel and dictate events to the turians, salarians, and asari.

His expression twisted further, as he paused in his examination to take a sip of his whiskey. Beads of condensation trickled down the glass, pooling on a porcelain coaster, and he closes his eyes a moment as the liquid sank into his gut.

The short-sighted idiots that the SA had foisted off on him had backed Saren, not only hoping to somehow control the geth or Saren's flagship, but to use his actions as a cover to allow them to storm the Citadel. Of course, he wasn't supposed to know that – they'd locked him out of the operational aspects of their plans years ago, or so they thought – but even given that, it was pretty obvious what would happen if it failed.

They'd vanish, and leave him holding a bag he never wanted in the first place. It was clear the SA had no intentions of being dragged down by being linked with Cerberus, even when most of the extremist actions they were hated for were at the behest of, if not the SA itself, then their appointed 'leaders'.

Thus, his early betrayal of them to the Citadel forces and scrambling his tracks was justified, in his mind. He'd managed to salvage about half of the staggering wealth he'd acquired, and about a third of his shell companies were still clean. It was a shame that Cord-Hislop would be investigated so heavily, but the Citadel and the SA wouldn't find much, and all they did find would point right back at Richard.

The Illusive Man examined the haptic feed he was seeing closely. Richard had blown up most of the surviving Cerberus military facilities to try to catch the Citadel forces in the blasts, and he'd inflicted a great deal of carnage. The news feeds were full of the outraged reports, but the Citadel Fleet had cut apart Rachel's precious little force of light cruisers and missile boats, and while there were certainly fallback positions and holdfasts left undiscovered, none of them were staffed by actual meant that if Richard and Rachel could elude being captured, they could start the entire mess all over again.

And as long as they were dug in securely on Edolus, Richard probably figured they were safe enough to do just that, escape. Jack's double-blind plan to get rid of Kahoku and send Shepard on a wild-goose chase would work flawlessly. After all, who would expect an asari to be working for Cerberus? It had taken years of surgery, nano-grafted adjustment, training and coaching from Trellani, but Agent Micha had become 'Eylana' and had proven very effective as an agent.

All she had to do now was lead Shepard by the nose to the carefully prepared false HQ and the information placed there, and Shepard would be lead to believe the SA was responsible for many of the things Cerberus was accused of. There were backstopped documents that would point at certain political entities with the ambition to do such, and the blow-up, while not big enough to take down the entire SA, would have the government on the defensive for years.

Years in which, thinking Cerberus destroyed, the organization could rebuild, unhindered and on it's own. Jack was rather proud of the plan, and it was a pity that Shepard would be the sacrificial lamb in a political sense, but in Cerberus' view a single Spectre, while important, wasn't critical to the survival of humanity. And thus, the plan had gone forward.

Of course, now the situation had changed.

Jack Harper had carefully reconsidered the threat presented by Saren and Benezia. If they were crazy, and if this was just a meglomanaical attack by the geth, then Cerberus' plan would work nicely. The giant dreadnaught would be taken, and either the Geth would be brought to heel under humanity, or humanity would destroy them and be lauded as heroes.

But if Saren's crazy ideas about 'Reapers' were right, then they were a threat to humanity and had to be stopped. Richard and Rachel never believed they existed, but given the evidence his agent aboard the Normandy had revealed, from the site on Eingana Jack was now convinced Saren wasn't lying.

And that meant, quite simply, that Cerberus's plans were a threat to humanity.

Jack touched the haptic control panel. "Load Benedict into the QEC and then transmit to Edolus HQ."

There was a long pause, and then the computer spoke. "Transmission in progress...complete. Executing."

Jack gave a thin smile. "When complete, slave the comm unit in Decoy 01 to this QEC channel. Also, bring up schematics of comm room for Decoy 01."

The haptic panel shifted, displaying floor plans, wiring diagrams, and security features. "Withdraw turrets 01 and 02 to idle position. When room is entered, maintain idle until positive ID on Agent Eylana. Once targeted, full attack on Agent Eylana, no other targets authorized."

The computer chimed softly, and Jack reached for a cigarette. Lighting it, he sat back down in his comfortable chair, glancing out of the view port to take in the vision of Horizon below. "Alas, poor Richard. I'm afraid the game is about to run out for you."

He inhaled, puffing on his cigarette, and his smile widened. "I think it's time to skew the odds a bit more."

---

Chapter 76: Chapter 67: Illusive Man, magnificent

---

A/N: So far, I've managed to get a lot done on both OSABC and the Cerberus Files, but I'm not 100% sure I'm back 'full time' yet. As long as the muse is shaking her ass, I'll keep writing, but I have no idea when that will stop.

This chapter is close to wrapping up the Cerberus segment. After the re-do of the outline I had, there's some Citadel and political fallout, then we're finally off to deal with snowy Noveria. Then geth. Then ... we'll see.

---

As it turned out, the captured Cerberus soldier was more than willing to divulge the base's layout when enough biotic force to dislocate both arms was applied. Wrex evinced disappointment that he wasn't allowed to eat the man, but Shepard's joking manner turned cold as she listened to the man spill his guts. Stories of aliens shot and dumped in mass graves, and of 'experiments' the man claimed he couldn't elaborate on, further soured her mood.

Finally, when prodded as to what his men had done to Kahoku, he looked away and mumbled a handful of words no one but Shepard could make out. Shepard snarled, backhanding the man strongly enough that the snap of breaking bone was heard, and then hoisted him up on his broken legs. Liara looked appalled as Shepard flung the soldier aside to Wrex, who coolly dispatched him with a neck snap, then dropped the corpse on the floor.

Shepard paid no attention, motioning Vega and Cole forward. "Alenko's gonna be leading a strike team, so you are running squads one and two. According to our friend there, the part of the base Miss Eylana came from is just low-security holding cells, storage, and energy generation. The bulk of the base lies ahead, beyond this security room."

She puled up a haptic draw-screen on her omnitool, using her finger to draw a rough map in the illuminated square that popped up. "Directly ahead are barracks and living quarters, and then the base splits. The left wing is high-security cells, research areas, armory spaces and a shuttle bay. That bay has to be taken out of commission so no one gets away. The right wing is monitoring facilities, training areas, data stores and computer systems – and the command and control center, which is where both the comm link and the boss of this nightmare fucking organization is."

Shepard glanced at the two, and at Alenko standing nearby, before continuing. "If the guy was telling the truth, the HQ was never heavily manned, and they lost a lot of their ground forces when the thresher maws went crazy during the attack on Kahoku. Kahoku may be alive, if so, he's going to be in that high-security wing to the left. Alenko will take Wrex and Tali, along with Cole's squad. Cole, your objective is freeing any prisoners, while Alenko takes out that shuttle bay and gathers up evidence of any research that stands out."

She turned to Vega. "Your squad will trail me, Liara, Garrus, and Miss Eylana. We're going to try to breach the command and control center, but there's at least one more hard-point of defense between us and the comms room, so we may have to dig in and wait for the other force to rejoin us. In any event, I need both Garrus and Sergeant Telanya to dig through their computer systems to find us any traces of a lead on Saren."

She paused, her eyes tracking everyone across the room, gaze hard and cold. "I shouldn't have to say this, but everyone here knows my reputation. I am going to transmit, via omni-tool, one demand for surrender for these fuckers, since the alarms I hear in the background tell me they know we're here. Anyone throwing down their weapon and surrendering in the next ten minutes will be spared."

Her eyes grew colder. "After that, I don't want to see any prisoners."

Williams looked upset, and Liara grimaced, speaking quietly. "Wouldn't prisoners be useful to the Systems Alliance, or to find out – "

Shepard interrupted her with a slashing movement of her free hand. "There are a lot of problems with that. We may be facing upwards of sixty to seventy opponents, most of which have military training, all of which have been supporting a terrorist organization involved in the slaughter at Eden Prime, killing and torture of alien sentients, and treason against the SA itself. I suspect, although I can't prove it yet, that someone in Cerberus may be tight with my superiors."

She exhaled. "High Command gave me a list of important planets and operations, and this world isn't on them. The Fleet Master himself did not think it was very likely we would find anything here, so perhaps he isn't in on it. But the ugly reality, Liara, is that these people are the worst sort of criminals, and it's entirely too likely that if we capture them, they may walk. I can't be sure when Citadel forces would arrive to take custody of them, and if a SA ship shows up to arrest them and haul them off, I can't stop them – or prove said ship isn't infiltrated by Cerberus. "

She stood taller. "We don't have any facilities on the Normandy for more than a handful of prisoners, and when we find the commander I intend to take them, at least, alive, if possible. But I refuse to let any of my soldiers get killed trying to take these fuckers captive when they've shown they'll suicide just to take out alien forces."

She paused. "Finally, they raped Eylana here, and they killed the survivors of their fight with Kahoku, and assuming the admiral is still alive, he's being tortured. No mercy."

She matched gazes with Cole and Vega, who both nodded, and then Alenko, who nodded more slowly. Eylana gave a snort and caressed her shotgun. "They did that to me more than once, actually. Filth. I got no problem with that, trust me. These people aren't worth keeping alive."

Liara looked shocked, but Telanya merely frowned. "What are you, a sister?" Shepard caught the reference, a slang term for asari who were members of the Eclipse mercenary gang, and suppressed a smirk. It was highly unlikely Kahoku would hire alien gang-bangers...

..but then again, why hire an alien to go on an operation against an all human enemy? Shepard frowned, turning that thought over in her mind, while keeping half an eye on the exchange between the two asari.

Eylana turned to face her, frowning in turn. "What I did when I was younger is none of your business, frankly. I don't need a damned reason after what these sick fucks did to me for days. I guess that kind of reality is a bit hard on you, though. Not all of us are sidekicks to big-shot members of the Thirty." She glanced at Liara almost hatefully.

Liara merely glanced away, but Telanya's expression went from upset to shocked, and Shepard filed that away. "Enough. Orders are clear. Alenko, Cole, stack up on that far door. Wrex, breaching charge, then squad one, fusillade clearing fire through the hole. Last chance for questions."

No one spoke, and Shepard nodded. Half the team drew off to the side of the door, readying shorter ranged weapons, while the first squad took up firing positions behind the low barricades in the center of the room. Wrex trundled forward, carrying a demo charge, which he placed at the base of the door. He then put up a barrier right behind the charge, ensuring the entire force of the blast would be directed into the hallway beyond.

He looked up. "It will take me a couple of minutes to rig this up, Shepard."

Shepard nodded. "Good. Let's let them know how fucked they are."

Shepard triggered her omnitool. "Cerberus forces. This is Commander Sara Ying Shepard, Alliance Navy, acting as a Citadel Agent of the Office of Special Reconnaissance and Tactics. You are in violation of both Systems Alliance and Citadel law, and have committed criminal acts and acts of violence against an alien sentient being as well as attacked a lawful SA investigative force. You will surrender, immediately, or you will be shot dead where you are found with no chance at mercy. You have exactly five minutes or my combined force of Marines, DACT troopers and Citadel Observer military personnel will execute every living Cerberus person found in this base. This is your final warning."

The line on the omni-tool was silent, for almost a full minute, before a cool voice spoke. "Cerberus dies, it does not surrender. All forces, prepare to repel the invading forces. Execute alien filth you find. Humanity now, Humanity tomorrow, Humanity forever!"

Shepard killed the omni-tool feed. "Kill every one of these fuckers, fast and hard. Goddamned lunatics."

Wrex chuckled. "Done, Shepard." He stood up, checking his barrier again, and stepped back prudently. "When you are ready."

Shepard nodded. "Fire in the hole!"

The blast was staggering, shaking the entire room, and black smoke billowed out from the now collapsed barrier. Immediately, Wrex stepped back even further, and squad one, along with Garrus, Shepard, and Liara, opened fire into the hole where the doorway was, laying down long streams of automatic fire. A few seconds later, Shepard hurled two grenades through the opening. "Second squad, close quarters charge! First squad, Iron Spear! Move!"

Marines hustled, shotguns brought up in sweeping patterns as they stormed through the doorway. The hallway beyond was littered with debris, shattered panels, and over fifteen dead Cerberus soldiers. Most had been killed by flying shrapnel and plasma ejecta from the door, and the rest had been downed by heavy fire coming through after. Twice shotgun blasts rang out, putting gravely injured soldiers down for good, and then they reformed at the next door.

Shepard vaulted ahead, putting away her ODIN and drawing her heavy pistol. "Keep moving, before they have time to reform. Iron spear again, sweeping fire, full ahead! Biotics, shockwave, on three, one two three!" She hurled biotic force down as Wrex, Alenko, Telanya, and Liara did the same, and the far wall and doorway literally shattered under the impact.

The room beyond was clearly a barracks, a broad open bay forty feet across and perhaps a hundred long, with a glassed in walkway above that paralleled a set of side passageways running down each side of the room. Shepard held up three fingers on her left hand and jabbed at each passageway, and three marines peeled off down each one, kicking in doors and spraying fire into the rooms.

Confused and unarmored soldiers crouched uselessly behind bunk beds, firing with pistols. The light fire didn't even deform the shields of Shepard's forces. Cole's Revenant stuttered out heavy rounds, punching large holes in thin metal frames and splattering soldiers that were hit. One Cerberus soldier literally was blown in half, the mass accelerator slug tearing his rib cage apart before tearing out his back in a gory halo of blood mist to strike a second soldier, hurling him to the ground with a missing arm.

Marines fired for effect, spraying rounds everywhere, ricochets doing more damage than direct hits, especially to soldiers still shaken and off balance from the shockwaves. Alenko triggered his omni-tool, spraying sheets of plasma down on the mass of soldiers, and most of them went up in flames immediately screaming. More accelerator fire and blasts of biotic energy from Liara and Wrex slammed another group to the walls or floor hard enough to break bones, followed up by several grenades thrown by Vega, blasting apart the broken soldiers to paste and red smears and splashes.

Some of the Cerberus soldiers threw down their weapons, but Shepard lashed out with a throw, catching a pair of heavy bunk beds in her biotic grip and flinging them at the soldiers. The furniture hit with a deafening clang, snapping bones and smashing the men to the ground. Shepard flexed her hand in a motion, and warp fire lined the metal railings, making them glow cherry red and then sag. The men screamed and thrashed as the metal melted around them, searing into flesh and bone before the entire mass collapsed and caught fire.

Even Garrus turned away from that, and some of the Marines looked pale behind their face plates, but Shepard strode on. Her fist glowed and was limned in biotic fire as she hurled her power forward, a bolt of blue striking the far doorway and sending them splintering to the ground. Marines spilled out of the side passages, splashed with blood, as they had cleaned out the living quarters, and Shepard motioned ahead.

The next fifteen minutes were little more than a slaughter, as most of the prepared defenders were already dead, and those remained were clearly injured from fighting Kahoku's forces earlier or weren't even combatants. Shepard didn't hesitate, killing everything that moved and wore Cerberus orange, and finally the two squads and her force stood at the main junction.

The way towards the comm center was blocked by two heavy security doors, with bold printing on them. "SECURE AREA – TURRETS WILL AUTO FIRE IF YOU ARE NOT AUTHORIZED ENTRY, SEE YOUR SECTION LEADER FOR ACCESS".

Shepard scowled, and sighed. "Change the plan up. Cole, leave four men here with Williams and Garrus to act as sniper oversight. Tali, you too, setup some auto-gun drones, and make sure nothing gets out of those doors. Everyone else, on me, we're headed to the docking bay and the high security cells."

Cole nodded. "Who has operational command, ma'am? Myself or the tur... uh, Garrus?"

Shepard arched an eyebrow. "You do, Cole, but if he has an idea, listen to him." She watched – amused as Vega merely flicked a hand at Telanya, who moved to join three other marines in covering the door – and turned away. "Let's go."

O-OSaBC-O

"Jesus Christ."

Richard's face was pale as he watched the telemetry coming in from the 'fake' HQ. Originally designed mostly as a place to hold dangerous experimental subjects and as overflow housing for transfers of Cerberus military forces, the mocked up HQ had been staffed with enough soldiers to ensure that Shepard would be convinced this was the real deal.

That was, until he watched how effortlessly Shepard and her soldiers cut their way through defenses that were near copies of the real ones in the main HQ. Two ten man squads and a fifteen man Centurion unit, wiped in less than twenty minutes, with zero casualties to Shepard's forces.

Rachel, on the other hand, had a sardonic, nearly shit-eating grin on her face. "Oh, she has learned her lessons well. She's got her entire force up-armored in top of the line combat gear – and Crossfire rifles! My, my, that must have cost a staggering fortune."

Richard gritted his steel teeth together, flexing one massive fist in frustration. "Rachel, this woman is slaughtering our own forces and you are cheering her on?"

Rachel sniffed. "The attack on Kahoku was a disgrace. A dozen worms outnumbering him four to one and we still lost 70% of our troops. I had the section commander shot for incompetence, but these soldiers have failed us for the last time, Richard. We're not losing anything that wouldn't be gone sooner or later in any case."

A technician came up to Richard. "Sir, the Agamemnon is fueled and ready to depart, but we're having some systems issues with the flight control computers. Engineer Sanderson estimates it will be another fifteen to twenty minutes before they are cleared up."

Richard merely grunted his assent. "I'm glad it's such a happy moment for you, Rachel, I really am. Are you sure 'Eylana' can pull this off?"

Rachel shrugged. "Jack's asari slut, Trellani, is the one who trained her and taught her, so I have no real idea if she'll stand up to close inspection..but neither of the asari have said anything so far. As long as she doesn't get severely injured, she'll check out. Her surface skin has been overlaid with coloring agents and fluids that will look like asari blood rather than human, but she gets shot through the chest or heavy bleeding will destroy the illusion. Plus, she can't hope to pass her biotics off as true asari, as she needs a damned amp. It's hidden in the folds behind the neck, but who knows if the asari biotics feel the strength of fields or whatever."

Richard nodded. "It doesn't matter. Once they find the second plant, we're good. After all, we never told him what he was doing wasn't the truth – he really believes it, and his effect on Shepard should ... distract her from any missing pieces. At least, that's what Jack claimed."

Rachel nodded, turning back to the tactical board. The last of her cruiser forces had been crushed by Citadel fleets, and Holdfast Thermopylae had been detonated before it could be taken intact. A few dozen independent operations continued – HE fuel stations, the occasional strike force tucked away on an uninhabited world – but almost a hundred thousand Cerberus soldiers and twenty six starships had been destroyed, along with over sixty billion in credits.

Even if the ruse worked and the Citadel and SA thought Cerberus dead and gone, it would take a long time to rebuild the forces they needed for Damocles. And without Saren as a distraction, the chance at storming and capturing the Citadel was a longer shot than she cared to admit. Another distraction would have to be engineered...trouble with the batarians, or that lunatic Aria in the Traverse.

Still, she was confident of the eventual success of Cerberus, right up until the point where the computers began running the altered codes that the Illusive Man had transmitted via QEC.

In the main docking bay, the sleek form of the CBV Agamemnon squatted, all heavy lines and blocky white armor. A cruiser armored up to near battle cruiser levels, she bristled with guns, torpedoes and every innovation Cerberus's ship-masters had devised. Her crew was topnotch, even aside from the hand-picked security force and custom-built JOTUN mechs onboard.

Unfortunately, the Illusive Man had a hand in her construction, and had built himself several backdoors into the flagship. Knowing that the Agamemnon was Rachel and Richard's ticket out of Edolus, it had not escaped his attention.

And his attention was usually lethal.

The sixteen anti-matter flecked heavy torpedoes in the ship itself were heavily code-locked to the ship's fire-control system, to ensure they couldn't be hacked and detonated during combat. Sadly, the forty nine torpedoes stacked neatly in the reload bin fifteen feet from the ship had no such protections, and when the Illusive Man's Benedict override hit them, all of them lost containment on the magnetic bottles that separated the antimatter from matter.

The explosion was beyond titanic, tearing a hole eighty feet wide into the base, the plume of hellfire erupting in both directions for hundreds of feet, spraying lethal x-rays and degenerate matter in all directions. The Agamemnon, with shields down and still connected to the HE3 fueling lines that had just finished, didn't explode so much as evaporate. The rest of the docking bay – with three destroyers and over fifty small strike craft – made up for that lack of explosions, blowing up even more spectacularly than the missiles.

Fire raced along corridors, blowing through interlocking security doors and incinerating dozens of personnel, slamming into the power generation engines that hooked into the planet's core, melting those to slag. At the same time, Benedict hit the Cerberus computer systems and security systems like a tidal wave.

Even as the base shook and pieces of the ceiling burst down in rains of sparks and rubble, the computers were failing. Hydraulic lines controlling security doors ruptured, spraying high pressure hydraulic fluid out in lines, locking said doors in the open position. Armories full of defensive gear locked and burned their door motors out, sealing away the weapons the soldiers that remained alive would need to fight with.

The entire research bay lost power, all of the records of research conducted being compacted into burst transmission form and going out in three strong pulses, before being deleted from the computers entirely. A moment later, random access commands dumped millions of incriminating stock transactions, sales receipts, and video images into said computers, all of them setting up Richard and Rachel as the leaders of Cerberus.

Outside, the heavy turrets of the planetary defense grid that Cerberus had built and hidden at painstaking expense ceased trying to find the sensor ghosts of the Normandy. Banks of missiles and barrels of mass accelerators instead steadily slewed until they locked on to the three circling Cerberus cruisers in orbit. They fired at once, over one hundred and eighty torpedoes mixed in with over two thousand missiles and lead by 55 heavy accelerator shots. One cruiser managed to evade for almost three seconds before being blown out of the sky – the other two, caught completely unprepared, came apart in bursts of light and fire.

Inside the Cerberus HQ, chaos reigned. Fire suppression systems sprayed out foam and water, soaking the ground with soap slurry designed to smother fires and instead reducing footing to a dangerous mess. The galley oven's heated to broil maximum temperature with the doors shut, catching fire almost immediately, while refrigerant lines were over-pressurized and burst out, sending toxic gasses directly into the canteen where soldiers ate.

Mechs all over the base powered up, and began opening fire, both at each other and at Cerberus forces, while the VI's that normally directed base movements began gibbering poetry from Robert Frost. Displays were overwritten with a pair of glowing blue circles, glaring out at screens from every direction, and Rachel and Richard could only watch in horrified, mute terror as the experiments were released from the holding tanks in secure level two and erupted. Howling mutant Terran dogs, crossed with rachni genes, leapt atop and savaged unarmed research staff, while a yahg tore apart his holding cell and landed on his feet, slamming a massive fist into the security guard next to him before appropriating his weapons.

Internal security systems were firing, as security officers triggered omni-tool driven manual overrides to contain the chaos, but the damage was done. The security doors were out, the armories locked and sealed, the base was on emergency power, every method of transport off the planet had been destroyed, and the soldiers were fighting crazed mechs and experiments in every hallway.

At that moment, the QEC link lit up, and the smiling form of Jack Harper stood before them, seated in a deck chair, lit cigarette in one hand and a drink in the other. His voice was cool and wry, and his expression was pure triumph.

"Ah, Richard and Rachel. Catch you fuckers at a bad time?"

Richard's inarticulate roar of rage didn't affect the hologram in the slightest. "I'm guessing so, based on the telemetry readings I'm getting. This QEC link is one way only, as I have no intention of listening to pleas of mercy, threats, or more bad villainous posturing from either of you."

The Illusive Man's expression grew darker. "I'm not blind to what you two have been up to, and I have come into information that suggests that maybe Saren's intentions are not as crazed as they sound at first flush. With that in mind, I'm afraid you two have gone from superfluous to a threat, one that I plan to neutralize as neatly as possible."

He paused to dump an ash from his cigarette, as Richard's face purpled. "Comms, trace the signal!"

The comm tech shook his head. "I can't sir, the entire system is locked up, cycling junk data and looping through testing and security protocols. It's non-responsive."

Richard stormed over to the man, lifting him up from his seat with a single hand. "Then hack it, you incompetent fool, or we're all going to die here!" With a flick he hurled the man back into his chair, his black gaze refocusing upon Jack's shimmering golden avatar.

"I'm sure you're trying to find some way out, but sadly, there are none. I've destroyed your ships – both the Agamemnon, and those in orbit. The fireworks will almost certainly highlight your true location to Shepard's forces, as well as to the Citadel strike force I just notified."

Rachel's jaw tightened as Jack continued. "I've scrambled all your set-up plans to sidetrack or disable Shepard, and made sure that whatever information we have will be easily available to her to find Saren, based on what little we know. I'm sure that by the time she gets around to you, she won't be in a very ... kind ... mood, especially given who you are, Rachel, so I do hope you two kept some sort of weapons available. I'm afraid the explosion in the docking bay probably incinerated everyone in Barracks One and Two, and Barracks Three is right next to the experiment storage bay, so.. "

He trailed off almost delicately, taking a sip of his drink. "At any rate, there's no need to prolong this call. Gloating is very unprofessional, after all. Trellani sends her love. Assuming you two make it out alive, I decided to forward your bolt-holes onto the Shadow Broker. Good luck getting out alive, and I do hope you can remember this is just business."

The signal died, the QEC detonating a moment later in a shower of sparks and a burst of flame that was quickly extinguished by one of the techs. Rachel stood stock still, considering, and then turned to the nearest tech. "Forget hacking the system. Bypass the PA system and try to coordinate whatever forces we have left alive. We have to get into the armories."

She turned to the situation map, which had gone dark, and then to the monitoring display screens that were feeding telemetry from the fake HQ, which had also gone dark. She sighed. "Even if Shepard didn't feel that blast, the Normandy's sensors will be able to pick up the fires from the explosions, not to mention the radiation. If we're lucky, we haven't already taken a fatal rad dose. Break out the med-kits and distribute the anti-rad syringes we have available. Is any one armed?"

Half of the twenty or so techs and support personnel in the command center nodded, displaying light or heavy pistols. "Very good. Those of you who aren't, get the doors leading to the center shut, use muscle power if you can't reengage the hydraulics. Everyone else, forget the computers, start tearing down the consoles and make barricades."

She turned to Richard, who was standing at his desk fuming. "You hardly need weapons or armor, so you'll have to be the center of our defenses, Richard. It will take time for Shepard to finish with the fake base, contact the Normandy, and reach us here. Then she has to fight her way into the wreckage of the outer base to find us. If we are lucky, whatever remaining forces we have outside can winnow down her ranks."

Richard glared. "She just cut through defenses much like that – working ones, mind you – in a fraction of what we thought it would take. Even I can't take down twenty plus marines in heavy combat armor, much less deal with that lunatic of a krogan or the asari bitches."

Rachel only gave a thin smile. "Then we'll have to use our heads, Richard. We haven't lost until we're dead. I've been in worse fixes than this."

Richard only looked at her for a moment before glancing away. "I don't even want to know." With a grunt, he picked up his massive steel desk as if it were a toy and tipped it over. "I'll help move the barricades around. For all the good that will do against biotic shockwaves."

O-OSaBC-O

The tremor was slight, but it could be felt. Shepard frowned, and then her frown deepened as the comm-link on her omni-tool came alive. "Shepard here. Why are you breaking radio silence, Pressly?"

Pressly's voice was clear and crisp, free of the persistent static that had been dogging their comms since landing. "Status change, ma'am. You're not going to believe this. A few minutes ago, there was a massive explosion about six hundred miles east of your position, near a mountain range. Sensors are picking up eta-band levels of radiation, mostly hard gamma and x-ray. Like a super-massive torpedo strike, or primary fusion detonation."

Shepard shuddered, eta-band was a measurement defined as capable of killing krogan in hours. "Go on."

Pressly's voice turned almost wondering. "At the same time, sixteen GTS sites opened up, full fire, on the Cerberus cruisers in orbit that chased us here. All three were destroyed. Ma'am, that radar locked us up at least once – and did not fire on us. Whoever triggered it was going after Cerberus ships, and based on the missile signatures...they were Cerberus ground to space defenses that did so. We're breaking low-observable to swing over the site, full stealth, and try to get clearer sensor and telemetry readings on what we're seeing."

Shepard nodded, thinking. "Approved. Seems like the jamming is gone too. Keep in touch and alert me to any changes, and put a sensor buoy out by the mass relay in case any more Cerberus ships show up." She clicked off, turning to glance at the team behind her.

Her shocking brutality had left most of the team in a slight state of anxiety, but the news just relayed by Pressly had broken that up a bit. "Sounds like there may be more than one facility here. Whatever just happened, it wasn't good for Cerberus. Let's continue our sweep and see what we can find when we storm the command center. Move out."

She met Cole's gaze. "Keep an eye on that door. If nothing else, that may have been their ride off planet, and they may come boiling out. Stop them, fall back towards my unit if you have to, but don't let them get past you." Cole nodded sharply, and Shepard turned away, her black armored form stalking down the blood-splashed corridor without hesitation. Marines and aliens trailed behind her, weapons ready, eyes darting around in preparation.

Cole felt very, very sorry for whoever ran into her.

---

Chapter 77: Chapter 68: Cerberus, Collapse

---

A/N: One..more...chapter. Reviews might help me write moar.

---

The trip towards the high-security wing of the base was an interesting admixture of horror and silence, punctuated by the clicking and resealing of helmets as marines had to take them off to vomit.

The first section of the wing was research areas, and it was a scene out of some dystopian, nightmare horror story that seemed to illustrate and populate what Shepard's team found. Huge, barren expanses of gleaming surgical steel were bifurcated by reinforced observation rooms, open topped with grated catwalks above them, while the walls were studded with research alcoves and operating areas. Garishly lit bays full of tanks of bubbling suspension tanks, each one holding horrifically mutated corpses – some human, some alien, some completely unidentifiable.

Many of the rooms held dissection tables, many gleaming immaculately, clean white tile floors and blackened drains hinting at their sinister purpose. But more than a few were occupied, the torn-apart cadavers of turian, asari or salarian forms silent and redolently still on the hard surfaces. Blood spattered in blues and purples, congealing thickly on the floor.

Some were adults. Some were children.

Worse were the 'experiments' – half-conversion borgs, out of their minds with pain, pulling uselessly at their own limbs. A section of humans glittering with biotic power, eyes clawed out and blood-trails streaking down contorted, screaming features, studded with blue-ware biotic cybernetic attachments. Salarians cut open and hooked to strange, glowing machines, a batarian flayed down to muscle and a heavy chitinous substance bolted to his body, spurts of blood leaking through the plates.

There were rows upon rows of broken, shattered corpses, stacked five and six high into narrow hollows in the walls and sealed in the frozen silence of stasis fields. A heavy rack assemblage of metal drawers and refrigeration units was a collection of organs, harvested from dozens of sources.

A circular pit in the middle of the huge room, its top covered with a solid security field, held almost sixty Thorian thralls, standing silent and mute, eyeless heads staring emptily as they tracked nervous marines who skirted around the edge. Shepard ordered the field dropped and six incendiary grenades dropped in, shuddering as the things burned to ash without even moving beyond turning to stare at her in unison.

The research stations were full of abominable things. Some displayed live biopsies, or the results of the injections of various drugs and substances into aliens, the screams underlined by the cool, quiet voices of researchers. Others were too disgusting to view for long – simulated combat tests against what looked to be packs of thralls facing down single asari or turians.

After the first few research stations had been viewed and downloaded, Alenko recoiled from what he found on one, stammering out curses and emptying his pistol into the thing. It took almost five minutes for him to calm down enough to state that the console showed payments from the SA to Cerberus to stage accidents of starships to dust areas of colonies with eezo.

Shepard thought back to the iron-like lines of Fleet Master Dragunov's face, the disdain with which he tossed aside her accusations of doing just what Alenko had discovered. God only knew what else could be found in this madhouse. Part of her didn't want to know. Part of her had to know. She had fought most of her adult life against criminals and pirates, slavers and monsters, not because she loved the law or cared about 'right' or 'wrong' but to prevent anymore little girls from ending up like her, to prevent the weak from being preyed upon.

That she could serve, even unknowingly, anyone who would sign off on this disgraceful abomination, made her want to kill, and then take a long, hot shower. She grimly directed her teams to gather more information as she continued looking around.

There were no soldiers, no defenders – the entire research bay was empty of human life. Shepard quietly directed her marines to cover the dead as they passed and record what they found, but to not destroy anything. "As disgusting as this is...it's evidence. I'm not going to cover for the fucking SA if they were actually behind any of this shit."

Neither Alenko nor Vega could meet her gaze. Wrex merely spat on the floor, grumbling something in korogish.

Beyond the research bay, the corridor ended in a security door. Feeling distinctly upset, she placed four grenades on it and detonated them remotely, and had the DACTs empty their heavy weapons into the corridor beyond for a full thirty seconds. After the explosions stopped, she motioned her forces forward, stepping over splattered red stains that littered the floor.

A security station and a set of low barricades with a pair of security turrets had stood here, until the fire from the DACTs had torn the entire area apart. Soldiers lay sprawled in messy piles, bits blown off or still on fire, and the wall at the end of the corridor was torn open to reveal part of another large room.

She dispatched two marines to make sure everyone down was dead, then stepped up to the new room.

Three neat rows of cells lined three of the outlying walls, six cells to a wall. The front of each cell was an energy grid, and a security station took up space on the nearest wall, two Cerberus soldiers manning it as she stepped through. Her ODIN barked twice, as she sidestepped sloppy incoming fire, the rounds blasting into each of the soldiers at head-height.

The first soldier collapsed bonelessly to the ground his head simply gone, spewing lifeblood in a gory fountain. The other one managed to half-duck behind a console and caught the burning wedges in his back instead, sending him to the ground screaming, his useless pistol skittering out of his numb hands. Shepard simply walked over to him and fired at his face a third time, point blank, the enormous power of the gun liquifying his entire head and upper torso. She didn't flinch as blood, scaldingly hot, splashed over her armor, beading and dripping ominously from her chest-plate and shins.

A third Cerberus soldier rounded a blind corner, pistol in hand. She brutally lashed out with her biotics, her anger flowing free like fire, and with a single, massive application of force hurled her strongest throw at the man while anchoring him to the ground biotically. His unarmored body tore open like a wet sack, spilling bones and organs in a tangled, sopping mess to the ground.

"Commander!" Alenko's voice was strained and horrified.

"Fuck these people, Lieutenant. Everything in this base wearing a Cerberus uniform is going to die in goddamned agony tonight." She then turned away and ignored him, fighting hard to control her emotions and anger. The Butcher surged inside, screaming for vengeance, for blood. She coolly stepped through the mess on the floor, kicking the man's head aside, and took in the far side of the room.

Four of the cells had occupants. The first two were humans, one an A7 marine, the other an older woman in upscale clothes. Both had been shot in the head, slumped on the ground in death. Shepard shook her head and walked on, coming to the third cell.

Admiral Kahoku lay flat on his back in the middle of the cell, his armor splintered and riven with acid burns and gunshot blasts. A pair of expended medical packages on his arm and torso blinked red with failure notifications, and his eyes, open and staring, were locked in the rictus gaze of the dead. Shepard cursed faintly and triggered her comms. "Normandy, this is Shepard. Admiral Kahoku is dead. Put together a burst packet drone and fire it off, call in the Citadel reinforcements. I'm going to wipe this place off the map."

She clicked off after getting a terse reply from Pressly, when a marine spoke up. "Ma'am, there's a man in this cell – and he's alive."

She walked over, still holding her ODIN shotgun, and stood in front of the cell for a long moment before unclasping her helm seal and taking it off, shaking her hair free.

The figure within was filthy, blood trickling from an untreated gunshot in his leg and from his mouth, his dark black hair unkempt. He wore a Cerberus uniform, but rank patches had been torn from it and the armor plating the soldiers wore over their chest, arms and legs was gone. Brown, tired, muddy eyes flickered up and over her armor, the thin, cracked lips drawing to a crooked, broken half smile. His once-broad and muscled frame twitched, in pain or sympathy, and the voice that rang out, whispery and tired, was so very familiar and warm.

"Hey, She-bitch. Long time no see." Jason Dunn gave a cracked, half-crazed laugh, and Shepard could only stare as he spoke the very same words Bea had upon meeting her on Feros.

O-OSaBC-O

"How are you here, wearing that goddamned uniform, Jase?" Shepard's voice was icy with disapproval, and yet it had more emotion in it than Liara had heard in some time. She was more careful this time – she was not going to glare at the human male, given that he had obviously suffered heavily, and his attitude seemed brighter than Bea's, despite his wounds.

Liara resigned herself to merely listen, promising to herself she'd be there if Shepard needed her...and worried what changes life this broken human would bring.

The battered human was laying down flat in the corridor, being treated by Corporal Jackson for his leg wound, munching dispiritedly on a ration bar. He was badly dehydrated, bruised, with several broken bones and a nasty infection from the gunshot in his leg that would have killed him in a few more days, but N7's were hard to kill, and his eyes were alive again.

"Long story, Shep. After you bailed on us and we bailed on you, we pretty much got blackballed."

She nodded. "I met up with Bea not too long ago, she told me. She said Von Grath and Florez weren't very happy with you."

Jason snorted, and choked down another bite of the ration bar. "Unhappy my ass, Von Grath wanted us up on charges, and Florez wanted us shot. But eventually it kinda calmed down. The trial ended up fine, you were promoted, and we were dumped into the RIU's. Baby Blue lost it and ran off to be a krogan or some shit, and Bea and I were shipped off to every fucked up, two bit, worthless ass suicide mission you could imagine."

He sighed, and took a sip of water from the canteen a marine had handed him. He drew the back of his hand across his mouth, grimacing, and glanced back up. "One day, I got approached by a private military contractor, or so he said. Told me I could make better money and fight batarian slavers and other 'disruptive assets of the enemies of humanity'. At the time, I was stupid, and angry. I signed up. Fought a bunch of slavers, took out a pirate ring, and signed for a longer term. Before long, the targets got less and less criminal, more and more .. questionable...and I realized I was in Cerberus. They 'disappeared' me, or so I was told, and I've been with them ever since."

She didn't bother to keep the disgust off her face, and he smiled back. "Oh, at first I was leery of them, with all the terrorist stuff. None of that shit you saw in the research bay – just military work. Sometimes against the Deathwatch or STG, mostly against light forces in the Traverse. Winning hearts and minds on independent colonies."

He paused. "But until about four months ago, every op I was on was as clean as a whistle. I guess I impressed them enough to transfer me here for 'accelerated training and conditioning.' Translation, propaganda and hate. I saw what they did to aliens, and experiments run on humans, and I couldn't handle it any more. I tried to reach out to Von Grath, but I got shifted over to an admiral."

She nodded. "You were Kahoku's source."

He smiled again, wider. "Yep. He said he'd check it out, and sent a team of specialists to 'retrieve' me. Unfortunately, they got picked off. So he sent a regiment, and they got killed off too. Finally, the old man comes himself...and the day he hits, I get taken out by my own people. They knew I tipped him off from the first. Fuckers caught me cold, shot me in the leg, beat the crap out of me, and tossed me in here. They knew I was the leak... and let me do it."

Shepard frowned, glancing over at Wrex. The krogan had taken his own helmet off, and his nostrils flared as he tested the air. He gave a subtle nod, and glared hard at the human on the ground. "He's telling the truth, at least as he knows it, Shepard."

She exhaled. "Alright, then. Why did they let you do it?"

The broken smile faded from Jason's face. "Kahoku was Cerberus's handler with the SA. Apparently when Saren came along and shit went downhill, Cerberus saw an opportunity – for God knows what, I don't know. They broke off comms with the SA and went rogue for real. SA had lost track of them and never knew about this place to begin with ... and Kahoku was the only one who knew enough of where the bodies were buried to track down their operations. So they let me lead him here, and then they ambushed him and killed him."

Shepard licked her lips. "And me?"

He nodded. "They knew you were coming, She-bitch. I wasn't placed nearly highly enough to know what the fuck they were doing with Saren...but they really don't want you interfering. I overheard one of the boffins talk about 'control platforms' and the geth – I think they want however Saren is using the geth for themselves. And I know they want the colonies that are independent from the SA to turn to them. I think they planned to kill you off, too, and use the embarrassment to fuck with shit politically with the SA. I dunno about that for sure..."

Shepard nodded. "But it fits. More Torfan style bullshit."

He grimaced at the name, but only shrugged a moment later. "Pretty much. Kahoku wasn't stupid, he backstopped a unit of asari mercs to pluck him – and me – out of trouble if we got ambushed, but I don't think he realized how deep Cerberus was into the SA intel. They took them out before they even got a chance to figure out what the fuck was going on."

Eylana only huffed at that, and Shepard nodded. "Why asari, though?"

Jason shrugged. "I dunno. He might have been worried that Cerberus would pick up on human mercs or other SA soldiers. I think one of his AIS agents was on the take. The last thing before they took me out I remember was them massing shit on Kahoku's forces. The base CO interrogated me and then tossed me in here to rot." He looked down, as the medical package on his leg beeped smugly and disconnected.

Jackson stood up, wrapping the package back into it's bag. "He's still shocky, ma'am – some blood loss, broken arm, lots of bruising and malnutrition. He's not combat effective, and I'm not much of a medic." She nodded and turned to the rest of the soldiers. "Alright, move on the shuttle bay, take it out with explosives and regroup here." She turned back to Jason. "You gonna make it?"

He shrugged, standing gingerly, wincing as he moved his left arm. "I guess. Doubt the SA will be very forgiving, with me having basically gone AWOL to join a terrorist group and then get one of their admirals killed..."

Shepard shook her head. "He was crooked, and in any case, Cerberus is about to be a moot fucking point. I'm going to storm their command center and kill it's leader. You know who that is?"

He shook his head. "They kept leadership in the dark, really. There was the Illusive Man, but he was off-world for sure. But there was also a big guy, saw him a couple of times, people gave him a wide berth." He paused, thinking, and Shepard shrugged.

"No matter. The entire Citadel fleet is on this assault, no one is getting away. You know anything about the base layout?"

He nodded slowly, favoring his left leg as he followed her. "C3 is behind the training areas and the computer sections. Pretty open layout once you're past the final security checkpoint. If whoever running this shindig is anywhere, it's probably in there."

Shepard nodded absently. She motioned Liara over. "Jase, this is Dr. Liara T'soni, a very strong biotic and a member of my strike team. I'm going to have her stick close to you, so she can cover you with her barriers." She paused to glance at Liara. "Please keep him safe, Liara."

Liara nodded as firmly as she could. "I will do so, Shepard. Are you ... alright? You are very .. agitated."

Shepard suppressed a snort, gesturing with a free hand towards the science bay. "What I saw in there pretty much shattered what little faith I had left in both my government and the path my life has taken, Liara. I'm not even a rehabilitated goon acting for the good of humanity – I'm just a thug being used by people even more sick, twisted and evil than the Reds ever were. I sacrificed my life, my .. person, my ... friends and soldiers...for this?"

She turned to face Liara more fully. "I just wonder if it's all fucking worth it. I know, in my mind, what I'm fighting for...but I've never experienced it all. Had a chance to touch it. All I seem to taste is death, betrayal, combat, suffering and fucking criminals." She shook her head, something in her gaze going dark and cold. "I get tired of it all. You can only be angry so long until you forget what the fuck you're even angry about."

She glanced back towards the science bay. "Even if I stop this, I can't stop the fuckers who allowed it to happen. Who authorized that shit on Feros. And all of this ends up ... for what?"

She gave a small, ugly smile. "I sacrificed who I could be for this?" Liara had no answer, licking her lips as she frantically tried to think of a response to that, but was surprised as Dunn limped forward aggressively...and then spat on the floor.

"Christ in a sidecar, Shep. Don't go all Bea on me here." He paused to give a broken-toothed smile and shrugged. "You didn't do anything you didn't have to fucking do, and you didn't do any of the shit in that room. You wanna blame someone? Don't blame the whole SA. You think fucking von Grath would sign off on some shit like that? Captain Anderson? Commissar De Murete? Or, devil fuck us all, Major Kyle?"

He turned to face her more fully, his bloodstained Cerberus uniform dimming in the poor light, eyes bright and hard. "We didn't do a real good job of backing you up after Torfan, Shep. I – we – all fucked up. It took me a while to see that, to get past the stupid anger and everything else. I got past it because I saw shit like this, realized that no matter how bad the burb-cology was, how hard CenPol came down on gangers, what I'd been through was a lick of shit against what real suffering was like."

He pointed with a hard, stubby finger at the marines with Shepard. "They are the SA. The civilians are the SA. Humanity is, as fucked as we are. Yeah, we did shit like this, we also fought and died at Torfan instead of folding up like little bitches. We bled at Dirth and Exova and a dozen other shitty worlds, not for some admiral, or some mouthy little Earth First assbat in a nice suit." He managed to summon up a glare, staring right into Shepard's eyes. "The blue has to mean more than that, Shepard."

Shepard's voice was soft, almost hesitant. "And if it doesn't, Jace?"

He rolled his eyes. "Then you fuck shit up and take it out, Neutron style, She-bitch. You're the fucking Butcher, the first human Spectre, the only fucking member of the Penal Legion to kick a commissar in the nuts and dare him to kill her! You're not going to give up and just let this shit stand, are you? I didn't. I fucked up, I did shit I shouldn't have, and I tried to make it right. You gotta keep stepping, Shep. You got fucked over and out...so did I. So have a lot of us. That doesn't mean I'm going to let them kick me any more than I let CenPol did."

Shepard's thin smile widened a bit. "You were always a stupid stubborn thug, Jace." She clapped him on the shoulder, gently, and he shrugged. Shepard's omnitool lit up as she did so, and she pulled back her arm to punch the comm panel. "Shepard here."

"Commander, this is Sergeant Haln, in the shuttle bay. None of the shuttles appears to be missing, but ...there's something strange going on. The electronics in all the shuttles are scrambled, the nav compensators all blown out, the fueling computer refuses to boot and the motors to open the bay doors are, well, shorted out. It's like someone sabotaged the entire bay. I've rigged up the explosives, but none of the shuttles in here are going anyway fast anyway, ma'am."

Shepard arched an eyebrow. "Huh. Rig 'em up anyway and put them on a remote detonator, Sergeant." She clicked off, glanced over at Jason. "Any ideas?"

Dunn rubbed his chin thoughtfully, then scrubbed the pad of his thumb along his jawline, wiping off a bloodstain. "Negative, boss lady. I've been locked up hard for days, but I know damn well that they shuttle capacity at least yesterday, that's how they brought in food supplies. Sounds ... fishy."

Shepard nodded, and tapped her comms again. "Cole, any movement?"

The basso voice of the master chief boomed through the comm-link. "Negative, Commander. Doors are still shut tight, no attempts to open them. Tali's got her drones in the air-ducts – the ducts leading to the comm center are all locked down with internal shutters. No way in except the hard way. We're picking up some kind of fragmentary encrypted comms, but they appear to be external to the base."

Shepard nodded thoughtfully. "Alright, Cole – stand by, we're headed back." She clicked off, then selected another channel. "Normandy, this is Shepard, new tasking. I want you to pick up the two MAKO tanks and the marines we left there and meet up with us here at this base. Go ahead and drop MAKO one near the entrance – it looks like solid rock, shouldn't attract threshers. Then stand by, we have some .. materials we need to load into external cargo bays one and two."

The voice of Pressly sounded back. "Understood, Commander. We have another issue. When we went to high orbital to launch off the drone as you requested, tac ops picked up an incoming burst transmission, from Citadel Fleet - they got a no-source transmission requesting heavy infantry backup about the same time that explosion we picked up went off. ETA is three and a half hours."

Shepard's mind drew a blank. "A no-source transmission? The fuck does that even mean, XO?"

Pressly's voice was tight with his own frustration. "They aren't sure, Commander. It got dropped into active routing from the buoy at Ferris Fields, and they can't pin down where it routed from before that. It has stock SA comm codes and the open-key encryption used by the SA military to communicate with the Citadel...but the key is old, commander. We changed that key, according to the systems, on May 9 2181."

Shepard felt a sharp chill travel up her spine, and she exchanged a sharp look with Jason, who had an almost identical expression on his face. "...that's the date of the Battle of Torfan, Pressly. That code was transmitted by General Florez to signal the Citadel cleanup fleets to secure the system. What the fuck is going on?!"

She turned towards Alenko, but as she did so there was a blaring alarm sound and a pre-recorded voice. "Alert. Fire suppression systems have been activated in Command Central. Manual overrides engaged. All personnel in Command Central have ninety seconds to evacuate before atmospheric decompression and halon suppression engages. Repeat. Fire suppression systems have been activated in Command Central. Manual overrides engaged. All personnel in Command Central have ninety seconds to evacuate before atmospheric decompression and halon suppression engages."

Shepard whirled on her heel, slipping her shotgun back into place in the small of her back. "Alenko, finish up here with three marines. Everyone else, reinforce Cole, now!"

The marine unit moved at a quick trot, weapons sweeping in clearing patterns as they moved back through the science bay. Jason Dunn hobbled along, followed by Liara, while Eylana looked increasingly nervous and trailed even further back. It only took five minutes to reach the intersection and a few more to reach Cole's position.

The platoon was there, still ready for a fight. Flashing orange lights above the security door were flashing, along with opened vents now hissing out atmosphere. Cole himself had his Revenant braced across a low wall, with a grenade placed within grabbing distance. "Still no one coming out, Commander...but I heard pounding on the door and weapons fire from within a couple of minutes ago."

Shepard nodded, and motioned marines into sniping and over-watch positions. "Tali, how can I get this door open?"

The quarian rose from her crouch to examine the security panel for several seconds, tapping hesitantly once or twice before slowly stepping back. "Shepard, something is very wrong here. The panel's software has been .. hacked. We can open the door at any time."

Shepard blinked. "Hacked? By who?"

Tali spread her hands helplessly. "I .. don't know. The software itself is overridden, all the security functions are just .. wiped. I can tell you that whatever did it wiped everything on the other side, but left the motor controls functional for this side...trapping whoever is inside that section within."

Shepard tightened her jaw. "Pressly, status on that MAKO and my marines."

The voice of Joker interrupted. "About five more minutes, Commander. Pressly is overseeing the undocking of the external cargo bays. What's up?"

Shepard narrowed her eyes. "Keep over-watch on this base, Joker. Anything tries to get out on foot, put mass accelerator fire into it. Clear?"

"Clear, ma'am. Not easy, but clear."

Shepard's expression turned darker. "Wrex, Williams, Cole, on me. Garrus, sniper. Alenko, Liara, get ready to throw shockwaves." She stepped up to the control panel, and pressed the disengage controls, and then the open door button. The massive doors creaked alarmingly, and then broke open, air rushing in past her forces with high force.

The corridor beyond was littered with dead bodies, most of them clawing at their throats or curled into fetal position. Heavy wisps of greyish smoke curled along the floor, half-concealing the dead. Small items, papers, pens, and other detritus was scattered in all directions, and a line of glass fronted internal windows was reduced to piles of broken glass in front of each window frame.

Nothing moved, and Shepard motioned her teams forward, pulling out her ODIN and sweeping it in slow, careful movements. The corridor split, one half moving down towards a room full of computer servers and large screens, the other curving gently to enter a huge, domed room with a war map built into a circular plinth in its middle.

"Garrus, take a few people and secure the data center. Everyone else on me." She continued to walk forward, stepping over contorted corpses, and crossed into the threshold of the communications and control center.

It was an impressive room – bank upon bank of status screens, and almost thirty tactical operator consoles arranged in a neat semi-circle flanked a complete holographic battlesim screen. On the far side, a man in a fancy looking Cerberus uniform lay slumped against a control panel, fingers contorted and eyes wide with fear even in death.

Williams whistled. "They asphyxiated to death...wow. Bad way to go."

Shepard, for her part, swept a full circle around the room before lowering her shotgun. "...everyone is dead. Move up. I want this room cataloged, closely, and every bit of evidence we can find here needs to be retrieved, so that we can take it back to the SA command and some kind of fucking justice brought to bear." She slowly moved along one wall, examining the tactical consoles for clues, and the rest of her forces began walking in.

The consoles were all blank, non-functioning, each one overridden with garbage data. The large comm panel against the far wall was blank as well, crumpled figures on the floor in front of it still and unmoving.

Eylana entered last, glancing around almost fearfully before relaxing. "So, this is the command center, huh. I guess from here I can call for a ride."

Shepard nodded absently, a moment before two turrets dropped from the ceiling. Before anyone could move, they fired in unison, both shots striking Eylana with incredible force. One tore through her right side, the other blasted off her left arm.

She fell the ground, eyes wide with shock, crimson blood spraying out from the chest wound before stopping. Marine counter-fire took out both turrets a moment later, but that was still a moment too late for Eylana, who gave a rasping, choked gasp and died a second later. Shepard cursed resoundingly, preparing to vent her anger on the turret wreckage, when she caught the strange looks Liara was giving the corpse.

Liara and Telanya looked at the asari on the floor in alarm, and then Telanya looked up at the commander. "Shepard...her blood is red."

Shepard observed the body more closely. The blood was red, not the purple an asari's blood should be. And now, dead on the ground, a few more things became apparent. The 'asari' didn't have her arms bend in quite the same way an asari would, and she hadn't been using her biotics in the same way an asari would, either. The angular shape of her face, the body stances...now that Shepard thought about it, 'Eylana' was far too glib and flip to be recovering from multiple rapes, and too dismissive of Liara, to be a real asari.

Wrex knelt down next to the body, sniffing. "It smells asari..but it smells more like human. A fake asari, heh. Your people are really screwed up, Shepard."

She snorted. "These assholes are hardly 'my people'. Keep searching, I want to know what the fuck happened here, people."

As she finished her sentence, however, the main screen in the center of the room lit up. A digitally blurred image appeared, with nothing clear except two eyes with a faint blue glow to them. "I think I can answer that question and more, Commander Shepard, if you have a moment of your time."

Shepard glanced to Tali, sending a quick omni-tool message for her find and trace the signal source. "And you are?"

The figure inclined its head, pixels shifting to keep the identity of the man hidden. "You can call me the Illusive Man, Commander. Former leader of Cerberus. And I can give you the current leaders of Cerberus, if you will just listen for a few moments to what I have to say."

---

Chapter 78: Chapter 69: Cerberus, Revelation

---

A/N: I managed to get out this chapter, because it had been kicking around in my head in a variety of ways since the beginning.

When I said this was an AU, people equated that with "mostly the same, some minor taste changes", but that isn't the case. Things are fundamentally different on quiet a few levels. Some of it is so that ME2 makes more sense, some of it just to fill holes in the established nature of events.

One thing that has always, always bothered me is how exactly Saren could know about highly secure information, like the location of the Eden Prime beacon, or that the Thorian existed and knew about Protheans. How he got his hands on a rachni egg. We're supposed to believe he had some kind of support network, but it's never shown, never mentioned. If it's so big, why is he relying on two bit thugs like Fist and inept clowns like the Krogan on Therum and Feros?

Saren had to be in league with someone. Cerberus makes the most sense, if you pitch it right.

I wasn't really planning to update tonight, but a long PM from Sollus made me reconsider. I'd like to also thank everyone who sent me encouraging reviews and PM 's when I took a break from writing, after the jackass sent me his "stop defiling the canon" PM. I really do appreciate it.

Hopefully, this chapter holds together and makes sense. I don't have a beta reader right now (she's going on vacation soon) and thus there may be a few lingering grammatical or logical flow issues. If you see something I need to fix let me know!

---

The coordinated grunting of forty or so people in unison was accompanied by the slow grinding of metal doors sliding across the floor. Rachel Florez nodded grimly as the doors to the command center were finally shut, and turned back to the comm map.

The past thirty minutes had been a nightmare. Every security system was fried or in active rebellion, experiments and prisoners were loose, computer systems invalidated and over two-thirds of the base personnel lay dead or dying. A third of the base was a smoking hole in the ground, and eighty percent of her personnel had taken a lethal radiation dose that would probably start killing people in the next week or two.

But Cerberus was strong, and the defenders of it's headquarters even stronger.

Luckily, the commander of the security team never did like Rachel's hardline demand that all weapons be secured in the armory when not in use, and he'd managed to salvage almost fifty soldiers and techs from the collapse of Barracks Three, along with weapons and armor. The rampaging mechs were mostly destroyed by equally rampaging experiments, the yahg in particular, but one tech remembered a shipment of JOTUN mechs that had arrived and placed in temporary storage. Deprogrammed and cold-started, Rachel had watched in desperate hope as Richard led her rabble of armed tech ops types out into the base itself to reclaim them.

The chaos was everywhere. Fire systems had vented away atmosphere in some sections, or flooded them with halon in others. Ventilation was out and fires from the docking bay were slowly spreading. But Captain Varr, the security commander, had punched through the chaos in Science One and Two to reach her own forces, along with dribs and drabs around the base. Forming a thin line around the cargo bay, they'd watched for incoming enemies as the techs rapidly cold-programmed the five JOTUNS.

When the big war-machines came online, Rachel immediately killed their comms systems, then physically tore out the wireless receivers, to prevent any more hacking. Locking them into verbal command mode, she'd sent them out to deal with the remaining enemies in the base, while the last secured the entryway. It only took ten minutes for the JOTUN mechs to carve their way through the few experiments and mechs that had gotten past the now-enraged yahg, and they had wounded that beast as well, driving it back into Science Two and sealing the doors.

External security was better, although all the ground and GTS defenses were offline. The security team outside was unaffected by the chaos within, and far enough from the docking bay that they were not dosed by rads. She gave them defensive orders, tucking them into sniping locations and putting one of the JOTUNS outside in GTS fire mode, along with a couple of light rocket launchers. Drawing back inside, she ordered some of the techs to sever the main tactical net from the rest of the base and try to reboot from hard copies on data crystals.

Now, at least, secondary power was coming back online – the solar panels that usually routed to the GTS systems had their cabling disconnected and spliced into the base's power network. The doors were unresponsive, and all internal security was down, but the science spaces were sealed off and Rachel smiled grimly as she was able to manually shut the ventilation down before manually triggering the halon release in the science labs. Even a yahg couldn't breathe pure halon forever, after all.

"Status report, Captain Varr." She turned to face the tired looking captain, a mousy looking man with pale skin, dark hair, sad brown eyes and a long scar occluding his cheek. His voice was a gentle, calming baritone, but sounded dry and raspy. The armor of his Cerberus uniform was spattered with blood and one shoulder unit was torn off, showing a nasty bite wound half covered with a medical package and medigel. He adjusted it as he spoke, wincing from time to time.

"Better, but not good, General. Over four hundred of my men are dead, and as far as we can tell, everyone in Science One and Two, Barracks One and Two, Storage One, Holding One, and Training Four and Six are dead. Less than a hundred and twenty people left alive, not counting the external security teams. We've got several doors being manually closed, but each one takes longer since they have to be closed from the outside."

Rachel nodded. "Place the bulk of your men inside the second door, let the external security blunt any entry. What about options for getting out of here?"

The captain sighed. "The scout car bay is intact, and the cars had zero electronics to hack or fry. The fuel pumps are out and the doors are blown shut, but I can get past that. The problem is the blast probably drew every damned worm on the planet, and we're already getting maw-sign from the lead detectors. The minute the cars get off the plateau, they're going to be targeted."

She nodded. "Can you set up some kind of distraction?"

He shrugged. "The radiating beacons were all in Science Two, ma'am. Once the halon thins down whatever is alive in there we can try to grab something, but whoever runs it out of here is a dead man. Even past that, there are only three scout cars, enough room for twelve, maybe thirteen people – and the Shadow Hand won't fit in any of them."

Rachel nodded again, more slowly, rubbing her thumb atop the grip of her pistol. "We'll deal with that when we come to it. The cars aren't a solution, though, Captain. We can't drive out to the relay, after all."

He nodded, smiling a little. "I know, ma'am. Two possibilities. One, the boat bay at the fake-base had both pinnaces and shuttles."

She interrupted him. "Shepard would have neutralized those, I'm almost sure of it."

He nodded again. "Maybe, but even if she did, she's got, what, fifteen marines and a half-dozen aliens? If we kill her here, we can ride out that way across the Marthin Ridge if we can get clear of the plateau, and see what we can salvage. Even if she blew the place up she can't be carrying much in the way of high explosive detonation charges – my combat engineers could at least rig up a shuttle or two."

He shrugged, continuing. "But my bigger idea was Kahoku's wrecked lander. According to the manifest we pulled off his omni-tool, his lander had two combat pinnaces in the bay. Each one holding about ten people. They're probably jumbled up real bad from the crash, but they build those tough."

He brought up a system map on his omnitool. "Even if our systems here are slagged, there's the storage facility on the fifth moon of Khemrom. Most of the supplies there are long-term stuff – rifles, armor, MRE's, etc – but there were two dozen light fighters and five FTL capable assault shuttles there in mothballs. The fighters can hold two people each, and the shuttles twenty. That's enough capacity to get everyone off. If we can get just a single shuttle of pilots up there, we can start ferrying people out of here in an hour. We make the relay, we can be in Vendon in ... a week. Rations we have on hand should last for three."

Rachel broke into a rare smile. "Good thinking, Captain. Very good thinking. It's a hack job, but the best we've got. Make it happen." The captain saluted and turned away, speaking orders into his omnitool, and Rachel walked across the room to the war map, and to Richard.

The big man was brooding, his fist splashed with blood and some blackish fluid where he'd crushed several thralls that had rushed the command center during the chaos. He watched with glowering eyes as the war map flickered fitfully, then glitched and displayed a map of the base with several large sections flashing red.

He looked up as she approached. "The techs have restored partial functionality, but the main computers are locked. And we can't get at the servers, they were behind Barracks Three, the tunnel has collapsed. No turrets and no sensors, just basic pressure telemetry."

She nodded. "Captain Varr has a rough plan for us to get out of here, if we can make it past the thresher maws. "

His nostrils flared. "I heard. His plan has a glaring weakness, Rachel. The Normandy is probably establishing holding orbit over us right now – and it's not that hard to drop missiles or MA shots on slow moving scout cars."

Rachel walked around the map, trailing her fingers along the railing. "I've got two men up topside with GTS launchers, and one of the JOTUNS, too. According to the documents we got from BuEng, her armor plating is insufficient to stop much fire. I've also got two techs working at one of the GTS missile launchers. If we can just get the thing to launch manually, a saturation barrage should be enough to finish her."

Richard didn't nod, or even move, merely watching her. After several long seconds, he gave a very curt motion of his head. "I hope that will be enough .. her pilot is supposed to be very good, after all. If it doesn't work, then there's no way out." He paused, and gave a sour, wry smile. "I suppose saying 'I told you so' at this juncture would be childish."

Rachel shook her head, exhaling and leaning over the railing around the war map, resting her arms on it and tilting her head up to look him in the eye. "No, it wouldn't. You were right, and I was far too confident in our abilities, and too dismissive of Jack as a threat. We knew how this would likely end when we set up that aircar accident for General Terensky, and stopped following SA dictates as they wished."

She half turned, facing the now closed doors to the command room. The only people within were her, Richard, Captain Varr, and two techs. She sighed. "We were so close, Richard. What could have spooked Jack to such a level to have him do this?"

Richard shrugged his massive shoulders. "He spoke of new information he found on Saren. Assuming we survive this clusterfuck, it may be worth investigating his claims." He then frowned, and stood to his full height.

"Luckily, Rachel, all is not fully lost. We have hold-fasts and resources Jack knew nothing about, and Cerberus will rise again, stronger than ever. It's a shame there will be sacrifices needed for that to come about, but .. that has always been the case."

Something in his voice made Rachel turn to look at him. "What do you mean?"

Richard smiled, displaying his steel teeth. "I have a light FTL capable fighter stashed in a hidden bay at the south end of the plateau. Call it insurance. I never did like this defensive setup, and I had the bay it's docked in built with some of the mech labor we used in construction, off the books. The fighter is cold, no chance that Jack's little final fuck-you program has messed it up. The only problem is, well, it's a one person fighter. And while I suppose I could always run out to the storage area on the moon and fly back an assault shuttle, if I get caught in the open when reinforcements for the Normandy arrive, it will be all for naught." He exhaled. "I plan to take the fighter and relay out, Rachel, and regroup at Holdfast Beta. I'm sorry."

Rachel nodded slowly. A large number of thoughts and possibilities ran through her mind, and with an iron will she dispelled them. "Then you'd better get moving, Richard. Captain Varr's plan may work, or it may not. But if we've been outed, that means someone has to be able to meet Shepard here as the 'leader of Cerberus'. And we can't take the risk, like you said, that you get taken out while trying to fly back an escape route for the rest of us."

She exhaled. "I've been dosed lethally anyway, Richard, so it's ultimately a moot point. I'm a dead woman walking. You, on the other hand, aren't. You have all of our science discoveries, our knowledge, and you're the most likely person to be able to hide from discovery for a long period of time and rebuild."

Richard looked at her for a long moment, before extending his massive hand. "I thought for a minute -"

She shook it, smiling a bit. "If I wasn't dosed, I might have ordered you to try to get us all out...but humanity is more important. Go. I'll ... do what has to be done."

Richard gave a nod, and then strode to the command center doors. What had taken forty people three minutes to push shut took him but a few moments to push open wide enough for him to slip through. "If they arrest you, and you .. make it... I'll get you out, Rachel."

She shook her head, smile widening. "Shepard isn't going to arrest me if she makes it that far, Richard."

With a grunt and a dark look, the huge man nodded and stepped out of sight. The doors groaned as he pushed them shut again, and Rachel turned to see the amazed expression of Captain Varr.

"H-how..."

Rachel sighed. "Full conversion cyborg, Captain. He was badly hurt in the last attack on Shanxi, trying to defend his brother, and lost 55% of his body mass. Cerberus science rebuilt him." She shrugged. "He's far more than human, now."

Varr nodded slowly. "Shanxi? The spikes did that to him?"

She nodded. "That, and ruined the career of his brother, and caused their name to be a byword for failure and shame. I think that burned at him most of all, worse than the physical pain."

Varr frowned. "His brother?"

Rachel turned back to the map, examining the outlines of the remains of her base. "Yes, Captain. His brother, General Nathan Williams, commander of the garrison on Shanxi, who was forced to surrender to the turians after they incinerated six thousand colonists as a 'warning'." She smiled. "It's all for the best, really. I don't think Richard paid much attention to the crew digest from Shepard's ship. His own niece is one of the marines with Shepard coming here."

She shook her head in disgust. "What a fucked up family."

O-OSaBC-O

For several seconds, Shepard's brain simply didn't want to engage. This entire trip had been a bit too much, too many crazy shocks one after another – fighting thresher maws on foot, seeing Kahoku's command butchered, dealing with fighting her way into this shithole, fake asari, finding Jason Dunn, of all fucking people...

I'm getting too old for this shit.

The image on the other end of the communication made a polite noise, and Shepard's eyes snapped up. "I heard you. You said 'former leader of Cerberus'. That doesn't put you much in my good books after the shit I've seen today, which would have shamed a goddamned Sao Paulo death squad. Why in the fuck would I listen to a 'former' homicidal terrorist lunatic?"

The figure reclined, seated in some kind of deck chair. The blurry pixels only swirled and covered his face – the scene behind him was of natural beauty, wooden decking overlooking a peaceful lake. Across the lake, a narrow white beach had children cavorting about, their small voices barely audible. The man wore a shimmering blue neo-silk suit over a pale gray dress shirt, the top button open. A cigarette dangled carelessly from one hand.

He looked perfectly at ease, and it made her angrier.

His voice was smoothly modulated, rich, somehow superior sounding. It made her feel small and stupid, as if she was a knobby-kneed mark again, hustling for creds or dust on Kenny's corner back in the NYC Arcology. She hated that feeling, too.

"Commander, I won't deny that I've done some unsavory things in my past, some of which I regret. I also won't deny that, at the time, those things seemed like that had to be done. I believe the same is probably true of every human being, unless you would like me to believe you don't regret your own past?"

She gritted her teeth, glaring into the blue glowing circles that seemed to mark his eyes. "We're not talking about me, we're talking about why I should listen to you."

He sniffed, flicking ash from his cigarette before taking a puff. "Quite. Then to answer your question, Commander, you should listen to me because I just stopped that fake asari from detonating the ten-kiloton nuclear device under that base and killing you all, and I'm the person who scrambled the defenses of Cerberus enough so that you can go in and kill the current leaders, the ones who are responsible for that display you no doubt saw in the research area."

She glanced over at Tali, tapping subtly on her omni-tool. Trace the signal. The quarian nodded and fell back a few steps, and Shepard refocused her attention. "Why would you do that?"

The Illusive Man leaned back in his chair with a long sigh. "Because, Commander, I happen to believe what you and Dr. T'Soni discovered on the surface of Eingana is very significant. I'm helping you because I think you have the best chance at undoing the stupidity of my former colleagues, and stopping a serious threat to humanity. And above all else, I'm helping you because I am ... disquieted by how my former colleagues twisted what began as something noble into something monstrous. Whether or not you believe me is, of course, up to you."

Shepard folded her arms, letting her weight fall back onto her right leg. "Why not just contact me on my ship? Why the dramatic execution and fancy reveal?"

The figure gave a dry chuckle. "We all have our foibles, commander. Melodrama happens to be one of mine. However, I also figured that you would be more inclined to hear me out in a situation like this rather than as a random communication out of the blue." He took a sip from something in a tumbler, and sat the glass back down with a soft clink.

Shepard was, for once, glad of the blankness of her expression. She swept her eyes over to Liara, who was watching the image raptly, and then over to Garrus, who met her glance with a flicker of his mandibles. She tightened her jaw and nodded curtly. "Fine."

Somehow the man's smile was audible in his voice. "Excellent. I'll keep it short and to the point.. well, as short as I can make it. It's a somewhat messy story." He paused, puffing at his cigarette, and continued.

"Cerberus began as a private military organization, one I created and modeled on a mix of the Iron Guard Surveillance unit and the salarian STG. At first it was concerned civilians, angry about the betrayal of our armed forces by the SA to appease the turians, and the kneeling of our government to our asari 'saviors'." The word twisted in an ugly fashion, and he gave a nod to Liara. "Not to offend a member of the Houses of the Thirty, but after listening to the council of Matriarch Trellani for years, I find your people's goals...distasteful."

The expression on Liara's face was one of fundamental shock, and Telanya's of outrage, but Shepard had little time to explore that. "So you and your racist buddies decided to shoot up some aliens and show the galaxy humans were hard."

The Illusive Man shook his head, that was clear even through the pixel blurring. "Not at all. It was mostly economic sabotage, intelligence gathering, and .. deniable operations. There were elements of the SA that were aware of us, and they gave us a wide berth. We did a few things that I .. regret now, in regards to biotic experimentation, but at the time our lack of biotics was something that made us vulnerable."

Alenko grit his teeth. "You blew up goddamned human ships and deliberately dusted hundreds of thousands of people!"

The Illusive Man nodded, taking a puff on his cigarette. "Yes, we did. Sadly, we were assisted by the SA in doing so. It was an unpleasant task, but required. And in it's way, that was the downfall of Cerberus. Over time, the SA grew to rely on us more, and more, to handle the black ops that could not ever be associated with the actual SA. They even started a white-wash unit, Janus, to cover up some the misdeeds we did on the SA's behalf. When I began balking at some of the things they wanted us to do... my organization was infiltrated by AIS agents, taken down from the inside, and I was given an ultimatum – cooperate or be turned over to the Turian Deathwatch."

The figure flicked an ash from his cigarette. "I did what I had to do. The SA's control came in two figures. One to coordinate scientific work they wanted done, and one to handle military expansion of a curious, asymmetrical nature." The Illusive Man spread his hand out in an open palm gesture, and two holographic pictures sprang to life.

Shepard felt as if her knees would go out from under her, once she recognized the left most figure. The high, aristocratic brows, the gray-frosted hair, the bobbed nose, the thin lips...

"...you're telling me Rachel Florez is part of Cerberus? She's dead."

The Illusive Man laughed. "The suicide? A flash clone. Trust me, she's the military leader, and she's alive. You should recognize the force structure, you studied under her. Snipers, pressure units, the armor-missile combo cruisers – none of that sounds exactly like the Florez Doctrine? General Florez has been in command of Cerberus's military since long before Torfan, Commander."

She was about to ask who the other person was when Ashley made a strangled sound in her throat. "...is that .. U-uncle Richard?"

The figure of the Illusive Man shifted in his seat, nodding. "Unfortunately it is, Gunnery Sergeant Williams."

Shepard glanced back at Ash, who'd gone white as a sheet, and then back at the Illusive Man's image. "You seem to know a lot about my crew."

The Illusive Man sighed. "Yes, I do, Shepard. I'm an information broker, one of the best in the galaxy, only matched by the Shadow Broker himself. Cerberus techs worked on building the Normandy, cleared roadblocks out of your path after you'd secure your Spectre status, and were instrumental in persuading BuPers to cut you a pair of DACTs to replace your losses. You've been carefully watched by Cerberus since this entire mess started, for the simple reason that Rachel and Richard wanted you kept away from Saren."

Shepard glared. "Now we get to it. What the fuck is going on, and why the hell is a human supremacist organization involved?"

The Illusive Man puffed at his cigarette. "The answer is unadulterated greed. When Saren began becoming more active in the underworld, his mercs tripped our network of operatives. When Benezia aided him, we decided we needed to investigate further. Using the same procedure that produced Agent Eylana there, we had a deep cover operative in Benezia's forces, and she reported seeing geth working - voluntarily - under Saren's command almost two years ago. Once this was known, Rachel made the tactical decision to attempt to work with Saren for the purposes of eventually figuring out his method of control over the geth and co-opting it, with the ultimate goal of enslaving the geth to serve humanity."

Tali bristled, but the Illusive Man's smooth voice droned on. "The initial contact was ... delicate, but it was established and Saren had a bold plan. He told us he had found an ancient Prothean warship capable of coordinating and suppressing AI's, and he was going to use it to unseat the Council. He and Benezia felt the Asari Republic was corrupted by the Thirty, and that the Salarian Union was a danger to every sentient being - he claimed he had proof that the Salarians had devised a viral method of doing the same thing to humanity that the genophage did to the krogan. Saren had also discovered how the Asari and Salarians were inciting volus separatists to break the Vol Protectorate away from the Turian Hierarchy."

Liana's voice was a soft whisper. "Goddess...without the volus, the turian government would go bankrupt in short order..."

Garrus looked away. "And then the fringe colonies would start up the wars again, and the Hierarchy would require further assistance to suppress them before we had another round of Colony revolts, and the Core families ... spirits above, civil war would break out and the Hierarchy would collapse."

The Illusive Man nodded, gesturing with his cigarette at Garrus. "Just so, Detective Vakarian. Saren needed financial assistance - money laundering - and intelligence access, and he needed to find certain Prothean artifacts to, he claimed, establish full control over the ship. Finally, he needed someone to translate certain Prothean information for him. In return for us aiding him, Saren would apply military pressure and terror tactics to the outlying independent colonies, and avoid ones under Cerberus protection."

He flicked his ashes again. "The political impotence of the SA government, along with colonies breaking away to back Cerberus, would have paralyzed the SA in terms of stopping us. When Saren struck at the Citadel, Cerberus would assist, and we'd have a new realpolitik of turians and humans running the show."

The Illusive Man sipped at his drink, and his voice was thick with disgust. "I thought it was a stupid dangerous plan from the start, but the greed of Rachel and Richard was too much. They let him know about the Eden Prime beacon, about the Thorian, about certain information from the Mars Archive, and even handed over a second beacon to him."

He paused, swirling his drink in it's glass, then continued in a quieter voice. "When you discovered the voice recording regarding the Reapers, and we did some research into Dr. T'Soni's theories, I felt that we had been lied to, and it was possible Saren was trying to bring back the Reapers for some reason. Rachel and Richard disagreed, but ... the patterns were there. Saren was dangerous."

Shepard nodded, trying to make everything fit in her head. "And you somehow got your hands on our report about Eingana to the SA, I suppose?"

The figure shrugged. "I did, and I agree. Whatever destroyed the Inusannon and Tho'ian is similar to whatever took out the Citadel Fleet and attacked Eden Prime. If Saren is in any control he might be able to strike some kind of deal with this power, to obliterate .. whoever." The cigarette was extinguished, harshly. "And that made Saren a threat to humanity, in my books. My associates ... disagreed. And I believe the planned to remove me in short order, after dealing with you."

The figure stood, pixels smearing his features, and looked out over the lake. "They made the call to lure Kahoku here and finish him off, and to use that to lure you here and do the same. You'd have traced him to the fake HQ you now stand in, and Agent Eylana would attempt to feed you false information that would have sent you on a wild goose chase away from Saren. And if that failed, they'd blow up the base around you."

The figure fished out another cigarette from his coat pocket, lighting it with a brass and steel lighter he produced from the other pocket, blue smoke trailing away from him in a gentle breeze. "I may be many things, Commander. I may very well be a terrorist, I suppose. But I will never endanger or betray humanity. That's why I interfered, why I sabotaged the real HQ and trapped Rachel and Richard within. That's why I'll forward you the little information I have on Saren and the best way to track him down, and give you what intelligence I have on his forces and finances."

The voice had gone hard with a ring of command. "I want him stopped and killed. If that means we lose out on a chance to control the geth, too bad. If it means we can't keep his super dreadnaught, too bad. If Saren isn't just crazy and he can bring back more of whatever destroyed both the Inusannon and the Protheans, we haven't got a chance at survival. And against that, I'll do anything to stop it. Pay any price."

Shepard nodded again, and rubbed her cheek tiredly. "Assuming I believe this bullshit..."

The Illusive Man laughed. "Richard and Rachel are currently at the main HQ, roughly six hundred miles east of your location. Your ship should have been able to localize the detonation of the stockpile of disruptor torpedoes I set off earlier, and I've put virii and scramble codes into the base computers. Most likely, many of the personnel inside are dead, but Rachel and Richard are extremely dangerous, and if anyone survived, even with security down, getting to them will be very difficult. "

Shepard shrugged. "According to my XO, Citadel troops are on the way already."

The Illusive Man nodded. "That is true. But it will still be hours before they arrive. You of all people know what will happen if you give General Florez hours to dig into a position. My hacks and lockouts aren't 100% foolproof, her technicians will eventually get the GTS and ground defenses working again, if given enough time. I destroyed most of the power generation and her space capability, but that's not to say they haven't squirreled away some small craft I didn't know about. If they escape, the whole mess will simply start over again. And yet..."

The Illusive Man sighed. "They can't be arrested, Shepard. They know too much, too many dirty political figures, too much blackmail on the SA. If they're taken by the Citadel, and interrogated, the Systems Alliance government will never survive. And your own Spectre status may be stripped, in the political fallout. Worse, it will poison human-alien relations for decades, and we cannot afford that right now. They have to be killed, Commander."

She snorted. "I don't take orders from you. You're a criminal."

The Illusive Man puffed on his cigarette, then waved away the smoke. "I am fully aware of that, Commander Shepard. I can't do any more than I've already done. I've put all the pieces on the board for you to see." He touched a control on his omnitool, a slender band of blue haptic light around his right cuff, and the computers in the command center sprang to life. "The information I have on Saren is available to you. Saren and Benezia have a hidden corporate facility on Noveria called Peak 13. Peak 13 appears on no map, and the corporate masters of Noveria think it's merely a geothermal plant used to power a Binary Helix facility further down the mountainside."

The Illusive Man flicked off his omnitool. "I can't order you to do anything. But you've seen the kind of 'research' Richard was producing. Rachel planned to storm the Citadel with her private army. Leaving them alive will not only cripple humanity and set back relations, but interfere with your search for Saren and stopping him. More importantly . . . taking them out helps me. And I am in a position to help you with intelligence gathering."

Shepard glanced at Wrex. "I've already got the Shadow Broker helping me."

The Illusive Man's smile was audible again. "And he saw all of this coming? That this trap was a setup specifically to derail you? The Broker, whatever he, she or it is, is not omniscient or omnipresent, Commander. The more allies you have in this hunt, the more likely you are to succeed."

Alenko shook his head stubbornly. "You can't trust someone like that, Commander. Even if he's not lying, and who knows if he is or not, we have a duty to bring whoever is behind this mess to justice."

Ashley was gripping the stock of her assault rifle tightly. "He's right though, LT. God, you can't imagine what a fucking disaster this is. One of our highest ranking generals and . . . my uncle.. involved in Cerberus? The government would collapse, half the colonies would freak, the aliens on the Citadel would say it was all an SA plot -"

Garrus only grunted, sounding more like Wrex than himself in that moment. "- and how do we know it isn't? At the end of the day, though, putting a bullet in their heads sounds pretty appealing to me. What they did to the turians in that room -"

Shepard cut off the babble of voices with a hand. "I'll give them one chance to surrender." She paused, peering closely at the screen. "And as for you, if I catch you, you'll get the same one chance. I don't give a shit if you found your goddamned conscience or if you're just cutting your losses, the fact that you had a hand in this abomination makes you the worst kind of criminal."

The Illusive Man stubbed out his second cigarette and shrugged, the filmy fabric of his suit rippling in shades of blue as he stood. "Unless something very unexpected happens, Commander, I doubt you and I will ever meet each other. I wish you good hunting...and for what it's worth, Commander, I don't think very many people in the SA were aware that Cerberus was working with them. The SA may have it's flaws, but I don't think any of the Congress, or the High Command, was aware. It was mostly .. figures of influence. Never more than a half dozen."

Shepard grimaced. "Was the Fleet Master one of them?"

The Illusive Man touched a control on his haptic bracelet, the blue circles illuminating his eyes locking onto hers for a moment. "Yes, to some degree."

The holo went dark, and a moment later the console itself smoked and emitted a spray of sparks. Tali cursed, running her omnitool over it, then sighed. "I never could get a good trace, Commander – the signal just ... came out of nowhere. It might have had routing information in the emitter itself, but he just fried it somehow."

Shepard nodded, calmly. "No matter." She tapped her omnitool. "All ground forces, this is Commander Shepard. I want this place wrapped up and ready to load up on the Normandy in fifteen minutes. After that, we're redeploying to another location on the surface – another Cerberus installation."

She paused, then continued. "It's possible that we're going to face heavy resistance. So far, everything has gone almost too smoothly. Let's not screw it up now. Check your gear, weapons, and energy levels, and get ready for transit." She clicked off, turning to her team.

"Regardless of whether that fucker is lying or not, what he said makes sense. I always knew Cerberus was fucking crazy, but I never would have thought that they were that crazy. I know General Florez. She was ... close to me. She trained me, taught me tactics and ship-handling, and was a big influence on my life, along with Captain Anderson." She closed her eyes. "The idea she's really behind this is as sickening to me as finding out about her uncle must be for Ash."

She opened her eyes, and glanced around a second time. "That being said, if they're willing to give up, we'll take them into custody. If they do not, then we take them out."

Garrus flicked a mandible. "Do we tell the Council about ... this? The little conversation you had? The identity of who is running the show, if we have to kill them?"

Shepard sighed. "I .. don't know, Garrus. I'd normally confer with High Command...but I just got told that the fucking Fleet Master knew about this shit, on some level. For now, I'd like to ask each of you to keep everything you heard today quiet. The revelations we've already found are ... bad enough. Once we've put Saren into the ground and stopped whatever batshit crazy he's trying to dig up, then we can deal with the fallout from this mess."

Ashley nodded tersely. "Ma'am, my uncle is not going to surrender, I can tell you that much. If it comes to killing him, permission to handle it myself. It's... a family thing...our name can't be dragged any further down ..."

Shepard exhaled tiredly. "If it comes to that, Chief, you can ventilate his skull yourself. Let's hope it doesn't." She glanced around at each member of her team.

Tali looked nervous, while Wrex seemed pensive, and was clearly impatient to either move out or communicate with the Broker. Alenko looked somewhat dispirited, Ash was angry and tense, Garrus almost rigid.

Jason Dunn stood swaying on his feet, a dazed expression on his face. "Who would have thunk it? General Florez, crazed military nutjob." He shrugged. "I'm banged up something fierce, She-bitch, but if we have to take down the Old Lady, I'll be there."

Shepard nodded, and glanced at Liara. The asari bit her lip and gently touched the commander's arm vambrace. "Are you going to be able to .. deal .. with General Florez, Shepard?"

Shepard only tightened the choke on her ODIN to solid slug pattern and gave an icy, tight smile. "Don't worry about that, Liara. Like Jace said, if it comes to dancing with the Old Lady, I'm game."

---

Chapter 79: Chapter 70: Richard Williams

---

A/N: This is going to be a controversial chapter. And a long author's note.

I am not a fan of giving over an entire chapter to an OC, but in this case, it's a necessary evil.

The biggest problem in Mass Effect has always been Cerberus. In the first game, it was a group of faceless Dudes of Evil, twirling their mustaches while they Committed Very Bad Acts for no real reason. Anyone who thought thorian or rachni would make usable soldiers in anything but the most extreme circumstances (aka, invasion by aliens hell-bent on obliterating humanity) was crazy ... but there was NOTHING in the background suggesting anything so dire as to evoke that kind of response.

I won't even talk about how badly they got messed up in ME 2 and 3. Bottom line, there has to be a reason Cerberus exists besides the relatively benign canon First Conflict War, which involved all of one colony. Cerberus is the kind of response to more than that.

I've also decided that there needs to be separation between TIM's Cerberus and the crazy we see in ME3 Cerberus. Mainly because TIM is too good to waste on such a stupid plot...but also because it makes more sense. And as a result, some back story and info-dumping is necessary.

I don't want to humanize Richard Williams – he is a monster, both physically and mentally. His world-view is warped, but sadly it's warped with good reason, not only by what he went through but by the people who, as you will see, literally saved his life. When your entire world-view is skewed by events, what seems horrific and insane to others seems rational to you. Placed in his position, would any of us be more humane, more forgiving?

I don't think I would.

As a plus, it gives me a reason to go into the history of the SA, and explain just why some other people thought that groups like Cerberus were not a bad idea. Remember, this is the Premiseverse, which is like the rapist, axe-murdering version of Renegade Reinterpretations. On a bad day.

With no coffee.

Enjoy!

Sarah Williams speech is adapted, in part from the speech given after 9/11.

---

Richard Williams, the Shadow Hand, ticked off controls on the Harpoon-class light fighter, his thick fingers moving through the haptic controls with blind familiarity, his mind adrift with plans on how to salvage this mess.

That he could salvage the situation was, in his mind, a fact – never did even cross his thoughts that failure could result from the setbacks that had occurred in the past few days. He had survived death itself and sneered back. Against that, merely starting over from a fall-back position was just time consuming. Irritating, and perhaps even belittling, but ultimately it was still only a setback.

The fighter hummed as it's mass core came online. The rough cave framed the tiny fighter bay, sheets of duranium and lead blocking sensor signals, natural winds from the valley below the plateau preventing heat build up. Richard was a believer in back-up plans, and back-ups to backups. If his life had taught him no other lessons, he had learned the hard way that Murphy was an optimist. So his natural inclination was to ensure that he was prepared for all events.

At times, coordinating it all was hard. It required a lot of forward planning, and anticipating the unexpected and unlikely. But it was as natural as breathing was to most people. Such mental acuity was not, after all, available to most people. It came from being a perfect specimen of humanity.

But being such a primarch of human perfection was, after all, the plan.

His mind turned back to the end of the First Contact War. The war that had defined and broken humanity's beliefs, that burned any illusions that alien life would be peaceful, wise, and enlightened.

He remembered, having been, along with several other members of his family, on his brother's staff at Shanxi. Then, he was a major of Marines, and he'd brought along his own son Byron, barely an ensign in the SSA navy, to act as a tech assistant in the command center. His brother, Nathan, was the ranking commander, and had brought his own son with him. Uriel had come along as well, just recently married, as a military consultant on the defense systems they were laying down.

He remembered the laughter and cheer. It was supposed to be a family trip, a final consolidation of the purchases of property on Shanxi, working hand in glove with the Chu Family of later Sirta fame.

For Nathan, it was supposed to be a last military command before retirement. For Jared, the oldest son of Nathan, a chance to see the colonies. For Richard's son Bryon, a chance to prove himself as an officer. For Richard, it was supposed to be an easy couple of years, a final red front-line colony command tab on his record before heading back to the safety of Earth to climb the ranks of the military and continue the Williams tradition of excellence.

He remembered when the turians arrived, and 'announced' their presence by obliterating the unarmed research ships fleeing back from the mass relay. The angular raptor lines of their starships, arrogant in the dim solar light, the flickers of mass accelerator fire and the crashing alarms of the Big A alert call to Sol Fleet.

He remembered the burning fire-falls of ships as the holding picket that protected Shanxi tried to fight back against ships three times as fast and twice as maneuverable, the terror as civilians followed the drills to get to the civilian shelters, the terror of firing his Avenger MII at the elongated, spiky-limbed monstrosities that stalked out of the dark, glowing with biotics and haptic info-war programs. He remembered how the 11th RIU died to the last man trying to prevent the turian Raptor troops from blowing up innocent civilians fleeing for safety.

He remembered the screams. And the fires. And the blood, running through the streets like a foul river.

The turians, having murdered tens of thousands of civilians by classifying them as combatants, had been hurled out of Shanxi, their precious strike force of biotics defeated, their small assault fleet torn to pieces by the vengeance driven First Fleet. Shanxi had been freed, and tears mingled with cries for revenge in the throats of many.

He remembered thinking that they had won.

Then the Talon Offensive began, and an unending stream of ships had vomited forth from the mass relay, enough to blacken the skies. Defiant to the end, Governor Marks had spat into the view screen when the turians demanded the surrender of all military personnel to face execution as war criminals and the complete surrender of the colony.

The turian answer had been brutal. Shanxi had died from kinetic bombardment. The entire planet went up as waves of plasma fire erupted. Arcology complex foundations were blasted apart, delicate towers of colony storage pods incinerated.

Hundreds of thousands of people were slain, the turians cheering on their com circuits. The armored HQ where General Williams commanded the planet's defenses was immune to their callous strikes...but the Williams compound on the north side of the capital city was not.

Jared, Nathan's son, was killed instantly in the blast that leveled Williams Manor. Nothing at all could be found of him. Uriel, Ashley's father, had been hit by shrapnel from the blast that killed Jared. It mangled his leg and right hand, but he was left alive, and managed to crawl away to a waiting APC. Richard's son Byron was blown free of the wreckage only to die in the fires that consumed the rest of the compound, his screams for help ringing in Richard's ears even after all these years.

Richard, on the other hand, had been arguing with Jared when the blast hit, and had stalked off in frustration for about thirty feet when the world had turned to white fire. He'd taken a full blast of vaporized metal to the face and body. His arms flashed into steam, his legs sheared at the thigh. His eyes were gone, his face a shredded wreck, his lungs burned. He had lost over half his body mass, the rest a suppurating mess of fourth degree burns.

That, for many days, was the last he knew. He never saw a broken General Williams utter a dispirited, sobbing surrender. Never watched smug turians land and occupy the planet, brutalizing it's inhabitants and outright stealing whatever they laid hands on. He never got to see the Exodus Fleet, a ragtag assemblage of refugee ships that managed to evade the turian fleet to flee to the nearest, system, Thanas.

He awoke just in time from a coma to hear about the Horror at Thanas, at hearing the descriptions of shaky digital images of the turians as they had poured into Thanas, blowing up evacuation ships with claims that they were attempting to ferry troops. He'd awoke, to find himself blind, broken, near death, and in a makeshift resistance hospital run by a charismatic rogue known as Jack Harper.

He'd been placed in a regenerative coma by the crafty medic of the group, but they could do no more until hostilities ended. So he had laid in shuddering agony, barely controlled by pain meds, and gritted his teeth as his race faced death.

The lies from the turians had enraged humanity past the point of reason. Civilians and retired military personnel enlisted by the hundreds of thousands. The entirety of the Corporate Court voted 193 to 0 to suspend charging the SA government for services and turned over their own corporate military forces and what stocks of weapons they had. Gangers and criminals volunteered by the ward district for the Penal Legions, turning themselves in for a shot at the turians. The shipyards were manned by hundreds of thousands of dockworkers, working for free since the government couldn't afford to pay them, often pulling fifteen and twenty hour shifts to refit and get ships back into the fight.

It was, perhaps, humanity's finest hour. He remembered the soft voice of Eva Core, talking past her tears, reading the speech of Sarah Williams, his own sister, as she poured out the soul of humanity.

"Never surrender. Never yield. Never forget. When the stone and steel that we have built up in our lifetime comes crashing down as molten rain, when the blood of our friends and family flows through the arcologies, when our ships burn broken in our skies and the cries of the mourners echo on every colony, that is when we pick each other up and fight even harder. We do so not as Americans or SA citizens or Horizoners – but as humans! We will not die. We will face death, and we stand, shoulder to shoulder, and face the twisting, black storm before us, not with hesitation or fear, but with squared jaws and clenched fists, and we shout out in one voice, brothers and sisters, to those who would tear us apart, "Our light will not be extinguished!" "

Colony after colony refused to surrender to the turians. Mirsan committed mass suicide rather than submit, detonating their fusion plants as the turians landed before taking poison en masse. The religious Amish colony of Peace Point would not fight back even in the face of the turians killing their leaders, instead calmly forgiving their captors and stepping up one by one, unafraid of their executioners, ready to martyr themselves for the Lord. The Indian-sourced colony of Presh, mostly monks, immolated themselves in plasma fires from their power generators and went out to embrace their turian invaders, jiggling torches in the night.

Kamikaze ships tore through the turian lines, as ship after ship refused to haul down the SA flag even if beaten in battle. SA marines strapped themselves down with grenade belts and charged the turian positions on Thanas, and the Fifth RRU began strapping anti-matter charges to the mass relay, threatening to detonate it if the turians didn't back down. Turian troops on the ground were hacked to pieces and their hides reworked into belts, coats, and flags.

Humanity fought with everything it had, and it wasn't enough. Richard had curled into the wreck of his body back then, waiting for death to come, but it never did.

The turian response to such infuriating resistance to proper military conquest was an emotional and irrational response. Nineteen dreadnaughts, leading over a million heavy infantry, stormed into human space. The heaviest units the SA navy had faced thus far was a heavy cruiser, and the turian ships simply blasted their way through human lines like wax paper. They planned to crush every colony and then attack Earth itself, and bombard it into submission or ruin.

It was sickening and overwhelming, and the turians would have destroyed humanity if the asari hadn't intervened. Whether prompted by the tearful vid-message of Sarah Williams, sent out by FTL wave relay on all bands, or by the horrific scenes of destruction wreaked on Shanxi that the STG uncovered when they became alarmed as such huge turian fleet movements, the asari had saved humanity, asari warships inserting themselves into the space lanes and backing the turians down like whipped curs. The shame of the Hierarchy was massive, doubled when the asari forced them to pay massive war reparations to the Systems Alliance.

When the turians protested, no less than the asari leader of the second house, Uressa T'Shora, had asked how the turians expected to be held as honorable warriors when they only applied their honor to conflicts within their own species. The asari would not back down, and the turians retreated, spitting bitter epithets about the 'unfairness' of it all. The Hierarchy had pushed their version of events, and despite the cost, their brutal assault on a new species had actually won them respect – and in later years, as humanity grew with speed and advanced faster than any other race had done before, a few alien voices suggested the turians should have been allowed to finish the job.

Thus, bitter, frightened, and bloodied, humanity had come into the galactic community. With that sort of entry, who blamed humanity for groups like Earth First and Cerberus? Humanity had adjusted, slowly, and in time most of the wounds healed. A new generation of humans and turians had grown up, and while tensions were still high, at least a few turians were deeply ashamed of how the Hierarchy had reacted.

Wounds had healed. For some.

But not Richard's. And not the William family's, either. The end of the war had all come too late for the Williams family. Their vast wealth destroyed with the fall of Thanas, their patriarch shamed by his surrender on Shanxi, none could stop the SA's snubbing of their clan. And many of the elder Williams had died fighting on Shanxi – the death of Jared William had shattered his father, and watching his other family members broken and bleeding on the battlefield had been the true reason the old man had been driven to surrender. That he had surrendered, when so many others had chosen death and defiance rather than submission, ended up with the Williams family being smeared as cowards. With it's patriarch dead, his brother a cripple, and it's sons mangled, they withdrew from society.

The end of the war allowed Richard to be returned home to Earth, where the last of the family's wealth was spent on desperate and frantic attempts to stabilize him and keep him alive. He'd never forgotten that, known that the family should have written him off...and didn't.

He sighed as he prepped the control surfaces of the fighter. He knew, in his heart, the real reason he was running away from this fight had nothing to do with survival. Shepard and her little band of freaks and wanna-be marines posed about as much threat to him as an ant-hill to a dreadnaught. Oh, he might not be able to beat them all if they rushed him en masse ... but very, very few of them would come out of that fight alive.

But even he had limits, and he'd be damned to the last circle of Hell before he killed his own niece, no matter how misguided she might be. He cursed thickly under his breath, remembering his rage at discovering that Ashley had been on the ground at Eden Prime and nearly killed. He should have taken steps to get her out of the line of fire, but he'd assumed after everything settled down – and her name wasn't on the list of dead – that she'd landed on her feet.

Jack, damn him, had never told him she was on the Butcher's ship. He savagely tapped through a series of buttons on the haptic control panels in front of him, and killed the environmental systems. They were unneeded.

Not for a man like him. His fight against death had proven that. Broken, blasted, half melted, his body ruined beyond the capacity of medical science to repair, the doctors the Williams family had engaged had expected him to expire. Most men would have simply died. Not Richard Williams. But he figured he'd never walk again, never fight again, and never be a man again. So he planned to retire to a medically supported retirement and write, maybe inspire a next generation to stand against turian aggression.

That was, at least, the plan. Before things changed.

The early beginnings of what would eventually be the Shadow Cell were, in those days, the Bio-eugenics and Purity Unit of the Manswell Security Force. The MSF was a darkly held secret, a hangover from the Days of Iron, when Victor Manswell had to subdue Earth to save it. They were the defenders and upholders of the Manswell Doctrine – that the Protheans had left Earth a critical message and that humanity must be its only holders, and in furtherance of that, all acts were permissible.

The MSF were human supremacists to the last man. They were also racists, sexists, rich white males armored in privilege and position. But against the sheer alien nature of their foes, the MSF found humans they would not have tolerated to serve as janitors in their country clubs more appealing than scaled, birdlike things.

And of course, the fact that humanity had not been saved by its own might but by a pack of blue alien hussies had simply infuriated them to no end.

Thus, they planned, and they considered, and they decided that they needed an agent. A hand, to perform their work.

They had salvaged the wreckage of a human being once known as Richard Williams for their own plans. They'd approached him in the sad, sagging remains of the Williams Estate in New Hampshire Arcology, and had offered to help him, and his family, in return for him volunteering for an experimental medical project that could 'return mobility to his body'. Broken and with no other choices, his family too poor to keep the medical care he needed to stay alive going for more than a few more years, it was an easy decision to make.

He'd signed up without asking what they planned or how he'd be 'helped'. In hindsight, he was glad he hadn't asked, his nerve would have failed if he knew what awaited him.

He'd spent nine long, pain-filled years as a testbed for Project Osiris. They'd kept him alive with flash-cloned tissues, constant blood transfusions, ultra-pure oxygen and clean rooms. He'd spent weeks having rotting, necrotic flesh debrided from his broken frame. Months with powerful growth hormones, bolstering his remaining organs. Surgeries and laser-scalpel removals, pulverized bones picked out by robotic arms and every section of his body flooded with nanotech agents.

At first, he'd thought they planned to heal him.

When the cyber-surgeons and industrial assembly robots arrived, he'd foolishly thought they planned a few cybernetic replacements. Until they began building a cutting edge lab around his life support unit, and brought in dozens of other wounded soldiers as baseline experiments. They tested each new piece of cyberware a dozen times before implanting it. Livers. Kidneys. Lungs. Eyes. Bones.

They plotted new experiments in cybernetic surgery, taking it far, far past the old thresholds of 54%.

When they went past 70%, there were murmurs that what remained wasn't technically human anymore, but that didn't stop them, either. There were times in the surgery he remembered wanting to see a mirror and they wouldn't let him. The tide of drugs disrupted his memories, but he remembered a faint sense of alarm and horror at what was being done to him. Seeing an arm move at his command that wasn't his arm. Feeling pain fade slowly replaced by digital representations of feeling.

Feeling, eventually, nothing at all except what signals his cybernetic body now fed to the remains of his brain.

He flexed his arm, feeling steel bones and myomer muscles shift with artificial, electronic pressure nerves. The cameras that were his eyes flitted around in his steel skull, vat-grown lungs of polymer and DETA filters filling his synthetic blood with oxygen.

Richard Williams died on those operating tables. What came out was, by any scientific definition, not even alive anymore. Much less human.

A quarter of his brain was now solid-state, multiphase computer wafers and six tandem greyboxes, encased in plasma-forged steel. High quality sound-conducting arrays and steerable microphones were his ears. His heart was an artificial pump, moving around a few liters of a substance similar to blood, but artificial. His kidneys were custom-built filtering systems and chemical processing trays, his liver a bio-engineered pack of blood-processing agents in a heparin circulation isolation trap.

He was the furthest conversion cyborg ever created, at 98% artificial. Only portions of his brain were real flesh. His face was biosynthetic armor-mesh weave with a few layers of synthskin atop it. His muscles were flash-pressure hydraulics, electronic myomer bundles, and micronised mass effect emitters. His bones were plasma compressed rods of pure titanium, smashed to increased density by million-ton mass effect fields. Armor plates linked by an array of impact-deadening omnigel suffused with repair nanos filled the spaces in his body not taken up by tech, flowed sluggishly through arms and legs that would shame a JOTUN mech with their sheer power.

He could bench over six thousand pounds, run at over fifty miles an hour, and survive in hard vacuum for almost ninety hours before even tapping his backup reserves. His brain, augmented by a computer array more powerful than what drove most ships of the line and supported by greyboxes full of the scientific memories and experiences of over two thousand top researchers, was unmatched in human experience.

He would be an immortal god-emperor to a unified, empowered mankind. He would unlock the darkest secrets of the universe, tear the power out of the hands of the filthy alien cretins who dared challenge God's own chosen, and create a Pax Humanica.

At least...that was the plan.

The path there, after being reborn as a god among men, was more convoluted. The collapse of the Jarkhold Government and the rise of the AIS ended the MSF, and their eugenics experiments were destroyed by a disgusted 'reformist' SA government. It wasn't until later that Richard learned the 'reformists' were themselves members of the MSF – covering their tracks ever twenty years.

He'd been given control of a project to create the next phase of human existence, and he took it up with relish. It was his brilliance that discovered asari sabotage to the L2 implants and brought about the flawless L3's. It was his hand that had crafted the protein-carbon chains that made Sirta's medigel such a huge hit. It was his iron-like will that had held the research group to the target when it came to building out the first iterations of what would become Research Station Sixteen, in the Black Zone, that had led to the creation of innovations like the IES stealth system used by the Normandy.

And when the MFS – now known as Northstar – tapped him to take over Cerberus, he was prepared.

He snorted to himself as he brought the fighter's sensors online. At least ... that was the plan.

Now the plan had gone south, and once again, he'd have to do everything himself. He shook his head in rueful, self-admonishing admiration. As angry as he'd been, he had to give points to Jack for being nasty and thorough in his strike at Cerberus. He was thankful that he had not shared all his hidey holes with the dangerous industrialist, but Jack was too much of a wild card. Too moral, even after seeing the true nature of events. And that asari he kept like some kind of mistress – disgusting.

But the MSF had foreseen that eventuality too. They had never trusted him, even after neutralizing his movement with their own actions. They'd long expected this day would come, and had likewise long prepared methods to handle the situation.

Which is why, as he slowly took the fighter out of the small cave and flew it in ground-hugging slow movements to evade any sensors the Normandy might have pointed in his direction, he triggered a burst pulse transmission from the fighter, soaring out to what appeared to be a boring asteroid in high orbit around the planet's moon.

The link took several seconds to set up – it had been Jack's scientists, after all, who'd pioneered QEC, and who knew what bugs lay within it's comms protocols. The slower, safer link of stealthed FTL comm buoys was slower, but since it was laid independently of the pan-galactic comms net, also secure.

The screen lit up, displaying the ancient symbol of the Manswells – a quartered Hohenzollern crest over an iron shield. "Challenge. The fourth position." The voice was a synthesized one, and Richard only smiled as he tapped in the appropriate response to the challenge code.

The screen cleared a few seconds later, showing an ancient figure sitting in a life-support chair. Wisps of fine, silvery-white hair dangled in a tattered fashion around the spotted, bald crown, and the face was a map of wrinkles and age, sagging heavily where an oxygen mask didn't occlude the view. The tiny, shriveled body that supported the head was twisted, held in place by biomedical clamps and haloed by tubes of fluids pumping in and out of the body, covered only by a thick blanket of rich fabric. Tiny feet poked out from the edge of the blanket, wearing heavy socks, and the visible hand was gnarled, twisted with arthritis, age, and injury.

But the black eyes were as bright and fiery as Richard had ever seen, filled with purpose and determination. The voice, a harsh, guttural whisper, was hard to hear, accents edged in crisp Germanic cadences. "You have departed the trap set by that insipid little mouse?"

Richard nodded, flying absentmindedly with one hand, the other manipulating his nav computer, even while he held the conversation. "Yes, Lord Maxwell. I had to leave Rachel behind, but I should be clear of the system in about an hour."

The old man's left, snowy eyebrow twitched. "As if I care for the stupid militarist. She was a tool, and she has served her purpose. It is of no matter, Richard. Get clear and report back to Zion Station. We are abandoning this line of .. pursuit."

Richard frowned. "But the control of the geth-"

The old man looked up, eyes narrowing. "I am not accustomed to having to repeat my words, or detailing out what should be obvious even to you, boy. We have been predicted. That has not happened since the Days of Iron. We cannot assume that we have not been compromised. Thus, we shall lie low and return when we have a better grasp on all parts of the situation."

Richard nodded, slowly. "I understand, but it seems that this remains a golden opportunity to have a chance at commanding a force that would speed up our goals considerably. I merely wish to understand the larger thinking behind this order."

The old man gave a rasping, wet cough, closing his eyes for a moment. "Control of the geth would only be useful in the last stages of Operation Fletcher. If we cannot seize the Citadel, then the geth are a possible liability. Whatever method this turian is using to control them cannot be perfect." He paused. "Further, there remains the possibility that there are players in the game we did not expect or prepare for."

Richard frowned, but the old man continued, voice growing stronger. "Saren's krogan allies – particularly Okeer. Unexpected. Collectors on Eingana. Unexpected. Spectre and Citadel attack on Cerberus – unexpected!" The old man's hand clenched, his accent becoming thicker as his voice rose. "That does not even cover the information Jack's little asari bitch gave us about the salarians and the goddamned batarians."

With a sharp inhalation, the old man calmed. "Now is the time for circumspection, not adventuring. We cannot risk exposure. If the member states of the SA – or the aliens – realized who really ran the SA, do you think any of us would be safe? Pagh."

Richard's frown did not vanish, but he could understand the reasoning at least. He gave a grim nod, and his voice was quiet as he spoke. "I am obedient in all things, Lord Maxwell. What should I do with the remaining Cerberus forces I have placed on standby?"

The old man made a small motion with his hand. "Sever all comms and destroy the codes and ciphers. Those forces are polluted, and they were small in number anyway. We will use the plans and designs that General Florez came up with to begin recruiting a new, stronger army. And when the time comes, we will unveil a new, pure Cerberus, to defend humanity. One with the full power of the human nation behind it."

Richard nodded. "And the other experimental data? We were very close on the yahg specimen..."

The old man grunted. "We will reassemble your work, never fear, Richard. We have come into possession of a very interesting item, recently, one I think you will need to research yourself." The old man's gnarled hand tapped shakily at a haptic control on his chair, and the camera panned across from the old man to reveal a black pyramidal shape sitting atop a metallic table. The pyramid was about a foot on each side, and smooth, marked only by thin, glowing lines illuminated faintly with red in a number of places.

Richard blinked. "What is it?"

The old man smiled. "A component of a great machine, Richard. We have identified another ship like the one Saren has. In orbit, around a gas giant known as Mnemosyne. We will have research teams and zero-g teams there in four months." The old man's voice finally rose above a whisper, in a note of triumph. "And that is why I have no need for Saren and his toys. Let the Butcher deal with him, and his asari bitch flunky. We will have our own power."

Richard's face split into a grin as he imagined the possibilities. Adapting the technology of such a thing would give humanity an unbeatable lead in power and knowledge. And the very concepts that could be created from such science, the ideas, the possibilities...

"Humanity Now."

The old man nodded. "Humanity Now, Tomorrow and Forever, Richard. That is all. Zion will be waiting for you, but there is no rush. Be cautious. the Butcher is dangerous. Even more than myself or the other members, Richard, you are the important one, the one to carry our goals into the future."

With that, the signal cut off, and Richard dipped his fighter into a canyon. Risking extraction while he had no clue where the Normandy was didn't sound good, and there was no rush. Easier to simply shut down all power and wait until battle – or other distractions – gave him a clean rush to the relay.

And to the future.

---

Chapter 80: Chapter 71: Normandy, Memories II

---

A/N: The ubiquitous flashback chapter. Just setting the stage up, the fight and end of the Cerberus arc is just about here. And a little bit more insight into Shepard and Florez.

I also included a Liara Moment. Because I could. :D

---

It took a full twenty minutes for Shepard's marine teams to load up the materials and evidence from the Cerberus base into some semblance of order and out the front door to the MAKOs now on the ground. There were too many corpses of all races to properly deal with, and Shepard left those for the incoming Citadel troops to deal with.

The evidence loaded into the computers in the command center by the Illusive Man was copied to OSD's, and Sergeant Telanya was going over it on her omni-tool, her delicate features twisted in concentration, as Garrus watched over her shoulder. Several scrolling columns of bank transactions and other financial manipulations trickled like golden waterfalls in one haptic column, while another omni-screen was filled with what looked like images of dead bodies or explosions.

Shepard watched as some of the 'experiment' corpses were packed into crates and loaded into the MAKO, then turned to face Liara, who had walked up next to her. "Jesus, what a clusterfuck. Sorry you had to see that, Liara."

The asari woman shrugged, bright blue eyes seeking out Shepard's own. "I am alright, Sara. Or I will be. I must admit, I had not thought to see such cruelty, but I understand now why many humans speak of Cerberus with such loathing."

Shepard snorted sourly. "Not all of 'em do. You've already seen how some of the Normandy crew react around Garrus, and that's on their best behavior with a turian they actually sorta like. The First Contact War made a lot of humans paranoid, and finding out about what happened to the krogan and quarians didn't make us feel a whole lot safer."

Shepard pointed to the boxes being placed in the MAKO. "Fear leads to shit like this, Liara. I'm not old enough to remember the FCW, but most of the admirals and people in my government are. They probably won't ever forget."

Liara nodded but an anguished, confused expression resided on her face. "Do all humans dislike aliens, then? Even . . . I mean, the Asari Republics stepped into stop the conflict..." Her voice trailed off weakly, and Shepard gave a shrug.

"I'd say Ash and Pressly are good people, but even they aren't comfortable around most aliens. I have to give them both credit for working very hard to overcome their .. prejudices. But most humans never work with aliens, and the only ones who deal with them every day got over their problems a long time ago. And yeah, the asari saved our asses...and there's people on Earth who don't like that because they don't want to owe anyone a thing."

Shepard rubbed the back of her neck, then placed her mirrored helm back over her head, sealing away her features. "In the long run, what matters is that you don't act like a murdering asshole like these fuckers did. A quick death is too good for them, I'm half tempted to just let the radiation in the other base cook those assholes slowly to death rather than go in and try to arrest Rachel."

Liara nodded, re-affixing her own helmet. "You said you were close to this Rachel person."

Shepard gave a grim smile, invisible behind her mask. "Yeah, you could say that."

---

The practice and parade fields of Camp Revelation were ugly and chalky white, cracked and dotted here and there with old bloodstains or warped craters of crumbled, stained earth. High walls encircled the field, boxy prison housing built into them. Tall, ugly plascrete towers soared above them, each one topped with a flat platform and several men with large, ugly sniper rifles. A patrol of fighters crossed the black, star-filled sky above, the jutting shapes of point-targeting anti-personnel guns angled downwards. The darkness was only pierced by the harsh, white lights that loomed over their heads from tall, sheer poles, and the blazing red-and-orange haptic deadlines that showed where they could and could not walk.

The sky itself, an inky void, was edged in all directions by the broken and irregular crater wall the entire base sat in. A faint, shimmering energy field distorted the view of the stars, the only thing that kept the air in, for they were on the surface of the Moon, on it's dark side, forever turned away from the life giving sun and the warm blue glow of Earth.

Inscribed on the nearest wall in hard, blocky stencils was a single phrase. "Service or death."

Six lines of ragged figures in SA black jumpsuits stood at rough attention in the middle of the field, silently and isolated. There were perhaps sixty of them altogether, some looking bored, many looking terrified. Some were older, but many were just teenagers, shifting nervously under the hardened gazes of the instructors.

The instructors, facing them, were all intimidating, wearing stark white uniforms reinforced with armored plates, and carrying small personal air tanks. Each one carried a powerful pistol keyed only to fire when held by that instructor, and a vicious electro-prod hung on the other side thick, white leather belts around their waists. Two were men, broad of shoulder and thickly muscled, scowling faces regarding the criminals in front of them with no emotion.

The lead instructor stepped up, her features hard. "I am Major Rachel Florez, third commandant of the System's Alliance Felony Reclamation and Rehabilitation Program. As of 0900 this morning, ladies and gentlemen, you are all legally dead."

She turned on a heel, face still expressionless, and pointed. "I can kill any one of you, for any reason. I don't need to justify it. You have all been found wanting. You are all criminals. Many of you face the death penalty. The few of you who don't have been determined to be non-viable as a citizen of our Systems Alliance. It is only through the mercy of our government that you are standing here right now, but you are dead."

She paused, cold gaze sweeping across the ranks of criminals, as if waiting for a challenge. She gave a tight little smile and continued. "Each and every one of you is here because you were deemed to have a certain level of sanity, because of your raw intellect or ability, and because you are dead and we are going to keep it that way if you don't perform. If you do perform well, you will be transferred to the normal military, to try to live out a better life this time. This is an opportunity, for you to leave behind the life you fucked up and take a stab at being an actual human being."

She began walking down the line. "You will be taught to fight. Read and write, if you can't. Read maps, plan fire-team ambushes, deal with basic first aid, and to rely on each other. I don't give a shit how hard you thought you were in the burb-barrio, how ice-cold your shitty little gangs were, or how much of a badass your punk asses assumed you were."

She gestured to the two men behind her. "These men behind me are commissars. Surrounding this entire facility are snipers. Fuck up, die. Fall behind, die. Piss them off, die. You will serve and serve with fire and fervor until your time is up or you eat a bullet. It's not like you can run away – in case you haven't noticed, you are on the moon. You'll freeze solid outside of this force shield in about six minutes – and of course, there's no air out there. A mass escape will just result in us venting the air and shipping up another load of criminals to try this out with."

She leaned forward. "You may have been badasses back home, but here you are meat. I can call down orbital fire on you. I can have you shot, tortured, and electrocuted on a whim. I'm better than you, and I always will be. I can outfight you, out-think you, and my dick is bigger than yours, too." This caused a few snickers, which she ignored.

She glanced around again, frowning. "Although, honestly, if you're the most dangerous badasses on Earth, we have clearly lost the fucking war and should just surrender. I've fucked up volus merchants scarier than you pack of clowns."

A huge, tattooed man stepped out of the ranks, snarling. Before he could even open his mouth, however, the Major's hand snapped out, crushing his windpipe with one blow. The man staggered back, clutching his throat, and she made a signal with her free hand. A moment later two sniper rounds transfixed his skull, spattering the recruit-criminals next to him with blood and brains.

Her smile grew wider. "There's always one who thinks he can get away with something. Consider that your warning, ladies and gentlemen. Each of you have an explosive device implanted in the base of your neck. We trigger it, you die. You get too far from your unit, it goes off and you die. I break a fingernail and you make a snarky comment about it, you die. Are we clear?"

There was a murmur of assent, and Major Florez sighed. "When I ask you a question you are to respond as soldiers. That means you say, "Sir, yes sir."

A thick-set man with two cobbled-together looking cybereyes sneered. "You ain't no sir."

Rachel nodded, and a moment later stepped up to the man, planting a fist into his stomach. He folded up, vomiting up blood a moment later, and she kicked his now lowered head, sending him sprawling to the ground. "I am God, as far as your punk asses are concerned. Mess with me and I will fuck you up so bad your momma will get pregnant. Am. I. CLEAR."

This time, the response was better. "Sir, yes sir."

She rolled her eyes, walking down the line, stopping in front of a thin, bony looking girl with gang tattoos and a murderous gaze in her dark blue eyes. "What's your name, little bitch?"

The voice was quiet, but hard for all that. "Sara Shepard."

Rachel smiled. "Oh, the drugged up little tramp who shot up her own gang, how sweet." She backhanded the girl across the face, hard enough to send her staggering back. "You will address me as sir at all times."

Shepard wiped blood from her mouth and stood, eyes narrowed. "Fuck you, sir." This time, Rachel's leg lashed out, flying to catch the girl in the knee. Shepard managed to block it, but still collapsed as the kick drove through her imperfect defense, and caught a second kick in the face.

Rachel sighed. "This little hussy shot and killed over a hundred men, and still can't – " She paused as Shepard leapt up from the ground, screaming, swinging. Again, two shots rang out, one going through her leg, the other through her shoulder, and the girl collapsed bleeding into the dirt at Rachel's feet. The major raised an eyebrow, and Shepard angled her head up, despite the pain, and spat blood on her clean white uniform.

Despite herself, Rachel grinned. "- and still can't even touch me, but she's got hate. Remember your hate. Stoke it. It's what will keep your asses alive." She turned to the second instructor. "Get her patched up, and get no-eyes over there awake too."

---

Shepard shook her head with the memories, and sighed. "It's complicated. She was... one of the first people who treated me as something other than a monster. Anderson was the first, but he was also so ... good, so perfect, that I could never understand him, never really get why he bothered with someone like me. With Rachel..."

Liara nodded. "She was .. more like you?"

Shepard closed her eyes. "Never had a mother. If I had to pick someone to take the role, she'd be the closest fit, I guess. As fucked up as that was.."

---

"Get up, Shepard."

Sara pushed herself up off the ground, limbs bruised, and wiped blood from her nose. Her vision swam slowly into focus, the figure of Rachel Florez standing in combat stance, leg forward, hand outstretched, blearily coming into view.

Her voice was cold and unyielding as she spoke to Shepard. "You rush in too fast, you let that anger of yours mess your head up, and you get fucking sloppy. Your goddamned biotics aren't going to save your ass if I can get you too messed up to use them, girl." She frowned. "You are distracted. You were doing better than this. You can do better than this."

Shepard exhaled shakily and nodded, but her jaw was still tight. "Yes, sir."

Rachel glanced over the younger woman for a long moment before sighing. "That's enough. Sit your ass down." She glanced over a shoulder at the other instructor. "Tom, take the unit out for a run, then march 'em to chow. I got shit to fix here."

The instructor known as Tom nodded, his burly features not shifting as he turned to go, leaving the two in the combat practice room alone. Pale gray practice mats and stark white walls were only accompanied by the stale lingering smell of sweat and the faint sounds of Penal Legion soldiers at drill outside.

Shepard sat on one of the benches along the wall, picking up a dry towel to hang over her neck, and

Florez stood in front of her, not even sweating. Shepard stared up at the woman in a mix of envy, confusion, and discomfort. She always looked elegant and deadly, never a hair out of place, never seeming to show any fatigue. Shepard felt weak compared to her, and she hated the feeling.

The silence stretched on for nearly a full minute before Rachel spoke. "I'm not good at this kind of thing, Shepard, so I'll be blunt. You have the potential to be the best fucking soldier I've ever seen or trained. Your reactions are topnotch, you are strong, fast, and you think on your feet. Your gut instincts are almost never wrong, and despite the fact that you're a frigid, anti-social bitch, you seem to be a natural leader."

Florez smiled at the slightly surprised look on the young woman's face, then continued. "Those kids you took under your wing worship the ground you walk on. You aren't even 19 and you have the potential to one day be the next Jon Grissom or David Anderson."

Shepard sighed. "I never feel that way. I just .."

Florez frowned, kneeling down to look Shepard in the eye. "You need to get the demons out of your head, that's what you need. Get your ass back to the barracks and shower up, then meet me at training field four in an hour." She walked away, leaving a pensive Shepard behind.

Shepard had obeyed, changing into a fresh uniform after cleaning up and reporting to the training field, finding a light SA shuttle there, with Rachel standing outside of it, talking to a taller, older man with an impressive handlebar mustache. Her voice was tight and cold. "I don't give a shit about the 'ramifications'. No one is going to give a shit either way, I just need you to sign off on it."

Shepard got closer, and stiffened, as she finally recognized the figure of Commandant Siron, the base commissar. The man smiled, his eyes cold, and glanced over Shepard for a long moment before turning back to Rachel. "If it blows up, or gets out, it's on you. I'll say you stole my auth-pad and did this on your own authority, am I clear?"

Rachel merely nodded. "Crystal, sir." With that, the man turned to Shepard and pressed a button on his omni-tool. "Inmate Recruit 96552-Delta, Sara Shepard. Your control implant has been turned off for six hours due to a request by your immediate commanding officer. After this time, it will be switched back on. If you are not within range of this facility by that time you will detonate. Any attempt to surgically remove the device during this time will result in it's detonation. Am I clear, inmate recruit?"

Shepard looked at Rachel in confusion before turning back to the Commandant. "Uh..yes. I mean, sir yes sir."

With a dry chuckle, the man departed, and Shepard turned to Rachel. "What is going on?"

Rachel merely opened the hatch of the shuttle. "Get in. We're going on a field trip, kiddo." She smirked and got in after Shepard did, motioning her to strap into one of the seats. Rachel took the controls, and the shuttle lifted off smoothly, departing the lunar surface and breaching the air-retention force dome over the training base a few seconds later.

Rachel's voice was cool. "According to your records, today is your birthday. Took me a while to grasp that. Also says, from the psych reports, that you never had a party before. So I figured that you deserved a present."

Shepard gave her a wary glance. "You're taking me to see my red sand dealer?"

Rachel gave an actual laugh, the first Shepard had ever heard from her. "So you can make jokes, amazing. No, I have something ... better in mind. I'll only say this one time. I'm risking my career for this, possibly more. I'm doing it because if you don't get the closure you need on this, you'll never be able to move on. What we're doing is so fucking illegal they don't even have a proper name for the crime."

Rachel paused. "I'm going to be trusting you with a live weapon, and not to try to escape or backstab me. Can I do that?"

Shepard bit her lip. A large, large part of her desperately wanted to escape. The terror of the Penal Legions was not a lie. Living under the guns of snipers, the brutal training and random beatings of the commissars, and the ugly threat of having the air taken away at any moment were enough to break anyone. The fact that a handful of teens shoved into the same regiment she was in looked to her for some kind of protection only made it worse.

But Major Florez had, despite the cruelty and hardness, been more supportive to her and for her than anyone else in her life. She'd worked out with her, taught her to fight, to shoot better, to plan and think. She spent countless hours drilling Shepard and correcting her forms, sometimes regaling her with stories of the First Contact War or other military anecdotes to pass the hours.

When Shepard got too mouthy, Florez would stop the other commissars from going too far, and when an older, stronger inmate had nearly raped Shepard, Florez's rage wasn't just that of a pissed off officer, but something ... else. Something dark, brutal, and vicious, that spoke to something in Shepard's heart she thought long dead and made her, for a brief, glorious moment, feel wanted and .. cared about.

Despite herself, and how badly she hurt every day, and how empty she was... she trusted Rachel Florez, more than anything else. Betray her? She'd die first. With a slow nod, she spoke. "I swear on my soul I won't betray you.. sir."

Rachel gave a small smile and angled the shuttle down into Earth's atmosphere. "This is going to be the last time you get to see your old home, Shepard. Enjoy it while you can." The rest of the shuttle trip was passed in silence, as Shepard bit her lip and tried not to cry at the sight of the glittering towers and endless lights of her home, the New York Arcology.

She had hated it, but she loved it, and seeing the crowds and smoke and the towers was almost too much after months of the stark white Penal Legion base. The shuttle bobbed and weaved through the rich part of town, skimming over Manhattan and down towards the Five Blocks...and then slightly across town from there.

Shepard swallowed and felt a cold chill come over her. The area looked vaguely familiar, but she couldn't place why, and it bothered her. The shuttle came down on top of an old parking garage, in the middle of a slum area, and Rachel triggered the shuttle door and stood.

She snapped a locker on the side of the shuttle wall open, and drew out an armor chest-plate, which she tossed to Shepard, before putting on another one herself. She then took down the two Avenger rifles in the locker, and slung one over her shoulder. "Catch".

Shepard caught the weapon, checking it's heat sink and ammo block, before pointing the barrel at the ground. "What are we doing here?"

Rachel pulled out two helmets with blank, silvered face-plates, setting them on the bench seating in the shuttle, then shut the locker. She tapped a haptic control on her arm and her uniform shimmered, shifting from the pure white of a Penal Legion commandant to the black and blues of a Major of Marines. She put on the helmet, and gestured for Shepard to do the same. "Just follow, for now."

They walked from the shuttle, down a set of old, half-broken concrete steps, to the road below. The street was mostly empty, a few homeless bums tucked up against the shattered, burned out shell of a warehouse to get out of the wind, a line of six single family homes in various states of disrepair across from them. Rachel marched towards the last one on the right, Shepard trailing, and coming to a confused stop when she saw the name on the phys-mail deposit box at the curb.

It read "Shepard, M".

Shepard looked at Rachel, but her expression couldn't be read through the silver face plate of her helmet. Rachel's voice was ice cold. "Yeah. You know where you are now. You know how you ended up with the fuckers who ruined you, don't you?"

Shepard nodded, shame and fury and pain all welling up inside her. "Yeah, my parents fucking sold me. Why are we here? You want them to fucking apologize or something, like that will change SHIT?!"

Rachel shook her head. "No, Sara. I expect you to walk through that door and put a bullet in their brains."

It felt as if the ground had dropped away beneath her feet. A tiny, tiny part of her had always hoped that her parents had been tricked, or forced into selling her, or that they had regretted it, and they would show up, teary and apologetic, and maybe things would... change somehow.

An equally tiny, tiny part of her still clung to that. She didn't know what to do, and Rachel simply took her by the wrist and walked up to the door, before banging on it with the butt of her rifle.

"Systems Alliance Commissariat! Open this door!"

---

"Shepard?"

Shepard shook herself again, looking at the slender fingers wrapped around her armored wrist before remembering where she was again. "Sorry, Liara. I just...this is going to be hard for me, for a lot of reasons."

Liara nodded, closing her eyes. "When .. when we descended beneath the surface of Feros, I knew in my mind I was going to see my mother. But it did not truly impact me until the moment I saw her there, standing beside Saren." Pain radiated through Liara's voice, the hand on Shepard's wrist tightening. "It hurt so badly to fight her, to see her looking at me with hate, watching her try to kill you. I wanted.. I wanted to cry, to scream, to beg her to just look at me like she did when I was young."

Liara paused, swallowed, and shook her head. "To know your mother is a source of evil hurts like nothing else."

Shepard patted the little asari's hand. "I think your pain is a lot greater than mine, Liara, and you're a lot stronger than I am in the way you face it." She exhaled. "Rachel..is the person who let me get back a lot of .. who I am. She is the one who let me kill the people who ruined my life, covering for me. She's the one who always fed me information on where to find them. I used to wonder how she could do that, and now I guess I know. Cerberus."

Shepard hung her head for a long moment, still holding Liara's hand, merely thinking. It was funny how calming it was, just being able to sit and hold onto somebody like that. Shepard closed her eyes, letting as much of the pain and misery she could drain away, latching on to that tiny little moment of peace, and found her lips quirking into a smile.

"Thanks for just...being here, Liara."

The asari made a surprised sound, but squeezed her hand in response. "I wish I .. I knew what to say to make any of this better, Sara. I must sound like a fool, babbling on about wishing things were different."

Shepard shook her head. "I often end up thinking that way. But maybe you were right. Maybe I went through .. all of this shit, the pain, the loss, the blood, all of it, for a reason." Shepard swallowed, a nervous note entering into her voice. "Maybe if not for all that.. I wouldn't have this." She squeezed Liara's hand in hers again, wishing it wasn't through layers of armor, and the asari turned to her, a beautiful smile visible through the clear faceplate.

"...yes, you are right, Sara."

There was a long pause, and Shepard spoke in a dry voice. "Still, I gotta find better places have heart-to-hearts with you than shot-up bases full of dead people." She wagged a hand, grinning behind her helmet's faceplate, and Liara's laughter was enough to burn away the last dregs of pain in Shepard's soul.

At least, for a few moments.

O-OSABC-O

Twenty five minutes later, the MAKOs boosted back into the Normandy's cargo bay, and Marines were storing away what they'd picked up from the planet. The barely functional JOTUN mech that had accompanied Kahoku was also in the bay, being fiddled over by an ecstatic Tali, and Shepard walked towards the elevator to get to the CIC when Garrus stopped her.

"Shepard, I think you need to see this." He gestured to Telanya, who had a data-pad in her hands. "It's about the files we picked up off their server."

Shepard nodded, turning to face Telanya. "You found something?"

The smaller asari sighed uneasily, her helmet now off inside the Normandy, revealing her features. "Yes, and it isn't very good. The material dumped into the system by this Illusive Person was very comprehensive. Lots of links to banks and anonymous donations, and lots of hints of off the books purchases routed through dozens if not hundreds of front companies. Cerberus was pushing something like fifty to sixty billion credits a year."

Shepard's eyes widened. "Jesus Christ."

Telanya grimaced. "That's not all, unfortunately. The bulk of that money came from a trio of sources. Cord-Hislop Aerospace, which, if the most recent news we picked up off the buoys is accurate, was probably a front for the Illusive Man. The second big source of cash was filtered through about fifty intermediaries, but was something called the Manswell Foundation."

Shepard felt ice creep up her spine. The Manswell Foundation was a huge endowment, left by the Manswells to pay for repairing Earth's biosphere and funding new arcologies. It was probably funded to the tune of hundreds of billions of credits, and was supposedly overseen by independent third parties. "That makes a sick kind of sense, Sergeant. The Manswell Foundation pushes a lot of credits, and no one has the balls to call out Maxwell Manswell on, well, anything." She paused, thinking, and then looked back up. "And the third source?"

Garrus locked eyes with Shepard. "The Northstar political party."

Shepard shook her head, sighing. "But that doesn't make any goddamned sense at all – Northstar is full of alien lovers and people ignoring Earth."

Garrus gave a turian shrug, tilting his head to one side. "Sorry, I'm not really familiar with human politics. I just know what Telanya found, and there were a lot of links between the two."

Shepard cursed under her breath, and nodded. "Good work, both of you. Write it up and have it ready to go out on a data buoy." She turned away, and got into the slow moving elevator, closing her eyes in frustration.

By the time she reached the CIC, she'd formulated a basic plan. Pressly was waiting for her on the deck, an info-pad in his hand. "We just got positional updates and information from the Citadel Fleet, ma'am. The last Cerberus holdouts fell about thirty minutes ago. The troopships from the Citadel Fourth Fleet are ETA three hours, fifty minutes...along with a ship from the AIS. You have several queued comms requests from the Fleet Master...and one from High Command."

Shepard nodded. "Hardly unexpected. First, get me a tight-band link to Admiral Mikhailovich. And once the cargo spaces are filled and secured, go ahead and have Joker bring us into the location of that radiation blast." She paused, then frowned. "Have Dr. Chakwas give everyone a rad-resistance dosing as well."

Pressly nodded. "I believe Dr. T'Soni can use the human version, as can the krogan..but we don't have dextro formulations of anti-rad drugs on board ma'am, unless my memory of the last manifest is off."

Shepard scowled and nodded. "They won't be going down, then – and add that to the next shopping list we have, along with anything else they'd need." She noticed the very tiny tick at the corner of her XO's mouth and exhaled. "Pressly, I know you're not a fan of the turians. But right now-"

He shook his head. "I understand, ma'am. I'll have it done right away." He gave her a piercing look. "Are you holding up alright, Commander? It sounded pretty ugly down there..."

Shepard gave a thin, sad smile. "I'll make it, XO. One way or the other. I just have a lot on my mind and no time to work through it all." She almost laughed at that statement – the shit about Cerberus, Kaiden, her past, Bea, fucking Jason Dunn, Liara...

She tightened her jaw. "Which reminds me. We have a Cerberus ... ex-Cerberus, I guess, captive on board. I sent him up to Chakwas already, his name is Jason Dunn. He was a member of Neutron Squad, my RRU N7 team on Torfan. I'd like him kept under guard, at least until we get a chance to fully debrief him. I don't think he's dangerous, but..."

Pressly nodded. "Better safe than sorry, yes ma'am. I'll handle it all. You'd better deal with the comms situation."

Shepard rubbed her eyes and nodded. "Yeah, after I have a stiff drink first. Route the shit to my cabin, if you would be so kind."

---

Chapter 81: Chapter 72 : Cerberus, Reversal

---

A/N : Cliffhanger!

To see what Wrex is talking about when he's discussing Binary Helix and Cerberus's logos, check their web pages on the ME Wiki ... and wonder.

This chapter was beta read by Wordkrush. If you haven't read Leviathan: Oracle, there is something badly wrong with you, and you should read it. Naow.

---

The broad features of Admiral Mikhailovich filled the wall view screen in Shepard's quarters, as dull thuds from the deck below signaled the external cargo bays being loaded. "Commander Shepard, I'm guessing you aren't calling me to schedule a game of poker?" His uniform was slightly rumped, and the background behind his head indicated he was probably in his ready room.

Shepard gave a thin smile. "No sir. I have a pile of political bullshit on my hands right now."

The admiral shook his head ruefully and turned to one side, tapping an off-screen control. "XO, go ahead and tell Captain Parnes to get the drives hot on my flagship, if you would. And do an all-hands recall on ship's personnel, be ready to cast off on my order." He turned back to the screen, eyes narrowed. "How many drinks am I gonna need for this one, Commander?"

Shepard sourly held up a glass of scotch. "My second, sir. I can wait if you need one."

The admiral gave a sour laugh and shook his head. "Later. Hit me."

Shepard took a deep breath. "Admiral Kahoku is dead, sir. We trailed him to Edolus, found his ship in the system all shot up by a Cerberus cruiser we took down. We found his lander shot down near the old colony there, after nearly being taken out ourselves by a pack of thresher maws. Kahoku's strike force mostly got eaten. Cerberus mopped up the rest and took him captive."

She paused, thinking. "We entered a base we thought was Cerberus's HQ. Inside we found Kohaku's body, along with an asari captive and an old squad mate of mine. When we started moving towards the command center, everything went haywire."

Mikhailovich frowned. "Haywire?"

Shepard nodded, telling him about the base explosions, the downed Cerberus cruisers, the bizarre murder of Eylana by the turrets, and the surreal conversation she had with the Illusive Man. Mikhailovich's expression grew more and more grim as she continued. When she told him who was really running Cerberus and the revelations from the files Telanya had gone over, his skin blanched white..

"Jesus fucking Christ .. what a mess. This is going to be a fucking nightmare."

Shepard nodded. "I had the databases downloaded then blown up. We're going to call that battle damage, although I have copies. I can't hide the .. shit we found in that science bay, but we did wipe a bunch of the research terminals. My big question is: what do I do about General Florez?"

Mikhailovich gave a long, tired sigh. "Honestly, Shepard, I don't know. I'm sure the Fleet Master and High Command are going to give you specific instructions. My gut tells me to put a bullet in her head and destroy the body; better yet, place a couple more disruptor torpedoes in the base once you kill her and say the whole place blew up. There's no easy fix on this. Having the data you downloaded is dangerous. If what this Illusive Man said is the truth, I'd offer it up to High Command ASAP before they decide you need an accident. "

He wiped his mouth on his sleeve. "Fuck, according to the news feeds, the Illusive Man shot himself, but you had a real-time conversation with him AFTER that so the body they're going over now is a fake. Clever little bastard."

Shepard nodded. "He said the body of General Florez we found after she supposedly committed suicide was a flash clone; he probably did the same."

The admiral nodded back. "Alright, for now, play ball however they tell you to and stall the Citadel for as long as you can. Are the aliens on your crew going to follow your lead on this?"

Shepard didn't miss the slightly darker undertone he used, but she quickly shook her head. "Garrus is like a damned fanboy, Tali's just a kid and understands this is none of her business, and Liara...won't do anything. Wrex is a question mark, sir. I have history with him, but he ultimately answers to the Shadow Broker. I'm not stupid enough to think that fuck won't have someone else here picking through the ruins soon enough. I don't want to put Wrex in a place where he has to choose loyalties."

Mikhailovich nodded, then grimaced. "I.. I'll handle the Broker's reaction." At Shepard's look of shock, the older man gave a sour smile. "We caught a couple of his little sneaks not long ago trying to pry out details about your IES stealth system. I can do a quid pro quo just as good as Kahoku did, you know. You finish up and get on the horn with High Command, then ... give serious thought to what I said about more disruptor torpedoes, Commander."

She nodded. "Yes sir. Thank you, sir."

Shepard clicked off, exhaling, then trundled out of her quarters and up the stairs, going into the comm room and stiffening her spine. "VI, simultaneous comms – Fleet Master, Systems Alliance, and Vancouver, Alliance Command."

The screen on the far wall blanked, then lit a moment later. The top screen revealed the scowling, scarred visage of Fleet Master Dragunov, the lower revealed the Secretary of Defense, flanked by two Admirals of the Red sitting in a comfortably appointed office. "I am very sorry for the delay, but I just finished combat operations against the Cerberus forces in Edolus."

The secretary of Defense was an older man with faded blond hair and hard blue eyes. A seemingly permanent grimace etched the hard planes of his face, and his uniform blazed with medals and six stripes of command. "Commander Shepard, I am Admiral Branson, and these are Admirals Defar and Yu. I see you brought the Fleet Master in on the comms as well, good idea."

Shepard nodded. "I successfully tracked Admiral Kahoku to this system. I regret to inform the Board he was killed by Cerberus. I took out the facility in which he was killed,, but have come across additional information indicating the actual commanders of Cerberus are in another base on this world. Due to sabotage, this base suffered a catastrophic detonation of what appear to be disruptor torpedoesand is currently heavily damaged. My intent is to finish it off and capture or kill the leaders."

Admiral Branson narrowed his eyes. "The Illusive Man is the leader of Cerberus, Commander, and he's already dead. Who exactly are you talking about and who gave you this information?"

Shepard smiled. "The Illusive Man contacted me via tight-beam in the Cerberus base I just took out. He's not dead – that's some sort of clone, sir. He informed me the leaders of Cerberus are General Rachel Florez and General Richard Williams. He also informed me, via information tight-beamed to us, that Cerberus has funding links with the Manswell Foundation and Northstar." She paused. "I have wiped this information from the databases in the base, as well as incriminating documents that put the SA in a poor light and indicate that some members of the SA were doing business with Cerberus. I have also collected a sample of 'research' the sick fucks were doing for assessment by Admiral Vandefar."

The secretary of Defense leaned back,a poleaxed look on his face. The two other admirals wore similarly stunned expressions. Dragunov, on the other hand, gave Shepard a piercing look for a long moment before speaking. "As I told you, Admiral Branson, Commander Shepard has the situation under complete control. The issue with fleet movements and the Thorian were merely due to us not completely bringing her into the loop. I presume, Commander, you intend to insure this will be brought to closure?"

Shepard nodded tightly. Admiral Branson frowned. "I'm sorry, but this is ... a bit shocking to me. You are implying you have documents showing links between the SA and Cerberus on a high level?"

Shepard closed her eyes. "The Illusive Man indicated there are members of the government at a very high level who are fully aware of the involvement of Rachel Florez and Richard Williams, and who are complicit in some degree with Cerberus's...activities." She shuddered. "I have video of the shit they were researching, sir. It made hardened marines throw up. It damned near made my krogan throw up."

A pained note came into her voice. "I have these files because I'm not sure I can trust anyone else with them. Sir."

Branson's eyes flashed anger but the Fleet Master immediately cut him off. "Hang on, Fredric. I know you wouldn't have a damned thing to do with Cerberus after they killed your daughter in law, but Shepard doesn't. She's not accusing you...are you, Commander?"

Shepard fixed him with a flat look. "No, sir. The information I have doesn't indicate anyone at the cabinet level was in on it., but I don't know about his aides, his staff, or Congress. Or, for that matter, yourself, sir." Her voice was cold.

The fleet master didn't even flinch. "I received the autopsy report on General Florez a month ago, which indicated a high chance it was a clone. I have been aware for several years that a man matching rough descriptions of Richard Williams is associated with elements thought to be close to Cerberus...and I am aware that Jack Harper is the Illusive Man."

The jaws of the three admirals of the High Command fell open. Branson was the first to recover. "You WHAT?"

"Oh, come off it", Dragunov snapped back. "Your own goddamned hands aren't so clean given what went down on Elysium, now are they? I don't like Cerberus and I have no goddamned clue why they went fucking crazy enough to cut deals with Saren, but for years the sick bastards were doing shit the administration didn't have the balls to do. You know the stakes and what's already going down."

Shepard looked from one admiral to another, and before an argument could start, cleared her throat. "I'm almost certain whatever you are discussing is above both my pay-grade and security clearance, much less the security encryption on this comm link. I need instructions on how to proceed with dealing with the main Cerberus base once I reach it."

Dragunov sighed. "It can't be allowed to fall into the hands of Citadel troops."

Branson's eyes bulged. "A cover up? Are you fucking insane? This is already a clusterfuck, but at least if we go ahead and come clean over it-"

Dragunov laughed, coldly. "Then all will be forgiven? Did you even READ the reports from Shepard about what Dr. T'Soni found on Eingana? If we go public with this now the Citadel Council will freak completely out. Saren is still out there, still dangerous, and if more ships like that thing that cut up the Citadel Fleet at Feros are still out there, the LAST goddamned thing I'm worried about is some political fallout down the line!."

Branson frowned. "I'm not sure I buy Dr. T'Soni's theories about Protheans and Inusannon extinctions being connected to this dreadnaught of Saren's. My concern is with the long-term political fallout -"

Shepard sighed, almost tiredly, and the two admirals looked at her. "Sirs, seeing as I have the only incriminating data, my initial opinion is that I proceed to the target site, execute the principles, and destroy the base. The base suffered an explosion of disruptor torpedoes, resulting in high radiation and plasma fires. I have nine more disruptor torpedoes in my armament. Spaced throughout the remainder of the base and detonated, they will irradiate and destroy any remaining evidence for decades. As a plus, Cerberus is already blowing up their own shit elsewhere so this won't even look suspicious. I can make local copies of whatever I find and turn it over to SA AIS agents when I get to the Citadel for repairs."

Dragunov nodded. "That's the kind of thinking I like to see, Commander. Capturing the people you named is .. suboptimal at best. We could never try them without a public relations disaster."

Branson grimaced. "I'm dispatching additional forces your way, Commander. A frigate with the AIS, and some forensic investigators. They can work with the Citadel forces until C-SEC arrives."

Shepard smiled. "I already have two C-SEC staff on my ship. They .. have agreed to sign off on whatever I say. None of the alien nationals on my ship will divulge this information to outside parties, at least in the short term."

Dragunov nodded. "In that case, Commander, I think your course is clear. Once you are done there, proceed to the Citadel for debrief and any restock or repair needed. Fleet Master, out."

The secretary of Defense stayed on the line, frowning. "Commander, I appreciate your efforts at helping us .. keep this out of the light., but I give you my personal promise – once this Saren mess is handled, we'll revisit this issue and go after the people who made this happen. I swear."

Shepard gave a small sigh of relief. "Thank you, sir. That .. helps."

The admiral's grimace only tightened. "I'm aware that the SA hasn't lived up to your high expectations. There was a great deal of discussion both before and after you were made a Spectre about your suitability. Many would have preferred my own son, Commander Branson, for the job."

He continued after a long moment. "But for all your flaws, you've always done the job. The SA hasn't always done the job it should have. I'm aware of your .. personal history and the tragedies involved, as well as what went to shit on Torfan,It was inexcusable which is why the Fleet Master personally executed the general behind that idea." He paused again, seeking words. "I can only try to convince you that at least I and the High Command are not, and will not, sign off on any kind of quid pro quo to sacrifice you or your command over political issues."

Shepard nodded. "I appreciate that, Admiral. Very much. I had a concern that my hanging onto information of this nature would make me a liability."

One of the admirals at Branson's side winced, and the other laughed. "She really, really needs to hit the political training courses, sir."

Branson, on the other hand, looked sad for a long moment. "Perhaps, but her fears are not totally unfounded, either." He shook his head. "Enough. You have your orders. I'm aware of the history between yourself and General Florez...so I'm making it an order. She is to be executed for high grand treason against the Systems Alliance with no offers of arrest or surrender. The same goes for Richard Williams. They are to be shot until dead and the bodies atomized. Am I clear?"

She saluted. "Clear, sir."

Nodding, he returned her salute. "Dismissed, Commander." The screen went dark, and Shepard gave a final, long exhalation before unclenching her fist.

O-OSaBC-O

Once the Normandy was airborne again ,the trip to the second base was quick. From the air, the base's location was forbidding, tucked into a rocky plateau in a low-slung valley that ended in a sharp canyon. Broken rocky terrain on all sides prevented any thresher maws from getting too close but even from hundreds of feet up, dozens of maws could be seen thrashing about in the broken hinterland beyond the valley.

Shepard gave a snort. "Guess they aren't going anywhere on foot, huh? Joker, bring us around; I want a couple of Tali's drones to scope the place out before we get any closer. Let me know when the sweep is complete." She turned away, bringing down the IMC mike, and began speaking.

"All hands, this is Commander Shepard. We've kicked in Cerberus's teeth,, now we're going to finish what's left. By direct order of High Command, we're to enter the base,base, fuck up anyone we find, free any prisoners, and then blow the shit out of the place. I shouldn't have to explain why, but I will."

"For whatever sick reason, Cerberus was doing some pretty vile things to aliens. It makes humanity look bad. It's kind of hard to claim we're any better than the turians were during the FCW when we're cutting up asari and salarians and fucking around with what looked like a mix of rachni and dogs. We are on a job, and that job is to catch Saren. Anything that could disrupt that has to go away, and this is one of those, almost all the people involved in this disgrace to our species have already caught a bullet to the face. The remainder, in the base we're headed to now, will be the final ones. That being said..."

She paused. "The official line is this base was destroyed when we got here. No one not on this ship is to ever hear any differently, at least until Saren is dead. That means you don't write your family, you don't tell your girlfriend, you don't blab to reporters. You don't mention it. You don't even think about it. When it's all said and done, anyone left around WILL be taken care of. I promise you that, on my own name."

She sighed, and keyed the mike again. "For now, I need the DACT unit to suit back up and get ready for a hot drop. All other marine units, if you need chow, get it down now, otherwise stand by for extreme hostile insertion. The area we are headed to is radioactive – everyone going down should have received anti-rad boosters and graphite stims. Detective Vakarian and Engineer Tali'Zorah will be required to stay on the ship since we don't have dextro-amino supplies of that nature."

"Shepard out". She clicked off, and walked back through the CIC to the elevator. The chatter on the ops alley was subdued, most not really understanding what went down on the surface, but the marine guard to the CIC had a shadowed, ugly look in his eyes. She paused. "Sergeant Haln?"

The man looked up, dark brown hair buzz cut to regulation, eyes almost empty. "Ma'am ... the shit we saw down there...and what that Illusive Man said.."

She smiled bleakly. "The secretary of defense was just as fucking jaw-dropped as us, Sergeant. He swore we'd find anyone else involved. Trust me, I will make sure if someone else is in this shit, they eat ODIN before we're done."

The marine straightened. "Yes, ma'am. Sorry, ma'am."

She clapped him on the shoulder. "Don't apologize, Sergeant. Make sure you're ready to rock." She slid past him, heading downstairs, and into the elevator. It bottomed out a few moments later and she strode into the cargo bay where Garrus and Tali were hard at work trying to repair the severe damage to the MAKO tanks. She swept her eyes around the bay until she found Wrex's familiar bulk standing in front of his link-system to the walked up to him slowly, hands open. "Wrex."

He half turned. "Shepard."

She folded her arms. "I need .. a favor."

Wrex frowned. "You want me to not tell the Broker about that little conversation down there?"

Shepard held up a hand, eyes narrowed. "I know you work for the Broker. I know you don't break your word, ever. I'm not asking for that. I'm not even asking for you to hide the fact I have incriminating data and that I'm covering some shit up. I'm asking you not to repeat what the Illusive Man said about Saren's location, or Noveria. In fact, I'd really appreciate it if you didn't even mention the Illusive Man saying anything about Saren at all."

Wrex frowned. "Why?"

Shepard huffed. "Because the evil fucker had a point! You mean to tell me the Broker didn't know about any of this shit? He's not giving us any kind of decent intel, Wrex. He's just sending whatever little bits and pieces fit his own needs, and I still don't have a really good reason as to why. I don't trust him, and I don't know what the fuck Saren is doing on Noveria...nor do I want anyone else poking around until I get the chance myself."

Wrex rolled his massive head from side to side. "This is why I prefer jobs with a shotgun and a target, Shepard." The krogan grumbled, then gave a slow nod. " Maybe you are right. I only work for the Broker because he pays well and because usually it's the kind of work I like. Enough creds and violence to lose myself for another handful of years, rather than think about how things used to be."

Shepard gave a sad nod. "I'm .. I wouldn't ask if it wasn't important, Wrex. I know you feel like you owe me because of Urv."

The big krogan glared at her for a moment before turning away. "Urv was just one more reminder that my entire race is dying by inches, Shepard. Nothing I can do about that. Nothing I want to do about it. Keeping your little secrets from the Broker doesn't mean I care either way." The krogan gave a low growl in his throat, and Shepard nodded.

"Thanks, Wrex. I .. appreciate it." She was about to turn to leave, when Wrex spoke.

"Shepard, the Broker may already know about Noveria. When I gave him my initial report about going after Cerberus instead of Saren directly, he laughed, and he sent me this image." He opened the Broker link, tapping at controls and pulling out a blue haptic screen, which filled.

The first was the logo of Binary Helix, a gold hexagon, broken in the middle, with an inner brown hexagon, also broken. The second was the Cerberus logo – a golden hexagon, broken in the middle, framed by a brown hexagon, broken in the middle.

Her eyes narrowed and then she spat. "Fuck." She glanced up. "And you didn't mention this why?"

The krogan gave a shrug. "What good would it do? We didn't have any real leads and Binary Helix's primary facility is on Ilium. If the Broker's people can dig far enough, they may find out about the Noveria link as well."

Shepard nodded, and then just shook her head. "We'll have to see. Be ready to hit the ground, big guy. We'll talk some more about this later." She walked off, moving across the bay to where Tali and Garrus worked. "What's the status?"

Tali leaned her head out of the tank, her purple reik smeared with some kind of soot in a couple of places. "I made some internal fixes, and the omni-gel is cooking on the armor plating and frameworks. Garrus is trying to fix the axle of MAKO 2. Oh, and I fixed up some of the damage to the JOTUN mech, too – some armor plating and omni-gel fill, and the electronics that were blown. We'd need a full workshop to redo the hydraulics but you could clamp some weapons on there, and the chain-gun still works."

Garrus slid out from under the MAKO, wiping his bare, taloned hands on a rag. "MAKO 1 is okay, just shaken up. MAKO II is not safe for combat but it can take a landing, I think. The suspension is really shot. I never had time to adjust the mass effect field on the second MAKO the way I did on the first one. If we get some down time on the Citadel – "

She snorted. "Not likely...after this, we restock and go after Saren as fast as we can. If the MAKO isn't ready by then we'll just have to roll with one."

Garrus nodded unhappily. "I also pulled the disruptor torps like you asked..I put them on a timed remote detonator and keyed it to your omni. Anything else?"

She nodded. "You heard the announcement. The place is hot; it's got at least delta and in some cases eta level radiation exposure. You two are sticking on board during the fight. No matter what. I did have Pressly order up some dextro-equivilent radiation drugs for when we get back to the Citadel though."

Garrus voice was dry. "Gee, thanks, sheep. Just what I needed. A chance to go traipsing through radiation. Can't you ever take us anywhere nice?"

Shepard snorted. "What, like an antique shop?"

O-OSaBC-O

It took fifteen minutes for the drones' reports to come back. The outer doors to the base were pushed shut and one drone had seen several personnel in hard-suits outside the base, doing something to the GTS missile racks found there. Shepard snorted.

Goddamn, Rachel, you should know I'm not dumb enough to fall for THAT. "Joker, target the GTS installations and the front door. Six missiles, wide spread, followed by five rounds from the main gun."

The Normandy shuddered as she disgorged missiles. The slender projectiles screamed out of the sky and hammered the plateau far below. A large explosion erupted a few moments later, spraying smoke and flames out in all directions as chunks of rock were hurled hundreds of feet away. Joker whistled. "Looks like some pretty direct hits, Commander. Part of the base structure is exposed."

Shepard nodded. "Alright, time to move. Bring us in at MAKO drop height and keep a missile lock on the entrance."

She departed the CIC and in a few minutes was in the cargo bay as the last of the marines loaded into the MAKO. She paused to put on her helmet, before sliding into the drivers seat of the first MAKO. Tapping her omni, she commed Joker. "Being drop. Pop the DACTs."

The DACT pair had quickly repaired any damage to their suit and jump packs during the down time. The two rocketed down to the surface ahead of the Normandy, landing with heavy thumps in the wreckage and rubble that was once the base entrance. As the Normandy descended, she picked up their initial reports. "Normandy, this is Angel One. We have a downed JOTUN out here as well as fifteen, that is one five, downed Cerberus shits. GTS battery is gone, so is a good thirty feet of rock. The front doors are slag, Entry to the base is half blocked but Angel Two is clearing. I see no hostiles; area is clear for cold drop."

Joker slowed his descent and the Normandy swooped down smoothly, cargo ramp disgorging both MAKO tanks one after another. The heavy vehicles slammed to the ground and Marines spilled out.

With that, the Normandy ascended to low battle position, hovering over the base at several thousand feet, and Joker's voice crackled across the comm. "Thank you for flying Air may now move around the cabin."

Shepard shook her head at her pilot's irreverence and stepped out of the MAKO, drawing her Revenant. She swung it around in an easy arc before heading to the back of the MAKO, watching as Cole disembarked his squad.

Seeing Liara approach, Shepard turned and was about to speak when the asari's shoulder erupted in an explosion of blue electrical arcs and spurting purple blood. The force of the impact sent her crashing to the ground hard enough to crack her helmet on a piece of rubble. As if a light had been snuffed out in her mind, the subtle sense of Liara's presence that had been in the back of Shepard's mind all these weeks suddenly went dark.

"LIARA!"

O-OSaBC-O

Agent Titus was a simple man. Raised in austerity by a colony of strict pacifists, he'd grown up believing fervently in peace and understanding. Batarian slavers raiding his colony, killing his wife and two of his three children had broken that. When Cerberus had driven them off and saved the life of his last remaining son, he'd cast aside his old life, joining their ranks with just as much fervor as he had for his old religion.

He'd trained hard, and discovered he had a rare touch with a sniper rifle. He'd killed dozens of humanity's enemies over the years – foul asari, demonic turians, sick and depraved salarians, filthy krogan, and especially batarians. In a way, sniping for him was like prayer.

There was a supplication to the higher forces of physics, windage, and elevation. There was a connection, the eyes of the target through your scope, the feeling of holding the fate of a being in your hands, to be taken at a whim. He loved, the feeling of power, the knowledge that he was defending his race, his home, and ultimately his son.

So when he'd been brought to the headquarters to guard the heart of the Operation, he'd been filled with pride. He was on external patrol when everything went to hell. His distance from the base had shielded him from the rads inside. His orders were clear: Stay outside, pick off incoming forces. With luck, the plan would have defeated Shepard's entire force before they hit the ground.

The bombardment from above had been unexpected – the Iron General had thought the Butcher would just stride into the place like a conquering queen and be off guard. So much for that. Instead, the GTS battery had gone up. The other snipers in the area were caught in the conflagration, their screams cut off by the sound of racing plasma fire and explosions. The plan to decimate Shepard's force with snipers and even possibly capture them was the only sniper left alive.

When the MAKOs had unloaded their troops, suddenly he had a chance to salvage something of the plan. He pulled out his Mark II Raptor rifle, sighted in delicately on the Commander's armored head, waited impatiently for the materials laser built into the gun to feed him ammo and penetration requirements for the kill shot. To his shock, however, the sensor reported his weapon – even with the strongest ammo loads and full capacity – couldn't pierce the thick layers of Spectre-grade armor the Butcher wore.

The rest of the squad was almost as bad. The Krogan was armored even more thickly, and so were the command chiefs. Taking out a single soldier was a stupid waste of his life; he knew he'd only get one, or maybe two shots off.

Then the asari had slid out of the MAKO. She wore the same red and black armor as the krogan, but according to his sensor, while the helmet and chest plate were just as thick, the shoulder pauldron was missing, replaced by some kind of lightly armored coat.

A hotshot wouldn't do it, but a plasma-penetrator coupled with an electroshock discharge would fuck her biotic field up so bad it would probably kill her. He grimly loaded the round, locked it in place, and waited.

When the asari turned to face Shepard, he fired. The round drove through the armor at her shoulder, splintering as it did so. The tiny pulse charge at its middle discharged as its casing fell apart, pumping the alien full of four amps of ten thousand volts of electricity. Originally designed as an anti-JOTUN round, using it on a lightly armored asari was akin to hitting a watermelon with a tank round. The back of the asari's armor erupted into broken fragments, a spray of blood jetting out and splashing over the Butcher's armor.

Titus's triumph vacated along with most of the top of his skull two seconds later. Tracking back the shot, Ashley Williams lifted her own long sniper rifle and blew his head off. By then it was far, far too late to do anything else. Ash could only watch as Shepard fell to her knees beside the asari. The Commander shook like a leaf as Liara lay there.

Unbreathing.

Unmoving.

Dead.

For a long moment, Shepard knelt in the dirt, silent and unmoving beside the fallen asari. As the Commander gazed down at Liara's still form, bits of dirt and rock began trembling around her and slowly rising into the air. Cascading arcs of biotic energy wavered around Shepard's limbs and she erupted. Ashley screamed, as did several other marines. Others staggered back or were sent flying from the pressure of the biotic shock wave Shepard unleashed.

Shepard's eyes visibly glowed through the mirrored faceplate of her helmet and hot blue fire erupted along the commander's armor, peeling away black paint and setting the flapping Spectre coat alight. A nearby DACT stumbled away in terror as Shepard lashed out with her biotics and wrenched the thousand pound door free from the base's blocked entrance. A mere wave of her hand sent the door crashing into the MAKO hard enough to knock the battered tank onto its side. Shepard stalked inside the ruined entrance to the base. She could barely see through the angry tears and the dead feeling in her chest, but she didn't slow down at all.

Dropping her Revenant, she pulled out her ODIN.

Slid the barrel back to a position she no longer used.

Tore out the regulation ammo block and slotted in a chunk of metal crisscrossed with warnings.

Flipped the firing pattern switch to full auto.

By the time Alenko got to his feet, the only sign of Shepard was the sound of screams echoing from within the base, and the roar of the ODIN firing in long, staccato bursts.

---

Chapter 82: Chapter 73 : Cerberus, Fate

---

A/N: The conclusion to the Cerberus Arc. Thanks to everyone who PM'd ideas. Also thanks to everyone who left reviews. :D

None of the remaining arcs are this long – Noveria is ... significantly different than canon, but the geth fight is not, and most of Virimire and Ilum is very similar to canon in most ways. The biggest change is soon to come, but for now, you can finally see the Butcher unveiled in all her crazy, nutjob glory.

Update: Thanks to my reviewers - looks like my editing software crapped out. I've fixed issues in both new chapters.

---

Fire and death raced through the already shattered hallways of Cerberus Command, borne by a figure that looked as if it had torn free of some lunatic's nightmare to haunt the mortal world. Burning pulses of tumbling, armor piercing shards tore through the soldiers trying to slow the figure down, searing through armor and leaving burning, shrieking victims writhing on the ground in agony. Waves of biotic power blasted through the weaker, inferior barriers that tried to stop them, burning and sizzling as they crushed through makeshift barricades, sending men and women flying with broken bones.

A Cerberus soldier slammed to the ground, both arms broken by the brutal slam he'd just caught the edges of, and he grunted, shaking his head to clear it. A moment later a black-armored boot stomped down hard on the man's neck, and he gave a choked scream before his neck snapped and his skull fractured under the pressure.

There was no hesitation as the black-armored figure tore through the pitiful beings in front of her. Grenades were hurled with biotic throws faster than the eye could follow, blasting the Cerberus soldiers to the ground. Wedges of polonium, super-heated by the illegal ammo-caster in the ODIN shotgun, flashed out in scything spreads, cutting soldiers in half, or blasting their armor into melted ruin, leaving them to sink to their knees clutching ruined faces or howling in agony as the chips of armor piercing, poisonous metal perforated their insides.

Captain Varr tried to rally his people, to bring up what support or tactics he could offer. It was like trying to stop a forest fire with a single bucket of water. A brave soldier charged forward, grenades in both hands, trying to bring down the black avatar of death, and instead flew back as an enormous flash of biotic energy caught his form and slammed it against the far wall. Varr could only turn away as the man literally came apart with the blow, bones bursting free of the shattered flesh in sprays of blood and organs flopping out of the man's burst-open torso like some demented pinata.

Two JOTUN mechs stepped forward, ominous in their black and orange armored paint, miniguns spinning as they tried to lock onto the figure. The woman tilted her head, the glowing eyes behind her blank face mask narrowing, and with a gesture at the ceiling, hurled blue fire at the broken and shattered hydraulics lines jutting forth.

With a screech of tearing metal, a heavy support beam collapsed downward. Driven by the weight of rubble atop it, the beam sheared through the left-most JOTUN, striking it's exposed head almost square-on. The heavy war machine collapsed to it's knees, detonating in a series of internal explosions, even as it's brother mech began firing at the figure in front of it.

The flashes of blue light, snapping from here to there through the narrow corridors, told Varr that Shepard's ability with the biotic charge made the JOTUN's response too slow to be a viable threat. A moment later, she snapped out of a charge right in the mech's face, leaping off of it's multibarreled weapon, draping something across the gap between it's shoulder armor plates and it's head. Another flash, and Varr felt only pain as she slammed into him.

The last thing his eyes saw before the glowing edge of an omniblade ended his life was the belt of grenades looped over the JOTUN's neck go off, sending gouts of flame and shrapnel into his remaining soldiers.

O-OSaBC-O

It had taken several precious seconds after Shepard had literally roared off, for anyone to figure out what to do. Wrex was first, scrambling his heavy bulk back to it's feet and charging after Shepard, ignoring calls from Alenko to wait.

For her own part, Telanya was looking at the still figure of Liara on the ground in paralyzed shock. A member of the Thirty .. struck down like nothing. The gaping wound in her shoulder, drizzled with her own lifeblood, looked huge, and she just could not process it. Vega knelt down next to her and cursed.

Finally Cole, roaring, got the rest of the Marines to their feet and turned to Alenko. "Pull it together, LT. We have a man down, get the doc on the comm."

Kaiden scowled. "She's DEAD, Master Chief. What good-"

Cole snorted. "I've seen asari shot nine times and get up afterward, LT. And what hit her looked like an electro round. It probably stopped her heart! If we can get it going again, she could pull through!"

Alenko stared for a long second, then nodded. "Handle the squad, Master Chief." He tapped his omni. "Joker, bring the ship down NOW. Get the doc out here with a crash bag, Liara is down and her heart isn't beating, and she's not breathing."

Joker didn't even answer, the Normandy seemingly coming to a dead stop in its climb towards orbit and tumbling back to the ground, righting itself at the last few moments to come to a dead hover some ten feet off the ground about fifty feet away. Two minutes later, Chakwas emerged, wearing a light support suit and survival face-mask and carrying two heavy bags. "We don't have time to get her on the ship and up that stupid elevator. Ashley, you and Corporal Haskins get her armor off. You, asari policewoman, I'm sorry I don't recall your name, I need you here too, as a baseline for readings."

Chakwas dropped her bags, pulling out several large syringes filled with thick, green liquid and a pair of portable med-units. She snugged one of these around Telanya's arm, placing the other one on Liara's torso, tapping it rapidly. Ashley hastily tugged off the chest plate, unsnapping the clasps and breaking one in her haste, before lifting the entire chest plate away, then pulling the armored sleeve off. The shoulder piece came apart under the pressure, showing the shattered flesh around the shoulder and bits of bone mixed in.

Chakwas clucked, handing a medical package over to Corporal Haskins, the younger woman taking it hesitantly. "Strap this to her other arm and hit AS, then CARD and DIST. Ash, I need you to do compressions. Press here, their heart is lower than ours is." She indicated with a free hand a spot below the asari's breasts, and Ashley pressed down, counting between compressions.

Chakwas hastily tore away a piece of the undersuit over Liara's bicep, and then stabbed Liara's bare arm with several of the syringes, flicking each one into the dirt after she was done. She glanced at the med package on Liara's stomach, and then pulled out a pair of heavy black medical forceps, the ends tipped with small blocks of metal. "There's some kind of .. fragments in her shoulder. Haskins, what does the package say?"

"I-it says blood oxygen at 83% and dropping, bauxites good?"

Chakwas nodded, plucking out a long sliver of metal and tossing it aside with a disgusted expression. "Good. Asari were ocean dwellers, hopefully her brain can go without fresh oxygen longer than ours can. Stand clear, girls." She dug into the bag, pulling out two paddle-like devices connected to a small tubular canister, and adjusted some settings on it, her slender fingers moving over the buttons with practiced speed. With a huff, she picked up the paddles and set them aside. Pulling aside the black jumpsuit that Liara wore under her armor, she broke open a packet of clear gel, smearing the asari's chest with it. Picking the paddles up again, she placed them on pale, pebbled blue flesh.

"CLEAR!"

Liara's body twitched under the current as the paddles discharged. Chakwas consulted the second medical package, the one sitting on Liara's stomach and hissed. "Dammit. Ash compressions again. Haskins, there's an O2 mask in the second bag – the third pocket – grab it and get her helmet off."

Haskins looked alarmed. "The air -"

The older woman gave her a look that made the marine scramble to do as she was bid. "The air, Corporal, won't affect her that much with the O2 mask. The pressure is bad, but in this instance that's okay." Haskins only nodded as she got the asari's helmet off, and then fumbled in the bag, coming up a moment later with the mask. Meanwhile, Chakwas took out several long strips of metal and laid them in x shaped patterns across Liara's bared chest, before smearing more gel over them.

"Press the canister bottom to force O2 into her lungs, Corporal. Ash, good work on compressions." Chakwas withdrew yet another syringe. "Dammit, I hope atropine works in asari like it does humans. DAMN the SA for not giving me a full pharmacology." She uncapped the syringe, which had a heavy, thick needle, and grimaced. "Ash, pull back."

As Ashley withdrew her hands, Chakwas slammed the heavy needle into Liara's chest and plunged down on the draw, withdrawing it a moment later. "Clear." She lifted the paddles and laid them on Liara's chest again.

Lord, I am but an old woman trying my best to heal, but this child doesn't deserve to die here. Please.
She triggered the charge.

O-OSaBC-O

Following the trail of devastation Shepard left behind was easy for Wrex. The broken bodies and burning wreckage didn't leave much question as to the direction she was headed, and the occasional terrified screams and bits of comm chatter he could hear only made him chuckle.

Wrex was hardly a subtle touch himself, but the kind of savagery Shepard was unleashing was enough to impress even him. Men were snapped in half, or torn into component limbs. A pair of soldiers was warped into a metal bulkhead, agonized expressions contorting their features into almost inhuman mockeries. Here and there were blackened piles of corpses, and finally he came to a large room with the waist-high barricades and sniping angles humans seemed to love in their fixed defensive positions.

The carnage was nearly unbelievable. Dozens of humans were dead, most incinerated by the still spilling plasma feed from a nearby power conduit. Shepard must have ruptured it with biotics and then charged out of the path of the rampaging energy flow. More humans were slammed against walls, in broken, contorted piles, bones and bits of armor jutting from them like crazed decorations on a very sick cake.

Two destroyed mechs, huge and hulking, littered the middle of the room. Wrex glanced around, snickering as he realized the two stupid bots hadn't even gotten any clean shots off. Shepard was tearing through this soft meat faster than he even expected. He was about to move on when something caught his eye, and he stepped closer to inspect it.

A man with what looked like officer bars had been beheaded, and next to him was a young woman, in a similar uniform. Pieces of metal had been driven into her shoulder joints, her knees, and through her stomach, and her head was a bloody smear on the wall in a fan shape, the wall itself blackened and ripped up by the passage of wedges of burning metal.

Wrex could picture the brutal scene in his mind, the terrified Cerberus officer, Shepard using her biotics to ram in chunks of metal to immobilize her, an icy interrogation, and the ugly execution at point blank range with her ODIN. Behind his helmet, his muzzle split in a wide, toothy grin.

"Masterful."

He hadn't seen the Butcher in full swing since Torfan. Shepard had tucked her hate and aggression away – probably scared of terrifying her crew. She'd fought well, but without her true vicious fire. But the teeth were out now, and Wrex didn't want to miss it.

He hurried onwards – twice pausing to dispatch lone, wandering Cerberus soldiers, once with his shotgun and once just by backhanding the fool out of his way, hard enough to snap his tiny, fragile neck. Ahead he could hear the roar of explosions and the sizzling sound that spoke of powerful biotics. He could feel the power pouring off of Shepard, in heavy waves. And he could hear screams, of terrified humans facing something beyond their power or understanding.

Rounding a corner, he charged into the room, pausing to skid to a stop at the tableau.

A JOTUN mech lay broken and shattered on the ground, one arm torn off, the other mangled, and a huge hole blown through its chest. Shepard was fighting the second mech, but it had gotten a lucky shot off, a missile launch having blown her halfway across the room, breaking part of her helmet and scorching her armor.

With a terrible, smooth motion she rose up, fist clenched and haloed in biotic power so strong Wrex couldn't look at it directly, before she hurled the power out, the soul fire tearing across the room with enough rage to tear up the deck plating as it passed. The warfire ball hit the JOTUN and splashed, metal sagging under its power. A moment later the ammo and rockets in its arms cooked off under the incredible heat, the war mech detonating in a staggering explosion that send bits of machinery and metal tumbling in all directions.

Wrex ignored the piece of wreckage that hit him, bouncing impotently off his armored chest, and stepped forward. "Shepard."

She spun to face him, her ODIN pointing dead at his face. The faceplate of her helmet was shattered, one blue eye visible, wide and mad with hate and pain, narrowing as she finally recognized him.

"Wrex. Go back. This isn't for anyone but me."

Wrex merely shrugged. "You think I'm here to tell you to wait?" He stomped forward, unafraid of her little gun, coming up to her and towering over her, its barrel poking into his broad stomach. "She was becoming special to you, wasn't she?"

The gun trembled.

The big krogan half knelt, pulling off his helmet, bulbous red eyes slitting further as he looked at her. "They shot her dead and did it to make you come at them stupid, Shepard. Go and kill them all, but I'm going to make sure you don't get taken down from behind."

The biotic energy wreathing her body flickered, and she nodded. "We need to move."

A voice erupted out of the air, sourced from a loudspeaker on one wall. "How sweet. A girl and her dog lamenting their dead asari slut. Is that it, Sara? Did she get you off at nights, I wonder, did you beat her like you did those prostitutes, and then kiss and make it all better?" The mocking voice was cut off as Shepard roared like an animal, firing the ODIN at the wall. The speaker exploded into sparks and fragments, and Wrex flinched back from the pulse of energy the smaller woman emitted as she stormed ahead.

Wrex sighed, getting back to his feet, and lifted up his shotgun. Anyone stupid enough to taunt the fucking Butcher deserved to die as painfully as possible. This was going to be fun.

O-OSaBC-O

Rachel Florez could feel the burning sensations from the anti-rad drugs she had taken, but her personal dosimeter showed she'd taken enough rads to kill her in short order. Already she'd vomited, and her skin itched. In a few more hours, the diarrhea and headaches would begin, then mental confusion. Death waited for her in a week. Maybe less.

She withdrew her Marine issue combat pistol and laid it quietly on the table in front of her, covering it with a few papers. She'd put on her armor, checked her omni-blade, and injected herself with the high-end steroids and anti-nausea drugs in her personal med-kit. All that remained was to deal with her wayward student one last time.

In a way, Rachel was sorry it was going to end this way. She felt a perverse, motherly pride in Shepard, having steered her entire life towards the ends that she'd needed. If things had gone the way Rachel had planned, Shepard would have been utterly isolated and broken in just a couple more years, and perfect for recruitment into Cerberus after carefully breaking her faith in the SA and instigating a few ugly incidents with aliens.

The damned mess with making her a Spectre had derailed her plans, though, and now there was nothing left but to clean up the last loose ends. She could, she supposed, tell Shepard the real truth about what had happened. That Cerberus tracked most of the babies born with eezo exposure, and had begun a systematic campaign to harvest them.

That Cerberus caused her father to lose his commission and job, that Cerberus had messed up the medicines leading to the mental decay of her mother. That Cerberus had ensured the girl would end up sold off, abused, and tortured. Cerberus had lost track of her when they had attempted to claim her from the sex slavers, but in a way that had even turned out better, as Shepard fell in with the 10th Street Reds.

Rachel had made sure every source of comfort she could turn to was poisoned. Shepard's own insecurities and sexual issues meant that she'd never find a lover, and her brutal leadership style isolated her from everyone but her own unit. The brilliant actions at Torfan by a Cerberus plant had wrecked even the cohesion of her Neutron Team, and the years under the equally traumatized Captain Delacor had almost finished the job.

Anderson, damn him, had once again ruined a pure product. And due to his ham handed, fatherly meddling, Rachel was going to die at the hands of her own handcrafted tool.

She could tell her the truth and break her once and for all, though, before she died. If she could have given the late Agent Titus a medal, she would have. He could not have picked a more perfect target than the asari doctor.

She watched the barely functioning monitors, tracking Shepard's psychotic rampage through her last few forces. By the time she got here, her biotics would be exhausted enough for a phase disruptor to disable them. The ones built into the floor should do the trick perfectly.

The krogan...would be problematic. She smiled, and checked the jury-rigged explosive charges set into the last archway between Commons 2 and the command center. Blocking that off would stop them both, but Shepard could just charge through the blockage. The obstacle would prevent the krogan – or any other interfering parties – from bothering her little reunion with Shepard.

She keyed another mike, smirking as she did so. "You know, Shepard, your little orbital strike didn't blow up everything. Your silly little crew is still outside the front door, wringing their hands and crying over that dead little slut. I bet, if I had enough time, I could figure out how to detonate the energy conduits to the GTS batteries that run right under their feet and kill a few more of them. Don't dawdle."

She only laughed at the answering, barely sane scream of fury that sounded before the speaker and its associated sound pickup were destroyed, but that's all she needed. She tracked the pressure monitors and what few internal sensors were still working, and when the moment was right, detonated the explosive packages in the walls right in front of the krogan and Shepard, blocking the passageway.

"Oopsie."

O-OSaBC-O

"Goddammit, CLEAR!"

Liana thrashed on the ground, and then gave a shuddering, choking inhalation of breath, as the med package on her arm erupted into pulse beeps. Chakwas sagged in relief as she began pulling more of the fragments out of the asari's shoulder. "Don't move, breathe, and keep your eyes closed. You were badly hurt and have been clinically dead for over five minutes."

Liana coughed again, inhaling and trembling, but tried to speak, her voice slurred and too quiet.

"Where...Sara..."

Ashley draped a blanket from the med bag over Liana's upper body nakedness, and looked up with a pained expression to gaze at Chakwas. The older female said nothing, standing instead. "Lieutenant Alenko, I need two of your marines to get a gurney from the cargo bay and help me get Liara back into the Normandy. The atmospheric pressure is bad and the atmosphere isn't helping."

Alenko nodded. "Just let me sort out my squads first, doc." He walked over to Cole, who was checking the loads on his Revenant. "We're about ready. Master Chief, you'll take squad one. I'll lead squad two. Vega, Ash, you're on sniper, the DACTs will take point, and Tali can send her drones while she's on the ship..."

Liara swallowed painfully, struggling to sit up, and Chakwas frowned, kneeling next to her. "You need to rest, Liara. You took a very heavy shot to the shoulder, which is shattered, and you've lost a lot of blood."

Liara shook her head. "Shepard...feel her. Anger. Pain. Danger."

Chakwas grew very still. She knew a bit more about asari than most of the humans on board. Asari telepathy was very badly understood, and was usually something only highly developed between bonded asari of long interaction. She'd read medical papers indicating the same could happen on some level with human partners, but ...

She licked her lips. What the asari and the commander did was none of her business. At the same time, she wasn't sure it should be something she should ignore either, given the importance of the mission and the danger. She found her voice, keeping it very low and calm. "Liara. Commander Shepard was, ah, very upset when you went down. She went ahead into the base and Wrex went after her."

Liara nodded, a broken, dark look in her eyes behind the clear plastic of the medical support mask. "She...she needs help. I have to go."

Chakwas shook her head. "Absolutely not! You aren't even in any condition to walk, much less head into a combat zone-"

With a gritting of her teeth, and a suppressed scream of pain, Liara's body lit up with biotic energy, and she staggered to her feet, medical package sliding off her arm and blood trickling from her shattered shoulder, only hastily sealed with medigel. "I...have...to...go." Her voice was so filled with pain that the words sounded more like growls.

Chakwas tapped her omnitool. "Commander Pressly. Chakwas here. I need your permission to have Dr. T'Soni restrained, she's irrational and demanding to go after Commander Shepard. Her medical condition is such that she could die without proper treatment."

There was a very long, pregnant pause on the line. When Pressly spoke, his voice sounded almost defeated. "Patch her up and get her in there, Major. That's a direct order, I'm logging your protest already."

Chakwas felt her jaw drop, and she felt a touch of anger enter her voice. "In the name of God, Pressly, why!?"

Pressly spoke again, grimly. "Commander Shepard's vital signs are at 121% of safe. Her heart rate is arrhythmic. Her implant is showing cascading heat and power fluctuations. She's showing at least four serious, armor breaching wounds, a broken helmet, second degree burns, and possibly a concussion. She's not mentally stable right now and if Liara can get her stable it's worth the risk. You have your orders, Doctor."

Chakwas frowned, pulling up a haptic display of the commander's vital signs, and spat a curse. The XO was right, Shepard's vitals were dangerously erratic. She was literally fighting in a state of shock.

She bit her lip, then spoke up. "Alenko, belay my last. I need two of your men to help Dr. T'Soni inside the base, after your sweep to make sure no Cerberus hostiles kill her again." She pulled off the heavy medical support mask she wore on her face, coughing at the near poisonous air, and pulled off Liara's flimsy O2 mask. "Put this on and keep it on, an O2 mask isn't going to last long in there."

Alenko looked bewildered as Chakwas took the O2 mask from Liara and slipped it over her own face. She placed another setting of medigel onto Liara's shoulder, and used an application of omnigel, spattering over the loose blanket and forming into a semi-rigid shell, immobilizing the arm. She took Liara's pistol, and moved it to the other side of the asari's gun-belt, so she could reach it.

"I don't have to tell you this is very dangerous and reckless, Liara.." She dug around in the med bag at her side, pulling out yet another syringe, and injected the asari with the strongest stimulant she had. Liara gasped, the irises of her eyes expanding, and Chakwas nodded. "That's the best I can do in terms of patching you up, without getting you into the med bay. Don't even try to use the arm, and I would recommend not using biotics, either. I very, very strongly protest this, as you could literally die from exhaustion or cardiac arrhythmia at any moment with out proper treatment."

Liara gave a weak smile. "I... I will be ... alright." She forced herself to take a step forward, stumbling, nearly falling. Reacting without thinking, Telanya caught her arm, stiffening as she did so, and then stepped back, with a low bow. "Forgive me for touching you."

Liara looked at the other asari for a long moment. "I . I am not... a member of the ..Thirty any longer, Sergeant. And... I am nothing... special, in any event." She paused, nearly out of breath, before continuing. "There is nothing to apologize for... thank you .. for not letting me fall."

Liara stepped forward again, ignoring the poleaxed expression on Telanya's face, and this time two marines flanked her, one throwing her good arm over his shoulders. "Come on, Doc. I got ya. Jesus, you asari are tough."

Chakwas took an inhalation from the O2 mask, and sighed. "I'm getting back onto the ship, take care of her, Alenko." She turned, pausing to pick up her bags, and headed back towards the lowered ramp of the Normandy.

With a sign, Alenko motioned everyone head. "Let's catch up. Hopefully, Wrex has kept Shepard in one piece."

O-OSaBC-O

Wrex blinked blood out of his eyes, and shook his head as he came to his senses. One moment they'd been walking along, Shepard taking out a couple of Cerberus thugs and slowly trying to calm down, and the next moment the entire world had exploded around them.

He rolled to a sitting position, groaning in pain. His armor had held, thankfully, the thick plates and protective layers keeping him unharmed, but the corridor was a smoking ruin, and the way ahead was blocked by a solid fall of twisted beams of metal and rock. Shepard lay on her side, groaning, and even as he watched she got to her feet, pulling off her now completely ruined helmet. A gash was open on one cheek, bleeding freely, and her eyes were narrowed in pain.

She picked up her ODIN, checking it for damage, and then glanced at her pistol on the floor, the barrel bent by the explosion. Kicking it away in a fit of pique, she glared at the rubble in front of her. "Well, fuck!"

Wrex slowly leveraged his way to his own feet, using his shotgun as a cane, grunting as several bones popped back into place. "This Florez creature is a cunning, but cowardly foe. It will take quite a while to blast through this mess."

Shepard shook her head. "I don't have a while. This bullshit ends here and now." And with a flash of biotic light, she was gone, phased through the rubble in her biotic charge. Wrex stood there for several seconds, blinking stupidly before shaking his head.

He had been pawing halfheartedly through the rubble for almost five minutes when he heard voices from behind. Another five minutes, and the two DACT soldiers walked up, weapons ready. "Christ, man, where's Shepard? It looks like the Sao Paulo Death Squads went through this place."

The big krogan nodded at the rock pile. "She did a charge through this to the other side. You got anything that can clear this?"

The two DACT looked at each other before moving forward to examine the rubble. "We can't just blow it up, that could bring down the entire goddamned tunnel on our head." As they spoke more Marines came up, followed by two helping along the battered, limping, bloody form of Liara T'Soni.

Wrex stared for a long moment before his face split into a toothy, feral grin. "You look like a kicked pyjak, asari. I'm surprised you're still alive, that shot nearly blew your little arm off."

Liara gave him a withering look and fixed her eyes on the rock pile. "Where...where is Shepard?"

Wrex gestured again. "She charged past that. Florez blew it up to stop us, and taunted Shepard over the comm system about it."

As the marines began examining the pile to try to figure out a way to bypass it, Liara leaned on the wall, closing her eyes, reaching out with her tired senses for Shepard. Whatever tenuous, fragile link the two of them had was still broken, but she could feel writhing anger and something else.

Fear. She was fighting, and losing. With a grimace, Liara shuffled forward, forcing her tired mind to grasp at the shreds of memory she had of Shepard.

Shepard flashing through the motions of the kanquess. Old memories of Shiala trying to teach her the move, the suppressed disappointment on her mother's face when she couldn't get the balances right. The repeated warnings about never trying it without knowing how to perform it properly.

Alenko barely had time to realize what Liara was doing before, with a yell of determination, Liara glowed blue for a moment and flashed, vanishing in a streak of blue light.

O-OSaBC-O

Shepard emerged from her charge, blinking back nausea and fatigue as she did so. Leaving Wrex behind was the only thing she could do. This conflict had nothing to do with her crew, or her friends, and everything to do with settling up the score.

The corridor beyond the rockfall was lit with orange emergency lights. Here and there, dead Cerberus soldiers were laid out neatly along the sides of the corridor, hands folded across their chests. Broken electronics and shattered haptic panels lined the walls, bits of glass crunching underfoot as Shepard trod down the dimly lit passage.

The crackle of fires and tendrils of smoke, along with a blast of heat, poured out of one side intersection, and the ugly sounds of collapsing rock and distant screams from another. Shepard paid it all no mind, striding ahead, breathing shallow, eyes narrowed, her hands clutching her ODIN so hard her knuckles hurt. The doorway ahead was shut, the Cerberus symbol over the outline of the Earth embossed deeply into the stainless steel metal of the doorway. With a surge of her biotics, she levered the doors open.

The room beyond was nearly identical to the fake HQ's command center – a bit larger, and makeshift barricades were set up in a couple of places. A few displays had power, flickering erratically, and a helmet, in orange and black, sat unattended on top of the main central display. Shepard glanced around, hissing as she heard something shift from above her, trying to bring her weapon around as she stumbled into the room.

The minute she crossed the threshold, agony crawled across her body as a pulse disruption field shattered her biotics. Her limbs felt heavy, and the fatigue she'd been holding off by lightening her weight hit her all at once. With that, it was no surprise she was too slow to prevent the flying snap kick that drove the ODIN out of her hands and skidding into a dark corner. She barely got a cross block up in time to stop a second kick, this one strong enough to send her back several feet, falling back on her butt.

Rachel Florez went to one knee. She wore form fitting armor, thin plates of metal over body-hugging ballistic cloth, in black with orange trim. Her hair, once so neat, was a bit tangled, her patrician features tired, drawn and much more pale than Shepard remembered. One arm was raised in a defensive block, the other was angled down, hand open in a knife-hand form.

"All these years, and you still forget the Rules, Sara." Shepard scrambled back as Florez stood, and she brought herself into a ready stance, placing her weight on her back leg, arms loose and ready.

"Bitch, this isn't a lesson in the dojo. What the fuck are you doing with Cerberus!" Shepard moved, slipping a high kick from Rachel, lashing out with a punch. The armor the Cerberus general wore deformed and hardened around her hand, nullifying its effect. Rachel's return knife-hand, to Shepard's solar plexus, cracked her Spectre armor, sending the younger woman staggering back, leaving her open for a round house kick that hit hard enough to leave Shepard seeing stars and skidding across the room.

Florez sighed. "Sorry honey. That's classified. Also, forgot to mention I had some upgrades done a few years back after that shuttle crash." The hand she'd struck Shepard with had its synthskin covering torn, revealing hard metallic fingers. Shepard cursed – she had not expected Florez to have cybernetic limbs. She needed a weapon, or her biotics. But she'd dropped her Revenant, and her pistol was ruined. Without her ODIN or a biotic ability, she suddenly realized that she was at a severe disadvantage.

Florez smirked. "Cat got your tongue, Sara? Aren't you going to scream at me for betraying you, the SA, honor, commitment, courage...berate me for killing your stupid little asari.."

Shepard's nostrils flared as her anger returned, blinding her with red rage. She levered herself up, rolling and coming up in a snap kick, driving her foot against the older woman's thigh. Forcing her back and ducking under a lightning-fast return right cross, she instead hooked her own foot behind Rachel's and tugged, flipping herself into a spin as she did so. The other woman crashed to the ground, and Shepard caught herself with one arm, pushing off the floor and bringing down her other elbow in a pile-driver against Rachel's stomach.

Florez made a retching sound, and Shepard didn't let up, lashing out with a quick right to the face, smashing that perfect, infuriating smile, splattering blood from a suddenly broken nose. But Rachel heaved and bucked, flinging Shepard from on top of her, and then caught Shepard's free flying right foot.

With a grunt of exertion, Florez spun, flinging Shepard into the comms station against one wall, sparks flying as the console shattered. Shepard shook herself, pushing herself upright, only to catch a brutal uppercut against the chin, followed by a knee to the stomach and a hammer hand chop to the back of her neck. Her armor blunted some of the blows, but that didn't help the jarring impacts, and when Rachel angled her arm into a judo hold, Shepard could only scream as the armor's reinforcement ended up aiding in dislocating her right shoulder.

With a moue of disgust, Rachel spun Shepard away, letting her fall drunkenly to the floor. "Pathetic. All that training, cross training. Preparation. Studying. For what? A barely in control, bloodthirsty little bitch. Just a Tenth Street Red in a soldier's clothes."

Shepard spat blood and fragments of a tooth, leaping up. She fainted at a sweep with her legs, then threw herself into a low roll as Rachel leapt over her leg. She came up, using the same rapid knife-hand move she had against Wrex in their sparring, catching the older woman across the eyes, staggering her. With a thought to that fight, she brought both hands across the sides of Rachel's head in open handed slaps, smashing them against Rachel's ears hard enough to ring the other woman's skull. Finishing off with a headbutt, she smashed the top of her head into her former mentor's already damaged nose, stepping back out of range of any counter blow.

Florez wiped the blood from her face, smearing her lips with it, giving a bloody smile. "Defiant to the last, I see. It's a pity. You were going to become a wonderful weapon for Cerberus before events ruined you. Now, dead, you'll still at least serve humanity as a martyr, and in that way I can still shape the future."

Shepard snarled. "You don't have a future, bitch." She stagger stepped, slipping right, fainting for the jab, leaning back to avoid the counter-punch. She blocked two low kicks with her own shins, grinning as the second kick left Rachel hopping back in pain. So, only the left arm and right leg are cybernetic.

With a demented grin on her face, she ducked under yet another high kick, charging ahead recklessly. She took the vicious punch to the face that Rachel threw to slam into the woman, letting the heavy weight of her armor overpower her foe and slam them both against one of the tactical consoles in the room. Rachel gave a yell of agony as something in her back popped, and Shepard triggered her omniblade, slashing down.

Rachel ignited her own, blocking the orange sweep of death, and hacked at Shepard, the tip of her more slender omni-blade scoring the black armor along Shepard's shoulder. Back and forth they swayed, droning blazes of orange leaving after-trails in their vision as they sought a single, clean thrust to finish the battle.

Rachel was nauseous, exhausted and sick, but Shepard had already pushed herself hard against the maws, in the first base, and in her psychotic charge to get this far. With the agony of the phase disruptor eating at her concentration, she was the first one to slip, and missed a block. Rachel's omni-blade slipped through her armor, a hot blaze of pain scoring across her stomach, and then Rachel's cybernetic arm backhanded her.

Shepard's vision swam dizzily as she crumpled to the floor, blood leaking from her mouth. Rachel kicked her, laughing, and more plates of armor splintered under the force of said kick. Rolling away in defense, Shepard was disoriented, and Rachel smirked as she dove forward and down, slashing her omni-blade directly into Shepard's thigh.

The scream that tore out of her throat was almost involuntary as the omni-blade splintered bone and burned muscles. Rachel twisted it viciously, before pushing her hair back and standing, chest heaving. With a smooth motion, she reached over to the comms table, pulling out a heavy handgun hidden under loose paperwork, and pointed it downwards, at Shepard's head.

"For what it's worth, Sara... I was always proud of you. I did what I had to do. Humanity's fate is more important than you, me, or any other individual."

Shepard curled forward, and then, suddenly, froze. A tiny, tiny smile crossed her features, at the sudden feeling tingling in the back of her mind, and Rachel frowned. "What is amusing, my old student? Death at last, freedom perhaps? You've longed for it, I know."

Shepard shook her head. "No, not that. It's just ironic you're going to die because you forgot to follow your own first rule." Shepard's smile widened into a bloody, vicious grin. "Always check the body."

Rachel's eyes widened and she spun, but by that time the battered, slender figure in the doorway, not in the room proper, had already lifted her hand.

Liara's voice was hoarse and soft, but infinitely vicious. "Get away from her, you bitch." White fire lanced out, overpowering the pulse field that covered the floor of the room, slamming into Florez and bursting into a singularity. The older Cerberus woman had time for one, disbelieving scream before her skull imploded under the strength of the biotic black hole summoned into existence.

Liara let the biotics die, slowly letting her hand fall, before staggering towards Shepard, blood running again from her wounded arm. She winced as the pulse field hit her, but grimly put one foot in front of the other, forcing a smile onto her features. "I .. have to admit...trying to do a kanquess ... from what bits of memory I have from you...was not the wisest thing."

Shepard reached out a hand towards her. "How...you...I thought.. I was alone..."

Liara's face was blurry in Shepard's vision, occluded by blood and tears, but before she lost consciousness, the last thing Shepard heard was Liara's sweet voice.

"You will never be alone, Sara. That is our fate."

---

Chapter 83: Chapter 74 : Edolus, Departure

---

A/N: This is just a transitional chapter, but one where I tried to approach the topic of Cerberus, and extremist research, in both conversations.

A quick, fluffy trip back to the Citadel, and then off to snowy Noveria.

---

The aftermath of the fight against Cerberus was anticlimactic, leaving the full horror of what had just been seen in everyone's minds. Alenko found he didn't like the feeling it left. He wanted a shower, a cup of hot tea, and sleep, but most of all he wanted the last two hours of his life to just go away so he wouldn't have to dream of the things in Cerberus' science labs.

It took a full fifteen minutes for Alenko and the marines to dig through the blocked corridor, using small explosive charges and brute biotic strength from both the lieutenant and Wrex. Surging through the opening, Alenko was the first one to enter the command center, taking in the headless corpse of Rachel Florez. The sting of the pulse field washed over him, heightening his migraine and making him grit his teeth as he entered the room, pistol drawn.

Liara sat on the floor, holding Shepard, who had slipped into unconsciousness. "She's ... badly wounded and .. we need to get her out of here. The .. bitch .. "

Liara made a languid motion with her free hand towards the black and orange armored corpse on the floor, almost liquid with disdain.

"...stabbed her."

Alenko nodded, turning as marines entered the room. "Jackson, Ownby, Rodriguez, Haln. Get some of those sheets of metal plating outside and use them as makeshift stretchers. Get the Commander and Dr. T'Soni out of here. Henson, go with them, get Chakwas on the comm once you're clear and have her get them to sickbay."

He turned, eying Telanya, who was obviously in some level of pain from the pulse field still affecting the room. "Grab what you can from these databases, Sergeant Telanya. We didn't run into Richard Williams, so see if you can find out where he is or if he was here at all."

He glanced over at the rest of squad two. "As for the rest of you, there are two mass effect hand-trucks in the cargo bay, loaded with the disruptor torpedoes. Hustle back, leave one man in the corridor on guard, and start laying them out. One in this room, one at the entrance, and spread the others around. Do it as quickly as you can."

Cole and Vega walked up, the senior chief with his Typhoon slung over one shoulder. The gash in Vega's armor where he'd been hit by a turret was patched with a sloppy smear of omnigel, and he spoke in a tired voice. "This place is a radioactive wreck, sir. Even with anti-rad dosing, we need to be up and out of here in another half hour at the most. There is still partial power, but most of the base is on fire. Air's going toxic, and the fires are still spreading."

Alenko nodded. "That will hopefully kill off any Cerberus survivors. Send the DACT troopers back to the entrance, let them pick off anyone trying to escape." Alenko turned to Cole. "Can you supervise moving anything we find back to the Normandy, Master Chief?"

Cole nodded, and turned to head back out. Alenko walked over to Rachel Florez's body. He frisked her for anything of note, finding nothing but a marine battle knife in her boot and a wedding ring on a neck-chain around her neck. Leaving those on her, he tapped commands to his omni-tool, and began spraying down the corpse with a fine layer of aerosol accelerant, soaking the body gently but completely.

By the time he was done, both Shepard and Liara had been hauled away, and Telanya was copying something from the battered computers in the command pit to OSD chips. "Lieutenant Alenko... according to this, Richard Williams was trapped in a science lab when the Illusive Man's sabotage blew up a great deal of the base. They seem to believe he was dead."

Alenko nodded. "If he's not he will be soon." With a sigh, he stepped well back, and sprayed plasma fire over the Iron General's body, reducing it to fine gray ashes in seconds. "The marines should be planting the torpedoes as we speak. Head on up, Sergeant."

The asari nodded, and Alenko followed her, pausing only to pull out his last three grenades from his weapons belt. Setting them to timed, he tossed them back into the room, watching them land in the middle of the command pit, and turned away. The explosion that rocked the room thirty seconds later barely shook the floor. The next few minutes of walking through the ruins only brought Alenko a sense of calm.

At least this perversion had been put to rest forever.

As Alenko exited the base, he saw his marines had dragged out a handful of items, mostly portable memory units, and were loading them into the Normandy's starboard external cargo area. Alenko hadn't been told exactly why Shepard wanted bits and pieces of Cerberus's research, but figured that was above his pay grade anyway.

He half turned, finding Ashley standing beside him, wiping off purplish bloodstains from her gauntlets with a piece of torn Cerberus uniform. "Hey, LT."

A small smile twitched across his face. "Hey, Gunny." He eyed the last team of marines hauling torpedoes into the Cerberus base, the long and ungainly weapons being maneuvered carefully. "What do you think about all of this?"

Ash flung the stained rag in her hands away, expression unreadable behind her armored faceplate. "This, as in the operation? I think we kicked ass. For all the talk about how supposedly powerful these thugs were, they fought like trash. And the skipper must have fucked up fifty of them by herself. Not very impressive."

Kaiden laughed, and she shrugged. "If you're talking about what Cerberus was up to...I think it's goddamned sick, Kai. I mean, sir. I mean, it's one thing to not like aliens. I never really got aliens. Turians..are kinda of a sore point with my family. Never met one until Vakarian, and from what he says, he's not much like the rest of them."

She looked away, gazing at the marines hauling torpedoes inside the base. "Never met asari or krogan, either. To be honest, I never thought much about aliens. Still think we might be better off on our own. But none of that changes that what Cerberus did is vile. There's no excuse."

She looked back towards him. "Then again, I guess some people never got over the FCW. Or just had bad experiences with aliens in general."

Kaiden thought bitterly of Vyrnnus, and gave a sour nod. "Yeah, that sounds about right. There's a lot of old hate towards aliens among the older generation, I guess." He shook his head. "But hate didn't solve anything, it never does and it just makes what everyone fears will happen come all the faster. With all the money and influence these sick bastards had, what could have they done to really help humanity, I wonder?"

Ashley sighed, shaking her head. " Ring out the grief that saps the mind, for those that here we see no more. Ring out the feud of rich and poor, ring in redress to all mankind." She paused. "I don't think these people ever wondered about the right or wrong of it, LT. This wasn't about power, it was about people scared of aliens and of anything different than themselves. People who are scared act stupid. When your back is against the wall, everything in the dark looks dangerous."

Kaidan fixed her with a hard look. "That may be so, but this-

She spread her hands. "-is the legacy of evil men who probably told themselves they were doing the right thing. It's shades of Colonel Santiago and the Sao Paulo Death Squads – "who were we to question the will of the Emperor, when all other alternatives were to be crushed under the unthinking heels of tyranny and starvation?" I mean, listening to Wrex talk about the genophage sends chills up my spine – what do we do if the salarians decide humans are a threat and cook up some kinda bug that kills us all off?"

Alenko snorted. "I'm sure that would only happen if humanity acted in the same way the Krogan did at that time – trying to conquer the galaxy. Organizations like Cerberus send the wrong message. And honestly, even if it was a situation like that, does that make this the right answer?"

She turned back to look at the base entrance, trickles of smoke beginning to emit from the ruined holes at it's edges. "It's not right, and it's fucked up. I ain't gonna try to pass this off as some kind of rational response, and the Santiago Defense is bullshit, just like the Nazi's and all that back in the 20th century." She paused, sighing, and looked at her hands, still stained here and there with Liara's blood.

Her voice was low and bitter. "When you grow up hearing bitter stories of the First Contact War, or see how the turians won't even look at you on the Citadel...when your whole family is looked at like cowards because of what aliens brought about... you lose perspective. If I had not been on this whole trip with aliens, gotten to know Tali, or Wrex, or even Vakarian, would I really be angry because aliens were dead – or just angry because Cerberus made humanity look bad?" She shrugged. "It's easy to say to yourself that you couldn't do something evil. I worry more that a lot of people don't even see the evil Cerberus represents, the kind of evil that makes it okay to cut up turians and salarians just because they're aliens."

Kaiden gave a somber nod "I get where you're coming from, Ash." His headache throbbed, and he forced it back, focusing on his words. "It's not up to us to force people to wake up and realize that we live in a universe where aliens are part of life...and often stronger than us. We can't change how bigots and zealots think, and we can't change how aliens view us unless we remove those bigots and zealots."

He gave a thin smile. "I understand, though, why you worry about it too. I've had ugly experiences with aliens. Like I said ... jerks and saints. It's just easier to make them 'other' because they look weird, smell weird, sound weird. It's easier to blame them for the economy being off, or cast them as the bad guys when we don't have a place at the table."

He jerked his thumb back towards the Cerberus base. "But the truth is, even if salarions are plotting to kill us off, humanity has already tried to do that to itself. Half the bodies in that hellhole were human experiments. No matter what rhetoric they pull out of their ass, the difference between people like them and people like you is that you just want humanity to stand on it's own feet. You don't want to rely on aliens, because you can't be sure they'll be there when humanity needs them. Monsters like Cerberus just want power, at any cost, and are using aliens the same way Hitler did the Jews, or Ardiente did with the Americans and Chinese."

He turned away, motioning to Cole to begin rounding the marines up to leave. "At the end of the day, we all have to look inside ourselves and remember that the worst threat to humanity has always been humanity itself."

Williams said nothing as she followed him up the cargo bay ramp, turning one last time to gaze out over the wrecked entrance and the forbidding, broken plateau beyond. Did you do this, Uncle Richard, to redeem our name? Or did you never come out of that dark place you fell into after Shanxi?

A series of explosions rumbled through the base, something within it's bowels blowing up, and more smoke poured out from the entrance. Ashley crossed herself.

Goodbye, Uncle Richard. I'm sorry you ended up this way. I hope you can find whatever peace God offers your soul.

Five minutes later, the Normandy was arching through the atmosphere towards the other base when the nine disruptor torpedoes went up in blazes of radioactive hellfire, sundering the remains of the headquarters of Cerberus forever. In the radiation blaze of the explosion, no one on the Normandy's Tac Alley noticed the barely visible sensor signature of a light fighter speeding away, winging towards the mass relay at high speed.

O-OSaBC-O

Shepard awoke in a blaze of pain. Her shoulder felt broken, her stomach hurt, her mouth was swollen, her eyes ached, and her nerves were on fire. Trying to open her eyes only rewarded her with blaring smears of light.

The kind, tired voice of Helen Chakwas sounded nearby. "Ah, you are awake. Another damn fool stunt you barely survived by the skin of your teeth, this time nearly killing Doctor T'Soni along with your heroics."

Shepard coughed, feeling something wet tear inside her body, and groaned. "You should see the other person." She tried to grit her teeth against the pain, and stopped and winced when her jaw throbbed and a tooth wobbled in it's socket painfully.

Chakwas made a clucking sound. "Try not to move much of anything, Commander. The only part of you that you didn't manage to wreck during your little alpha-female rampage was your hair. You've got a splintered femur in your left leg with torn muscle groups; a broken shoulder blade; a torn capsular ligament in your shoulder; perforated intestines from an omni-blade stab .. not to mention second degree burns, a concussion, a hairline fracture in your jaw, broken teeth, neurological damage..."

Shepard leaned back against the pillow as Chakwas's voice droned on about her injuries, taking slow even breaths. Despite how much pain she was in, a small smile made its way across her features, and she managed to hold up a hand to stop the flow of injury information. "Any casualties in the crew? And ... Liara?"

Chakwas made a noise, huffing, and adjusted something heavy and cold on Shepard's stomach. Rather than try and risk more agony by opening her eyes to look, Shepard just waited, and after a moment Chakwas spoke. "Minor injuries, mostly. Two marines have moderate gunshot wounds that require surgical correction, and Senior Chief Vega has three cracked ribs. Liara's shoulder joint is almost destroyed, and it needs surgical correction. Her vitals are recovering nicely now that I removed the last bits of whatever kind of round hit her, and I've stitched everything up in abeyance of further work with a bone regenerator. No deaths."

She paused. "I also examined the health of your ... captive. Jason Dunn. He shows signs of malnutrition, dehydration, and severe electro-shock torture. His cybernetic arms are heavily damaged and need both repair and recalibration. I've got him on fluids and fed him, but we had to burn his uniform and put him in a spare marine overall. Are you planning on turning him over to the Citadel forces when they arrive?"

Shepard shook her head. "I'll deal with Jase myself. Later. Am I in good enough shape to talk to Pressly?"

Chakwas said nothing, probably checking some kind of readout, and then peeled back one of Shepard's eyelids with a gloved finger, shining a light into her pupil. "I think so. You are still lightly concussed, but I don't think you are delirious. You are, however, not getting out of this bed, if I have to have Wrex come in and sit on you. Clear?"

Shepard nodded, and was left alone in the med bay for several minutes. She had almost nodded off when the doors hissed open and Pressly's voice filled the silence. "Reporting as ordered ma'am."

She coughed, and with a tired sigh, forced her eyes open. Smear colors and shapes swam dizzily in her vision, the biggest one a blurred blue shape with a blob of pale beige on top. "I can't see very well, but give me a moment. What's our status, XO?"

Pressly's shape wavered, slowly coming into rough focus, showing him holding an info-pad and wearing a worried expression. "The Normandy took some damage from the fight against that single missile cruiser, and more from vacating the fight that destroyed the Phoenix. Armor plates 4 through 22, and anterior plates 6 and 9 are non-viable, and plates 23 to 28 are damaged. Our torpedo stockpile is empty and most of our missiles are gone. Both MAKOs are on board and both are non-functional for combat."

He tapped his pad. "We've got enough fuel to make it back to the Citadel, but not to Noveria. Also, the Marine contingent has two lightly wounded and two on limited duty. Both DACT armor sets need overhaul and repair. Your armor is a write-off, ma'am. So is your pistol. So is, for that matter, Wrex's and Liara's armor. We're down to 44% on fresh stores, and 28% on medical supplies, including our entire stocks of anti-rads, regenerative patches, and flash heal paks. We're also down to less than nine gallons of omni-gel."

He put the pad behind his back. "You've been unconscious for two hours. Citadel fleet forces entered the system twenty three minutes ago, and were accompanied by a C-SEC cruiser and a few SA ships, including a ship bearing AIS operatives. We have orders from High Command to hold position in orbit unless medical treatment requires us to evacuate, and an Admiral Vandefar is aboard the AIS ship."

Shepard groaned. "Wonderful. Is there anything else of note?"

Pressly paused, then shook his head. "Nothing I can't handle, Commander. Concentrate on getting better, we will transit back to the Citadel in a day."

She nodded. "Before you go, I'd better contact Vandefar and get this Cerberus crap off my ship. Have you made any reports about what we found?"

Pressly shook his head. "Not yet." He shrugged. "I didn't mention the existence of Mr. Dunn to the SA query where I spoke with Admiral Vandefar, ma'am. Figured I would let you handle that."

She grunted, wincing as something in her shoulder tightened. "Chakwas is on the warpath, so hauling my butt to the comm-room is out of the question. Bring me my omni-tool and a portable comm screen, please. I'm trapped in bed."

Pressly was gone for about five minutes before returning with Shepard's omnitool, along with a haptic view-screen. He carefully placed her omni in her lap, and propped the screen up against the regenerator package on her leg. He departed with a small nod, and the bay was empty except for Shepard once more.

Shepard tapped her omni, bringing up comms, tabbing through the various signals being routed through the CIC comm-link, finally coming to Vandefar's ID. "This is Normandy, requesting tightband comms with Admiral Vandefar."

The symbol of the Systems Alliance was displayed for a few seconds, then the image of the older woman flashed on the small haptic screen. Instead of admiral's whites, she wore working blues, the background some kind of war room with a map of the Edolus system in the distance. "Commander Shepard. I've been waiting for hours to talk .. oh." Her voice trailed off as she took in Shepard's battered appearance, and the commander gave a small smile.

"As you can see I'm a little banged up, Admiral. Just regained consciousness. I presume the Fleet Master reached out to you?"

Vandefar nodded, her eyes bright. "He did. I want to thank you for being so ... insightful in thinking to secure samples of what Cerberus was researching, and securing the, ah, remains of their victims. That will bring a good amount of closure, with the aliens and all that, and possibly insight into exactly what they were doing."

Shepard's face twisted in disgust. "About every bad thing under the sun from what we saw. Dissections, cybernetics, a pile of Thorian thralls, and worse. A lot of it was damaged, either during the firefight or by Cerberus blowing up their own facilities to slow our advance, so what we have is probably a mix of many things."

Vandefar nodded. "Any idea of what they might have been after, based on what you saw? I'm aware you aren't exactly a scientist, but your Dr. T'Soni might have seen something..."

Shepard shook her head. "Nothing cohesive. Ways to kill aliens, mostly, and methods of incorporating cyberware or bioware into people. They had a faked up asari, a human being with an overlay of asari-like skin and fake blood. They had .. more than a few human subjects as well."

Vandefar shrugged, tapping into a keyboard to one side offscreen. "The alien bodies will be returned to the appropriate species for disposal or burial, I suppose. We'll take possession of the human corpses and try to find out what Cerberus was up to. Is the material in your cargo bay, or still groundside?"

Shepard shook her head. "It's all in our external cargo bays. Those are modular, and you can have Kodiak's hard-latch to them and lift them over to your ship. That way nothing ugly will be out in the open." She grimaced. "I think at least a couple of alien corpses were loaded as well."

Vandefar nodded again. "An excellent solution, Commander, and it will make our transfer all the easier."

We'll make the transfer when we relay out of the system, rather than under all the eyes of the Citadel Fleet." She paused, rubbing her chin. "I have to apologize for being upset with you at our last meeting, as you are clearly thinking on your feet."

Shepard shrugged. "Admiral, I still think what happened at Feros was unacceptable. I get it, on the same kind of level people get how I had to sacrifice a lot of my men in battles to get the job done. That doesn't mean I liked doing it, or thought it was the right thing to do, I just had no other choice. There had to be other ways to find out what the Thorian had to tell us – not as fast, but less morally disgusting. I can't help but wonder if Cerberus would have used the same methods."

Vandefar sighed. "I wish I was able to dispense with such moral quagmires with the same equanimity as you do. Unfortunately, I have to deal with the long-term consequences of the actions we take. Tell me, how many times has two-stage shielding reinforcement saved your life, or the lives of your men?"

Shepard thought about the question, her mind still a bit addled. "I have no idea, probably thousands of times. Anytime high impact rounds get past the initial shield."

Vandefar nodded. "That was one of the first things the Thorian taught us how to understand from the Mars Archive. Without that, we would have not developed that technology until about, perhaps, a year ago, when we were able to leverage it from independent sources in the Salarian Union. How many thousands of soldiers – tens of thousands – would have died in the nine year gap, I wonder?"

Shepard frowned, suppressing a grimace of pain. "The ends justifies the means?"

Vandefar shook her head. "Manifestly not. The difference, Commander, between Cerberus' crazed hacking at aliens and what we did at Feros was one of scope and intent. The only people sentenced to die at that colony were nonredeemable. Every last one of them were career criminals, every last one had been put through Penal Legion examination not once but twice, and every one of them was a Z level convict. They were slated for execution anyway, and nothing was going to stop that. In return for their deaths, humanity as a whole benefited. Hell, we traded away some of what we found to other species. Cerberus experimented solely to promote their skewed ideal of human power, an ideal crazy enough to make them ally with Saren Arterius." She softened, if only a tiny bit. "I understand your distress over what MilSCI has to research and undertake, Commander. But I assure you we are not going to end up like Cerberus."

Shepard nodded, thinking carefully on the admiral's words. She still didn't like it. A part of her rejected the logic and reasons given, even as she understood their validity. Something in the files Udina had given her on human political psychology rang in her head, though, about people in compromising positions often rationalizing their own actions to appease their conscience. Rather than press her on this, Shepard decided to back away and ask something she needed to know.

"I ... understand, Admiral. As the Fleet Master told me, I'm not educated in this level of operation, so I should just keep my mouth shut and my boots on the ground. I should leave the science to Liara."

Vandefar scoffed. "Perhaps. But you had the intelligence to grasp the significance of Dr. T'Soni's report on what she discovered on Eingana. I'm still reviewing her findings ... I'm afraid to say there is significant political opposition to what her thesis suggests."

Shepard scowled. "That doesn't surprise me at all. What do you think about it?"

Vandefar leaned back in her seat, tapping her finger on her cheek. "On the surface the idea is preposterous. Alien races vanishing for eons and then coming back to wipe out all life sounds like the sort of bad science fiction you get in Blasto movies. But the supporting evidence is ironclad. Something utilizing a very similar weapon, with a remarkably similar composition, to the ship we saw at Eden Prime destroyed the Thorian and Inusannon vessels on Eingana. I've tried twice to organize a follow-up expedition to scout the ruins for more corroboration, but I'm being blocked by a number of factors. The High Command isn't buying it because if it were true, there's nothing we can do."

Shepard frowned. "What do you mean?"

Vandefar rubbed her forehead. "We only have preliminary numbers, mind you. But what little we know of the Inusannon technology indicates they were beyond even the Protheans. The turians cataloged something on the order of eight hundred to nine hundred dreadnaught-plus class hulks on the ground. Impact cratering on the planet's moons indicate there were probably more than that. Assuming they had a conventional fleet structure, that means something on the order of eleven thousand heavy and light cruisers and upwards of twenty thousand light ships. Shepard, the entire weight of battle of every naval force in the known galaxy is less than two hundred dreadnaughts and less than a tenth of that overall fleet size."

Vandefar frowned, glancing at her hands. "Even if we assume – foolishly, if you ask me – that the Inusannon and Thorian were able to take their foes out at a 1 to 4 ratio, that means whatever killed the fleet at Eingana numbered in at the LEAST two hundred of those horrible ships we saw at Eden Prime. If that force comes back, our navy would be of as much use as pissing into a supernova."

Shepard felt a chill come over her, the images from the Beacon flooding her sight for a moment. "It...if what I saw in the Prothean beacon was correct, ma'am, there were thousands."

Vandefar sighed tiredly. "As I said. Based on the evidence we have, we're not doing anything because there's nothing to do. The entirety of a Citadel task force didn't even scratch the paint on one of those monsters. If – and there is no proof of this – but if there are more, we are beyond 'in trouble', Commander." She shrugged. "I think the Protheans destroyed them and were themselves destroyed, if for no other reason that no other pre-Prothean culture's ruins show any messages left behind of what happened to them. "

Shepard didn't think that was the case, but said nothing of it. "I'll discuss it all with Liara, ma'am. If that's alright."

Vandefar nodded. "Of course, Commander. Is there anything else?"

Shepard smiled. "Just one thing. I ... have some potential intel, but before I go raring off to blow up bad guys and recover it, I need to make sure I don't step on your toes again. Are there any Systems Alliance operations on Noveria?"

Vandefar arched an eyebrow. "Noveria? The Corporate Court world? What is this in regards to?"

Shepard exhaled. She'd have preferred to have this conversation when she was rested, not half-stunned and in pain, but she'd only get one shot at this and had to make it count. "Admiral, you're aware I have information from various, ah, sources, in the search for Saren?"

Vandefar made a moue of distaste with her narrow lips. "Yes, the Shadow Broker."

Carefully not affirming nor denying that statement, Shepard continued. "I have reason to believe that evidence we need to find Saren may be on Noveria, perhaps within the confines of the corporate enclave for the company he and Benezia owned shares in, Binary Helix."

Vandefar nodded, tapping something to one side, beyond the visual range of the screen. "We don't have any active or sensitive projects on Noveria, Commander – the political situation is too unstable and SA contractors have to agree to work within at least Level 2 space restrictions. None of the corporations in the formal SA Court of Corporations maintains anything but ... labs and 'experimental areas' on Noveria. If you have to blow something up there, that would not affect our operations."

Shepard nodded, and smiled thinly. "That's all I needed, Admiral. I hope whatever I found is useful."

And I'll keep in mind what you said about the nature of your work."

Vandefar gave a bright smile. "We'll see, but I am optimistic. At the very least, we can salvage some bright spots from this foul affair. I will notify you of any findings that touch on your search, Commander. Have a speedy recovery. Vandefar out."

Shepard let her head fall back against the pillow as she killed her own comms, sighing.

---

Chapter 84: Chapter 75 : Udina, Outraged

---

A/N: This chapter isn't in response to reviews, but was actually planned out ahead of time. That being said, I hope it answers any lingering questions about a more realistic view of what happens in the universe and what is done by other alien races.

The rest is more transitional stuff.

---

Donnel Udina had discovered, over long years in politics, that when comm-links started responding slowly, it was due to one of two things. One, new haptic movies had come out and idiots were busily sending snippets and videos to their friends. Two, big news was occurring and reporters were overloading the comm buoy nets with full trideo packets.

Thus, when a simple call to Arcturus took almost a full five minutes to go through, he carefully cleared his calendar of meetings and changed out of a plain beige suit to a more expensive one of Horizon wool with small leather panels for trim. When the comm-link actually crashed out before completing the call, he sighed and commed Captain Anderson to come to the embassy.

He'd managed to clear his desk and even have a bracing drink with the captain before the first calls came blazing in, from every news agency on the Citadel and a pack of independent outfits from various locales. "Your pet lunatic must have blown up something impressive, Captain. I didn't even know batarians had news stations."

The dark skinned man standing at the balcony overlooking the Presidium grounds gave a sour smile. "I'm sorry, Ambassador, but I haven't gotten any updates from High Command since the terse "cease combat operations against Cerberus" went out early this morning. From what I managed to gather from Admiral Dragunov, Shepard was successful in taking out their HQ."

Udina grunted as more lights appeared on his communications panel, and he eyed them with poorly concealed disgust. "And now I have a comm request from Charles Saracino. Lovely." He was about to stand when the indicator for incoming calls from the Council illuminated.

Udina gave a long-suffering sigh, positioning himself in front of the holoivid projector, and keyed it to power. "Good afternoon, Councilors. How may I be of assistance?"

Sparatus, Valern and Tevos all had displeased expressions on their face – at least, Udina thought that was salarian displeasure. He was gratified to note he was correct as the salarian spoke with clear irritation in his thin voice. "We are calling in regards to the report turned in by Commander Shepard, about the details of her mission."

Udina nodded, keeping his face and voice calm. "I'm afraid I haven't been copied on any such report, Councilors, which is probably due to it being Spectre-level intelligence. What exactly in the report concerns you enough to reach out to me?"

Tevos gave a small smile. "The report was curiously ... devoid of anything that pointed fingers at the Systems Alliance, for one. Perhaps we are merely misinformed, but we find it very odd that there were no links in the large amount of material we discovered at the HQ between the Systems Alliance and Cerberus. In fact, we couldn't find any financial records at all. A strange omission."

Tevos lifted a finger. "Secondly, Shepard recovered material items from the Cerberus HQ and turned them over to one Admiral Vandefar – a Systems Alliance Admiral in charge of your military's R&D programs, if I am not mistaken. We were not told what these items were, nor were they allowed to be inspected by Citadel forces. Given the horrors we found within the base itself, we find it somewhat disturbing that certain items were removed without us knowing what they were."

Tevos ticked off a third finger. "Third, Shepard and her teams didn't submit any armor camera footage. We discovered only recently that none of the new armor she has purchased for her soldiers or ground combat team has such a feature, so we have no corroboration of events except what we have been told."

"Finally, Shepard's report indicates she killed what she called the leader of Cerberus, but the figure we found at the base was a former Alliance major, one Victor James. Major James was dishonorably discharged from your SA military almost five years ago, but Cerberus has been around longer than that. Additionally, Major James, while a capable soldier, never demonstrated anything like the tactical abilities or planning shown by Cerberus forces. While we are aware of Shepard's penchant for not taking prisoners, the fact that literally no one is left alive to confirm this was, indeed, Cerberus's leader is also disturbing."

Valern folded his arms. "STG and Spectre intel, along with reports from the Shadow Broker, show that at least one highly placed military figure of note was among Cerberus's leadership, and seized records from at least one of the Cerberus based we identified pulled up the image of a person that looked suspiciously Charles Saracino, interacting with Cerberus personnel." Valern sniffed. "The Shadow Broker also suspects that, given the capabilities the organization demonstrated during our assault, the amount of money that Cord-Hislop Aerospace and the handful of subsidiaries could have channeled would not cover a tenth of Cerberus' expenses...leading one to question, who funded them?"

Sparatus gave Udina a glare. "White-washing any SA connection to Cerberus does not exactly put us in a trustworthy frame of mind, Ambassador. We are happy a threat such as Cerberus is destroyed, but their link with Saren makes it imperative that "

Udina's gentle smile didn't waver in the slightest. "I see. Your contention is that the Systems Alliance government – who, mind you, were the first ones to condemn Cerberus as an outlaw organization – were secretly involved with it and that we had Shepard cover up SA involvement. You have based this ridiculous assertion on 'reports' without any support and ugly truth that your C-SEC agents are just as incompetent at figuring out Cerberus' money trail as they were Saren's."

Sparatus flicked a mandible. "Don't try to dodge the issue, Udina. We want answers."

Udina laughed. A full, long laugh that brought color back to his features and left him swaying slightly. "I'll be happy to give you answers, Councilors. Would you like them before or after we publish the details of the STG team we caught red-handed trying to distribute remote detonation devices at Arcturus Station? Perhaps after we distribute the report from the Sirta Foundation that suggests the flaws in the L2 architecture as delivered to us by the Asari Republic was defective on purpose and had to be custom-fitted to cause the damage L2's are experiencing?"

Udina leaned forward. "Or maybe, turian, we should just ask how we found a Blackwatch operation deep in the Skyllian Verge, working with pirates to attack new human colonies in a region that certain turian mining corporations were interested buying up?"

The room was silent, the flickering images of the Councilors saying nothing, surprise evident on all three faces. Udina's voice was harsh. "Humanity has not bothered to raise these issues with you because we know how the game is played. Your own special forces have their dark side. So does, I admit, the AIS. Our governments have all done things in the name of political expediency that the public would not understand."

Udina leveled a finger at them. "However, you cannot not think we are blind and unaware of what you are doing in the shadows, or that we cannot take a hint of what might happen to us from the treatment of the quarians, krogan, and volus."

Udina's face finally lost its smile, twisting into a sneer. "Cerberus was a vile blot on humanity's name, a pack of racist thugs unwilling to accept reality and they have paid for it. The SA had no connection to it, and if we did then we would not have let your own people dismantle it! The SA did not prevent you from taking possession of what facilities you captured, they did not hinder you in landing at the HQ site to perform your own investigation, and if you honestly think Shepard of all people would cover up criminal activity of that scale, I begin to see why this Council fails to achieve anything."

He slammed one fist into another, face purpling. "This is beyond outrageous. You think to lecture me about my government's failings and accuse us of covering things up when your own damned Spectre is responsible for the deaths of thousands of humans on Eden Prime, Feros, and the slaughter of your own Fourth Fleet? You think we are covering up something when we could have just had Shepard blow the HQ base up and pretend the many, many victims you found there never happened, that the sick research that you have found details on didn't take place?"

Udina shook his head. "The gall of this farce of an interstellar government astounds me. Here we are, trying to shut down the supporting forces of a lunatic, and you want to use the opportunity to score political points! So much for bringing together the races of the galaxy in unity!"

Anderson carefully reached out, touching Udina's forearm, and the older man nodded jerkily. Tevos glanced uncertainly at Sparatus, then at Valern. "We will discuss your statement with our own governments, Ambassador, and revisit this discussion at a later date. However, given the recent statements by figures in your government, our concern is warranted." The images of the Council vanished, and Udina shook his head again, muttering under his breath.

Anderson gazed out the balcony view again, before looking back at Udina. "Is all that you said true?"

Udina looked up. "Hm? Oh, about the black-work their special operations groups are doing? Yes. AIS gave me a briefing on it during the Spectre hearings, in case we needed political leverage." Udina rubbed his chin thoughtfully, eyes dark with speculation. "They aren't usually this ham-handed with their holier than thou act, so I remain confused as to what set them off. The Senate didn't issue any official diplomatic communiques..."

His eyes traveled over to his desk, and with a curious expression, he tapped a comm-link. "Ambassador Udina here."

The image of Khalisah al-Jilani erupted from the view-screen. "Ambassador Udina, I'm happy I caught you. Do you have a formal statement regarding the statement by Charles Saracino, regarding the assault on Cerberus?"

Udina hesitated. "I'm afraid I've been in closed discussions with the Council and haven't seen it yet. However, in regards to the situation with the destruction of a terrorist organization that vivisected living beings – many of them human – I will state my view. Cerberus was a blight on the name of humanity and anyone supporting it should be jailed. I'll view Saracino's statement and get back to you, Khalisah." He killed the line before she could retort and then groaned.

"So that's what has the comms lit up and put a fire up the Council's collective behind. They should muzzle that man."

Anderson made a face. "Saracino. The leader of Terra Firma. This will probably be unpleasant to watch." The captain watched as Udina tuned his projector and picked up SA-SPAN ONE on the vidscreen.

"Reports from various colonies and the like are still coming in, but most of the response to Mr. Saracino's speech has been positive." The screen displayed the pleasant features of an ANN reporter, who read from her vid-screen. "To recap: the reportedly terrorist organization, Cerberus, was destroyed in pitched combat today by Citadel Forces with assistance from Commander Shepard, humanity's first Spectre. No other SA forces were involved, and there is a large amount of political uproar over the fact that the Congress did not authorize this action, and that no criminal charges were filed against any of the members."

She continued. "The organization was outlawed fourteen years ago, one of the first acts of the Coleman administration as a nod to better alien relations. However, until now, penalties for membership in Cerberus have been civil fines and citizenship suspensions. Only those Cerberus members convicted of crimes against the SA or the legal code have been arrested and executed. Legal scholars say the Citadel's unilateral strike against the organization is illegal because the members of Cerberus were still SA citizens at the time, and should have been arrested."

The view switched to the other report, a male with dark hair and even, handsome features. "Anita, how will all this place out in Congress?"

The female reporter put on a concerned face. "John, in the aftermath of the announcement of the destruction of Cerberus, a rally was put together by members of the Terra Firma and Earth First parties. Traditionally not quite aligned, they were joined by Alliance Blue, and initial polling indicates many in the outer colonies and the member colonies are outraged by the actions of the Citadel Council." She paused. "The rally, led by Charles Saracino, included a call for a vote of no confidence, which was submitted just minutes ago by Senator Raul Costasanti. If the parties line up behind their leadership, the Coleman Administration could be out of power in as little as a week, when the November 5th primaries are held."

The male report nodded somberly. "And now, let's view the speech by Mr. Saracino, held outside the Chambers of Unity in downtown Vancouver, just down the street from the House on the Hill."

The image reformed, this time showing Saracino, flanked by at least a dozen Senators and three SA admirals, addressing a staggeringly large crowd from atop a grav platform, studded with colorful blue and white bunting and haptic images of the Earth's continents.

Saracino was dressed in a black neo-silk jacket with runnels of silver piping, over a traditional white shirt and blue-black tie with haptic patterning. His features were twisted and snarling as he spoke, his booming voice making up for his shorter stature.

"Today, my fellow citizens, I come to you not in triumph but in sorrow. Today, the blood of our race has been spilled yet again, not in defense, not in honored sacrifice, but by attacks in the dark. Today, patriots have been struck down, proud and brave humans slain by our would-be alien masters, and the SA's thirty pieces of silver paid in full. Cerberus, the organization of heroes who was our only defense against the underhanded actions of hostile aliens, was destroyed today."

"Destroyed, by a pack of brutal assassins, the mailed fist of the so-called Citadel Council, acting without the knowledge or permission of the Systems Alliance. This group of sneak-thieves assaulted Cerberus in the dead of night, and this morning trumpeted their victory over men and women who just wanted to protect their people, their culture, and their way of life."

"And how did this come to be? How were humans, citizens of the SA, slain? By a secret operation, carefully concealed not only from the bulk of the SA military but from Congress and the President, signed off on by a few officers in dark rooms and aliens on the Citadel. Framing Cerberus for the vicious attacks by a turian, the Citadel struck out at our ever-beating heart of freedom."

"They boldly came to Earth itself, murdering veteran survivor and self-made industrialist Jack Harper, framing him as the leader of Cerberus. They bombarded forces on a dozen colony worlds, and illegally destroyed corporate property and starships in a brutal, cowardly attack."

Saracino smiled. "And the leader of this pack of wolves? The Butcher of Torfan, who 'bravely' defeated the military commanders of Cerberus in their HQ, no doubt getting half her men killed in the process. We are told that this is a great day, that evil has been destroyed."

"But what evil is that? Cerberus protected us! Cerberus stood for human advancement, human supremacy, in a galaxy of tired aliens who couldn't accomplish in a thousand years what we did in a century! And the lies they tell, oh, the lies. Cerberus, formed after the bloodthirsty butchery of the turian assault during the First Contact War, was helping Saren? We are expected to believe this... tripe?"

Saracino's voice thundered. "This was a quid pro quo! The SA military machine got more ships out of the aliens, by way of their Treaty of Fairaxen. The SA commissars and jack-booted thugs that oppress you got their precious Butcher made a Spectre. This government has sold you down the river! Saren is still out there! Eden Prime died unavenged! Feros was ravaged, unavenged! The Corporate Headquarters of a human success story, ExoGeni, destroyed by this ravaging lunatic – and their reaction is to go forth and kill humans?!"

The crowd roared, and Saracino roared back. "Do they protect our colonies! NO. They demand taxes and more conscription, but do they protect us from crime, from pirates, from Saren? NO! They claim one must support the Citadel to support the SA, but do they stop the asari cults and salarian tech gangs? NO! They have the audacity to commit murder on SA CITIZENS – for that is what every member of Cerberus was!"

Saracino leaned back, jaw thrust out. "You may have disagreed with Cerberus' methods. You may have written them off as racists. That doesn't mean they can be slaughtered – without trial, without even a chance to surrender – by aliens who plot to overthrow our way of life and either enslave us or exterminate us!"

He lifted his arms, and the crowd chanted his name. "With me today is Bill Upton, committee chairman of the Senate Armed Forces committee. He knew nothing of this planned action. With me are the party leaders not only of Terra Firma, but also Alliance Blue and Earth First! We have the votes needed to unseat the Coleman Administration!"

"And that, my fellow citizens, is exactly what we plan to do. We are tired, tired of excuses as why pirates ravage our colonies and yet the Citadel does nothing. Tired, of platitudes, of being told we have to conform to a galactic unity that looks down upon us and restricts our expansion, our research, our business. We are tired of asari preachers telling us we should follow their ways, of thieving salarians stealing the brilliant work of our young people and laughing behind their sleeves. Of the bloody-handed turians, who are the first to complain about human expansion and the last to care when it is humans who die at the hands of pirates who are all too often turians!"

"We have had enough. This government, the Coleman Administration, has bent over backwards to appease the aliens, and this is our reward. To have a tithe of our people slaughtered, to be told that black is white and that somehow humanity is to blame for Saren's atrocities! We have had enough! I call on our Congressmen to call for a vote of No Confidence in the corrupted, ineffectual Coleman Administration!"

Saracino balled his fists, raising his arms again. "Come November 5th, we are going to take our government back! Let Cerberus' not have been martyred in vain! Don't listen to transparent lies, or the gibbering platitudes of those beholden to aliens."

"Humanity Now! Humanity Tomorrow! Humanity Forever!" His voice was lost in the crowd's frenetic shouting, many of them firing off guns into the air and waving flags and banners.

With a scowl of disgust, Udina shut off the video feed. "If ignorance ever gets to a hundred credits a barrel, I want drilling rights on that man's head. Of all the idiot political stunts!"

Anderson looked at the myriad flashing comm lights on Udina's desk. "Is this going to affect Shepard and the hunt for Saren?"

Udina sighed, walking over to his desk and flinging himself into the chair. "In the very short term, no. The Secretary of Defense is a cabinet level appointment, but the High Command isn't. They may sack Admiral Branson, but in the short term they can't really affect SA military policy in any real way. What they can do is throw roadblocks into Shepard's path, waste her time with assignments under the Spectre Charter for 'associated work', and make it nearly impossible for the planned assault against the geth to have any real force behind it."

Udina wiped his hand over the comms requests, blanking them all. "The real problem is going to be public opinion, both human and alien. Cerberus was popular in the outer colonies, especially the independent colonies. They were often active in driving off pirates, and without them raids will probably increase. Worse, however, is that aliens are going to see that short little fool mouthing off about how wonderful Cerberus was and assume that the majority of humanity thinks that way. It will set us back in our relationships for years."

Anderson nodded. "But Shepard will be able to finish the job, of going after Saren and stopping him?"

Udina narrowed his eyes and gazed at the captain. "Yes, but there is more to consider to the situation than that. Shepard's idea of cutting off Saren's allies was sound enough, from a military standpoint, but the political fallout is going to be immense. The decision to launch this operation without letting the Congress know may have ensured Cerberus didn't have a heads up, but it will bite us in the ass when it comes time to explaining the fact that Shepard wants a task force to hunt geth."

Anderson gave another short nod. "She's going to come back here for resupply, and probably to report in person to the Council. Are you going to brief her?"

Udina ran his hand through his thinning hair and shrugged. "I do not know yet. I dislike Shepard's methods on an instinctual level, and I still find her too rough around the edges. And yet I will admit there is a certain charm in her way of looking at the galaxy – good or bad, right or wrong. If she could articulate that purity into words, she would be able to nullify a lot of the non-sense Saracino is going to cause."

After a long moment, he shook his head. "I suspect, however, that trying to get her to listen is about as likely as Sparatus taking a human mistress, and thus I'll leave that sort of discussion to you, Captain. Assuming those fools at High Command haven't shouted at her again for doing her job."

Anderson chuckled. "She's a good soldier, Ambassador. If anyone can- " He broke off his sentence as the urgent-comms light lit on Udina's desk.

Udina gave another tired sigh and tapped it. "Ambassador Udina."

The grave voice of Admiral Hackett sounded. "Ambassador, we have a situation on our hands, one that is still developing but could end up going south fairly quickly. Do you have an ETA on when Commander Shepard will be arriving?"

Udina glanced up at Anderson, who shook his head. "Not at this time, Admiral. Is this related to Cerberus?"

The voice of the admiral sounded hesitant. "No, not exactly. Shepard's old commanding officer, Major Kyle, retired from the military after her induction as a Spectre. I forwarded you a report about his activities not too long ago, requesting that Shepard pay him a visit to see what he was up to."

Udina nodded. "Yes, I remember that. He'd started some kind of biotic commune out in the Fringe and claimed that the SA was conspiring with the asari government against biotics or some such nonsense. I told Shepard about it, but in the follow up to her discoveries on Eingana..."

Hackett sounded annoyed. "Well, he's gone further than statements now. Kyle refused admittance to a pair of Commissars, and somehow he and his followers neutralized them and punted them off the planet in an old shuttle. The AIS says he's working with subversive asari cultists who have known links to Benezia. I know Shepard has a lot on her plate, but this could blow up fast, especially given what the AIS recently told us about the L2 issue."

Hackett's voice went darker. "There was talk about sending a member of the Committee on Biotic Rights out to talk to Kyle, but the bastard has locked his compound down and isn't answering hails. I need permission to re-task Shepard for this issue. I don't want to step on any political toes."

Udina glanced at Anderson again, who spoke. "Admiral, this is Captain Anderson. Shepard's XO indicated that Shepard was pretty badly hurt, and that the Normandy had suffered battle damage and was running low on supplies. Her marine team was shot up as well. In other words, neither her or her team are combat ready. Is that going to be a problem?"

Hackett gave a sigh, and his voice was low and even. "I hope not, Captain. We're hoping Shepard can reach out to Kyle and either calm him down enough to bring him out or figure out a way to approach the problem non-violently. If that fails...Captain Delacor is on hot standby with the Fifth Marine Battalion to 'suppress' the commune. I don't want it to come to that, there's no telling how some people might twist the results to their own ends."

Udina nodded. "In that case, Admiral, I have no problems with it. I'll relay the report to the Citadel Council."

"I appreciate it. Hackett out."

O-OSaBC-O

Joker loved the long hours of FTL flight between primary relays, especially during the mid-watch. Most of the ship was asleep, save a couple of techs in the ops alley and an engineer or two, and thus he didn't have to hustle to get out of the way of other people when he needed to hit the galley or use the restroom.

Joker hated to leave the cockpit, especially since that meant he had to turn over his duties to one of the two off-watch pilots. But sometimes it was worth it. Walking with the leg braces Tali had made for him reduced a lot of the pain of walking around to almost nothing, and now he had to be careful about how fast he moved.

Tripping would probably break his arms and face, after all.

Gingerly hobbling his way into the mess deck, Joker was nearly silent. He was surprised to see a very battered looking Shepard up, sitting at one of the mess deck tables, talking to the Cerberus guy they'd picked up from Edolus, sipping on a cup of cocoa.

He made his way quietly to the coffee maker, shuddering at the liquid it disgorged, and took down a package of Pop-Tarts. He was delighted they'd started making the century-old pastry again, even if no one had a toaster anymore, and more delighted that the always stingy SA would stock the things as part of the ship's food roster. Fortified with his pastry of choice, Joker turned his attention to Shepard and Dunn.

Shepard's face was bruised, bandaged on one cheek, and had a drawn, tired look. Her leg was in a partial cast along the thigh, with a medical package embedded into it, and her t-shirt was overlain by bandages around her waist and on her shoulder. Next to her, the figure of Jason Dunn still looked off balance, every part of him but his arms seeming emaciated, a hollow look in his eyes.

Joker left the galley and headed back towards the stairs, and after a few moments he heard voices. Unable to restrain his curiosity, he circled around the wall blocking the stairs from the galley, to come up on the other side, behind them, and listened in.

Shepard's voice was soft. "And that is the last I saw of her. Wrex said she went to the ExoGeni building."

Dunn replied. "That's not good. Cerberus had taken ExoGeni out. I hope Bea is okay, she's a tough broad."

Shepard shook her head, dark hair falling in uncombed tangles across her neck. "Not like she used to be. I don't know if was dealing with the Thorian or just watching her entire unit die, but she was busted mentally. And .. she was pretty bitter about everything." She took a sip of her drink, dark eyes looking up to meet Jason's.

The man leaned back, cracking his neck. "God, she needs to get laid more than you do, She-bitch. I swear, Bea was always an icy bitch, but she went subzero after Torfan. Didn't help that she liked pissing Von Grath off something fierce. You ever hear from the Old Man any more?"

Shepard shrugged. "He sent me a congratulatory note after I made Commander, and another one when they made me a Spectre. He's busy preparing to run for office, he can't afford to be close to a piece of crap like me." Her voice was bitter, and she gave a thin little smile. "Besides, he was never as close as David...or Rachel."

She dipped her head, and Dunn nodded. "I figured she'd go out hard, but .. Christ. You're lucky the blue caught up to you. Taking her on by yourself was a grade-A stupid Shepard moment."

She tilted her head. "Her name is Liara, not 'blue'. I'd appreciate it if you used it, she's saved my life three times so far."

Dunn arched an eyebrow, stared at her for several seconds, then shrugged. "Alright then. I can do that. I'm just saying, you can't do the dumb shit you used to, and expect Neutron to bail you out of it."

Shepard's jaw tensed. "The team I have now is good."

Dunn sighed. "The team you have now is shit, Shepard. The quarian can be fucked by heavy explosions. The turian's a sniper type but has shitty situational awareness. The DACTs are goddamned crazy, and I have no idea where you found that walking recruiting ad of a Master Chief, but he's not all there either, if I don't miss my guess. The ... Liara...is a goddamned civilian who got her shoulder shot off because she didn't even have on full armor." He placed both hands on the table. "I'm not saying it to insult them, but they ain't N7's. You go in with that book of Ezekiel 'and you will know I am the Lord' bullshit, and you're going to get your team killed."

Shepard stared at him for a long second before looking away. "What am I supposed to do? This is what I have to work with. I have to take down entire goddamned terrorist networks just to figure out where the fuck Saren might be. It's not like the SA is giving me much support, Jace." She sipped listlessly at her drink. "It's not like the old days, where we had weeks or months between the hard fights. I haven't even healed up fully from Eden Prime. And with no support, I just have to keep going."

Dunn picked up his cup of water and drained it. "It's not about support. Jesus, Sara, if anyone can take down that Saren bastard it's you. You nearly dropped the Old Lady without your biotics, and she was on Ahern's team in Rael Six. You don't need more support, you just need to refocus your way of fighting."

She nodded. "I had, Jace. I had to. I was losing myself in anger before...all this started. Now, things are a confusing mess, but it's not a bad confusion. Things are different." She paused. "I've had to deal with people in a way I never had to before. I've found that maybe, just maybe, I'm not as empty as I was scared I was. Maybe things aren't going to always end in death and more failure." She looked up. "But in a way, that just increases the pressure. I lost it on Edolus, because what I saw reminded me of what was done to me. And when Liara got shot..."

Dunn snorted. "Saw that. Your men never saw the Butcher, did they? They got to see Commander Shepard, but that was their first time seeing you when you get angry. Probably scared the shit out of them."

Shepard rubbed her forehead. "I can't afford to lose control."

Jason gave her a hard look. "If you flip out so bad you cook your own armor when this Liara girl gets shot and dropped...I don't think the problem is anger management, Sara. This gonna be another Torfan?"

Shepard's eyes narrowed. "No. It isn't. Goddamn it, Jace, does everything go back to -"

He held up a hand. "Sorry. I'm sorry. Honest. I got over it a long time ago, like I said. I'm not saying that you're thinking with your dick. Cuz you ain't got one."

Shepard rolled her eyes. "You're still a goddamned asshole, I see."

He grinned, but then it fell off his face, and he continued. "What I'm saying, She-bitch, is that you aren't thinking clearly where she's involved. It's obvious. Not to your crew, probably. They don't know you the way I do. But I see the way your eyes move, the way you make an extra hard effort to tamp down on your temper around her." He folded his hands together. "I'd like more than anything for you to find some happiness. And maybe if you got your ashes hauled, you'd be able to deal with the pressure you're under a bit better."

He stood, and Joker prepared to leave. As he edged back to the stairs, he heard Jason's final words. "But you need to figure out exactly what the fuck you want out of life, girl. Hunting for Saren won't be any easier if you're caught up in soul searching and doubting yourself."

Joker made a hasty retreat, and had safely ensconced himself in his pilot's chair (and sent the other, sleepy relief pilot back to his pod) by the time Shepard slowly limped her way up to the cockpit. "Ship status, Flight Lieutenant."

Joker pulled on his hat and sighed. "It's the mid-watch. We're 740 light years from Earth, and the coffee still sucks."

Shepard smiled, sitting down next to him at the weapons panel. "Enjoy eavesdropping?"

Joker felt a sense of nausea, and cursed mentally. Before he could say anything, she just laughed. "We're both N7 soldiers, Joker. I could hear your bones creaking and your damned breathing. You could have just sat down."

Joker tapped a control, lips pressed together tightly, before speaking. "I didn't want to interrupt...but...sorry, Commander. I was just nosy."

She nodded, flipping through a display of her own. "I cut you a lot more slack than anyone else, because like I said – you can understand me on some level. But what you heard tonight I expect you to keep to yourself."

Joker nodded quietly. His mind hadn't really even considered what he'd overheard, and as he did so, he suppressed an internal grimace. "Would it be too much to say you have good taste?"

She shot him a dark look, but one laced with the slightest bit of embarrassed confusion, and he pulled his hat down further. "Sorry."

She merely paged through views on the haptic screen in front of her. "I .. don't know how to deal with such situations. Never did. Never .. had such things happen to me. For years I thought I was ugly."

Joker couldn't keep the amazement off his face, but did manage to keep an entirely inappropriate comment from coming out of his mouth. He merely scratched his neck.

She continued in the same soft voice. "No matter. I woke up – and ended up in that conversation – because I got a comm message, Joker. Lay in a course for the Presrop system in Hawking Eta. We have a short visit to make, then we'll head to the Citadel."

Joker nodded, then frowned. "Um, Commander? Is this going to be a combat drop? I noticed you're checking the main guns."

Shepard looked up again, a shadow of a smile on her battered features. "I really hope not, Flight Lieutenant. I'm going to have a talk with my old CO, Major Kyle, the Lion of Mindoir."

---

Chapter 85: Chapter 76 : Normandy, Moments VI

---

A/N: Another transitional chapter. And more Shepard and Liara, basically becoming a little bit more comfortable about the idea of what they are doing.

I'm still working on the outline of Noveria...but while some things are indeed canon, the big shocker is yet to come. :D

---

The trip to Presrop took three days, as the Hawking Eta cluster was at the far end of the Silver Spiral relay link lane. Shepard found herself very glad for the time down, and spent most of it resting and letting Chakwas work on injuries.

The fractures she had from Eden Prime and Therum were finally fading, under repeated applications of the bone regenerator, but Chakwas gave her heavy calcium supplements and warned her of further stresses. Chakwas also hesitantly worked on Liara's wounded shoulder, but suggested the young asari wait until they reached the Citadel to have any serious surgery done on it.

The trip was broken up by various drills, mostly damage control and fire tracking drills, while Tali, Garrus and to a lesser degree Adams tried to fix the heavily damaged MAKO tanks. Tali also spent time working on the battered wreck of the JOTUN mech that once accompanied Admiral Kahoku, endlessly fiddling with its electronics and sensors.

Wrex spent his time working on his blast-damaged armor with omni-gel and a shaper, usually chatting with Jason Dunn amiably. The ex-Cerberus soldier had been allowed to move around as he pleased, although he was kept away from any weapons. Shepard still hadn't decided how to deal with him yet, and wasn't looking forward to it.

On the second day, Shepard called the entire combat team into the cargo bay for debriefing. The marines sat in ranks on the floor, Cole leaning against the MAKO at one end, smoking a cigar, with Vega at the other end, squeezing a set of hand grips in one massive fist. Garrus and Wrex sat near the weapons lockers, Tali perched on the MAKO, and Liara sat near Shepard on the weapons bench, nervously fiddling with an info-pad. Alenko stood behind the marine line, arms folded.

Shepard looked them over, nodding. Most of the marines had one or two medical bandages, and Vega's chest was still patched up from his close call with a turret. But out of them all, it was Shepard herself – and Liara – who were the most seriously wounded.

"Alright people, listen up. This was the first test of our new weapons and armor in combat, and I say the money was pretty damn well spent. The armor bounces a lot of the incidentals and lighter weapons fire, the shields are good, and your ranges with the Crossfire rifles was excellent."

A couple of marines high fived each other, until Cole scowled at them. Shepard continued, privately pleased to see such high spirits after the depression that had happened after Eingana. "That being said, we can't get cocky. Senior Chief Vega nearly died from that one turret. Dr. T'Soni was legally dead for a couple of minutes after that sniper shot her in the shoulder, and even my Spectre armor didn't stand up well to an omni-blade in the gut."

She began to pace in front of them, eyes narrowed. "It's another day to our destination, then three days back to the Citadel. On the way there and back, I expect a full damage inventory of the armor. We need replacements, we'll get it. We need new parts, we'll get them. I want both squads working with Detective Vakarian and Engineer Tali'Zorah to get our goddamned MAKOs up and functional by the time we leave the Citadel."

She paused. "Before the Cerberus takedown, I'd decided to change up my command structure, moving Master Chief Cole to the BDO position and making him an LT, and moving Lieutenant Alenko to a specialist role. We didn't use that lineup on Edolus because we didn't have time to practice it, and later on because operational issues made the team layouts .. unwieldy."

She turned back. "Going forward, however, that lineup will be our game plan. Squad 1 under Vega, Squad 2 under Williams. When we deploy forward, if the sub-teams need squads, you'll report to either me or Alenko – otherwise, you'll be under the command of Cole."

She smiled. "Since I am handing out promotions, I thought I'd do a few more while I have everyone here. We'll start from the top. Master Chief Cole, front and center."

She ended up moving Cole to Lieutenant (brevet), Williams to Senior Chief, and Sergeant Haln to Chief. Several of her corporals also got bumped.

"With the exception of Lieutenant Cole's new rank, these are all permanent promotions, already approved by BuPers. Cole is still a Master Chief, still the Chief of the Boat, and still responsible for putting his foot in your ass in regards to discipline, his rank of Lieutenant is solely to allow him the authority to act as BDO."

Cole nodded. "So keep on the up-hop, apes."

Shepard grinned. "That's all for the marines, dismissed. Council Observers, please stay a moment." She waited until the marines had dispersed, the circle of aliens drawing closer to her, and spoke in a low voice. "Once we get done with this little side trip, and our restock and resupply on the Citadel, we have a lead on Saren. He's on Noveria, and we're going after him directly."

Garrus gave a low growl of satisfaction, and Wrex a chuckle. "Noveria should be fun for us to get into, Shepard. You have some kind of plan, I hope?"

She smirked. "Your favorite kind, Wrex. Shooting, shouting, and backhanding anyone in my way." She paused. "More seriously, though...this is it. I need each of you at the top of your game. When we go in, we're going in hard, and there's no telling if it's just Saren, or if Benezia is with him. If both, Liara, Alenko and Wrex are going to have to try and hold her off until we can take down Saren. If it's just Saren, I think we can beat the murdering fuck in a straight fight."

She looked at each one of them in the eyes – or faceplate, in Tali's case. "If you need anything on the Citadel – heavier weapon, some kind of special supplies, whatever – get it. Charge it to the ship. Once we go after this fucker, we probably won't be able to back out, so be ready."

Tali nodded firmly. "I would like a new shotgun, I think, and maybe an extra shield generator."

Garrus shrugged. "If your Spectres have any new sniping toys, I'm game for an upgrade."

Liara gave a small hesitant movement. "... I have my mother's shotgun, the one she left behind on Feros. I would appreciate some training on how to use it..."

Wrex grinned. "Finally, the asari decides to use a real weapon. I'm good, Shepard, but more jaaki would never hurt."

She snorted. "You're a goddamned krogan, Wrex. Why are you drinking hanar tea?"

Wrex only looked at her. "Don't start with me. An artist needs inspiration." Even Liara laughed at that, and the wounded expression on the krogan's wide face only made it funnier.

O-OSaBC-O

The third night into the trip, Shepard awoke from an ugly nightmare, sitting up in the darkness of her cabin, sheets soaked with sweat and tangled up in her legs. Sliding off the bed, she padded over to the tiny dresser built into the wall, pulling on an ankle length robe, and left her quarters with a towel in hand, headed to the tiny showers built into the port side of the crew deck. The mess was abandoned this late at night, and Shepard showered with mechanical precision, letting the water soak into her body and leaning her head against the smooth, cool metal of the shower stall.

She both wanted and feared calling Liara into her quarters. They really needed to talk, and yet Shepard found herself inexplicably frightened of what that talk would consist of. With a shove, she killed the water, kicking in the air vent that rapidly dried her body. Wrapping the robe back around her nakedness, she returned to her cabin, dressing in a fresh set of BDU's, the familiar motions taking place automatically as her mind focused on what to do next.

There was a chime at the door, and Shepard raised one eyebrow. Feet still bare, she opened it, looking into the face of Liara, dressed in yet another tight University of Serrice uniform. The asari looked tired and drawn, her arm still cast up in the sling Chakwas had her wear, the injured shoulder packed away beneath a padded omni-gel hardened bandage.

"I...woke up. Are you alright, Sara?"

Shepard shrugged. "No. Come in." The door whooshed shut behind Liara, as Shepard walked over to her corner table and poured herself a glass of Anderson's scotch. Shepard watched as Liara gracefully sat down next to her, even the injured arm not detracting from her poise, and shook her head. "You want a smoke?"

Liara nodded, and Shepard picked one out of the pack on the table, handing it over before pulling another for herself. She picked up her battered lighter, igniting the tobacco, and handed that to Liara as well, lingering over the touch of her fingertips for a moment. "I had another nightmare. First one in a few days."

Liara's lips pursed around the cigarette as she lit it, the vent fan in the ceiling sucking away tendrils of blue smoke. "I suppose that is not surprising, Sara. All I do is .. aid you in reinforcing your mind's control over the memories and images the Protheans have shoved into you. I have been studying several journals of human neuropsychology and I find myself somewhat at a loss on how to 'fix' the problem in the long run."

Shepard smirked. "Neuropsychology?"

Liara leaned back, blue eyes never leaving Shepard's. "The study of the brain, and how that is affected by your lifestyle, emotions, and thoughts. My own people do not formalize such things as science, as we have specialists in joining who can repair such afflictions. I am afraid the phrase does not translate cleanly, but it would be close to 'healer-of-gaps-in-thought'."

Shepard inhaled on her cig, blowing out a stream of smoke after a moment, nostrils flaring. "So you've gone from wanting to cut me up in a lab to wanting to hand me over to shrinks. Well, I've seen plenty of psychologists already. I don't think any of them can fix whatever is wrong with me, even before the Beacon decided to shove it's shit into my head."

Liara gave a small, awkward smile. "That means you are limited to having me aid you as best I can. I believe that the process works, although there are .. awkward shades to it."

Shepard dragged the tip of her cigarette around the rim of the ashtray, smoothing the cherry down to a neat point. "Yeah, well. I've been stumbling around that point for a while myself. After I put a foot through Saren's face and deal with your mother, what happens then?"

Liara gave another smile before taking a drag. "You are asking me, Sara? I have not really given it the thought I suppose I should. A part of me is simply willing to follow." She glanced away. "Leading and taking charge is not something I have ever excelled at."

Shepard nodded, glancing out. "All the same...we do need to talk about it. I'm not going to pretend that it isn't real. When I thought you died, I .. I lost it."

Liara nodded sadly. "I felt it, even as I fell. So much rage and anger, like I was drowning in blood." She extended her hand, cool blue enfolding soft brown. "I saw your armor, where your own biotic energy warped the surface."

Shepard grimaced. "I haven't ever had anything go fucking right for me, Liara. As much as I think I know what I want, actually dealing with the feelings is a lot harder. I worry that you'll get hurt out there and I will just lose it completely." She sighed. "I went off half-cocked and Rachel was about two seconds from blowing my head off. How much would that have hurt you?"

Liara squeezed her hand, her face somber. "My mother once sat me on her knee, when I was very young, barely old enough to read. It was after the death of my aunt's bond-mate, a kind turian who was always very nice to me. I was upset that he was gone, and asked her why he had gone. When she explained death to me, I was even more upset, asking her why good things had to leave our lives."

Liara closed her eyes, a trace of pain crossing her features. "She told me that in every happy moment there is the sadness of losing it. That in every good thing we experience in our lives, we must always remember to grasp it while we can, for all things fade and return to nothing in the end."

Shepard waited, as Liara continued to speak in a soft, almost hurt voice. "And she said that no matter what, you could never let the fear of losing what made you happy drive you from pursuing that happiness. It is amusing, that conversation made me never back away from my determination to study the Protheans when she wished me to follow another path."

She finally opened her eyes. "You saved my life on Therum. You saved my life with the viala. We are bound, and I will not let go, no matter how much that hurts. If we let what might go wrong turn us from our path, how will we ever know those moments of happiness she spoke of?"

She exhaled, and forced a smile. "I do not want to always talk of gloom with you, Sara. There must have been some happier times in life for you, surely."

Shepard shrugged, stubbing out her cigarette. "I was happiest in the 2 RRU, with Bea, Jace, Baby Blue, and Rai. My NCT. Team Neutron. I was happy when I got up-shifted out of the Penal Legions, with Rachel and David and General Von Grath congratulating me. I was happy when I got out of OCS and got made a Captain of Marines, and even prouder when I qualified for A and made Lieutenant Commander."

She sighed. "After Torfan? There wasn't anything approaching 'happy'."

Liara finished her own cigarette, gently crushing the fire at its tip into cold ashes. "I was happy when the University of Serrice accepted me as a junior researcher, and on my first dig. I was so excited going into my first dig I could not sleep for days before or after. The first time I discovered a piece of Prothean statuary – a carving of a plant – I was delirious."

She smiled. "That last talk on the beach I had with my mother, smoking and just .. being ourselves."

Shepard listened, as Liara told stories of Benezia – the awe she invoked as a High Priestess of Athame, dressed in silver and black. The pride in seeing thousands upon thousands of asari, salarians, turians, even humans flock to her Triune gatherings, to listen to her wisdom as she tried to bring siari to others. The wonder of the trips she'd had in her youth, the places she'd seen in her years of studying the Protheans, the sheer joy of discovering something new and unknown.

They discussed Shepard's time in the Penal Legions, the memories of pranks pulled and punishment details. Shepard spoke of her fascination with the huge collection of starship models General Von Grath had in his cabin aboard the 2 RRU's command cruiser, and how she'd built a few of her own. Liara found it a curious hobby, and was amused when Shepard went into great detail about the models and how building them gave her a better understanding of ship structures.

Shepard spoke of how alienated she felt in her own society, and how every attempt to fit in either felt like she was faking it, or like she was playing a game with rules no one understood. "People expected me to fit in these neat categories, and when I didn't they would get upset with me. I killed a lot of turians and batarians, so I must hate aliens. I'm an orphan, so I must want a family. I'm cold on the battlefield, so I must be an emotionless, pitiless murderer. It got to the point where it was just easier to...meet their expectations. Maybe that's what I was supposed to really be like?"

Liara, in turn, vented about the endless social maneuvering in asari social circles, the endless casual linking that made Liara all the more excluded because she was never invited, the sense of separation she felt from 'normal' asari. "When Sergeant Telanya came on board, the only thing going through my mind was I had no idea if I was expected to formally greet her or ignore her. I interacted with the clanless so rarely in my life I don't even remember if it's an insult to offer her chathesi tea or an honor. All I could hear was my mother's voice, droning on about how mingling with the lower classes was for lesser houses." She sighed. "She probably sees me as yet another haughty member of the Thirty, not a..." She trailed off.

Shepard smirked. "Hot, kinda nerdy biotic badass?" Liara flushed, but laughed all the same.

Shepard had asked about the dress Liara had worn on the Citadel, and why she never wore anything like that on the ship. Liara had explained she wore the University of Serrice outfits as a mark of pride, as her only reminder that she had at least once achieved something that she had doubted was possible. She also explained that wearing formal dresses on board the ship would be very distracting. "Especially for human males."

Shepard snorted. "Yeah, I don't need Joker crashing the Normandy into a planet because he's staring at your behind." She poured more scotch. "Still, we have plenty of BDU's, if you want to wear a set. That uniform looks...well, great on you...but is it comfortable?"

Liara smiled. "I suspect those uniforms you wear are only comfortable to you due to long experience in wearing it. When I first got on board, Lieutenant Alenko offered me one. It is ... the sizes you have are rather tight across the chest." She colored slightly, and Shepard shook her head.

Two hours later, Shepard emptied the bottle of scotch, and lit another cigarette, and realized she was content. Somehow, in just talking and listening, she felt closer to Liara, instead of increasingly uncomfortable and awkward like she felt around most other people. She stood, finding her balance uncertain, and Liara was there, one arm sliding around her waist.

Shepard ended up moving to the small couch, and Liara sat next to her, the two of them staring out the small window in the cabin, out at the endless night of deep space, speckled here and there with gleaming smears of blue, white and silver. Shepard leaned her head back, letting her muscles loosen, and gave a slow exhalation of breath.

"I just wish I was .. normal, sometimes. Maybe with a regular job. Police. Or a driver."

Liara's lips quirked. "If Garrus's stories of your driving in the MAKO are true, driving may not be the best choice."

Shepard laughed. "Chickens are just chicken, that's all." She smiled, and felt herself lean into Liara, cool skin against her own. "To be nothing special. To have no expectations set on you. No past bearing down against your soul." She shook her head. "No weight of blood, or crowds shouting your name in hate."

Liara nodded, tracing a finger up Shepard's forearm. "No legacy to live up to, or disapproving family to call you a failure, and blame you for the path of your mother." She brought the finger up, lifting Shepard's chin, and kissed, sweetly, gently.

Shepard could only breathe again when she finally broke the kiss. "But we are who we are, Sara. We cannot change that any more than we can change the stars themselves."

Tali's words came back to Shepard, and she smiled. "We don't have to be normal. We just need to find a way to do the things normal people do, without messing ourselves up any worse. That's not changing us, it's just changing how we do things."

Liara nodded somberly. "That is wisdom. But how do we do that?"

Shepard exhaled. "Liara, I can't hide forever what I feel for you from .. everyone. I don't want to, to be honest. I didn't give a shit of what people thought of me before I met you, and I certainly won't start now. I don't want you to get hurt, by me or in all of this mess, but like you said, if I stand still out of fear we'll end up nowhere."

She linked her hands with Liara's, looking for words. "I don't know what to do."

Liara nodded, kissing her again. "Neither do I. But I am tired." With that, she curled up against Shepard, nestling her head against Shepard's shoulder. "And I am frightened, of losing you, or of dying myself."

Shepard closed her eyes, her free hand reaching out to snag her old Penal Legion blanket and drawing it over them both. "We'll figure it out."

The feeling of Liara against her was more comforting than arousing, and Shepard found herself unable to keep her own eyes open. She stretched a bit, sliding her body against Liara's, and let her head fall back, a tiny little smile on her lips.

O-OSaBC-O

The jump alarm woke Shepard from her slumbers, and she found herself on the couch, Liara pressed up against her. The feeling of holding the asari and the lethargy in her limbs felt so nice that it was hard to lever herself up and slam her fist against the haptic panel.

A moment later, as Liara stirred, Pressly's voice came over the comm. "Ma'am, we just dropped into the Century system. There's a System's Alliance assault cruiser here, requesting comms with you."

Shepard winced as a muscle pulled in her back. The weight of Liara had caused her leg to start throbbing, and she resolved in the future to not sleep on the damned couch when she had a bed right there ... but sleeping in the bed lead to images she didn't have the willpower to deal with now. She tapped the panel on her wall again, fingers smearing the graphic as they touched. "Yeah, sure, whatever. Tell the bastards I'll be on the horn in ten."

The amusement in Pressly's voice was muted but detectible. "Yes, ma'am." Shepard scowled at the display, then at Liara when the asari giggled. "What?"

Liara rose in a single, graceful motion that looked somehow sensual, and glanced over her shoulder with a smile. "Your glare of menace at the poor haptic panel will not change the fact that you have to get up."

Shepard huffed, sitting up and running a hand through her hair. "Yeah, yeah, laugh it up." Without pausing, she peeled off her BDU top, tossing it in the tiny laundry bag hanging from the side of her bed and rummaging in her drawers for a uniform.

Liara couldn't help but wince, seeing the long scars of electro-whips on Shepard's bare back, only broken by the thin black band of a sports bra. She swallowed as she watched the interplay of sleek muscle in Shepard's back, but didn't look away. "S-should I leave?"

Shepard shrugged, stepping out of the BDU bottoms, leaving her only in plain black panties and the bra. "It's not like I'm naked, Liara, and we're like, together. Sort of." Shepard pulled out a set of tightly folded and pressed white pants with red striping down the side seams, and shook them out. "I hate dress whites." She pulled them on, grimacing, and Liara felt her face go hot as she wiggled and turned to get them on.

Shepard then pulled on a t-shirt, gleaming white, followed by the uniform top. Pulling open what looked like a metal wall section revealed a very thin, shallow closet, holding a single dress white coat. Shepard slid this on, buttoning the front up, each gilded button tiny and precise. Panels of pure white leather formed the sides, and five ranks of colorful ribbons took up most of the left side of the chest.

With a very ugly expression, Shepard lifted out something from a bag inside the jacket, and draped a red ribbon over her neck. The bottom of the ribbon supported a golden stylized star, embossed with a silver image of Earth. Liara smile faintly. "That is the Star of Terra?"

Shepard sighed and nodded. "The highest award the Systems Alliance can give. All but nine of them were awarded to people after they died. The ones who got it while alive were all heroes. Jon Grissom, twice. Tough bastards who fought crazy odds and lived to tell the tale, like Tradius Ahern and Yonis Chu. People who risked their very lives, like Corpsman Sireal Kambei." She considered it for a long moment. "Then they cheapen it by giving one to me, for fucking Torfan. I feel like a hypocrite every time I put it on." She let it fall against her chest, adjusting the ribbon, and sighed.

She knelt, pulling out a drawer from under the bed, and pulled out a thin leather belt and a scabbarded dress sword, wrapping the former around her waist and hanging the latter from loops in the belt.

Liara tilted her head. "Why are you wearing this ... dress uniform?"

Shepard walked over to the tiny sink and mirror, splashing water on her face, and picking up a comb, running it through her hair with short, forceful strokes. "Military protocol. Admiral Hackett sent me here to talk to my old commanding officer, who seems to have gone right off his little nut. They want me to ... calm him down, if I can. I suspect that assault cruiser out there is full of Marines to take him out if I can't. No one wants that to happen, least off all the poor goddamned marines."

Liara said nothing as Shepard continued. "Anyway, the man I'm going to meet is one of humanity's greatest heroes...and I'm partially responsible for him being this way. Going down as a Spectre, or even in armor, would send the wrong message. Going in dress whites, unarmed, with my own stupid Star of Terra around my neck, might let me get through to him. And when you meet a Star of Terra bearer, you're supposed to wear your own."

Liara nodded. "Do you want me to come with you?"

Shepard's face twisted, and she shook her head. "As much as it might help me be a little calmer, no I don't. I'm hoping if it's just me, and I'm there to talk, he'll listen. The SA has already tried the heavy handed route, and he basically bitch-slapped a couple of Commissars out of his face. Given that they were biotic and he wasn't, well... a fight is the last thing I want."

She fiddled with her hair one more moment, before turning on her heel. As usual, to Liara's biased eye, she looked perfect, the obviously pre-creased uniform spotless, the look in her eyes hard. "I suspect, Sara, no one wants to fight you either."

Shepard's smile was sour. "Compared to Kyle, Liara? I'm a punk ass kid."

---

Chapter 86: Chapter 77 : Kyle

---

A/N: The figure of Major Kyle always interested me. So did the mission to Presrop. How exactly did a non-biotic gather up a following of biotic extremists? What drove him to that? Why would he give up so easily? And for that matter, why did the SA care so much they sent a Spectre to negotiate with him?

Rather than follow canon that gives us more questions than answers, I've decided to change things up a bit. I'm not big on writing out the side missions, but a few stand out and need to be talked about.

Kyle's discoveries don't play much into ME1, but they will show up in a big way in my ME2 fic.

---

An excerpt from "On Valor and Victory: The Heroes of Humanity Examined"

Heroes come in many forms in the proud history of Earth's military. Many of them have pedigrees going back before the Days of Iron, even into antiquity. The Williams family could name six Medal of Honor winners, the Branson family four, in America's armed forces, while the Chu family had a dozen ace pilots.

We could mention singular heroes, like the iron-willed Jon Grissom, or inspirational ones, like the smiling image of James Branson. But throughout the history of the Systems Alliance, and indeed throughout most of human history, only one man has ever been awarded a nation's highest military honor three times – Major of Marines, UkoE, KoG, DMKoA Sir Preston Kyle.

Kyle was born on Earth to simple farming parents in a collective agri-arcology in 2120. A natural polymath, Kyle mastered the piano and higher calculus at 9, graduated high school at 14 and college at 17. Picked up immediately by the still newly formed Systems Alliance Army for officer training, he was commissioned as a lieutenant in 2140.

He served with honor and distinction, but his first call to battle was during the horror of the Turian assaults during the First Contact War. Kyle, then a mere captain of infantry, rallied a combined team of broken pieces of various B infantry, militias, and police units, leading them into nineteen hours of grueling combat against turian invaders on Thanas. It was his action and leadership that broke the lines of the Siege of Spaceport Six, allowing over half a million refugees to flee certain death at the hands of turian hunting squads.

His hand blown off, his body riddled with wounds, Kyle single-handedly defeated four turian TALON jump-assault soldiers in the fight at Spaceport Six, before succumbing to his wounds. Rousing himself from a pool of his own blood, multiple eyewitnesses describe him as rising as if from the dead to regroup the resistance forces on Thanas and hold out long enough for relief.

The first Star of Terra he won, for that battle, was joined by two more, against even more impossible odds. He was on the assault team of then Commodore Tradius Ahern, along with a trio of heroes – Rachel Florez, Yonis Chu, and Michael Saracino – who broke through turian lines, fighting off an entire mercenary company by themselves to retrieve critical technical information that led to the Battle of Arcturus and stopping the turian fleet cold, before the arrival of the asari. All four fighters – half dead by the time they were recovered – were awarded the Star of Terra.

But, perhaps, his most memorable fight, the Defense of Mindoir, is the most remarked upon. The unfortunate tale of Mindoir is already known, and the arrival of the 19th RIU was not enough, sadly, to prevent the horror that was visited on that world. But Kyle, with a double-strength team of less than thirty men, routed four different slaver bands, each one approaching regimental strength. Kyle's bravery in that battle, recorded by dozens of witnesses, outshines that of any mortal man or woman in history, running full out through kinetic strikes, plasma barrages, and shrugging off terrible hits from a sniper to reach the GARDIAN tower controls the batarians had sabotaged. If not for his actions, most of Mindoir would have been taken as slaves and reduced to ruins, rather than a third of the colony.

The Lion of Mindoir took command of the famous Second RRU, and for years was the commanding officer of yet another hero, this one darker – Lieutenant Commander Shepard, the Butcher of Torfan. It was in that brutal, vicious fight that both of Kyle's sons – themselves Marines – were slain, and after Torfan Kyle moved into non-combat service.

Kyle's combat tactics, strategies, and use of info-war techniques is standard training for every new Systems Alliance recruit, officer, and commissar. His writings on the nature of morale, fear, and bravery make up most of the course in the OCS classes on leadership. His rank of Major of Marines, usually an honorary rank, carries the brevetted equivalent of an Admiral of the Red. He is a Royal Knight of the United Knights of Earth, a Cavalier of the Knights of Grace, and was awarded the Distinguished Merit Knighthood of the Systems Alliance.

Preston Kyle is a testament to what a simple human can achieve with faith in his government, his men, and his future, and is perhaps the greatest warrior humanity has ever produced.

---

Shepard's comm with the awaiting troop ship SCV Rampage was as unpleasant as she suspected. The thing was commanded by Commodore Tylor, a crusty bastard who was old before the First Contact War, and who now was more replacement cybernetics than man. The marine company on board was, to Shepard's additional displeasure, commanded by none other than Captain Delacor.

Shepard had openly doubted the ability of a mere regiment of mixed A and B marines to take down nearly two hundred biotics, especially when commanded by Major Kyle, but her concerns were dismissed. Rather than trade words with (or stay in the general, unlucky vicinity of) Delacor, she instead hastened to establish comms with the biotic commune on the surface.

They didn't bother answering hails, so she dropped in a MAKO, coming down a good mile beyond the rough stone walls that defined the outer boundary of the commune. Presrop was a jagged, ugly mining world, but big money had clearly gone into the commune. It had an atmosphere shield, keeping a breathable atmosphere around the place, and a pair of handsome civilian corvettes with aftermarket weapons were parked on a long, hardened runway. Four old GRIZLI APC's sat next to a pair of brand new HAMRHEAD tanks, and the buildings of the compound were equally impressive – prefab construction, fortified with plascrete walls, steel supporting bunkers, and mass effect fields.

She pulled her MAKO to a stop outside the front gates, waiting. A loudspeaker at the side suddenly blared. "You are approaching private property on an unregulated world that does not adhere to the Unified Systems Alliance Charter. Trespassers will be disciplined."

She triggered the MAKO's comm system, hoping someone was bothering to listen. "This is Commander Sara Shepard, Council Spectre. I've been sent to speak with Major Kyle."

After a pause of several seconds, the voice on the loudspeaker barked again. "...proceed, but do not engage any weapons systems or activate any LADAR or tracking equipment. If you make any hostile moves you will be attacked."

She answered back. "I'm not in armor and unarmed except for a dress sword. This MAKO is not combat capable at the moment in any case. I just want to talk."

The gates opened, and a haptic guide-line illuminated the central part of the road. Shepard dutifully followed it, the road snaking around the main cluster of buildings. Beyond them, near the edge of an old mining pit, a reinforced combat bunker had been sunk into solid granite. Shepard slewed the MAKO to a stop in front of the building, and pulled down a hostile environment face-mask and air canister before stepping out of the MAKO.

As she exited the vehicle, four figures emerged from the bunker. All human males, they wore heavy suits of battle armor, and were festooned with weapons – most carried two or three heavy pistols, a shotgun, and some sort of battle rifle.

Shepard approached, hands empty. "Major Kyle?" She asked uncertainly, and the lead figure shook his head.

"Father Kyle is in communion with the Mother, and does not wish to be disturbed." The man's voice was unsteady, and the very ugly shotgun in his hands was pointed vaguely in her direction.

She merely looked at him. "I think he does. There's a marine dropship up there with an entire regiment of soldiers looking for a reason to come after you people. I'm just here to talk, to try to find a way to stop this whole thing from blowing up."

The man's helmet was opaque, but she could hear the skepticism in his voice. "They send the Butcher to negotiate? You expect me to believe that?"

She rolled her eyes. "I'm in clothing, with a goddamned dress sword, and I'm all shot up from the fights I've been in. I couldn't take Major Kyle on the best day in my life with a fucking pack of krogan, much less take out an entire army of biotics. If I wanted to take this place out, I'd blow your atmo-shield up, then hole your compound with missiles, not come down here by myself."

The tallest of the figures tapped the side of his helmet, obviously a private comm line. After several seconds, he slowly lowered his weapon. "...Father Kyle says he knew you would come, and to welcome you." The man's voice shifted from suspicion to awe. "He says the Mother has seen you. Come."

Without another word, the four men turned, one sliding an old-fashioned laser keycard into a reader, the doors into the base sliding open. Shepard followed them into the bunker, walking down concrete steps to a heavy airlock door, and proceeding in.

There was little cycling involved, the airlock opening a few seconds later, and Shepard stepped into what looked like a converted command bunker entrance. Heavy concrete barricades littered the long room, each topped with a portable shield generator and a heavy turret. Shaven-headed men and women manned them, most wearing partial armor, talking quietly among themselves.

There was an ugly, sullen look in their eyes, a sluggish twitching to their movements. Ever last one of them was armed to the teeth and beyond.

She shuddered as she realized there were demolitions charges wired into the walls, all glowing with the red light indicating they were primed and live. Here and there were boxes of weapons, piles of armor stacked in one corner, a pallet of medigel being unpacked and sealed into slap-paks by two more surly looking men.

Following the escort through the bunker, she passed room after room of biotics, all practicing various combat forms, martial arts, or working on weapons and armor. Many of them looked like they'd been in a fight – one room was set up as an infirmary, full of wounded, bloodied figures – and all of them looked dangerous as hell.

Her escort took her down a side passage, through a pair of security doors, and down two more flights of steps. The door they reached slid open, revealing a wood-paneled floor. The room beyond was spacious – more than thirty feet long and almost again as wide – and the far end terminated in a vast, floor to ceiling window, cut deep into the sides of the mining pit and giving a somewhat slanted view of the old mining operation's wounds to the planet. The walls were heavy concrete, with haptic maps, bookcases, and shelves cut into them. A collection of heavy machine guns was mounted on one wall, from a simple Harvester to a monstrous, double-barreled custom Saber converted for autofire.

A single black-framed shadow box contained three blood-red ribbons and three gold stars, flanked by a constellation of other awards, medals and commendations. Below this, there was an oil painting of two young boys, sandy blond hair and wide happy eyes staring out, set in a field of grass. Shepard recognized the picture as a youth portrait of Kyle's twin sons, and turned away in misery.

A single asari woman, black clad from head to toe and with a heavy black veil covering her features, stood in the middle of the room, murmuring softly. Next to her, slowly coming to his feet from the plush rug he had been kneeling on, was the form of Major Kyle, his once regulation hair now almost down to his shoulders, his broad shoulders straight. He wore a simple white robe, his features tired looking. He towered over her, the thick slabs of some kind of armor visible as edged shapes under the thin robe, his jaw firm.

She stopped, coming to attention, and saluted. "Sir."

Kyle's lips twisted into a small, amused smile. "At ease, Shepard. I knew you would come." He gestured to a set of low benches to one side of the large room, and Shepard sat, as Kyle stood in front of her.

There was something off about him, she decided. The somber, bitter despair that had once enfolded the man was gone, replaced by the same steely, frightening determination that she remembered from the days before Torfan turned everything dark. She didn't see a madman, or one who was mentally unstable. She saw someone preparing to go into battle, and that made her nervous.

"Sir, it's good to see you. When I heard you were the one who recommended me to be a Spectre, I was pretty sure you had lost your damned mind."

Kyle's smile turned into a grin at that, and he folded his arms, a fond look coming into his eyes. "I was in a dark place for many months after Torfan, Shepard, but I was never crazy. The alternatives being proposed were not what humanity needed in its first Spectre, and I wasn't about to allow Branson to take the job." His smile faded. "Do you know why you are here?"

She sighed. "Admiral Hackett sent me. The SA is concerned about your actions, sir. They're pretty upset about their commissars, and about whatever you've said in the past few months." She glanced around the room, and at the asari, before fixing her gaze back on Kyle. "What is going on? How did you know I would be here? And why are your people preparing for war?"

Kyle smiled, a gentle expression. "There are things I have seen coming, Shepard, that the men who run the SA wish to keep in the dark. The SA wishes to silence me, because I will no longer countenance their evil, nor fight to protect it in the hopes of changing it one day. And I knew you would be here because the SA isn't very original."

She licked her lips, picking her words with the best care she could. "Sir, they are very upset. They have an assault cruiser in orbit, with the Fifth Strike Regiment ready for a combat drop against you if I can't talk you into surrendering and coming with me."

Kyle's expression turned amused. "Ah...their plans are the same ham-fisted garbage as usual, I see." He sat next to her, his voice still gentle. "Shepard, have you opened your eyes to the reality of the Systems Alliance yet?"

She thought about what she found on Feros, about Cerberus, about the ugly suspicions she had about why the heavy units on Eden Prime had never showed up, about Torfan. She slowly nodded, her eyes narrow. "Yes, sir, I have. I'm not .. I don't know what to do."

Kyle gently patted her shoulder. "Of course you do. The SA never reined you in because they wanted a terrifying, bloodthirsty killer. I never reined you in because I knew you didn't fight solely out of hate. You wanted justice, not just revenge. Every slaver you killed, ever pirate you blew out of space or apart on the ground...you wanted to make sure no one else ended up like you." His voice turned grave. "And now, you are finding out, like I found out, that there is a darkness at the core of our government we cannot ignore."

He looked at the asari, now surrounded with a faint biotic glow. "I found out almost a year ago that many of the powerful men in our government answered to no law but their own. I have found out horrible things, Shepard. Plans which would turn your stomach. Cerberus, for all it's ugly nature, was only a smokescreen, to distract the eye."

Shepard frowned. He didn't look crazy but his words didn't sound all that sane. "Sir, even if that's true, there isn't anything to be done by getting yourself and these biotics killed. There has to be some other way to get your ... message out, whatever that is."

Kyle shook his head. "I'm not going to preach at you, Shepard. These men and women came to me out of a lack of any other options. L2's written off by the government as non-viable, many of them with DNDD or other biotic illnesses. At first, I was only searching for a way to bring them peace. But as more came, and I heard stories of what they were doing, what the SA was doing to them, I could not be silent."

Kyle stood, outlining his form in the light from the window at the end of the room. "I've heard rumors about projects happening in TQ-494-C, the Black Zone, that make Cerberus look like a sleepover. I've seen with my own eyes documents detailing plans to 'deal' with insurrectionist colonies and wayward corporations."

Shepard shook her head. "Sir, please. I'm not doubting you. I'm not saying that what you've seen isn't a problem. But what good does it do to say it, if they will simply kill you and the biotics you've been helping?"

Kyle's half turned, that grin still on his face. "Much like you, Shepard, I require a lot of killing. That isn't what matters right now. Nor, really, is the survival of the commune. I've done what I can to help these men and women, but ultimately, what's needed is a firm statement that they aren't going to take this kind of treatment anymore. That's what I am here for."

He smiled. "They're going to have to kill me to stop me, and the attention that will bring is going to make covering up their dirty little secrets that much harder. These men and women with me are dead anyway, all of them. There is nothing they can do to survive the neural breakdown they are facing. But they can chose to die on their feet, to die for a reason instead of at the SA's whim."

Shepard sighed. "Hackett felt I could talk you out of this, sir. He – and I – don't want this to end up in a bloodbath."

Kyle snorted. "Shepard, the fact that they sent you to me tells me otherwise."

He turned to face her fully. "Hackett is a good man, but one immersed in the workings of his fleet and Citadel relations, not what is happening in the SA as a whole. Someone gave him orders, and he passed them on, not realizing their significance. The SA sent you here because they still think of you as a crazed, violent thug, one who's only answer to any problem is immediate, overwhelming violence. They expected you to come here, and if you couldn't talk me down, to kill me."

She opened her mouth to deny it and he held up a hand. "I know you wouldn't. These people don't. I guarantee you that Captain Delacor has orders to 'prevent any unnecessary violence'. I know he also dislikes you, intently. They intended for there to be a fight, one giving Delacor a legitimate reason to attack my followers, and one that would end up with both you and I dead."

Shepard felt her blood run cold as she turned his words over in her head. On the one hand, it was exactly the kind of delusional, paranoid thinking she would expect if Kyle was going crazy. On the other hand, she wasn't blind to the fact that his words made sense. She knew that, on some level, the SA and Cerberus were linked. She hadn't reported that to the Council – because she needed to finish off Saren first – but she didn't think anyone would believe she'd just let it go.

She bit her lip, standing as well, and frowned. "What do you want me to do, then, sir?"

Kyle placed his hand on her shoulder. "Return to your ship. Tell Delacor that you've worked out a solution with me, and that I've asked for one hour to explain things to my followers, so that there isn't a riot. I'll get on the comm and confirm this. Once you are clear of this mess, take your ship and leave. I'm not your CO anymore, but that is an order. If anyone asks you what we discussed, tell them I was crazy, ranting about conspiracies, and the only reason I agreed to surrender was that you threatened to attack my compound in such a way that we couldn't fight back."

She nodded. "What about you?"

He shook his head. "There is nothing you can do for me. I have been .. discussing ... various issues with the asari behind me. Her name, as far as I can tell, is Walks-In-Shadows. I'd ask you to take her with you when you go, and get her back to the Citadel." He pulled out an OSD chip. "And to take this. Don't read it unless you're willing to see what I've seen."

She hesitated, then took it. "What drove you to this?"

Kyle's eyes darkened, becoming distant. He was silent for several moments before shaking his head. "It's not important now. It's on the OSD, if you choose to view that. Right now, the important thing is that you understand me – I am not crazy. I am choosing my fate, the only choice I feel I can make with a clean conscience."

Shepard sighed. "There's no other way?"

Kyle smiled, and shook his head. "I am sorry. but no. Even if I stood down, they would simply lock me away. Maybe if I had been more circumspect in the days after I came across this information, I could avoid what is coming. But they know. The only path left to me is this one." Kyle's smile faded a bit, and then he turned as the asari stopped glowing. "It is done?"

She nodded. "As much as I am able, human. The field will not last for long once I have departed, perhaps a day. But it should stabilize the biotic abilities of your warriors for at least that long." The veiled gaze traveled to Shepard, and the asari gave a shallow bow. "This is my way off your world?"

Kyle nodded, and he bowed deeply to the asari. "Yes, priestess. I thank you for your assistance."

The asari's voice grew thick with bitter amusement. "There is no need to thank me, human. The fate of these poor souls is upon the asari's hands as much as it humanity's. I begin to wonder if Matriarch Trellani was insane as the Thirty claimed, or closer to the truth than we care to know. In the end, all returns to siari – even you and your people."

Kyle shrugged. "I have lived long enough. Survived things no human should, seen horrors that I can't get out of my mind, and buried my own wife, my own brothers, my own children. There is nothing left in me but one last fight."

He turned back to Shepard. "It's time." He placed his arm on her shoulder again. "Before you go, I want you to know I understand why things happened the way they did on Torfan. I do not blame you for what happened...and I forgive you, if that is what you need to hear. The person who killed my sons wasn't you, and you couldn't have stopped it."

She swallowed, thickly, remembering the shattered look on his face as he'd beheld the mangled forms of his sons on the soil of Torfan, and she hung her head. "That doesn't mean I forgive myself, sir."

Kyle's voice was gentle. "Shepard, we all have to forgive ourselves. Life is more than looking over your shoulder at what has been. I'm not Anderson, willing to tell you everything will be alright. At the same time, I'm not going to give up just because things in my past were bad."

She grunted in frustration. "Isn't that what you're doing? Couldn't you sneak out of the system on one of those pinnacles, tell your story to the press, apply for asylum with the asari or-"

He cut her off with a smile. "I'm not giving up. I'm choosing the medium by which I plan to send my message, and how I plan to die. Among other things, there are cameras and sound pickups in this compound, that I will turn on once you leave. I'll record the entire debacle that is about to play out, and it will burst transmit before anyone can stop it. The SA can only kill me, Shepard. They can't make me fear them, they can't make me bow to their wishes, and they cannot – will not – dictate to me."

He stepped back, bringing his hand up to his robe, letting it fall. He wore his old RRU Calamity Reaction armor, fresh painted and with the three broad, blood-red stripes of his awards slashing bright across the chest-plate. "It's time to go, Shepard. Transmit to Delacor, now."

She gave a shaky exhalation, emotions she couldn't name racing through her. She wanted to break down crying, to scream at him to do something else, anything else, but the hard look that had come into his eyes brooked no argument, and she lifted her arm, tapping on her omnitool bracelet as it came up. "This is Commander Shepard. I've ... worked an agreement out with Major Kyle. He needs an hour to calm his people down and get them to understand what he is doing, and then is willing to surrender himself into your custody."

The crackle of atmospheric interference filled the line for a moment before Delacor spoke. "I see. Is he there?"

Kyle spoke, his voice even and cool. "Yes, I am. Who am I speaking with?"

"Captain Delacor. You have one hour to organize your departure and come out, unarmed and unaccompanied, to be picked up by my ground teams."

Kyle's voice hardened. "And what of my people? They have broken no laws. Everything here is licensed properly according to Systems Alliance laws."

Delacor's voice sounded frustrated. "... I have no orders regarding the compound or it's inhabitants, unless they offer resistance of any kind. However, until you are in custody, we will fire on any departing vehicles or aircraft. Do not attempt to leave."

Kyle's voice sounded weary. "Very well, Captain. At 1400 I will exit the compound by myself and you can come get me."

Shepard spoke. "I'm departing the compound now. Do you have visual on the compound at this time?"

"We do."

Shepard sighed. "I have one asari here who was visiting the compound and wants no part of anything that might happen. She's requested transport back to the Citadel. I assume that will not be a problem?"

There was a long pause, almost a minute, before Delacor spoke again. "No, that's fine. However, anyone else approaching or entering your MAKO will require us to stop you from leaving the planet. Clear?"

"Very clear, sir. Shepard out." She clicked off, looking up at Kyle. "Sir.."

Kyle shook his head. "Tell Anderson he was right about you. And don't let that OSD fall into anyone else's hands." He turned away, moving towards the wall where his weapons hung, taking down the double-barreled Sabre rifle. "Time to go."

Shepard closed her eyes, and then nodded, opening them and saluting him. "Godspeed, sir."

Kyle returned it, smiling. "Dismissed...Sara. Go."

O-OSaBC-O

Shepard's arrival on the Normandy was followed by her directing Alenko to find some temporary space for the mysterious asari woman to stay during their trip to the Citadel, and a fast walk to the CIC.

"Pressly, status."

"All systems nominal, ma'am."

She nodded. "Get us the fuck out of this system, best rated speed. We don't want to be anywhere nearby in the next twenty minutes." She fingered the OSD in the pocket of her dress whites, wondering what could have driven Kyle to such extremes, when the Ops Alley lit up in blaring alarms. "GTS launch, from the ground!"

Shepard spun on her heel, slapping a haptic control to bring up the combat plot. "Target?"

The radar tech was tapping her controls rapidly, bringing up a rough plot of the missile tracks, glaring red traces on golden backgrounds. "Spread of twenty-five, low impactors, all targeted at the Rampage, ma'am. Rampage is engaging GARDIAN defenses and ECM...two hits. Their missile tubes are out."

She made a motion to Pressly. "Engage the IES, now. Comms, are we being hailed?"

The young man at that panel shook his head. "No ma'am...I'm picking up a Discrimen-level encrypted packet...headers indicate it's for high command. There's Commissar encryption on it, ma'am, our computers can't read it."

She nodded, turning back to the plot. "They're launching assault shuttles and MAKOs?"

The plot coordinator tech shifted the view, nodding. "Yes ma'am. Designating targets Sierra Alpha through Tango. . . also, smaller radar signatures. DACT suits, ma'am, at least fifty."

Shepard grimaced. She knew full well the exact troop line up of Fifth Regiment, and fifty DACTs were not part of that. This force was most likely augmented, explaining exactly why Delacor was so confident he could take Kyle's forces. "Joker. Full speed to the relay. We're not sticking around."

The Normandy shuddered as she accelerated away from Presrop, leaving behind the flashing lights of ground combat and anti-lander defenses that marred the planet's image.

---

Chapter 87: Chapter 78 : Normandy,Moments VII

---

A/N: I'm slowly working through ideas that are in my head while I rewrite the Noveria chapters. This one is mostly a bit of insight into asari culture, mixed with more about Liara.

---

The trip to the Citadel was, for most of the crew, much the same as the trip to Presrop. More drills, more repairs, and the marine team working on their new command configuration. Shepard isolated herself the first day, staying in her cabin, giving terse orders to Pressly not to be disturbed. When the images of what occurred on Pressrop came out later in the day, it became apparent why.

Telanya spent the bulk of her free time pouring over the reports Shepard had obtained from the Illusive Man, economic transactions and a dizzying trail of shipping and cargo manifests. It was clear that Cerberus had been maneuvering forces into place for weeks prior to the final assault, most of them a single jump away from the Citadel. And the amounts of material and money being flung around were astronomical.

While she could draw certain inferences from that – ugly ones – that didn't account for all the money. Some of it had vanished, probably into other accounts, more of it had been run through some kind of loop of cross-corporate investments and packaged into credit swaps that couldn't be tracked. And a surprisingly large amount of it had been seized by the SA itself, once Jack Harper seemingly shot himself on Earth.

But from the records, a significant fraction of Cerberus's financial strength hadn't been caught up in the Citadel Fleet's attacks. There were records for spare parts for both cruisers and frigates; shipments of security mechs to dead-end systems, and trails of bank swaps and buyouts that made no damned sense. It was almost as if the money going into Cerberus was then being shifted somewhere else, but who used a terrorist organization to launder money?

Telanya figured the funds were going other Cerberus operations – maybe it was set up in isolated cells. She rubbed at her eyes, glancing at the clock, and sighed at the time. Garrus was curled into his cot in the gunnery room, and she didn't feel like waking him up to curl against him. Wiping tiredly at her eyes a second time, she set her info-pad down and half stumbled into the mess decks, looking to find something edible or drinkable. The human teas all tasted horrible, and this 'coffee' they drank was worse.

In Telanya's mind, the fact that the human crew consumed inordinate amounts of the stuff every day only made them more crazy, and this was from a crew that thought tossing tanks out the hatch and taking on entire terrorist networks with rifles made perfect sense. She moved around the blocky spaces of the mess decks, the square shapes assaulting her sense of space once more, and decided firmly against trying anything too exotic, after hearing stories of Dr. T'Soni having a poor reaction to a human food called bacon.

She was in the process of getting a glass of water – surely humans wouldn't mess that up – when she heard voices from the med bay. One she didn't recognize – a human male – but the haughty, cool tones of Liara T'Soni were easy to hear, and she shook her head.

Whatever T'Soni was, she doubted now that the young doctor was in league with anyone. Her attraction to Shepard was almost amusing, as Liara's body language – probably indecipherable to the humans – screamed of her subservience.

Which, in and of itself, was a curious, almost terrifying thing. A human strong-willed to have a member of the Thirty feel submissive? The human's display of anger when Liara fell on Edolus was more than impressive. The insane, cruel and bloodthirsty nature of Shepard's attacks, especially after Liara had fallen, had frightened even the other humans. Liara's own crazed use of the kanquess – untrained – had left Telanya in awe, reminding her again sharply that the Thirty were simply beyond other asari.

If she'd tried the kanquess, without the proper training, they would be wiping up pieces of her for a week. Liara did it as if it nothing. She'd been shot with a biotic-suppression round and had to be resuscitated, and then managed to find the strength to pursue Shepard and – if the rumors flying were correct – kill the leader of Cerberus herself, a task that even Shepard failed at.

Telanya took a sip of the water, satisfied that they humans hadn't somehow done anything bizarre to it, such as lacing it with caffeine, and began looking through the cabinets for something to eat.

She was not sure what exactly to report back to the Council of Matriarchs. There wasn't any sign of malicious action on the part of the other asari. T'Soni was frigid, not even bothering to speak with her once the entire time on board, but Telanya couldn't really find herself surprised that she wanted nothing to do with a clanless. She was clearly held in very high regard by the marines, less so by the ship crew. Her careful conversations with the other human soldiers – how easy it was to get them to open up! – had revealed Liara seemed to be as powerful a biotic as her mother.

The communications on the ship were rigidly controlled, and given the human's paranoia, probably recorded as well. That made any kind of communication between mother and daughter impossible. T'Soni also showed no interest in her holdings on Thessia, and had no servants, no bodyguards – it was just her, which for a Thirty was nearly .. incomprehensible. Even the lowliest of the Lesser Houses usually had at least one or two servants from the clanless, and she had never even seen a member of the Thirty without an entire entourage.

Garrus own gut, which she trusted more than anything else in the galaxy, told him that Liara was a good person who wasn't hiding anything. The asari was often nervous and jumpy, but Telanya dismissed that as a front – a way to put suspicious humans at ease. After all, even humans would be nervous around a member of the Thirty, but a shy scientist who stuttered and stammered would be ..

cute.

Telanya felt a dry appreciation for the other asari's clever front. She examined a box of cereal, translated the name of the food on its cover, blinked at the handwritten message decrying said title as lies, and put it back slowly. Humans were crazy. She shook her head, and decided that, at least for the moment, her report would say what she had seen : Liara was a weird, shy recluse, with no real connections and nothing suspicious in her behavior. Despite that, her biotic power was every bit as terrifying as her mother's, and she clearly wasn't under any kind of detainment by the SA, meaning she wanted to be on the Normandy.

An asari seriously willing to kill her mother was about as close to 'insane' as asari got. Maybe that would please the Council of Matriarchs. If not, Telanya was not even going to try to do anything about it. If Shepard was capable of throwing around huge blast doors and liquifying enemies in her path when Liara was hurt, Telanya shuddered at what the human would do to her if she tried to hurt Liara.

An ugly mental image of her and Garrus being reduced to spatters of blue and purple crossed her mind, and she suppressed it with a grimace. She pulled down a box of diced, dried fruits, emptying them into a bowl, then stopped as she felt a tingling, crawling sensation across the limited front of her mass effect field.

She turned, and found the robed, black-veiled figure of the asari matriarch Shepard had picked up on Presrop standing there, her hands folded together in a gesture of siari. "Greetings, child."

Telanya turned to face her, politely. "Greetings, mother. I am Telanya of no clan, a member of C-SEC and of this ship's company. I am afraid I have no courtesy to offer, but I would gladly sit and learn from your wisdom." She used the term 'mother' as a mark of respectful affection, one more polite than mere 'matriarch'.

The asari's expression, hidden behind her veil, was of course unreadable, but her posture shifted. "Such a polite child. Well raised. It is good to see the clanless have maintained better manners than the Clans, at least. Sit. Eat."

Telanya slowly did as she was bid. The sheer power radiating off the woman was enough to set her teeth on edge, but she refused to show anything but the proper deference. Her mother, a small timid asari who'd lost her bondmate barely months after becoming pregnant, had always hammered politeness into her head.

Telanya didn't like talking with other asari, but she doubted this one was an ardat-yakshi. She bowed her head, eating, eyes taking in the form in front of her.

The older asari's voice was hard, cool. "You are a lake of simple, warm waters. But I feel the touch of the night-wind on you, girl. You have suffered. You are marked."

Telanya let her spoon fall. "How..."

The asari drew her veil back. The woman's eyes were gone, a shredded mass of scar tissue, surrounded by tiny, burned glyphs sunk into her flesh. Her face was marked with the Mask of Athame, and Telanya began to tremble.

This woman was a godtalker, one of the Chosen of Athame to assist the High Priestess of the Sun, to have their eyes sundered so they could see only what Athame chose to show them. There were less than a dozen in all of the Asari Republic, what in the name of the Sword would one be doing out here?

The asari smiled. "I am Walks-in-Shadows. I have seen, and those who follow me have not, but wish to see. I see the mark on your soul, on your biotic field, in your motions, in your voice. I feel with senses the People have forgotten, that have fallen into decay with disuse. I no longer walk in Athame's steps, I now merely speak of the unity of siari."

Telanya nodded slowly. "I see, mother. What is your wisdom, then?" This was a polite way to ask a matriarch what her guiding philosophy was. For many, an offer to learn.

Walks-in-Shadows merely smiled. "My philosophy is simple. Siari is a surrender to the path of all things. It is the river in the riverbed. It is the tides upon the shore. But there are times the river is turned from its banks, when the ocean rises in wrath. There are those who are beyond siari's gentle grasp."

Telanya frowned. That was as close to blasphemy as she'd ever heard. "Does that mean all things are not siari?"

The asari shook her head, amusement on her face. "If you take a glass of water from the ocean, does it cease to be water? One cannot part from that is siari. But one can fight its currents, ignore its call, try to bend the universe to change the path that one must travel from the start to the finish." She traced her long, blue fingers along the smooth metal of the mess deck table. "The shortest path between two fixed points is a line. But the shortest path between two points is to move one of the points to the other."

Telanya frowned. She'd never been as diligent in her studies of siari as she could have been, but something in the older asari's words troubled her. "You are saying ... that we don't understand siari and how it moves us through life?"

The older asari shook her head once more. "Not at all. You do not understand the initial conditions. We assume. That the points are fixed. That all asari are in unity. That monsters do not crawl in the darkness. That surely cooperation and consensus will trump violence and disunity. That what is true for one asari must be true for all." The woman folded her hands again. "You have already seen that to assume is to be vulnerable."

Telanya shuddered, considering the matriarch's words in a new light. "I do understand. How do I improve myself in your wisdom?"

Walks-in-Shadows merely tilted her head. "Consider carefully the weight of all your actions, and then consider what you assume to be true, to see if it actually is. Everything, politics, business, war, love, even art, is about understanding the other and anticipating what comes. When you bind yourself down with suppositions, that is when you blind yourself more fully than I ever will be."

Telanya nodded, tucking this bit of wisdom into the back of her mind. "Thank you for your guidance, mother. How did you come by this .. way of thinking? It seems very different from the siari teachings I have listened to."

The older asari sighed, a sad, defeated noise. "Through the loss of two bondmates. Experience may be the best teacher, but she is also the harshest, the least efficient, and the slowest. Assumptions have cost me my mate, my lover, my children, my parents." The asari paused. "My grandmother. My teacher, my sister, my friends."

Telanya looked at the matriarch with dawning, shivering horror, at the sheer scale of the trauma and loss the woman must have survived to endure the destruction of so many close bonds and joining. "Your pain..."

Walks-in-Shadows shook her head. "All remains as one. To dwell on their losses is to cheapen their joy, to drown in sorrow is to forget the laughter and life they brought to me while alive. I did not retreat into the ranks of the Godspeakers out of grief. Nor do I walk where I have today out of some misguided attempt at healing."

Telanya frowned, not understanding. "You mean, with the humans on that planet we were just at?"

The matriarch nodded. "Humans. So ... divided. So many fragments, of parts of their race fighting others. They are as a school of skora fish in a deep reef, fragments of the whole sifting through various levels – obvious to one observing from afar, but hidden to each other, reacting with surprise when they pop out."

The asari stood, letting her veil fall. "In the end, child, humans make the most assumptions of all. They burn hotter and brighter, but for all that fail to see that the brightest lights cast the longest shadows."

Telanya stood herself, bowing as deeply as she could. She wasn't sure what to make of the asari's last words, but she knew a gesture of dismissal when she saw one. "I am undecided regarding humans myself. I find the turians more .. stable. But your insights are fascinating. I am in debt to your wisdom and your guidance, mother. If this poor clanless can serve you, I am ready to do so."

The other asari merely nodded. "I have all I need, child. Go in the ways of siari, and find peace in the gaze of the Goddess." With that, she withdrew, leaving Telanya alone to consider her dried fruit, and the continued murmurs in the medbay.

She wondered briefly if she should have asked the Matriarch's guidance on the issue with Liara, then dismissed it as unworthy of her time. Rather, she turned her attention back to the information about Cerberus's finances she had been struggling with, thinking on the other asari's admonishments.

I assumed the money was going to Cerberus to fund Cerberus. But there was just too much of it for that, so where did it end up? And where did it come from?

Her spoon stopped in mid-air as the answer hit her. She stared at her food, before going back to the forward battery for her info-pad. If she was right, all of that money was in the hands of the person who had every way to get at it.

The Illusive Man.

O-OSaBC-O

Liara didn't know what had happened to Shepard on Presrop, or who the strange asari matriarch who came back with her was. Shepard had been strangely quiet, but Liara could see and feel the emotional turmoil in her, roiling around like black thunderclouds.

No one else had seen the straining knuckles in her hands as she gave the orders to leave the system, the too-hard footfalls as she fled for her quarters. Liara had tried to enter her quarters, but there had been no response.

When they broke into the next system and updated their comms from the news buoys, the answer why became clear. The footage from Pressrop was horrifying. Cascades of fighters, soldiers, and huge DACT units stormed the compound of Major Kyle. They were met by ragged bands of biotics, each one fighting with insane strength and purpose. The carnage had been horrible, captured in high-definition and beamed wide band across the comms net.

It lasted twenty-five awful minutes, until the figure of Kyle himself had emerged, one hand clutching the biggest rifle Liara had ever seen, the other holding the broken form of a dying biotic, who he laid down gently before leaping into the fray.

Liara found herself unable to stop watching as the human moved through the ranks of SA soldiers like a sword of fire, cutting down everything in his path. He was shot – many, many times – and simply ignored them, as if he were vengeance and fury made flesh. His biotics screamed his name as they charged the waiting SA marines, who fell back in panic.

SA Commissars stepped forth, biotics igniting, but the biotic rebels countered them, and then Kyle was among them. One wrenched his rifle from his grip only to die from an unfolding omni-blade to the throat, Kyle spinning past him to snatch the pistol from another Commissar, kill him with it, and then shoot two more down.

Shades of the moves Shepard used could be seen in his movements, but this was just a man, no biotics, no cybernetics, just a man. And thus, when several DACT soldiers finally transfixed him with bursts of fire from miniguns, he had no way of escaping it. His return fire killed two of the DACTs, sending a third away clutching his arm, but Kyle himself was obviously mortally wounded. It took a long, long moment for the man to finally sink to his knees. A trail of absolute carnage lay behind him, but as his life left him, he pulled off his helmet, revealing his features, his mouth dribbling blood, his eyes alive with fire.

"Sic...semper...tyrannis." The human tapped his omnitool, and the entire compound detonated, a blast wave of fire rushing out in a ring to consume both him, his biotics, and the remaining marines, before the signal went to static.

Liara swallowed, knowing that this man had been Shepard's CO at Torfan, and that she spoke of him in the same reverent, small tones that she talked about David Anderson in. She had no idea why he'd throw his life away in such a violent gesture, but the human news programs talking about it were full of speculation, mostly focusing on the SA government. A manifesto had been transmitted along with the video, a short statement that answered no one's questions.

In life, we all make choices, mistakes, and judgments. There is nothing stopping good men from evil acts committed in ignorance, and justice must always reflect such. But when the acts committed are of knowing evil, of deliberate malice, then there can be no excuses. Tyrants and monsters throughout history have attempted to justify their actions with flimsy rationales, but in the end they are merely criminals. I will not serve a government that plots the destruction of that which I hold dear, nor will I hold my tongue when brave men and women who have sacrificed their minds and sanity for our people are cast aside, not out of political expediency, but to utilize them as raw materials for weapons that should never exist.

Perhaps it had some significance to humans, but it seemed incomprehensible to Liara. She spent the day observing the humans around her quietly – they seemed only slightly perturbed by it, wondering what it all meant, but most of their conversation was focused on returning to the Citadel for a few more days of leave.

She sighed, entering the medical bay to load more regenerative medicines into the medical package on her shoulder, and found Jason Dunn sitting in the med-bay, a scalpel laying on a tray, false synth-skin having been cut cleanly from his right arm, exposing the cyberlimb below. He was adjusting something in the servos as she entered, and he looked up, eyes curious. "Ah, Doctor T'Soni. Are you a medical doc, or..."

She fumbled for a moment, not used to such open greetings, especially from someone at least formerly a part of a racist, terrorist organization devoted to killing aliens. But his expression seemed open and friendly, and she forced older images of a younger Jason Dunn out of her mind as she stammered out her greeting. "Ah, no, I mean.. that is, I have studied a few medical techniques, but I am a doctor of anthropology and archeological studies, not ... medicine."

Dunn nodded, twisting hard at something in the machinery of his wrist. "Ah, well. Chakwas is sleeping, and I figured I'd do my maintenance on my arms before Shepard hauls me off to jail for the rest of my life. The damned things aren't acting right ever since some goon hit me in the back of the head. Problem is, the neural interface is glitching, and I don't know if it's something wrong with me, or the cyber."

Liara nodded, crossing the room to pull out the medical infusers for her package. "I am sorry to hear that. I remember Beatrice Shields also had significant cyberware. Is it common among humans?"

Dunn smiled, snapping a panel shut, flexing the arm. "Not ... really. Among civilians it's too expensive and, well, too outre. The SA pays for cybernetic replacements for wounds taken in the line of battle, but they aren't top quality. Most vets end up having custom work done. I got my arms blown off getting Shepard out of the line of fire on Dirth, Bea lost her arm at Horizon." His gaze darkened, and he put the tool in his hands down, picking up the synth-skin 'glove' that usually covered his hand and forearm.

Liara nodded. "And Shepard? She does not appear to have any..."

Dunn's expression turned into a knowing smirk. "You seem awfully confident about that, there, Doc. Doing some late night medical examinations on the CO?"

Liara could not remember a time she felt more embarrassed, and the human merely chuckled. "Jeez, you're easy to get flustered. As to cyber, not that I remember. Shep always was hard to hit with all that biotic bounce bullshit she likes so much, and barriers come in real handy when your shields go down."

He adjusted the fit of the synthskin, before picking up a tube of omnigel, smearing it around the thin line that indicated where the synthskin hooked to another segment, sealing it. "But then again, she had us there, picking her ass up out of the fire, stopping anything from getting close enough to kill her."

Liara put down the medicine infuser. "Until after Torfan." Her voice was bitter, and Jason's expression shifted.

"Yeah, well, that was not one of the finer goddamned moments for any of us." He grimaced. "We were all a mess, back then."

Liara turned to face him. "I know. Ms. Shields was ... confrontational regarding that. She said I could not understand the pressures or strains you were under. And that you did not properly understand Sara."

Dunn scratched at his ear, and stood, only to lean insolently against the bulkhead. "Bea is full of shit, Doc. Or maybe that's actually how she saw things back then. I wasn't angry at Shepard. I was angry at my goddamned sister, for getting our unit killed and fucking Shepard's mind up so bad. I was angry at Rai for losing his shit completely and making Shepard kill him. I was angry at the SA, angry at myself. I just took it out on Shepard because she was there, because she was an outlet."

He looked down at his hands. "I said shit I shouldn't, frustrations I'd thought I'd gotten past. I left her kneeling there in the dirt crying her goddamned eyes out because I was too much of a punk to admit that Shepard was with my sister because we didn't give her what she needed to live."

He gave a cold, bitter laugh. "And then, I ended up joining a group of people who was even more fucked up, out of the same stupid frustration. I became a criminal."

His eyes met hers, bleak, empty, tired. "I know what she thinks of criminals."

Liara winced. "I do not think she looks at you as a criminal. She is .. conflicted right now."

Dunn snorted. "Yeah, so am I. Goddamned Kyle. I always knew the man was fucking crazy – how else do you win three SOT awards without fighting off the entire turian army with your dick?" He shook his head. "But that was..."

Liara took a step closer. "Why would he take such a suicidal act?"

Dunn gave her a curious look. "I don't know. Kyle was like a superman. Brilliant mind, mastered anything he touched. Bastard could blow the head off a turian at three hundred yards with a pistol and then turn around and write a symphony. He was always weird. If anyone knows it's Shepard, but she's got to be hurting right now."

Liara bit her lip. "I know that Kyle was her CO, but ..." She trailed off when Dunn shook his head.

"Look, Doc. Shepard had only a few people to believe in her, growing up. David Anderson, Rachel Florez, Tyson Von Grath, and Preston Kyle. That's it. She had to kill Rachel a few days back, and now Kyle is gone."

He looked away. "When we bailed on her, they were the only family – or what passed for it – she had left. One a traitor, one a fucked up loony toon who just got offed, and the other two buried in the SA." He rubbed his jaw.

Liara nodded. "She is not answering her door."

Jason nodded. "She gets .. upset. Crawls inside herself. Hates showing people her emotions because she doesn't know how to make them work for her. I tried telling her that emotions don't work that way, but she's convinced they have to."

Liara swallowed. "I am .. trying to find a way to help her. To reach her. She is so hurt, so wounded, trying to deal with the burden they have put on her all alone. I had hoped that Ms. Shields could help in that, but she was .. hostile. Even after we resolved our differences, she was touchy, and now the situation has... changed."

Liara rubbed her hand against her thigh nervously. "How can I break through to her?"

The human male rolled his neck, tired eyes not meeting hers. "Doc, I've got to be the very worst person in the galaxy to ask that question of."

Liara exhaled. "Do you love her?"

Dunn's eyes slowly inched up to meet hers, something hard and cold in them. "That's a pretty loaded question. As a rule, hot girls with tight asses and nice tits are always something I love."

Liara found herself suddenly agreeing with Shepard's exasperated declaration that Jason Dunn was an asshole. She simply folded her arms, staring at him, and after a moment his levity departed. He rubbed his chin thoughtfully, then shook his head.

"She's still my teammate, even if she's crazier than she used to be. But I'm not stupid enough to bang my head against a brick wall and then complain it hurts. I care about her. She's my friend, if I can call her that after what I did. But love?" He shook his head a second time. "The part of me that loved her and the part of her I loved both died on Torfan, outside a shitty bar."

He was silent a second, and then he looked at her sharply. "And you, Doc?"

She felt a tremble come over her limbs as she spoke. "I cannot seem to stop myself. But I do not know if that, by itself, is enough to 'give her what she needs'."

Dunn grunted, pushing off the wall. "What she needs? Ha. She needs to take the stick out of her ass. She needs someone to slap the self-pity out of her. She needs her brains fucked out, then to be taken to a bar and gotten completely smashed, followed by a good cry and to let go of a bunch of meaningless bullshit she won't let go of."

Liara flushed again at his crudity, but couldn't help but wonder why, and so she spoke. "Why.. I mean, that is, why does she .. "

He gave a sour grin at her nervous trailing off, but it faded almost as fast as it formed. "Shepard has hangups with intimacy, with her own emotions, with the shit she's been through, but above all else, Shepard has a goddamned problem with being Shepard."

He paused, thinking. "Shepard never had 'down time', ya know? She never went to the clubs, she never just got smashed for a good night out, she never could loosen up and just live. The only times she cut loose, ended up ... bad. There were a couple of ... incidents. Hushed up. Some people have problems with what gets their rocks off. She's one of them. Once she's gotten over that, accepted it as a part of what she is, maybe she can focus on something else. But she never gets that far, because she's too busy hating on herself."

He shook his head. "It ends up just making you want to shake the stupid out of her. Hell, maybe Bea was right. I could never figure out how to get her to see beyond her past. Yeah, it was fucked. She got sold off, raped, drugged up. Ended up running with gangs and capping people to afford a dusting or some heroin. But you can't change it, why keep fucking going on about it!?"

Liara blinked. "Her emotional issues are deeply set in her mind, Mr. Dunn. To simply dismiss them seems cruel and unsympathetic."

Jason Dunn's jaw tightened. "Doc, you never get anywhere by standing in the same place instead of moving forward. I may be a dumb gun-toting thug, but even I have more sense than that. Shepard doesn't need sympathy – how the fuck can you or I honestly say we can understand when we haven't gone through anything that bad? The fuckers who did it are dead – she blew her own parents away! She's had all the goddamned closure there is to have. She just doesn't want to let it go because it gives her an excuse."

Liara felt a spike of excitement, like she'd felt when uncovering Prothean ruins. She knew whatever Dunn was about to say would be the key she needed to help Shepard. "An excuse? For what?"

He walked over to the far wall, looking out at the mess decks, watching Telanya converse with the other asari woman. "Shepard was always terrified of failing. Of being not good enough. Being thrown back in the Penal Legions, or just abandoned. She's not going to worry about her own life, but she has so few people who care about her that losing any of them drives her crazy. Yet she never sees the truth, that everyone she lets in uses her."

Liara took a step back in shock. "I.. I do not use her!"

Dunn barked out a laugh. "Bullshit. Everyone does. Anderson is maybe the only one who hasn't. The Old Lady used her to condition the rest of the penal unit. We – her team – used her to protect us from the rest of the convicts, and later to convince ourselves we mattered. My sister used her to wreck Torfan, Von Grath used her to prop up his own image. The SA used her to make pirates run in fear, and the goddamned Council is using her because it's politically fucking expedient or whatever you call it."

He took a step towards her. "And you? Tell me, doc. You gonna claim that you're just wanting to help Shepard to feel better about herself out of your good, kind heart? I have a goddamned vid terminal. You were thrown out of your own family, your government wants your blue ass locked up, your mom is humping a fucking lunatic who blew up two planets and your university issued a public statement calling you a hack. She's your meal ticket."

Liara balled her fists. "I am not using her! I helped her when no one else could! When she was losing her very mind to the Prothean Beacon I was the one who brought her back! You threw her out of your life and you stand here and say I use her!?"

She'd never felt so angry in her life, and realized belatedly she was glowing, her biotic field flaring wildly. She tried to bring it under control, emotions bubbling through her, and Dunn merely stared.

She was about to say something when the medbay doors opened. Shepard stood there, haggard, eyes red and her BDU's crumpled. There was anger from her, too, a sharp line of it, and Liara could feel it running from herself to Shepard, and back.

Shepard's voice was like thick ice. "This conversation is over."

Jason Dunn shook his head. "Truth hurts, huh?"

Liara didn't even see Shepard move, but the next second Dunn was up against the wall and Shepard had him by the throat, her eyes narrow and glazed. "Jace, I am this fucking far from making sure you need cyber legs as well as arms. You want to scream at me, fine. You want to run your mouth about me, fine. You yell at her again and I will kill you." The threat was uttered in a voice so cold, so angry, that even Liara shuddered.

Dunn merely stared back. "Is that all...Commander?"

With a push, Shepard stepped back from him, letting him go. "When we get back to the Citadel, Jace, I was planning to lose track of you. Don't make me change my mind."

Dunn gave her a surprised look for a moment. "What happened to 'thus ever to criminals'?"

Shepard didn't answer, instead leaving the medbay as abruptly as she entered, headed back to her quarters. Liara swallowed, brushing past Dunn to follow her. He watched her go, and a cool, calculating smile came over his face.

The Illusive Man had been right, the asari was the perfect lever to manipulate Shepard with.

---

Chapter 88: Chapter 79 : Unity, Pain, Hope

---

A/N: Warning : long authors note. Second Warning: explicit sexual content.

---

So here it is.

I've debated about how to handle this. The issues are the timing, the balance of misery vs. hope, and the methods involved.

The easiest choice with the timing, of course, would be to follow canon, the night before Ilos. But that choice always seemed ... like a fling before near certain death. I thought about doing it in the aftermath of Benezia's death, but for certain reasons soon to be revealed, that wouldn't be appropriate either. I'd even considered doing it after the destruction of the Reaper; but that would be too cruel, given what comes after. In the end, having shot canon in the head many chapters ago, I decided doing it now because of what it changes. I'm aware that some people were concerned that Liara and Shepard seemed to be treading water in their relationship, and this is not necessarily the most logical conclusion. I'm not 'forcing' it to happen to progress the story. It's a spot where it can happen in such a way to make the flow of following chapters easier, but there were other spots. It is happening now because that's where the muse said it should go.

Second, the balance of the misery and brokenness of Shepard and Liara against what they gain. Both my beta readers belabored the point that empty sex solves nothing. And it's certainly true. What happens in the chapter is not intended to be solely about the sex. The joining is brutal because Liara has about as much control as any other emotionally distraught, mentally worn out, psychologically crippled oversexed teen has. Basically, none. That it doesn't happen to other asari is due to the fact other asari link and do shallow joins all the time, unlike Liara. But beyond that, the bond gives them each something they do not have. For Shepard, it's Liara's almost unhealthy devotion to her. For Liara, it's the sheer strength of Shepard's emotions. Both draw on each other to give them that which has left them unable to move on all their lives.

Finally, the methods involved. This will not be everyone's cup of tea. That much is fine. It's also cool if you leave a review or PM saying you dislike it, think it's inappropriate, or that it should be removed. A writer has to deal with criticism and the angle I approach things from in the Premiseverse is supposed to be unorthodox, even disturbing.

That being said, please keep two things in mind. First, please don't read into the situation in the wrong way. It was not forced. If it reads that way, then it because I suck at writing, not because that was my intent. What Shepard gets off on is both a product of her background and her mindset. She needs to dominate, to be in charge, to push someone to a state where they accept what happens without resisting it – because in Shepard's fucked up head, that means she must be worth the trouble and pain. Liara goes along with it not just because she is 'weak' – but because once it starts, the sensations are mixed up and she loses control of what feels good.

Second, keep in mind that Shepard is very damaged goods. She doesn't act this way because she likes it, but because it's the way she reacts, regardless of what she wishes. Inevitably, men writing about women are going to Get It Wrong. Inevitably, writing about situations like this is going to not resonate with some people, and resonate with others in all the wrong ways. I can't change that, or change how people choose to view it. For some, sadism and masochism are never the 'correct' ways to handle things. But at the end of the day it's my story. I don't demand you agree with it or like it, but I don't expect anything else to fit my Shepard the way this does, at least for now.

The changes wrought by what Shepard and Liara do fundamentally change them both. It breaks Shepard's death-grip on her past, and stiffens Liara's spine. Over time, they develop. They change. They grow. Over time, the sadism becomes merely spice in the bedroom, the wounds, while never fully healing, are overlaid with happier memories, and love, and above all else, belief in each other. That is what should be taken away from it.

Please review. I don't usually ask for that, but this time I do, if only to grasp what people think.

---

Shepard didn't respond to Liara's attempt to talk to her, but was moving around the Normandy the next day, her BDU's freshly pressed, her face back in its usual cool and dispassionate ask.

Liara felt hurt at the way Shepard had shut her out, especially after the closeness they had shared on the way to Presrop, but tucked it down as best she could. It sometimes seemed every time she got close to Shepard, something – Feros, Pressly being shot, now this – snatched the progress Liara had made away from her.

It was frustrating and depressing, made more so by the fact that she had little to occupy her mind. The entire day passed slowly, Liara avoiding Dunn, avoiding Shepard, cowering in her science lab, laying on her cot in empty thoughts. By the time Liara was upset enough to fight past her worries and talk, it was already very late. She didn't know if giving Shepard all day to cool off was good, or would just make things worse. So it was with a sense of trepidation and unease that she made her way to the mess decks, intending to try to talk to Shepard once more.

She found Shepard on the mess decks themselves, talking to Garrus and Telanya. The other asari woman's was pointing out something on an info-pad to Shepard, who had a scowl on her face.

"...and that is the inference I can draw from the records we have, Commander. Whatever organization or groups were backing Cerberus were not just funding them. They were using Cerberus's illegal financial connections to funnel money somewhere else. When the Illusive Man ... disengaged from the project, he was able to subvert a large portion of those funds, but I still don't know where the money was originally going."

Telanya met Shepard's gaze. "I originally dismissed the idea as crazy...but nothing else fits. Cerberus may have been a cut-out for something even more disturbing, or at least more critical to keep out of the public eye – why else run this money through this kind of pattern? What frustrates me the most is that any evidence of where the money went after Cerberus was destroyed by the Illusive Man covering his own damned tracks. He gave us everything we needed to pin down the Cerberus leaders on Edolus...but his actions could also be him simply cutting away the compromised parts of Cerberus and starting over somewhere else."

Shepard nodded. "Didn't figure he was doing it out of the kindness of his heart. Still...the money trail is pretty clear where Saren is involved." She pointed to several highlighted transactions on the info-pad. "I'm not much on this money-tracking stuff, but even I can see that there's a lot of payoffs to Binary Helix on Noveria. And what is all this 'transaction trust index' stuff?"

Telanya sighed. "Usually that indicates a real estate deal of some kind. There are over fifty of them, some are old mining sites, a couple of abandoned colonies...a shutdown resort on some tropical world...there's too many to check them all out in the Normandy, but I wonder if this list indicates locations Cerberus sold to Saren to build bases or facilities on."

Shepard grunted. "Send that list to the STG and copy Wrex on it. You may be right, and while we can't check out every location, we can at least get someone else to do some of the footwork." She sat back, sighing. "Anything else we've found?"

Garrus made a sound in the back of his throat, his taloned hands ticking across the metal table. "Not much. Cerberus was dumping weapons on the open market, backing some very nasty merc groups, and putting up bounties on pirates that preyed on human colonies. What disturbs me more is the pattern of where they were building up supplies, Shepard. All one jump from the Citadel, all close combat and urban assault types. They were planning to attack the Citadel at some point."

Shepard groaned. "Cerberus was crazy...but the forces they have lined up, based on Sergeant Telanya's report, wouldn't be enough to take the Citadel. I mean, I know it's mostly defended by chickens like you, but even so..."

Garrus made a gesture with his hands that made Telanya flush and Shepard crack up laughing, and Liara felt a smile cross her own face at the sight. Something about Garrus seemed to effortlessly reach through the barriers Shepard put up to everyone else. Part of Liara was bitter about that, but most of her was happy that at least someone could do something to get Shepard to smile.

The levity faded quickly, though, and Telanya's voice rose. "It would be enough if they were acting in support of some other groups, Commander. The quarian, Tali'Zorah, shared her report on the geth you have fought thus far. Many of them have adaptations the quarians have not seen before, adaptations making them more fitted to fight a battle aboard the Citadel."

Shepard grimaced. "Based on the supplies they were putting together, what kind of time line are we talking about? Days? Months?"

Telanya flashed through a few screens on the info-pad, running a hand over her crests. "It's hard to say, but it looks like at least a month out. The Citadel task forces seemed to have cleaned all these nests out, but at least some of the transactions were for low-observation transports to drop off Cerberus soldiers on the Citadel itself. Those transactions cleared...meaning they are already on their way, or already on the Citadel. The numbers were low, less than fifty..."

Garrus scowled. "Fifty trained combatants with an eye to terrorism or sabotage could be a very big problem, especially if C-SEC isn't aware of it."

Shepard grunted, catching sight of Liara at last. She looked at her for a long moment before turning back to Garrus and Telanya. "Put that in your write up to the STG, then. We should hit the Citadel in the morning, maybe they can find something between then and now. In the meantime, Telanya, I need a version of that information that can be given to the Council without implicating the SA in this...mess."

Telanya's voice was very quiet. "You're asking me to falsify evidence."

Shepard's face took on a very pained expression. "And I hate it. I'd like nothing more, I promise you, than taking this shit right into Arcturus and pinning down the people responsible for what we saw on Edolus. But I can't. The political bullshit that would erupt would tie us up for months, and Saren is still out there."

Garrus laid a hand on Telanya's forearm. "You talked to me once about doing things the right way. Said you wouldn't become a criminal to stop a criminal. By hiding this, aren't you cutting the same kind of corners you said I shouldn't?"

Shepard looked at him for a long moment, studying the angles of his face. "Maybe. Maybe I've lost the faith I once had in my government. Maybe I'm so worried about messing this up, of Saren getting away, that I'm doing the wrong thing." She stared at the table, at her hands, then looked up again.

"I hate criminals. I hate what Cerberus did, and even if the Illusive Man gave us a lead that might get us to Saren, I would like nothing better than to ventilate his fucking skull for allowing that bullshit we saw down on Edolus to happen in the first place. But I have to put things in order of priority. Right now, Cerberus is reeling, most of the fuckers are dead, and whatever the Illusive Man got away with, it won't be enough to save his ass once we sic the STG on him."

She turned to regard Telanya again. "But if we throw all this out there, the chances are good that nothing would happen anyway. I've been trying to put my head around all the politics...and the bottom line is the damned Council wouldn't use this information to prosecute anyone, or even make the SA clean house, but instead to blackmail and influence the SA. They wouldn't even give you one extra day to finish your investigation on Saren, and you think they'll go after this and start a war?"

Telanya was quietly looking at Garrus, but turned to face Shepard when she finished speaking. "I understand that, Commander. But are you going to allow this to go unpunished?"

Shepard tensed her jaw. "Fuck no. Once I put Saren's head on a goddamned plaque and hang it above my bed, and deal with Liara's bitch of a mother, I'm taking this information and ramming it straight up someone's ass. I'm a Spectre, I don't need permission. Or fucking subpoenas, or any other legal bullshit. I may just walk into the Manswell Foundation, shoot everyone in the building, and then transmit this entire file in the open."

Telanya gave a very slow nod. "I anticipated your request, Commander. Garrus trusts you...and so will I." She pulled an OSD out of her BDU pocket and set it on the table. "I've filtered off the links to Northstar and the Manswell Foundation on these files, as well as removed the references to the SA, Rachel Florez, and Richard Williams. The broken financial links point to various Cerberus fronts, many of them already seized by the SA." She frowned. "The SA AIS will be able to grasp relatively quickly that the file was altered...but C-SEC FINCIN will not. Nor will the STG, unless they have penetrated your AIS."

Garrus snorted. "If that happened, they'd already know most of it."

Shepard took the OSD, and gave Telanya a sad look. "I hate this. And I appreciate...what you've done. I doubt we'd have been able to explain our pursuit of Saren without this data, and without you to fix it up, I would have had to go to the SA for help. God knows where that would have ended up."

Garrus shifted uncomfortably. "Given the exposure that information has? With us all dead in a ditch somewhere, I expect." The turian sighed, and Shepard nodded, standing.

"I'll file this later, when we hit the Citadel. You two look like shit, get some rest." Shepard turned, and Liara walked up to her before she could enter her quarters.

"We need to talk, Shepard."

Shepard sighed. "It's real late, Liara. Can it wait?"

Liara merely shook her head. "No, it cannot. Please."

Anger and something else danced in Shepard's eyes and the muscles of her jaw, but she shrugged.

"Come on in." Liara followed, trying not to wring her hands in worry, and did so.

O-OSaBC-O

Shepard's quarters were neat, but two more empty bottles of Scotch decorated the table. A bottle of pills – sleeping aids, Liara read from the label – were open on the nightstand. The bed was made, the sheets unmarked, but Shepard's old Penal Legion blanket was tossed on the floor in a corner, next to yet another empty bottle of scotch. Shepard's small terminal was broken, the haptic screen emitter smashed. A single OSD lay in front of it, its shape deformed by warp fire.

Shepard stalked into the room, and tossed the OSD Telanya had given her on her desk before turning to face Liara. "What is it?"

Liara, for her part, merely stared at Shepard. The tiredness in her eyes was there again, the pain. Despite her neat appearance, Shepard still looked haggard. The medical bandages around her stomach were still there, as was the limp in her step from her wounded leg.

Liara carefully took a breath, before letting it go shakily. "I want to help."

Shepard looked away. "Some things I have to do alone, Liara."

Liara shook her head, taking two steps closer. "No! I will not let you push me away. Not now. Not when you are hurt. Not when everything you have believed in and trusted in is either failing you or dying. I am here, Shepard, because of you. Because I want to be here! Because I want to ... be a part of you."

Shepard sat down on her couch, her expression crumpled. "Everything I believed in is a fucking lie. My government..." She gestured with disgust at the ruined OSD... "God, I can't even explain. It's just too much. All of this shit is too much."

Liara carefully stepped around the table, to sit next to Shepard, trying not to tense up. "Why must you carry it all yourself?"

Shepard shook her head. "I'm the only one who can."

Liara stared at her for a long moment. "And what am I, then? Goddess, Shepard, I have shared your pain-"

Shepard turned to face her, mouth a grim line. "I didn't ask for that, Liara. I didn't...fuck. FUCK!" She slammed a fist into the side of the desk next to the couch, and then got to her feet. "I can't do this right now. I need ... to plan. To get ready."

Liara stood as well, her hands shaking. "No."

Shepard turned. "No?"

Liara reached out, grabbing Shepard's hand. "No. I am not going to abandon you like everyone else has, or leave you to face whatever you must alone, or pretend I am alright with being shut out." She was going to continue but Shepard pushed her back, hard, against the wall. A moment later she was in Liara's face, so close she could smell Shepard's faint scent, her shampoo.

Blue eyes bored into hers, dark and furious. "You can't fix me, Liara. We all have times where we're fucked up and hurt. Times where I don't know what the fuck to say or even feel and having you there just makes it worse!" She pushed off the wall, still glaring.

Liara merely grit her teeth. "Is what Dunn said a lie? Do you run away from everything because you could fail at it? Did you lie to me when you said I understood, when you said that I made your day better?" She took a step back, trying to summon the nerve to say what had to be said. "Shields said you used everyone around you, and Dunn claims you are used by everyone around you. Which one is true, Sara? Do you even know?"

Shepard turned her gaze away, and Liara stepped closer, holding out her hand. "This is all I have. My mother is gone, my family wants me to vanish, my career is lost, and the only thing left for me is to hope that when this all ends, something is left for me. I cannot fight your battles, heal the wounds others have torn into your soul. I cannot bring Major Kyle back. All I can do is share your pain."

Shepard's expression twisted. "And that's all I'm good for, Liara! Dragging people down with me to fucking die. I don't want it to be that way! I can ... deal with it, shove it down, and then –"

Liara shook her head. "It is still there, Shepard. I woke when you were upset from the nightmare before Presrop. You could feel my anger with Dunn when you interrupted our argument. Do you think I am not already hurt when you sit in this ... this cave, and drink yourself to sleep, and come out pretending you are fine?"

Liara got even closer. "I know, Sara, what it means when you go blank. I do it too." She reached for Shepard's hand, the flesh still too strangely warm in her own. "I will not break."

Shepard refused to meet her eyes. "You don't know what you're asking."

Liara felt herself tremble. "Then show me. I will not let you go." Her grip tightened, her heart speeding up, and finally Shepard met her gaze again, eyes filled with something hurt and broken.

Liara pushed, her senses and feelings expanding, flesh on flesh. The energy in her body racing along her limbs, joining her to Shepard –

It wasn't the simple blend of focused memories, of seeking specific things. It wasn't controlled. It wasn't something Liara had done before, and the broken spaces and hurts in her own heart stabbed at her like glass before her vision seemed to shatter.

She felt her body against Shepard's – heat pressed against her coolness, desire ringing through her core, up the flesh on her spine – but memories and emotions pouring through her mind were too overwhelming.

The degradation and pain, the agony and sick torture of the slavers, the shame and humiliation. The teasing sweetness of drugs, the hot rasp of the electro-whip, slicing into her back. Everything. The hard days of living hand to mouth, hustling drugs, killing in a joyful, shouting ecstasy of rictus rage.

She felt herself slipping away, feeling the grip of Shepard on her arm, pulling her closer. She couldn't move, couldn't breathe. She could feel the blood thundering through Shepard's body, through her own. She saw so many images of Shepard's life, slashed with cold pain.

Felt unending, hot rage, boxed in by cold, hard despair. Felt the sting as, again and again, the people she reached out to betrayed her. The gang she ran with, fighting for her right not to be raped. The gang leaders, using her to their own ends. The endless fights and battles in the Penal Legion, curled into a battered blanket, shivering against the rest of her squad, trying not to cry out in pain from half-treated wounds.

She felt herself falling, felt Shepard falling. She didn't know what was happening anymore, or who she was. She felt hot tears falling on her face, felt her hands pulling at Shepard's clothes. She didn't know what she was doing. She could feel so many different emotions. Love. Fear. Sorrow.

She nearly screamed as Torfan burst into her mind, not flashes of horror, but the entire conflict, the pain of wounds, the ugly expression on Rai's face when Shepard shot him. The screaming broken English of a batarian mother, begging the humans not to kill her child, crying that he didn't have a bomb on him, and the cruel laugh when Shields emptied a shotgun into the boys face.

She felt her body clinging against Shepard's, felt her hands sliding against bare skin, felt her uniform flay under a biotic pull. Jolts of pleasure shuddered up her spine, into her body, as was lifted and half thrown, half dropped on the narrow bed. She moaned into Shepard's shoulder, crying in pain, crying in joy, crying in confusion, as the meld smashed through everything she was, through everything Shepard was. She felt fingernails against her skin, and she pressed into them, her hands moving down, her body sliding across Sara's.

She wasn't sure when it started, the pain, or the pleasure, or feeling what Sara felt, or the spinning. She felt herself slam against the bed, the floor. She felt teeth on her breasts, felt her hands sink into Sara's body, felt heavy pressure from biotics on her own frame. Knuckles digging into her azure. Memories kept flooding into her mind, emotions ripping up and down her very soul. She couldn't think, couldn't reason - her body reacted, her mind staggering as two people blurred together.

She felt herself dig fingers into the bed, smothering her moans, as she saw herself in Shepard's memories – impossibly pure, impossibly beautiful, impossibly elegant. Even in the rapture and confusion she was in, she felt embarrassed, but it was swept away by more pleasure, more melding. The bond was like fire, like spikes of iron hammered into both of them, to the point Liara could not tell what was her body and what was Shepard's when the first orgasms hit her frame.

There was no pause, no stopping, they both pushed their grasp on each other, forcing their bond deeper, as their bodies reacted with mindless need. It only grew – the meld deeper, more out control, the violence more focused, harder, driven and passionate. Teeth and fingernails left bleeding, hot furrows. Backs arched as nipples were rubbed raw, as fingers were pistoned until they went numb. Liara barely could think as Shepard wrapped around her, fingernails sunk into her own breasts, screaming as Liara's tongue did it's work.

It was only when something in them both snapped, when Liara's mind was little more than quivering, screaming release, that she finally lost it, both of them dissolving into some intermix of Shepard, Liara, and pleasure. Emotions so pure, so sweet, that if she could weep she would have. The feeling of being held in an embrace that nothing could break. Waves of frantic fear, of being left, of not being good enough, of being abandoned. Their fears and hopes, their miseries and triumphs, melted and ran together like hot wax, and Liara arched her back in as everything shattered in a single burning moment that only ended with darkness claiming what was left of their conscious thoughts.

When Liara awoke, it was in a tangle of bloody, sweaty sheets and limbs. She felt drained and empty, happy and tired, calm... and confused. Wait, why is my skin blue...oh. Liara. I ... yes.

She tried to sit up and her whole body nearly screamed from the stiffness. Her uniform was torn in half on the floor, her underclothes having fallen into small piles next to it. Shepard's BDU's were in pieces.

She felt Shepard asleep, clinging tightly. There were claw marks and bruises, bite marks... .Liara shivered, the feeling in her stomach a mix of wonder, horror, and arousal. She released the pain had turned her on, and wondered if that was Shepard stamped into her or something else.

She could feel Sara in a way she never could before. A slow hot pulse of ... presence in her mind. A second heartbeat. She stifled a groan, too weak to do anything but lay back against Sara's body, trying to sort her thoughts out.

It was ... impossible. Liara wasn't even sure where she began and Sara ended now. This wasn't a link, this wasn't even a sexual meld. This was a bond, one literally driven into them deeper than Liara, in her admitted limited experience, had ever heard of.

Part of her felt like it was glowing. She knew, now, what Shepard had never been able to get out, to articulate – that she was terrified, not of failure, but of abandonment. Of disappointing those who chose to believe in her. Her worst nightmare wasn't of her years of captivity, or of gang activity, or even of the vision of the Prothean extinctions.

It was of Anderson looking at her with disgust and turning his back on her. Liara bit her lip, hugging the sleeping woman tighter, trying to find some kind of baseline from which she could ... function.

She knew things, now that she shouldn't. She knew what had driven Shepard to despair, the OSD from Kyle detailing and confirming that the Manswell Foundation backed Cerberus, that the SA was harvesting L2s at the end of their lives to produce some kind of serum that boosted the biotic power of new biotics. She had seen the awful, hate-carved visage of Admiral Dragunov dressing her down in the comm room, the shame and bitter fury Shepard had to swallow.

She saw and felt the horrible shock and pain Shepard had suffered when she'd seen Liara die.

Liara shook her head weakly. This ... was supposed to make them happy. To make them whole. To take away all the pain. She knew Shepard must have experienced everything she had, seen her whole life, every failure, every frustration, her stupid rejection of Amania. Compared to the nightmare of Shepard's life, her trials must have seemed childish.

Could she actually bear up under the weight of Shepard's pain and past?

With a groan, Shepard stirred, eyes flickering open with a rapid movement around the room, stopping once she recognized Liara. Liara knew now how panicked, even if only for a second, Shepard would be in close contact with someone, and biting her lip, managed to suppress her own discomfort enough to disentangle their legs.

She stopped, though, when Shepard gently touched her chin. "I ... I am sorry I ... pushed you through that, Liara. I – "

Liara cut her off by shaking her head. "I pushed, not you. And ... while I do not know if I can deal with all of this as I claimed...it is what I wanted. Do not apologize."

Shepard laid her head back. "Fuck. I can only hope everyone was goddamned asleep, but Garrus and Telanya must have heard that. This..."

Liara didn't move, her body still against Shepard. The smell of sweat, human and asari, need, and the faint tang of blood lingered in the air, and Liara didn't care. No matter how hard it was, Liara belatedly realized, she was still happy. She was tremendously happy. She couldn't figure out why for a long moment, until she felt the pulse of the bond between them.

She could feel Shepard's love.

She knew Sara was hers, and she was Sara's. If death claimed her soul for siari tomorrow...at least, once in her life, she'd finally succeeded at something.

Shepard's face twisted into a small smile. "You feel ... happy. I feel complete. Or new."

Liara turned to face her and nodded slowly. "I ... I intended just to...share. To ... be there to let you know you were not alone. I seem to have miscalculated."

Shepard couldn't help the grin that stole over her features, softening her eyes. For a moment, years of pain and burdens fell away, and Shepard gave a quiet, but happy sounding, laugh. "I ... sorry, Liara. Mind is just blown." She took in the dark blue bruises on Liara's naked form, and the happiness leached out of her eyes. "Jesus Christ..."

She pulled the covers off of Liara, taking in the damage, the raking fingernail claw marks, the bruising, the blood. Shepard's face went pale, eyes widening in broken horror. And Liara could feel – feel the self hate Shepard had, the feeling she'd done nothing but ruin Liara, use her.

It made Liara realize more than ever that Jason Dunn and Beatrice Shields had no understanding of Sara Shepard. At all. Liara aped Shepard's gesture, lifting her chin with a hand. "Shepard. You are what you are. And I am a part of that now. You did not do anything to me I did not want. Goddess, I could not stop myself. I enjoyed it."

Shepard gave her a sad look. "Because we mind-fucked each other so hard when I woke up I wondered why my crest felt so weird?"

Liara glanced down. "I wondered why I was blue for a moment. It is ..." Liara shook her head. "That does not matter, Sara. The why is less important than the fact that I feel what you feel. My soul is with yours. If you enjoyed it, so did I. And ..." She trailed off, gesturing at Shepard's own bruises and marks, and blushed. "This is not what I expected it to be like."

Shepard nodded. "I ... know. God, this is so fucking confusing."

Liara smiled. "Do you at least feel better?"

Shepard stopped, and kissed Liara. "I'm a goddamned idiot for not listening to you. I'm beyond better. I feel like I just had sex with the most beautiful woman I've ever met and discovered the beauty of her soul." She paused, thinking for several seconds, emotions flitting like the shadows of clouds across her face, before fixing into a small, thin smile.

"I am Sara Shepard. I am alive, and I'm not going to let myself fall ever again." She touched Liara's cheek, hesitant, almost worshipful. Liara couldn't suppress a wave of happiness at the mere simple touch, and that made Shepard smile even more.

Shepard struggled to find the words. "I can't .. explain it. I can't put it into words that make sense. I'm not stupid enough to think one night like this changes anything." She reached out as Liara's face fell, and smiled. "Let me finish."

Shepard licked her lips. "I felt you, in a way I never have before. Not the sex. Not the emotions. Just being a part of you. Being combined with you. I know I can carry all this shit by myself. But I don't have to. Tonight changes nothing, and everything. Tonight tells me I'm not alone. I'm not so broken that I can't be reached. Be touched. Be loved."

She looked away, and Liara was shocked to see tears run down her cheeks. Shepard's voice trembled. "I don't have any idea how we're going to do this. But we're going to do it together. I let myself fall to pieces and either expected people to pick me up, or used the fact that I'd fallen to justify how I acted."

She looked up, and the bond surged between them with so much pure, raw emotion Liara couldn't breathe. "But I'm awake. That's what it feels like, Liara. Waking up from an ugly dream and realizing I can goddamned well hang on to what I have."

Liara nodded. "I feel as if I am wounded." She saw the wince of pain on Shepard's face, and shook her head. "Not like that. Seeing what you went through, all of it, not just flashes...drove home to me that you are right, in some ways. I cannot just fix you. Whatever it is we offer to each other, we have to find a way to move past our wounds. I cannot make them go away. I can only hope what I offer – love, acceptance, trust – gives us something to build on."

Shepard ran her hand through her matted hair, nodding. "I don't want to offer you misery."

Liara lifted her chin. "And you have not! There is more to what we are than two broken people clinging to each other. There is hope, Sara. There is the knowledge that I am not going to break, not going to flee. That you are not going to use me or hurt me." She closed her eyes, feeling for the bond between them, unable to keep herself from shivering at it's strength, it's warmth.

Old, ancient words she'd heard only once, at a bonding ceremony, came from her lips. "I am your strength, and you are mine. I am your light when yours goes dark, and you are my bravery when my courage fails. I am yours, if you will have me."

Shepard swallowed, then smiled and kissed her again. "I do."

Shepard finally let her hand drop, groaning as she got to her feet and picked up Liara with her. "Are you ... um...can you walk?" Shepard's cheeks had gone red, and Liara herself was torn between her own embarrassment and a shocking jolt of amusement. To her own surprise, her answer was almost playful.

"No problems walking, but I think you broke my arm."

Shepard's expression became even more embarrassed, but she muttered. "That's what you get when you stick your fingers where they don't belong, Doctor."

Shepard flopped on the bed. Her nakedness was only enhanced by the smooth interplay of her muscles, the bruising and marks of Liara's fingernails only making her more erotic and striking. Liara made herself exhale and regarded her uniform on the floor with some concern. "I ... I think I will have to borrow one of your BDU outfits, Sara, if I am to leave the room..."

Shepard nodded. "Second drawer down." She glanced at the time, and sighed. "VI, status report."

The VI chimed from the wall haptic panel. "Ship status nominal. No incidents."

Shepard blew her breath out, sending a tuft of hair flying out of her face. "I'm going to scout the mess deck, make sure you and I have a clean run to the showers. I have a pair of robes in the wall locker there, you can use one if you don't bleed on it too much."

Liara rolled her eyes, as Shepard put on the other robe, wincing as she tied the belt, and went out into the ship. Liara picked her way past discarded clothing, before looking at herself in Shepard's mirror.

The dullness in her gaze was gone, and she couldn't wipe the stupid smile off her face. There was a spot of blood on her lip, which she wiped off, then took in the other injuries. The scratches and bite marks were already healing, the bruises hurt but no more than the wounds she'd taken so far. Her shoulder ached, abominably, and the medical package was flashing red lights, showing it was empty again.

A part of her couldn't believe what she did last night, even with every single second burned into her mind. She looked into the image in the mirror, and some hint of the bond she had with Shepard trickled into her mind, a feeling of sheer satisfaction and smug glee. She heard the sound of water running, and imagined Shepard in the small shower, water trickling down her form. She blushed, almost out of habit, then remembered what they had just spent the night doing.

She couldn't stop a laugh from bubbling up out of her mouth as she put on Shepard's other robe and decided to see if Shepard wanted company.

A/N: I'm gratified that no one had complaints about the desecration of canon :D The next few chapters are more fluff before Noveria.

Oh, snowy Noveria. How pissed people will be at me due to you. :D

---

The arrival of the Normandy back at the Citadel was punctuated by the docks being cleared by rough-looking, black uniformed SA Commissars and a healthy dollop of C-SEC police officers. Reporters and protestors complained and were dismissively given the verbal heave-ho, even as the silvery crescent of the Normandy slowly approached the docks.

Shepard had awoken in the best mood she could remember. The shower and what happened afterward helped with that, but also contributed to some rather slow movements as she was careful with her bruises. The last thing she needed was Chakwas asking where they came from, after all. Or worse, Joker.

After a quick breakfast – mostly spent trading good matured barbs with Garrus – and a quick walk around the ship to check in with the department heads, she walked up to the cockpit. Joker was there, hat pulled down, fingers moving gracefully through the maneuvers for docking, the ship barely shuddering as it came to a halt. She paused for a moment to admire his deft handling, the quiet competence and grace in every movement he made.

"Flight Lieutenant, good landing." Her voice was soft, but it still caught at Joker's attention. Joker grunted, glancing over his shoulder at her, then turned around more fully, taking a second to examine her expression. "Is everything okay, Commander?"

Shepard blinked, surreptitiously checking her uniform to see if she'd spilled something on herself. "Yes, why?"

Joker coughed. "You're smiling. You usually smile when putting your foot through someone's face. Just checking."

Shepard rolled her eyes, pulling down the IMC. "Even I am in a good mood sometimes, Joker." She paused, taking a breath, and spoke into the mike.

"Crew of the Normandy, this is Commander Shepard. We're back at the Citadel, for three days. The ship will be undergoing repairs on the fuel systems, armor, and outer hull, and we'll be refreshing and reloading ship stores. Our MAKO tanks are pretty shot up and need an overhaul, as do some other ship components, like the damned coffee maker."

She heard snorts of laughter from Ops Alley and continued. "Since all ship systems will be shut down – including the Core – I am declaring liberty for all hands. We kicked the dogshit out of a cruiser twice our weight, fucked up a small army of Cerberus thugs, and took out an organization that threatened innocents everywhere – human and alien – without losing a single soldier or suffering any catastrophic damage."

She exhaled. "I have had more than a few commands. Out of all of them, this crew remains the professionals and experts that I have come to rely upon. As usual, you continue to outperform and take names. I expect everyone back on the ship by Thursday at 0900. We'll be departing for our next target, and if our intel is right, that target is a pointy-faced fuck I plan to introduce to my fist. We are going to end this shit." She paused.

"Until then, I expect you to get the hell off my ship and celebrate. Let's not repeat last time's incidents in elevators, but have fun. At 1900 tonight, drinks are on the CO at Flux. Ship's Company – dismissed!"

She placed the mike down, a small smile on her face, and Joker's eyebrow raised higher. "You're going to a nightclub?"

Shepard fixed him with a flat stare. "The crew needs to blow some steam off. The place is secured against goddamned reporters, the music is good, and it has lots of dark corners I can hide in and enjoy my drinks in peace."

Her face was set in an almost peaceful expression, and Joker couldn't help but think something vital had changed. He tapped a haptic control to drain the fuel lines to the engines, and was about to make another remark when a high priority comm request tagged through. "Looks like you have people waiting for you dockside, Commander. AIS."

She sighed, and rolled her eyes. "Great. No doubt they're here to bitch me out about something else I fucked up, before Udina, the Council, the media and whoever else gets their shots in."

Joker shrugged, scratching idly at his beard. "I could say something about the price of fame and glory."

She gave a small quiet laugh, and then examined him minutely, her eyes taking him in for several seconds. "Make sure you show up tonight, Joker. I ... need some input on a few things. And I value yours." She paused, and then patted the back of Joker's chair. "You did a damned fine job that trip out, Joker. Get out of that chair and have some fun."

She turned, walking away with less of her usual stride and more of a ... sway? Joker blinked, shook his head, and leaned back in his pilot's chair.

"Jesus. Happy Shepard. What next, polite Wrex?" Wondering in the back of his mind what the hell she could need to talk to him about, Joker decided on heading down to see what Tali was up to.

O-OSaBC-O

Shepard let most of the crew depart before she changed into her dress blues, pocketing the modified OSD Telanya had provided. A part of her still longed to take the real information to the Council and Udina, and let the shit fall over what faces it would, but Saren was still the primary threat.

She felt Liara's presence in the back of her mind, cool, soft... sleepy. Suppressing a smirk, she figured she could let Liara recover a bit more from last night as she dealt with the pack of unhappy people across the boarding ramp that were no doubt waiting on her. Taking a deep breath, she departed the ship, crossing the ramp and coming up to the group.

In the lead was a slender, almost fragile looking man in his thirties, with dark, almond shaped eyes and slicked back black hair. His uniform was pressed and perfect, the single red cord hanging from his shoulder and the gold eye-in-the-pyramid flash on his right side indicating he was with the AIS. Those dark eyes sought out Shepard, measuring her, assessing, and codifying. The agent's decorations were few but impressive – two SA commendations, a Star of Valor, and three Silver Stars.

Next to him was the scarred, blocky form of a Commissariat Major, blazing ranks of medals and decorations covering his left side, a thick red sash under a leather belt holding up a huge pistol on one side, and a neural mace on the other. Rather than the standard SA uniform, he wore all black – heavy, coarse pants tucked into thick, steel toed combat boots, and an equally blunt armored breastplate atop a stylized black leather jacket that broke at mid-thigh. A peaked cap covered his squad head, furrows of scar tissue obscuring one eye, trailing down the cheek to twist the man's lips into a snarling, fixed sneer.

The last member of the group towered over the other two. Despite his height, he was rail thin, his uniform hanging off of him. Slate gray eyes under heavy dark brows took in her approach, his sallowness, aged features and clean-shaven head giving him an almost funeral aspect. He stood ramrod straight, his hands folded almost stiffly behind his back. His rank insignia showed him to be a full Admiral of the Red, a command-level admiral not assigned to any particular fleet, and his neat rows of decorations featured commendations Shepard hadn't ever seen before. Her eyes were drawn to the savagely blood-red ribbon and gold star that nestled neatly around his neck, and she immediately determined this person's identity.

She came to a stop, snapping off a perfect salute. "Commander Shepard, reporting as ordered, sirs."

The tall admiral spoke first, returning her salute with slow but careful precision. "At ease, Commander. I am Admiral Yonis Chu, Deputy Director of the AIS. This is Colonel Reginald Thain of the AIS Internal Investigation Unit...and Major Dravus Chisholm, of the Systems Alliance Commissariat. Before you debrief the Council, we would like an opportunity to speak with you about your discoveries."

Shepard exhaled and nodded. Dravus the Dragon was damn near as feared as Shepard herself, the much-whispered "Cigar Man" of many a conspiracy theory, the hatchet-man of the Senate. She didn't know the AIS spook, but having a full colonel assigned for a debriefing wasn't the norm.

And Admiral Chu was a hero...and had been out of sight for decades, since the First Contact War, quietly doing whatever it was that admirals of his rank did. She remembered he'd been one of Kyle and Rachel's teammates...meaning the man was a complete, certified badass, no matter how old he looked or how skinny he seemed.

Given the outcome of the last batch of high-ranking officials to show up at her ship, and keeping in mind Admiral Mikhailovich's not-so-subtle warning that the intel she'd acquired would make her a liability in the eyes of some, Shepard realized she should be feeling pretty apprehensive at this point.

But buoyed by the gentle sense of Liara in her mind, her lips only quirked in amusement. "This is not the first time I have been accosted by senior command staff dockside, sir. Would you prefer to meet aboard the Normandy or conduct the tongue-lashing dockside?"

Cho's expression might have flickered in shared amusement for a moment, before he shrugged. "We're not here to pick your actions apart or second guess you, Commander. Your ship will be fine – I'm afraid it's been more than a few years since I stepped onto a frigate, does it have a meeting room or other suitable space with comms and screens?"

She nodded. "Our comms room is sound-sealed, lined with jammer fields, and has both. The seating is a touch spartan, though." She smiled again, and the AIS agent merely arched his eyebrow before trading glances with the Commissar.

Admiral Cho nodded. "An admirable choice, then. We can be out of your way in less than twenty minutes, as we just need to discuss a couple of events. Please lead the way, Commander."

The trip to the comm room reminded her much of her last interaction with top brass, except Dragunov and his gang hadn't been armed. The pointed fact the Commissar was quite armed set her nerves on edge. Commissars made her jumpy, a reminder of her time in the Legions – and of the ugly discipline actions she'd seen in the wake of the mess on Horizon.

For Chu and an AIS aide to be here made a certain kind of sense. But the presence of a Commissar indicated Chu expected trouble of some kind out of Shepard. And that worried her, in that she didn't know what she was supposed to have fucked up to need to cause trouble.

The comm room's usual gray décor didn't settle her nerves, but the fact that, once the door was closed, the admiral didn't say anything for several seconds did. After a glance around and several moments of silence, Chu smiled. "I'll try to be brief, Commander. You're in something of a unique situation that the Systems Alliance isn't sure of how to deal with, and shockingly, the latest revelations you have brought to our attention haven't made my job any easier."

Shepard nodded, saying nothing, and Chu continued. "To wit, I've had my AIS people going over the data logs you recovered from Cerberus HQ – at least, the subset you forwarded to us. I fear that the information the Illusive Man gave you, at least at the first pass, seems to be correct. I've been ... occupied dealing with other fallout in the past day or so, and I wasn't given enough time to analyze the data myself, which is why I brought Colonel Thain."

Shepard glanced at him, then back at the Admiral. "And what have you found?"

Chu sighed. "There was very significant penetration of several areas of the SA, including intelligence, financial, economic, educational, and even military-industrial. Cord-Hislop Aerospace built 70% of the airframe of the Normandy, and had complete access to the IES designs and the Tantalus Core concepts. Worse, many of the subsidiary corporations were tied into all manner of other sensitive operations."

The Commissar spoke. "We are already ... cleaning house. Quietly. Messily. Suicides, accidents, muggings. Our own analysis shows Cerberus was not stupid enough to attempt to infiltrate the Commissariat, so by default we are forced to take a leading hand in the purification." There was a cold glee in the man's voice, one that drew a slightly disturbed look from the colonel.

Shepard nodded. The guy must be having a blast, BBQing anyone who fails his purity exams.

Chu sourly nodded. "The real and unfortunate truth is, of course, that we are stuck in cleaning house until we can be sure the last of the rats are gone. That means, for the moment, that there is a great deal of political and ... shall we say, motivational confusion at high command. That's part of why I'm here. The AIS has been hamstrung in providing you intelligence support since the start of your mission, and oddly enough with the destruction of Cerberus such interference has stopped. That in and of itself tells me quite a few things, none of them good."

Shepard nodded, gritting her teeth. "Can I expect more support from the SA and the AIS?"

Chu sighed. "The AIS, yes. The SA? Who knows right now, Commander. I can't speak for High Command, because I don't use that kind of language around ladies." He smiled thinly, and continued. "Now, before I go over what we know, I understand you have some leads of your own. Admiral Vandefar communicated to High Command your ... inquiry ... regarding Noveria. I can only presume this is connected to Saren, and the source of said data is the Illusive Man?"

Shepard nodded. "Yes, sir. He seemed to think Saren was a legitimate threat. He spoke of the findings of Dr. T'Soni and other information he'd acquired, but didn't elaborate beyond telling us that Saren would be on Noveria, in a hidden facility. He seemed to suggest that the Corporate Court was not aware of Saren's ... facility or presence."

Chu nodded. "Makes sense. I don't doubt the Court knows about it on some level, but the screed they're putting out now mostly indicates they think this is a struggle between Spectres, not something that affects them. The fact that ExoGeni got obliterated gave a few of them pause, but none of them have been very helpful."

Chu pulled out an info-pad. "Our information is much sketchier. We've traced some of Saren's activities and actions. He's been in contact with a very old krogan warlord known as Okeer. Okeer is persona non grata among krogan, for reasons not clear to us. From what little we know, Okeer sold or gave Saren a sizable population of krogan mercenaries. Okeer also appears to have taken large cash payments from Saren in return for some other forms of research transactions. Our people on Tuchanka aren't 100% certain if this is some kind of end-run around the CDEM, research into the genophage, or what, but it sounds bad."

Chu tabbed down, his frown increasing. "Meanwhile, Matriarch Benezia's Triune Order has gone to ground, but we've had dozens of incidents of cult members funneling money, weapons, supplies, light craft and what not to various staging areas. Our most recent analysis shows their numbers are very sizable, with at least fifteen thousand of them active, and more sympathetic. Benezia has been sighted in the Dark Rim asari colonies at least three times in the past month, but the most recent sighting had her boarding a turian frigate and heading towards the Ralx Mass Relay. Significantly, that relay connects to Noveria."

Shepard nodded. "Do we have any kinds of leads on Saren's bases of operations or sightings of the black ship?"

Colonel Thain spoke up. "To the former, many rumors and zero hits, although we did raid the locations you forwarded to command that the asari Shiala told you about. All were abandoned. We've been unable to find details of this 'Virmire' location, although not for lack of trying. As far as the super-dreadnaught, we had two sightings near the Perseus Veil."

Chu put his info-pad away and folded his arms. "Despite whatever garbage the Council is spewing about the ship being of geth manufacture, AIS is taking the line that this ship is some kind of artifact – perhaps one of the ships used by whoever knocked off the Protheans. Obviously if Saren had access to more he'd be using them, and based on your own reports, he's looking for some kind of super-weapon, so that may indeed be his goal. In any event, I tend to concur with High Command that your primary task remains stopping him at whatever cost."

Shepard nodded grimly. "That was the idea, sir."

Chisholm cleared his throat, and Chu sighed. "Which brings me to the other reason for my visit. You only sent on a portion of the information you obtained from Cerberus HQ and the Illusive Man. There is quite a bit of concern in some areas that you may decide to hand this information over to the Citadel in toto. Given that we haven't had a chance to vet the information, as well as other recent events, I'm afraid I've been given orders to secure the data, especially before you hand any evidence over to the Council."

Shepard sighed. "I'm going to be pretty blunt, sir. I haven't fully finished reviewing it myself. There's a ton of it, and a lot of it covers things that I thought couldn't happen in the SA. Until I'm convinced that whoever I hand it to isn't going to chunk it in the garbage, it's staying with me."

Chu's eyes narrowed. "Commander, your orders are very clear."

Shepard smiled back. "Yes, sir, they are. Section Four of the Spectre Code. Spectres are expected to follow all lawful and legal orders of their home military organizations, except in such circumstances in which the Spectre feels following such orders would violate the safety and security of the Citadel, or act in direct contravention to standing Council Orders. Incidents such as this will be reviewed to determine if they were appropriate or not by the Council." She exhaled. "I'm not handing over the data to the Systems Alliance, sir. Nor am I doing so to the Council."

Chu did a double-take. "What?"

Shepard shrugged. "I've had an altered copy of the financial transactions and evidence pointing at Saren's location prepared, and a sanitized version of the shipping manifests made. What I plan to hand over to the Council will mostly just point at Cerberus fronts as the source of money, that and a few individuals. I'm not happy about hiding the real facts from the Council, but they haven't been a hundred percent cooperative so far, and I don't need to be sidelined by whatever circus this would turn into. I am very concerned, however, that the people backing Cerberus will get away scot free, and I have no intention of giving over the data that tells me who the real crooks are."

Chu rubbed his temples. "The High Command won't like this, Shepard."

She let her weight fall back onto one hip and folded her arms, fixing him with her gaze. "With all due respect, sir, High Command can kiss my ass. They already had me cover for them with their pet man-eating plant. If I give over this information, I have to trust people who've already lost my trust to do the right thing."

Colonel Thain frowned. "Ma'am, while I take your point, there's no way for the AIS to know who to investigate or not without at least a copy of said information. There's not a lot you can do with it, unless you plan some kind of vigilante actions and murdering your way through top officials, with no more proof than files from a known terrorist with every reason to mislead you. What the Illusive Man gave you may or may not be accurate. Until we check it out, we don't know – and neither do you."

Shepard shook her head. "You're aware Admiral Hackett tasked me with talking to Major Kyle before the incident a few days ago, aren't you?"

Chu winced. "We're aware of that. I'm afraid that whoever gave him the orders may have been hoping to silence Kyle before he could speak out. That backfired magnificently."

Shepard nodded. "Kyle had been doing his own investigations, sir. And much of what he found backs up the data the Illusive Man gave me. I don't know or care about his sources, but at the moment I'm inclined to believe what I have is the real deal. I'm not going to hand it over for a full review and let people run around covering things up."

Commissar Chisholm stepped up. "Do these files have any information suggesting the Commissariat is penetrated?"

Shepard frowned, pulling up her omni-tool and doing a quick term search. "...no. You're apparently right about that. Cerberus felt the commissars were under too much observation to bother with."

Chisholm nodded. "I can understand your hesitance, Commander. You're a person with a known fixation against those who hurt the helpless. Right now, though, you already have a mission. You wait until you take out Saren and whatever happens after that, and the window to pursue these goons will be gone. You have two choices. You can stand pat, keep the data, and the AIS won't be able to do anything to find the people involved. Nor is anyone going to lift a finger to help you afterward, either. Or you can play ball and trust that at least Admiral Chu and the Commissariat are not a part of these, and actually get to see the people involved fry."

Shepard gave the man a dubious look. "And there would be no red-tape, political committee investigative bullshit?"

Commissar Chisholm gave a low, almost breathy chuckle. "No fear of that, Commander. If you have the originals, my people will go to work right away. I don't need subpoenas to suppress clear and present dangers to the Systems Alliance. And I don't need hard evidence either."

Shepard exhaled, and then punched the data up on her omnitool, and beamed it to that of the AIS colonel, who nodded appreciatively. "I'd better not regret this."

Chisholm shrugged. "If it gets out, I'll kill the Colonel myself." Thain made a choked sound, and the Commissar regarded him with a raised, bushy eyebrow. "I'm serious, Colonel. I expect names and acts by this time tomorrow, or I'll have to assume Commander Shepard is correct and take ... corrective actions."

Chu shook his head. "That won't be necessary, I'm sure. However, Colonel Thain can't analyze the data instantly. He'll need at least some time to process it, unless Shepard has already done that."

Shepard shook her head. "Not really. My people found lists of commercial transactions for various real-estate locations, sometimes entire worlds, sold by Cerberus to Saren. I forwarded that list to the Council already, so that STG teams could start looking for any bases. Other than that and cleaning it up, and picking through a few gory details, much of it is still unreviewed."

Chu nodded. "That is to be expected. I ... appreciate your cooperation on this. You have my word that you won't be disappointed." He regarded her with curiosity for a long moment. "You're one of the few people who've spoken with the Illusive Man. What's your take on him?"

Shepard spat the words. "Slippery. Refined. Manipulating. The bastard set his own partners in crime up so slick it was like he choreographed it, and he was sitting on a damned deck chair on some beach, having a drink. He kept his face concealed." She sighed, and the admiral's face turned thoughtful for a long moment.

"If the STG is correct, then the Illusive Man is one Jack Harper. A veteran of Shanxi, who was responsible for a resistance cell that saved the life of Richard Williams and was instrumental in stopping some kind of secondary activity involving Desolas Arterius."

Shepard's lips twisted. "A relative of Saren?"

Chu nodded. "His brother. The details remain unknown for the most part, but it corroborates an early link between Williams and Harper. How Rachel got dragged into this mess we may never know...I'm sickened by the idea the woman I know could have been part of Cerberus."

Shepard grimaced, pinching the bridge of her nose. "Yeah, I ... looked up to her." With an angry exhalation, she shook her head to clear it. "Is that all, sir?"

The admiral nodded. "Colonel, you have anything else?" After a moment, when no answer was forthcoming, he half turned "Colonel Thain?"

The colonel was reviewing data on the omni-tool rapidly, eyes flickering over the data, opening multiple windows, and pausing to wince several times. "Admiral...my apologies. I was just immersed in the data...this is ... very bad." His voice sounded shaken.

Chu's face grew even graver. "How bad, son?"

Thain's voice dropped to a near whisper. "The Senate looks mostly clean, as does High Command, but there are ... instances of possible collusion or corruption. Worse, there's evidence that at the very least the Fleet Master and possibly Anita Doyle knew the identity of the Illusive Man and turned a blind eye to their activities in return for Cerberus stopping pirate raids on our outlying colonies. There's links to ... god. Sirta, the Manswell Foundation, Detrimus Entertainment, Northstar..." After a moment. "Sir, Cerberus was probably behind several high-profile assassinations. The amount of money being tossed around is phenomenal. There are thousands of links to several components of the SA's disbursement and contracting centers."

Chu's face tightened. "Sounds like there's more rot to clean up than we thought. You mentioned you'd made a copy cleaned up to avoid links to the SA. Your altered evidence had better be very well done to fool the STG."

Shepard nodded. "The person who did it was a C-SEC customs officer and financial investigator, who is familiar with the types of data searches and links they are going to be looking for."

The colonel looked up, his attention finally broken from the glowing text in front of him. "That would be Sergeant Telanya, yes?"

Shepard nodded slowly. "Yes, that's correct."

The colonel gave a sharp look to Chu, who sighed. "Shepard, the decision to attach the asari to your crew was made by High Command in some kind of trade-swap with the asari government. That is, the council of Matriarchs. AIS believes the woman is there to monitor the activities and motivations of Dr. T'Soni, and – based on certain observational models of past actions – possibly kill her if T'Soni acts in a way that implies she's in league with her mother."

Shepard's jaw tightened. Garrus' taste in women had gone from nice to lousy, and she wondered if he knew. Then she thought back to last night, and the closeness she had with Liara. Of course he knew, he just didn't say anything. She found that somewhat depressing, but shook her head. "That is a very good possibility, sir. Nonetheless, my choices are to use her fabrication, or take the whole sordid mess in front of the Council. I can't recommend the latter."

Chu gave a measured nod. "Do you think their assessment of Dr. T'Soni as a potential liability is accurate, Commander?"

She couldn't stop the flare of anger, or the tightening of her fists, but she forced herself to speak as calmly as possible. "No sir, I do not. In any way."

The colonel's eyebrow shot up again, but Chu paid him no mind, the cool gray eyes boring into Shepard's. "Very well. We'll see what we can turn up with this information, and if anything else shakes out we'll contact you." He gave a sigh and glanced at the Commissar. "If there is nothing else..."

The Commissar gazed thoughtfully at Shepard. "I need a word with her alone, Admiral, if you don't mind. I'll see you topside." He waited as Admiral Chu and the colonel departed, before turning his scarred visage back towards Shepard. He paused, withdrawing a silvery disk from his pocket, placing it on the floor. A cool wash of static and ozone crackled around them.

"A disruptor field, Commander. What I say is for your ears only. Am I clear?"

Shepard nodded, and the man smiled. "Two things. First, Jason Dunn. He'll be leaving with me for a nice ... interview."

She rocked back on her heels. "How – "

Chisholm sighed. "Don't be stupid about this, Commander. The Commissariat has a person on every single ship in the SA. People think 'Commissar' and associate that with 'big coat, pointy hat, biotic'. That isn't the case. No, I'm not telling you who he or she is. Mr. Dunn is a deserter, a traitor, and a potential gold mine of information about Cerberus."

She sighed. She wasn't real happy with Jason, both for his actions and his reaction to Liara, but she'd always planned to let him slip away, after everyone else had left the ship. The fact that the Commissariat had someone on her ship spying was something she cursed herself for not thinking of earlier. She swallowed. "What happens to him?"

Chisholm shrugged. "If he's cooperative? We'll clean him up, debrief him, slap him on the wrist for being a naughty boy and turn him loose with a six month citizenship demerit. Probably hire him to do workups on the Cerberus forces. If he's uncooperative...well, he's already familiar with the Penal Legions, isn't he?"

Shepard closed her eyes. "I don't have a choice in this, do I?"

Chisholm folded his arms. "He's an old teammate. I get that. But the man still joined a pack of alien-kicking thugs and letting him go without finding out what he knows is a fundamentally bad idea. If I can get him released early, if he cooperates, I will. It's up to him."

She nodded grimly. "And the second thing?"

Chisholm's expression tightened. "The reason for the disruptor field. Shepard, it probably feels like you fallen down the rabbit hole. Lots of things going on. Lots of political back and forth. Kyle's stunt, the revelations of Cerberus, the mess on Feros. I understand that."

The commissar stepped forward. "I cannot give you any more details except to say that there are things that even the highest level of government is not aware of. Very, very few people are. As one of those people...do not, for any reason, let up on the chase for Saren and Benezia. No matter what you are told, no matter how crazy you end up sounding. There is proof that dates before the mess on Eden Prime that your vision from that Prothean beacon is reality."

Shepard opened her mouth but the commissar raised a hand. "I cannot give you any more details, or answer any of the questions I'm sure you have. Find and kill Saren and Benezia. Stop whatever they are doing. That is your highest priority. Disobey any orders to the Commissariat will handle the rest."

Shepard's expression was strained. "That's it? I go through all this bullshit and you pat me on the head and tell me to keep at it and won't even tell me what the fuck is going on?"

Chisholm tilted his head. "Remember when you were in the Penal Legions, and the bombs we put in your spine would go off if certain key words or phrases were spoken?" With a slow tap of his finger against his temple, the commissar nodded. "I cannot tell you more."

Shepard took a step back, her mind whirling, and the Commissar smiled. "I'll pick up Mr. Dunn topside, and get him off your hands, Commander." He bent to pick up his disruptor, sticking it back in his pocket. "Please keep in mind what I said."

With that, the Commissar left the room, leaving behind a greatly confused Shepard.

O-OSaBC-O

Fifteen minutes later, Jason Dunn got into an aircar with the Commissar, which lifted away from the docks and towards the Wards. The former N7 leaned his head against the head rest and signed. "Jesus, I'm glad that's over."

The Commissar nodded. "Was Benedict successful?"

Dunn shrugged. "Florez was definitely dead, and Richard Williams supposedly dead. And so far, neither Shepard nor her alien buddies have stopped to ask themselves if the Illusive Man overwrote anything when he shoved his evidence their way. The money transfers should have been covered, but it's possible a smart financial analyst with the full data set could figure it out."

Chisholm shrugged. "Null importance. What about your take on Shepard?"

Dunn smiled. "The Illusive Man was right. Shepard nearly lost her mind when that sniper took Dr. T'Soni down. And... well, after last night, I am 99% certain Shepard is banging her, too. I think the profile we have on her is fairly accurate."

Chisholm nodded. "Alright. You know what to do next. Stay out of sight for a few weeks, then make sure to get back on contact with Shepard. We have to handle this very delicately."

Dunn only smirked. "I dunno...if what I heard from the mess decks last night was any indication, she likes it rough, not delicate."

The commissar grimaced. "Has anyone ever told you that you're an asshole, Dunn?"

---

Chapter 90: Chapter 81 : Tetrimus, Frightened

---

A/N: I am moving along in several directions with this chapter. Hiding the events that Liara and

Shepard partook in (given the thinness of walls and the way sailors gossip) is completely unrealistic. Joker didn't know (because he rarely takes part in gossip and sleeps with his headphones in) but others know. It's best to deal with it and move on...along with other consequences.

I like Pressly. I may write an entire fic involving Pressly one day.

As for the Broker segment, well...consider it food for thought.

---

Tetrimus did not like Hagalaz. Or rather, he didn't like the weather, and he hated the ship.

The eternal lightning storm outside the ship that served as the Shadow Broker's primary base was loud, and it set his biotics on edge. The ship itself, an over-weaponed, custom-design dreadnaught, was built along utilitarian lines, making it boring to look at. It didn't help that the Broker's taste ran to black, jagged, and menacing. It was a titanic monument to compensating for something, and Tetrimus had been amused when he'd first seen the ship, so many years ago. Now he was just tired of it.

It was with no little relish that he had, over the years, sealed his own personal domain on the ship against sound, static, and vibration. The floor was covered in layers of thick rugs, the walls sprayed down with shock-absorbent foam and painted a pale gray, and he'd even spent a great deal of time hauling in his own furnishings. Various art objects, weapons, alien curiosities, and of course the bullet-perforated skulls of both of the Primarch's sons – all of these things brought him a sense of belonging and stability.

It was these little touches that made the constant agony of his physical condition a bit more bearable, on days where nothing but bad news crossed his desk – the salvaged desk of General Williams, the bloodstains from the fateful day where the Hierarchy betrayed him carefully preserved.

The entire forward wall of his room was covered in status report screens, a smaller array similar to the setup in the Broker's own den. These were for lesser operations that Tetrimus himself watched over, not the high level agents managing their own efforts. Normally, the field teams he had would report in over secure encrypted lines, or rarely by courier.

When someone had to report in person, the news was always bad. Coupled with the complete failure of two teams to take down an STG probe into a Broker financed commercial takeover, the death of an agent in batarian space, and the Broker's own foul mood over some long-term plan being thwarted, Tetrimus didn't really want more bad news.

The nervous flickering of the mandibles of the turian agent in front of him, however, warned him that this was likely to be more than just bad. "Speak", he said, his growling tones conveying his displeasure.

The turian in front of him wore the Broker uniform – black ballistic cloth under interlocking red-trimmed black plates of armor, a crossways bandolier of tech toys and grenades, and an oversized omnitool emitter. His gray plates clashed with his white face paint, and his dark eyes shifted to the info-pad in his hands.

"Yes, sir. We've finished the initial sweep and follow up on Eingana, as you requested. The Hierarchy was not really reviewing the wreckage for the signs we were, and we remained undetected. The STG team we can across did seem to be looking at the wreckage...but you told us not to engage."

Tetrimus nodded. "And your findings, Agent Sirva?"

Sirva shuddered. "We went through the wrecks of the Inusannon and Tho'ian vessels, trying to identify individual signatures of the weapon used against Eden Prime and Fourth Fleet. Our initial guesses seem to be on target, as we were able to recover actual residue from the weapon's usage at Feros. It's a magneto-hydrodynamic weapon, a mix of common meteoric iron and carbon, superheated to a liquid slurry and conveyed by a form of mass effect tunnel to the target. The beam is cohesive, but the magnetic effects make it explosive when it connects with energy shielding."

There was a pause. "Given that the metal itself has no mass signature adjustment – it's just melted metal, with no way to generate its own field - and that the amount of energy produced seems to be more than what is put into the beam, we have no real idea how it works. We know the physical aspects, but not how they manage to steer the beam, or keep the liquid in cohesion. It seems to violate several laws of physics related to both energy conservation and what we understand about mass tunnels."

The turian glanced at his info-pad. "Each one of these weapons has a unique signature based on the various mixes of iron and carbon, the stream rate, and several other factors. Compiling these based on the wreckage on Eingana, we estimate there were between 1,400 and 1,700 of the dreadnaught class ships at the battle over the planet."

Tetrimus felt the remains of his fringe contract. "That's over five times the estimate of the turian team at the site."

Sirva nodded. "Yes sir. Some of that is due to them not looking for this kind of differentiation. But most of it is due to the fact that many of the variations are subtle. We have a grand total of 1,534 different signatures...but based on the strike locations at least some of the emitters must have been on the same platform. Not a majority. Only a few. It may be a super-heavy class the same ship."

The turian looked at the info-pad again. "The ... issue I wish to bring up is this. We compared the spectragraphic and mineral analysis of the Eden Prime and Fourth Fleet wreckage to the Inusannon wrecks to form our baseline. Yesterday, we found a 100% match to the signature of Saren's ship to the wreckage on Eingana."

It took Tetrimus several seconds to process the meaning and significance of that statement. "You are implying that the same vessel that Saren commands, the vessel that destroyed Eden Prime, was present at the battle that destroyed the Inusannon and Tho'ians? Over 100,000 years ago?"

The turian nodded. "Yes sir. And...we were not able to obtain any kind of conventional dating information from the pieces, due to a lack of carbon content. But we have been looking for that specific metal now across several other sites. We have found remains that correspond to the same kind of metal that Saren's ship is built of at several sites."

The turian closed his eyes. "The oldest was in sedimentary rock over three million years old."

Tetrimus's cyberware engaged, pumping oxygen and calming sedatives into his bloodstream to counteract the shock that nearly stopped his heart. He got up from the desk, turning to his single window, staring out into the storm. The clouds, dark and menacing, billowed across the tortured skies below, lightning flashing from place to place.

Tetrimus had long thought any vestiges of fear had been burned from the wreckage of his body. In some ways, death would be a release for him. His family was dead, his honor shattered, his future likely to end in cybernetic toxic shock syndrome or cancers in a decade or so. What was left to fear?

Life, once again, was showing him how much of a vicious little bitch it could be.

The information he'd just learned was too big to get his mind around. Too crazy. Too frightening.

"Sirva. This information is now Omega Black. This cannot, under any circumstances, get out beyond the Broker Network." He turned, heading to his command console, and tapped one of the panels. "I'm sending a level six liquidation team to secure your findings and handle your team."

Sirva's mandibles sagged open as he tensed, and Tetrimus chuckled. "Don't worry, you aren't part of the clean up order." At least not for that team. Tazzik will handle you himself.

Sirva nodded bonelessly, and then exhaled with a desperate note in his voice. "...my.. .my mate is on team four."

Tetrimus turned slowly to face him, then shook his head. "You have forty eight hours to get her out, then. Be thankful you are dealing with me and not the Broker. Once you have her you are to get back here. No stops. No picking up anything. This information cannot get out."

Sirva gave a jerky nod, eyes wide. "Thank you, thank you."

Tetrimus waved a hand and the other turian bolted, leaving him alone with his thoughts. After a moment, he tapped his omni-tool bracer. "You heard?"

The rumbling basso of the Broker erupted from the air. "Of course. Your mercy continues to surprise me."

Tetrimus continued to tap at the screen. "You must not be checking the orders I'm giving the liquidation team. Mercy is for the weak. Tazzik will handle Sirva, he won't even be expecting it."

There was a pause before the Broker gave a sadistic sounding laugh. "Very well. What is your thought process on what Sirva discovered?"

Tetrimus paused. "It is a bit much to take in. My initial thinking was Saren had discovered a battleship of the race that destroyed the Protheans, and was using it to dominate the Geth in some plan to take over the Citadel or achieve his own goals. When Dr. T'Soni linked the destruction at Eingana to the same kind of vessels, things made less sense."

Tetrimus finished ordering his liquidation team, and sent the commands out. "But ... three million years? What the spirits is this even about?"

The Broker's voice was, for once, thoughtful. "It may be time to reassess our goals in this endeavor."

Tetrimus sighed, checking the time. "If the last report from Wrex is any indication, Shepard found something in the Cerberus base that she believes will lead to Saren, but hasn't shared it with anyone. If she can stop Saren, does this entire mess come to a conclusion?"

The Broker's voice took several moments to respond. "Possibly. However, there is every possibility that Saren and Benezia are not the primary actors. Consider what we know. Exterminations of all space-faring life every forty to sixty thousand cycles. Technology far beyond any known race. The capability to perform mid-system jumps. Weapons systems that seem to violate the known laws of physics. And this cycle may have been going on for millions of years."

Tetrimus nodded. "Meaning...what?"

The Broker's voice was frustrated. "I do not know. I do not know what agency would have the kind of power to eliminate entire star empires in a span of a few centuries, and then remove almost all clues as to their presence. More importantly, I do not know why such a thing would happen, much less to have it repeat hundreds of times. The only conclusions I can draw are based on the facts we do know..and what we know of Saren's researches."

The Broker sent him several files, on a batarian named Edan Had'dah. Tetrimus flicked his good mandible in confusion. "I do not see a connection."

The Broker's voice was patient, but laced with something like ... excitement. "Had'dah was a batarian aristocrat, searching in Prothean ruins for years. He spent something on the order of sixty million credits on a project several years back, a project that ended up requiring him to bring in a specialist. One of the top researchers into artificial intelligence, Shu Qian of Earth."

More images flitted to the screen in front of Tetrimus. "We know that Saren, in his discrediting of David Anderson's Spectre interview, was later involved in the death of both of these men. We know Saren used his Spectre connections to seize much of Had'dah's property. We know Saren himself consulted several topflight AI specialists...and I suspect his 'investigation' into Synthetic Insights has less to do with human corruption and more to do with him raiding their research."

Tetrimus knew the Broker was smarter than he was, or in fact, than anyone else Tetrimus had ever heard of. But the pieces the Broker was laying out for him didn't fit. "I thought the AI research would be related to his control of the geth."

The Broker made a noise of impatience, a growling utterance that never failed to send a chill up Tetrimus's spine. "You are not looking at what we already know. The recording we have of Saren admitting to Benezia that he killed Nihlus was made by geth. They were not dominated by Saren – they were recording him because they were distrustful of him and wanted to be directly in touch with this 'Nazara'."

The Broker's voice reeled off facts. "According to the dockworker on Eden Prime, Saren argued with the geth there about something. They see him as a danger. They call him 'Prophet' but are not automatically obeying him. Shepard's report about Feros included speculation that the geth attach a religious significance – not to Saren, but to whatever or whoever this Nazara is."

The Broker paused again. "Finally, the kind of AI research Saren was going after is pointless with the geth. A specialist for geth would be someone working on distributed systems, or a quarian. Both Synthetic Insights and Shu Qian were focused on large-scale unified systems...and on organic-synthetic interfaces."

Tetrimus tightened his jaw. "And you surmise what?"

The Broker's silence lingered for a second until he spoke. "I do not have enough information to formulate a complete theory. It is as if I can almost derive what is happening, except for one critical piece of information – the identity of this 'Nazara' figure. I know it is all related – the Protheans, the Beacons, whatever Saren seeks, the ship, the extinctions – all of it. I must find the pattern."

The Broker's voice dipped from its usual growl to a rumble. "I am, however, aware of two things that incline me to believe Saren is a danger. The first is the span of time between the destruction of the Inusannon and Tho'ian to when the Protheans were destroyed, and the span of time between that extinction and today. The time frames correspond fairly closely. If something is to happen every fifty thousand cycles, then we are due for an event. Given the outcomes of the last two 'events', it is likely that Saren's success will get us all killed."

Tetrimus nodded sourly. "The Citadel governments will not believe that. They're unlikely to begin any kind of preparations."

The answer was immediate. "The Citadel's response to this issue is not my concern. I plan to act to ensure the survival of the Broker Network, regardless of what those fools chose to do. I've already ordered construction on a generational support vessel with enough hydroponics and supplies to last several centuries, and a program to obtain highly intelligent salarian, human, turian, asari and drell orphans. The volus, krogan, batarians and vorcha are not worth my time. Nor are the hanar. In a worst case scenario, we will simply retreat to the ship, perform a FTL transit to deep space beyond the galactic rim and watch events unfold."

The sheer scale of what the Shadow Broker planned and the casual tone he explained it in stunned Tetrimus. "You feel it's that severe?"

The Broker's voice lowered. "If Agent Sirva's team is correct, any 'preparations' that are to be made aside from headlong flight should be religious and funerary in composition. Fourteen hundred vessels like Saren is currently using would wipe the galaxy flat in a few months. Even at maximum utilization of industrial capacity and with a two-hundred percent research modifier, no simulation I can create has galactic society having any chance against such numbers without at least access to the weapon they use."

Tetrimus gave a grim nod. "And the other thing that makes you think Saren is a danger?"

The Broker's, rather than answer, simply sent him another file. What he saw made his spurs retract and his fringe go flat. "Is that a rachni egg?"

The Broker's voice was soft. "We found this in a manifest of 'secured items of interest' when we obtained Ethan Jeong's cooperation. If the manifest is correct, this egg was sent to Binary Helix's facility on Ilium for study."

Tetrimus smiled, the broken needles of his teeth gleaming. "Ilium. So that's his location, eh?"

"No. The Ilium HQ had no labs, and our agents watching it never saw the ship carrying the egg arrive. We found the vessel adrift in space on the Ralx Trade Lane, the crew killed...the cargo missing. The pattern of assault matches the signature carnage Shepard discovered on the volus trading ship she investigated."

Tetrimus flicked his mandible in irritation. "Why hijack a ship bringing him something in the first place? It's just a rachni egg. It's not like it's a queen or ..." Tetrimus trailed off, eyes traveling to the notes attached to the Exogeni manifest, and shook his head. "No...is he insane?"

The Broker's voice was cool again. "Quite possibly. I find any other explanation for why he would attempt to summon a race whose primary method of interaction appears to be obliterating all space-faring life to be problematic and unlikely. In any event, we must be prepared to move and neutralize any actions he takes, while at the same time recalling critical personnel to the Nest for possible evacuation."

The Broker transmitted a long list of financial and material transactions. "Dispatch teams to implement this list. I want at enough raw materials to last centuries, if needed, and I see no reason to abandon my wealth if the galaxy is going to be overrun by giant warships. If nothing comes to pass, if Shepard is successful, we can reinvest the materials and funds in new ventures in the Traverse."

Tetrimus nodded. "And Shepard? Any orders there?"

The Broker, for an answer, terminated the call, and Tetrimus gave a jerky shrug and proceeded to call up his best open teams. When the message that both Sirva and his entire team had been neutralized, he allowed the smallest of grins to cross his ravaged features before continuing his work.

O-OSaBC-O

Liana groaned as she sat up on the bed in Shepard's cabin. She rubbed her eyes, and swung her legs off the narrow bed, standing up in a semi-confused daze for several moments before shaking it off. The aches radiating through her body sent confusing messages to her mind, some of discomfort and some of pleasure. The sheer strangeness of it bothered her ... but she shook that feeling off as well.

The memories of the night before tangled in her mind, along with flashes of Shepard's life, and the slow thrum of the link between them. Shepard was ... irritated, upset, and worried about something, but otherwise alright. Liana walked over to the small sink, splashing water on her face, and wincing at the pain in her shoulder.

She'd have to wait another day or two to head to the hospital, at least until the bruising faded. With any luck, Chakwas would be off the ship when she refilled the medicines in the shoulder package.

Answering questions about why she was as battered as she was to the human doctor would be ... exquisitely awkward. Liara sighed, and put on one of the too-tight BDU's Shepard had left out, slipping out of her quarters quietly.

Luckily, the mess decks were empty, and Liara was able to reach the science lab and put on a fresh University of Serrice outfit. She noted it was her last one, and she wondered if she could perhaps buy some kind of jumpsuits or other easy to move in clothing on the Citadel. Her need to cling to her university status had faded in the upheaval of her life that was last night.

She left the science bay, and was refilling the medicine in her shoulder package when Pressly came into the medbay, a faint smile on his face. "Dr. T'Soni. How are you feeling?"

She stood, adjusting the package against her arm, and pulling at her sleeve a bit to alter the fit. "I am well, Lieutenant Commander. May I be of service?"

The XO gave her a piercing look, then hit the trigger that lowered the shades to the med bay. "I think we need to talk, Doctor. Have a seat."

Liara felt a flash of apprehension as she did so, nervously facing him as he continued to stand, arms folded. Something about the man, his solidity or his gaze, always made Liara feel smaller – his aura was very much like her mother when she was in her more serious moods.

Pressly did not comment as Liara winced when she sat, but did exhale slowly. "First, I want to thank you for doing what you have done in supporting Commander Shepard. The telemetry readings I have on her indicate she's a lot calmer – not withstanding the anxiety she suffered when you went down on Edolus. More importantly, she isn't abusing sleeping pills or sleeping four hours a night any more."

Liara kept her voice calm. "I did what I could, Mr. Pressly. Shepard is very strong, and she has endured a great deal on her own without anyone really understanding her."

Pressly gave a short nod at that. "I wholeheartedly agree. As I told you during our last conversation, it's the XO's job to make sure the crew is running smoothly and to watch Shepard's back." He gave a thin smile, and then a sharp exhalation. "Part of that job is to try to anticipate and stop problems when they're small, before they get big enough that she has to step into fix things."

Liara nodded, slowly. She wondered if Pressly was going to accost her about being involved with the Commander, and how she was supposed to respond.

Pressly's lips tightened into a firm line. "Shepard met with members of the AIS about a half-hour ago, before she went to see the Council. One of things she told me before she left is that the AIS told her something very troubling. Shepard wanted to ... handle this herself, but I told her that it was best to let me do it, seeing that she was ... agitated."

His eyes met hers steadily. "Sergeant Telanya is not just a C-SEC officer. She was sent here on order from the asari government to monitor and spy on you, and if you became a 'threat', to kill you."

Liara, despite herself, relaxed slightly at his words. While they were troubling, anything was preferable to Pressly interrogating her about her relationship with Shepard, at least until she had time to fix up her own head. She shook the thoughts clear and refocused on the conversation at hand. "Kill me? Why? I mean, I understand the Council of Matriarchs is displeased with my mother's actions, and they are likely to wish to punish me for her transgressions. That much is asari tradition, the sins of the mother pass to the child."

Pressly made a face. "Humanity's religions say exactly the reverse, Doctor. That's one reason we aren't about to hand you over to th.." He stopped himself, frowning at whatever he was going to say, and cleared his throat. "To them."

Liara gave him a sympathetic look. It was clear Pressly was never going to really be comfortable around aliens. Yet he tried very hard to be decent, unbiased, professional and polite. She found her lips curving in a small smile. "There is no need to censor yourself around me, Lieutenant Commander. At this juncture of my life, I am beginning to think of the Council as a pack of ruthless socialites more focused on calming the trouble caused by my mother than caring in how it has affected me. I must say your revelation regarding Sergeant Telanya does not truly surprise me."

Pressly raised an eyebrow. "You're taking this a lot more calmly than I would, Doctor."

Liara's small smile grew, becoming almost smug. "You saw how Shepard reacted on Edolus. So did Telanya. Would you continue with any plans to harm me in the face of that reaction?"

Pressly's face split into a grin before he could control it, and he smothered his amusement with a cough. "You have a point, Doctor." He gave her another, more serious look. "That being the case, however, only means that I have to be more cautious. I'd like you to come with me as I confront her and Detective Vakarian about this."

Liara exhaled. "It might ... be better if I handle her myself, Lieutenant Commander. She is ... the relationship between certain segments of the asari population are filled with intricate and confusion customs, rituals and expectations. I do not want her driven away from the Normandy if her contributions are of assistance to Shepard."

Pressly took a step forward, kneeling down to look Liara directly in the eyes. His immaculate uniform crinkled, the gold bars on his broad shoulders shining, his face was set in a determined, almost cold look. "I've kept this to myself, but when Shepard saved the population of Dirth, my parents were there. My brother was there. Most of my friends were there. They were going to either be dragged off as slaves, or shot in the head and left in the streets. Shepard damn near died stopping the pirates that attacked Dirth. That's always been one reason I've admired her among many. Many on this ship feel the same. No matter her past, Shepard is a damned hero."

She nodded slowly, confused. "I agree, but what does that have – "

His voice roughened as he cut her off. "I'm not blind, Dr. T'Soni. Or deaf. The unrestricted version of Shepard's personnel file goes into great detail about Shepard's ... preferences, and let's me know what must have happened last night." He reached out to tap sharply at Liara's uninjured arm, and she hissed in pain as he did so.

She met his eyes with a nervous, frightened look. "I – "

Pressly held up his hand. "I'm not saying anything, Doctor. I ... am not comfortable around aliens. I lost family and friends to the turians. I lost more to pirates. I lost my wife because I spent all my time patrolling to stop more aliens from kicking in the doors of our colonies. I have no reason to like aliens, plural. That doesn't mean I'm racist. It doesn't mean I have any problems with you, of any kind. And it doesn't mean I don't ... approve."

His voice evened out, even as Liara's eyes widened in shock. "What you and Shepard do is between the two of you. You weren't exactly quiet about doing it. People heard what happened last night. People know what happened. People have seen her and you damn near kill yourself more than once fighting Saren, fighting geth, fighting Cerberus. People saw you come back damn near dead from fighting against your own mother. People on this ship respect you, Doctor."

His jaw firmed. "People are not going to say a god damned thing or I will throw them out the airlock myself. That is not what this discussion is about."

Liara swallowed and he continued. "Two weeks ago she was about damned near a nervous breakdown, now she's smiling. I don't give a damn if you did a threesome with the krogan if you keep her going and happy, Doctor. What I do care about is that you're now the only person on the boat who I can't risk getting killed. You're the only person on the boat who I have to make sure is alright, because you're the only person on the boat who's making sure she is alright. Compared to that, I couldn't give a shit about Sergeant Telanya's 'contributions'."

Liara found herself shaking. Pressly's eyes wouldn't let hers go. "So no, Doctor, you are not going into a confrontation with a turian and an asari sent here to kill you without me standing right there next to you, armed, and two marines as backup. I'm handling this because Shepard would have turned her to paste. You're coming with me so if she does anything biotic you can stop it."

Liara nodded, and Pressly stood up, holding out his hand. She took it, and he gave her a small smile.

"I'm not a big fan of aliens, Doctor, but you I think I can trust. Follow me."

O-OSaBC-O

The forward battery was cramped, narrow, and dark, intended only for use during battle, not as a place of residence. It had an almost homey feel sometimes, when Telanya could wrap herself in Garrus's arms and forget C-Sec, ardat-yakshi, crazy Spectres (both human and turian) or the Thirty. Other times it almost magnified her sense of attachment to Garrus, reassuring herself he was still there with little touches that drew only the occasional snarky remark from her lover.

"Maybe I should install a tracking beacon in my fringe, Tel", he'd joked.

But there were times when the closeness of the battery was stifling, and this was one of those times. She'd been halfheartedly arguing with Garrus in quiet tones about what to do with their down time, her mind mostly preoccupied with the fact she would have to report to Councilor Tevos about her findings so far, and how long such a thing could be kept a secret from Shepard.

Garrus had tried – and failed – to convince her to just go to the Commander and tell her the truth. "She's not a bloodthirsty monster, Tel, really." In the aftermath of seeing what Shepard did when Liara had died, however, that plan had fallen by the wayside.

Telanya had seen asari commando matriarchs that weren't half as terrifying as an enraged Shepard. And the very idea of Liara being able to pull off a biotic charge on the fly only further reinforced her sense of inferiority to a member of the Thirty. The awkwardly kind words and disavowal of her membership in their ranks only made Telanya feel worse – the girl seriously considered herself an outcast.

Thus, she was already guilt-ridden and upset when the door to the battery slammed open, and the hard, intimidating gaze of the Normandy's executive officer speared her like a fish. Liara stood behind him, flanked by two very pissed off looking marines in full armor, and the XO himself looked ready to explode, his jaw clenched so tight Garrus could hear his teeth grinding.

"Detective Vakarian, Officer Telanya. Please come into the mess deck, we need to have a discussion. Immediately." The two marines flicked the safeties off their weapons, and Garrus shot Pressly a bewildered look before standing slowly.

"Alright, Lieutenant Commander. Neither of us is armed. Can you tell us what this is about while we, uh, walk to the mess deck?"

Pressly made a subtle hand motion, and one of the soldiers put himself between Liara and Telanya. Pressly's voice was cool, hard. "I think you both know, Detective Vakarian."

Garrus's instincts throbbed in his skull, and he put himself in front of Telanya. His spurs tightened and a heavy pressure settled across his shoulders. He tensed, until Telanya gently put her arm on his side.

"Garrus..."

The turian didn't break his gaze from Pressly, but gave a single, jerky nod. "Fine." He walked out of the battery, his arm protectively cradling Telanya, and down the narrow corridor of sleeper pods, emerging into the relative brightness of the mess deck, which was deserted.

The two marines split up. One moved to the side of Garrus and Telanya, his Crossfire rifle still loose in his hands. The other marine continued to stand between Liara and Telanya, eyes narrowed.

Pressly sat on top of one of the mess deck tables, his immaculate shoes not even leaving a mark on the seats. "Sergeant, the AIS informed Commander Shepard this morning that your presence on this ship was allowed under false pretenses. Perhaps High Command signed off on it, or perhaps Cerberus traitors in the SA did. You've been accused of being sent here by the asari government to spy on and possibly murder Dr T'Soni."

Telanya took a deep breath and exhaled. "That's not exactly correct. I came here because I'm Garrus's bond-mate. I came here because I was terrified of losing him in some crazy-ass hunt for a lunatic, when no one would tell me what was going on. The ... mission I was given was the only way to do that. I haven't done anything to hurt her, haven't even spoken directly to her but twice in my entire time on board."

Pressly's eyes were still narrow and hard. "Detective Vakarian, were you aware of this?"

The turian hesitated before nodding once, and the XO gave a shaky exhalation. "Is there any reason I shouldn't have the both of you dragged off this ship, given that you decided it wasn't important to notify the Commander the asari sent a fucking assassin on board?"

Garrus growled softly, leaning forward. The marines tensed, but he didn't even notice, matching his cold gaze onto Pressly, the ocular target designator in his eye rotating as if locking on. "She isn't an assassin, human."

Pressly didn't budge, jutting his chin out. "That's her damned reason for being here...turian."

Liara swallowed, finally speaking. "Lieutenant Commander, please...stop." Pressly gave a heave, and to Garrus's surprise, leaned back. Liara carefully stepped around the marine to stare the other asari in the eyes. "I know what it is like to fear for a bond-mate's life. To feel helpless to change the danger racing at them. Are you a threat to me, Telanya of no clan?"

The smaller asari woman had gone very still. Before she seemed tired, almost upset. Not scared. But if Pressly was reading her right, now she was terrified. The normal confidence that filled her frame drained away and her eyes widened, as she stammered. "N-no! It's not like I could do anything to you anyway. You're a member of the Thirty, blessings trail their steps...I'm just...me. The ... I had to do what they told me."

Liara's voice dipped an octave, her elegant pronunciation becoming clipped. "And by 'they' you mean the Council of Matriarchs? A group that probably views you as walking trash, unfit to even speak in their prescience? You would risk the life of your bond-mate in obedience to them?"

Telanya's coloration paled, and her mouth opened, but Liara did not stop. "Because that is exactly what you have done. Lieutenant Commander Pressly is here trying to defuse this because there is a very good chance that upon Shepard's return she will violently end you both. You, Telanya, because you threatened me, and this mission. You, Garrus... "Her voice turned sad, almost hurt "...because she thought she could trust you, and as it turns out she cannot."

Liara's voice turned bitter and cold. "And nothing hurts her more than betrayal."

Garrus winced, a small well of panic lapping at the base of his anger. He couldn't lose the chance to finish this mission, not –

He cut himself off. Two demanding, inflexible impulses collided in his head.

Justice had to be served.

Stand by your bondmate, until death.

He felt a flicker of misery and self-hatred from Telanya, and cursed himself silently even more. She knew how important this mission was, but had never thought of how her 'mission' might affect it, or cause it to come to an end. And she could feel his own emotions and frustration. If Shepard threw them off the ship – or worse –

Telanya's expression flickered, into a beaten one. "How... how can I prove I am no threat? I will swear on Athame's name itself, I just wanted – "

Liara held up a hand, and the other asari fell silent. "I do not wish to be cruel, Sergeant. I have never embraced the lifestyle of my own kind. Not the empty hedonism, nor the social sharing, nor the endless and wasteful expenditure of wealth. I was excluded and cut out from these things, and they have no hold on me. The Council expects me, I suppose, to act as a chatelaine of the Thirty should – properly supportive of one's mother, furthering one's house in all acts, preparing for the future."

Liara gave a sad, empty smile. "I have no future in asari society, not after the ruin of my name and my mother's treason. You are no threat to me. Not because of my being a member of the Thirty, nor because you are clanless. I could care less about such things."

Liara's face grew cool, and she leaned forward. "I have no fear of you because if you ever harm me, Sara would kill you in such ways that Athame would search for a thousand years and not even find your soul. You must decide if you will stand by your bond-mate or scurry back to those scheming witches upon Thessia, but do so quickly."

The haughty ice and utter certainty in her voice was chilling, and Telanya actually sobbed as she nodded. Turning to Garrus, who was looking at her as if she'd grown a third head, she was almost angry. "And as for you, Detective ... you should apologize to Shepard. And pray she feels like forgiving you. The Council of Matriarch's is ruthless and will stop at nothing to suppress the chaos my mother's treason has stirred up, and in that I do not fault them. Nor do I fault a single clanless asari for being unable to stand up to the bared might of the Council."

She turned away from Garrus in disgust. "I find fault in you that you couldn't trust Shepard enough to tell her the truth, after she has so steadfastly defended you against the humans who said you could not be trusted. You have hurt her, Vakarian, and that I cannot forgive. We are facing the most dangerous task possible, and she does not deserve or need such a betrayal of her faith after everything else she has lost."

She walked away, headed to the stairs, and Pressly fixed them both with the coldest look of smoldering anger Garrus had ever seen on a human face. "Shepard departed for the Citadel Tower a little more than a half hour ago. If you're quick you may be able to catch her there. Until I get a comm from her saying you two are cleared to be aboard, I'm afraid you'll have to disembark. Now."

Garrus sighed and nodded, placing his hand on Telanya's shoulder. "Of course. We'll be back later after this is all sorted out."

One of the Marines followed them as they left the mess decks, while the other, the newly promoted Chief Haln, slid the safety on his rifle to home and slung it. "Goddamned turians. Acting like we're the rude ones."

Pressly gave a tight, short nod. "I give Commander Shepard credit for keeping an open mind." He exhaled, trying to release his anger. "And Doctor T'Soni for handling that so...calmly."

Haln only nodded, eyes still angry. "Never thought I'd get pissed on behalf of an alien, sir. But that Doc, she's something else. I still can't believe she walked off a fucking anti-mech round." A pause. "One of the comm techs was getting a bit gossipy this morning about ... you know."

Pressly raised an eyebrow and half-turned to face the chief. "And?"

Haln shrugged. "Put my foot up his ass, sir, and he is five by five now. Ain't nobody sayin' shit."

Pressly sighed, and shook his head. "I assume the entire ship knows?"

Haln gave an uncomfortable shuffle. "Ah, sir...they kinda woke up Engineering. Most of the pods are sealed against sounds, but people talk..."

Pressly's head shook again, more slowly, and Haln chuckled. "It's not all bad, sir. Cutie-pie ain't figured it out yet, and the Master Chief managed to talk the rest of the Marines out of bro-fisting the Doc for hitting third base like the fist of God..."

Pressly grimaced, and then his eyebrow shot up again, higher than before. "Cutie-pie, Chief?"

Haln nervously scratched the back of his neck. "Ah, er, Engineer Tali, sir. The name...Ash started it...it just..."

"Ah, god. That's it, Chief. I'm going to get drunk out of my mind." Pressly pushed off the table and stood, brushing unseen lint from his uniform. "At this rate, I'll be completely bald in a year."

---

Chapter 91: Chapter 82 : Telanya , Cowed

---

A/N: The logical conclusion to what happens when you threaten Liara. I wanted this chapter to have some emotional pop to it, but I'm not 100% I like it. Once again, feedback in reviews or PM's is always useful.

---

Shepard's meeting with the Citadel, hard on the heels of her disturbing little chat with the AIS and Commissar Chisholm, went about as well as every other meeting she had with them.

The opulence of the Council chambers grated on her nerves, the ever-fucking pier she had to stand on like some kind of begging supplicant grated on her nerves, and the sneering skepticism of Sparatus towards anything coming out of her mouth grated on her nerves.

The Council had several C-SEC financial analysts on hand to go through the Cerberus data she provided, three volus and two salarians. She had to wait for fifteen minutes to allow them to sift through it before the lead investigator, a volus, waddled up to address the Council.

"The records appear to be shrrkk in order, Councilors. There is a distressing shrrkk amount of data contamination in them, and the exchanges conducted are shrrkk murky. But it corresponds to at least what we can find of shrrkk financial transactions made aboard the Citadel itself."

The salarians started arguing about 'data clerinations' and 'core fiduciary responsibilities of accounting principles' and a ton of other boring shit, but in the end they all admitted the records looked very legitimate, and that the exposure of Cerberus in the SA was limited to racist thugs and companies already under suspicion for their links to Cord-Hislop Aerospace.

Fine, Telanya didn't double cross me with the data at least. I won't reduce her to fucking ketchup ... yet.

She was seething over the revelation from the AIS that the asari cop was a spy for the Council of Matriarchs. She was more hurt by the ugly fact that Garrus had to have known, since they were bond-mates. It hadn't really hit her until the air-car ride over to the tower gave her the space to actually think about it, but the more she did think about it the more it angered her.

She was also still grappling with some of the effects of her bond with Liara. Most of it wasn't bad, but Liara's life had been a long, lonely, empty desolation of people not giving her the support she needed. Aside from the ministrations and attention of Shiala – and Shepard felt the full impact of her death now as she had not before – literally no one had ever encouraged or backed Liara in anything she did. All her brilliance, her will, her determination, came from herself alone.

As fucked up as Shepard's life had been, as horrible as it had been, Shepard had at least found a few people to try to help her. Liara didn't even have her family. Her aunt despised her, and her relatives found her distasteful in the extreme. Asari society looked at her as some kind of repugnant cretin because she was a purebred, and that bitch at the University of Serrice was going to have her throat kicked in just as soon as Shepard got done putting bullets in Saren and Benezia. The anger she felt from that was poisoning her entire mind, only amplifying her rage at Telanya and Garrus.

I don't know who I want to smash more. Telanya, or Liara's fucking aunt.

With a firm effort she pushed that particular homicidal tendency down, refocusing on the Council itself.

After the volus had cleared the financial details, the Council had retired to a private briefing room to go over things in more detail. They were now seated, the plush room where she had shown them the data proving Saren was a traitor put to use once more, Shepard fidgeting in her chair as the three reviewed more of the Cerberus data. Udina had finally shown up, and gave Shepard an actual smile before sitting next to her, calm and composed.

Valern was paging through a copy of the Cerberus data on his omni-tool. "Very good work, Shepard. I must admit when you put forward your plan at first, I was not sure you would follow through with it. But smashing Cerberus to the ground in this fashion will help many people sleep better at night."

She shrugged, as Tevos continued. "I do not know if you are aware of the political statements made by the Systems Alliance government about the assault on Cerberus, but a new political alignment of your government appears to be upset about their destruction."

Shepard nodded coolly. "Yes, ma'am. I saw that. Saracino is a bag of walking trash, and if he attempts to interfere in my investigations or hunt for Saren he will regret it."

Sparatus made a gesture with his hands as if throwing something away. "Words, Commander. We have no clue what you handed over to your Admiral Vandefar at the system's edge, or what you might have covered up to protect your Systems Alliance. Words are always empty."

Shepard folded her arms and rolled her eyes. "I find that a curious statement, coming from a politician, sir. I wanted Cerberus gone, you wanted Cerberus gone, and now Cerberus is gone. I can't control what some nut on Earth says about the situation, so I don't feel it's very fair to hold me responsible for his statements. What I handed over to Vandefar were stolen, classified data and material that belonged to the SA."

Sparatus sneered. "Your government put these statements out there. Your government, involved or not, turned a blind eye to the problem for years. Am I to ignore that?"

Next to her, Ambassador Udina gave a snarl. "General Thriatax Palavanus stood in this very chamber and suggested humanity needed to be exterminated not a year ago. Are we thus to assume he is speaking for your entire government and species? Or are only members of the Council allowed to spew filthy denunciations against others?"

Shepard exhaled, keeping calm. "What matters, Councilors, is that due to the data seized from the Cerberus HQ, I can prove concretely that Cerberus was helping Saren, and that I can find Saren based on the evidence we have."

Valern gave a nod. "So I see. Going after Saren on Noveria is going to be problematic from a legal standpoint. Technically, the world neither in Citadel nor Alliance space. It does not choose to allow Citadel inspections of it's facilities and only pays excise taxes on it's various shipments."

Udina grunted, and Shepard smiled thinly. "Councilors. I have had, as you might expect, a taxing few days. I'm still beaten up fairly badly from the battle against Cerberus, my crew is worn out, and my ship is under repair. I'd like to find a solution to Noveria that doesn't require me blasting my way through whatever two-bit security guards and mercenaries the Corporate Court has put together to ensure their security."

Tevos gave her a curious look. "While we would agree that the diplomatic approach is always best, employing such on Noveria will be difficult. The Noverian Corporate Court does not recognize Citadel authority except under extreme duress."

Shepard's smile became a smirk. "What is the official penalty for aiding and abetting a known traitor to the Council? Are there any kind of economic fines, penalties, embargo...?"

There was a moment of silence, and then a rusty sound emitted from Sparatus. It took a moment for Shepard to realize the turian was laughing. "You want to threaten the Corporate Court with fines? We've fined them massively already. The problem is they refuse to pay, and embargoing them would cripple the galactic economy, something we can ill afford."

Shepard nodded, glancing at Udina. "Is that true of the SA as well, sir?"

Udina sighed. "Not as much, but it's still a concern. Additionally, given the ... political climate right now on Earth, getting approval from the Senate to do much of anything would be problematic in the extreme."

Shepard nodded again. "So the Corporate Court would feel that anyone reasonable would have no real way to thwart them or be a threat to their interests, right?"

Something in her voice caught the attention of Valern, who gave her a long look. "Spectre Shepard, what are you planning?"

She smiled brightly, an expression none of them had ever seen. "The Corporate Court is likely to be composed of people whose only experience with me is the media, whose depictions end up making me sound like a blood-dripping lunatic who eats kittens and kills dreadnaughts with my bare hands or something. Waving my Spectre status around won't achieve anything, and neither will fines or sanctions. They've defied you before and are likely to do it again."

She tilted her head. "At some point, you have to send people a message."

Tevos's eyes widened. "Shepard, you haven't answered the question as to what you plan to do on Noveria."

The human marine leaned back in her chair, smirking. "Threaten them with invasion and orbital bombardment."

The room fell silent, until Udina spoke. "That is a curious answer, Commander. How do you plan to bring this about, given the Citadel can't support such an act and the SA won't – "

Shepard stood. "The Citadel has do to nothing except to say, in light of the fact Noveria refuses to even recognize the Citadel's laws, that they do not plan to step into stop the situation. As far as getting the SA to help, both Admiral Chu and Commissar Major Chisholm assured me this morning they would do whatever it took to help me bring down Saren. I believe both the AIS and Commissariat are not under direct Senate control, Ambassador?"

Udina felt his lips twitch into a small, reluctant smile. "That is correct, Commander."

Tevos glanced between them. "So you do not actually plan to invade Noveria...merely present them with an ultimatum you feel they will not call your bluff on?"

Shepard turned to face the Council. "...essentially correct." There was, after all, no need to tell the Council that the AIS would be delighted at a chance to invade and loot the tech labs of dozens of salarian and asari companies, and that Commissars would bring marshmallows to the resulting carnage.

"All I really need from you is a recording for them – better yet, a transmission – officially wiping your hands of anything that happens due to their resistance to be helpful. After that, it's up to my ability to intimidate a bunch of suit-wearing businessmen. I think I can do that much."

Sparatus made a sour expression with his face, but said nothing. Valern glanced at Tevos, who nodded, and then looked at Shepard. "We have no issues with your plan of action...although I would strongly advise utilizing an olive branch along with your stick in your plan. I will have the STG forward what they know about the current situation in the Corporate Court to you."

Shepard nodded, and the Councilors and Udina stood. As she prepared to leave, Sparatus spoke out. "Spectre Shepard, I need to speak with you." As she turned to face him, his mandibles flickered. "Alone."

Udina shot her a warning glance, but she made a hand motion. "Of course, sir. Where?"

The turian whirled on his heel, and she followed, aware of Udina's frustrated and worried glance at her back. The turian councilor walked past several meeting rooms before finding an open one, and stepped inside, closing the door behind Shepard as she followed. He moved to the end of the room, his expression tight and disapproving.

"I am not an admirer of your species, Commander. I find your people repulsively aggressive, arrogant, and most of all naive. The fact that your kind advanced faster than others seems to be of great import to you, the fact that your growth seems to have slowed to a crawl hasn't registered yet. Your species reaction to the Relay 314 Incident and the Suppression will always rankle me, regardless of who is to blame."

Shepard arched an eyebrow, thankful for Liara's maddening training in remaining calm in the face of provocation from her mother. "Did you come here just to insult me, Councilor? Because I have to say, I've heard worse."

The turian glared at her before snapping his mandibles down. "No, Commander, I did not. As I was saying, I don't like your people. I don't trust them. For that matter, I don't like you. You are too aggressive, too ready to kill, too confident."

He gave an exhalation. "That being said...I cannot believe for a moment that you are a liar. I need to know if the data you have given us on Cerberus is complete. I know what the techs say. I know what you say. But what my own sources are telling me is conflicting with that, and either their data or yours is lying."

For a long, long moment Shepard said nothing. She had thought turians honorable, but with the stunt Garrus pulled involving Telanya – and knowing Sparatus dislike of her – made her question that. If she could trust the asari sergeant, maybe she would have stood her ground.

But the only thought going through her mind was that Telanya had that OSD prepared before Shepard had even asked for it. It could be designed to be detected as a fake, to discredit Shepard, to make it easy for the Asari Matriarchy to get to Liara in the confusion of the mess a fake file being discovered would entail.

Shepard closed her eyes. "No sir, it is not complete. I had one of the C-Sec personnel on my ship scrub it of certain data we discovered in our destruction of Cerberus. All of the aliens onboard agreed with my call on that."

Sparatus's expression was unreadable, even for a turian, his clear eyes merely holding hers for several long seconds. Then, to her surprise, he gave her a single, dignified nod. "Deal with Saren, first, Commander. I won't ask if the data you are holding back links Cerberus to the SA." He paused. "In fairness, I can say that every race has dirtied it's hands to some degree at one time or another."

She nodded in return. "There are elements in the SA cleaning up the traitors now, sir. Elements that based on the full data, were never touched by Cerberus."

The turian councilor nodded thoughtfully at that. "I appreciate your honesty. This isn't the time for a long talk about what you've covered up...or why. This is, for now, between you and I. We will revisit this conversation after you bring me Saren's corpse."

Shepard was a little surprised the turian was not using this to berate her, but merely nodded. "Udina is going to ask what you wanted to talk about."

Sparatus snorted. "Tell him...that his comments about the Skyllian Verge were well taken." Sparatus folded his arms, and lifted his chin. "That will be all...Spectre."

There was a grudging level of respect in the irritating voice, and Shepard could only smile in response as she saluted and left.

O-OSaBC-O

Udina's expression when she passed on Sparatus's words was troubled, but he was already busy with dealing with the media and told her to meet with him before she left for Noveria. She nodded, and with a deep exhalation decided she had to talk to Anderson, soon, before she lost her entire mind.

Unfortunately, when she got to the bottom of the tower, what she found was Garrus and Telanya. The asari looked as if she'd been crying, the fire and starch in her spine clearly gone, a strained and unhappy look in her eye. Garrus wasn't looking at her, his posture stiff and heavy.

She tamped down hard on her anger and walked over to Garrus, her eyes meeting his. "Is there any reason you are here, Detective? Escorting her to report to Tevos about Liara?"

Garrus met her stare evenly. "No, ma'am. I'm here to talk to you since Lieutenant Commander Pressly saw fit to remove us both from the ship."

Shepard gave him a seething look and then glanced around. The environs of the tower plaza were open, but no one was in casual earshot. She swung her head around to face him again, forcing down her instinct to punch him in the face. "There isn't anything to talk about, Detective. You let an asari agent on my ship knowing her mission was possibly to kill a member of my crew – a member who not only helped me decipher the Beacon images and the Cipher, but who is essential to understanding what Saren is going after."

She got up in his face, his larger size not a concern. "I trusted you. I fucking trusted you, when everyone around me was questioning your very presence on my ship. I trusted you when I let her on board, because she was your damned bond-mate. You knew she was there to kill Liara and you didn't say shit."

Something ugly flared in Garrus' eyes. "I thought you were different, Shepard. Like me. You're spirits-damned right I didn't tell you. You say you trusted me, but you didn't trust me enough to believe I would let something like that happen without telling you? I knew why she was there and I knew she has never had any intention of killing Liara. She is fucking terrified of Liara. She sees her as royalty and herself as trash."

The turian got in Shepard's face, close enough they were nearly nose to nose. "I didn't tell you because if I did, no matter what the hell her real intentions were, you would have had to put her off the Normandy. If she'd ever really planned to jeopardize the mission that way, I'd ... I'd..."

Frustrated, angry, broken movements of Garrus' mandibles were all he could produce. His eyes were angry, upset, ashamed, and full of the same tired despair she'd seen in them in the Council chambers when Saren had walked away untouched.

Shepard exhaled, and felt her anger bubble up from within. Before she could speak, the quiet voice of Telanya sounded.

"I... I didn't do this to spy for the Matriarchy. I had no choice. Being away from Garrus, not knowing if he was alive or dead, being ... alone. I couldn't take it. I couldn't find any other way to be with him, and I couldn't ask him to throw away this chance to prove to himself that he could do this." Telanya met Shepard's burning gaze with a flinch, her hands clasped together in an almost imploring fashion.

"I ... I made that OSD knowing you'd need it, even after seeing all those dead asari on Edolus...knowing you would have to find some way around telling the councilors the truth. I did it because I felt horrible lying about why I was aboard." She wiped her eyes, half angrily and half in frustration. "Goddess, I never – "

"Shut up." Shepard ground out the words, her fists clenched so tight they hurt. A part of her brain was screaming at her to just fucking kill them both. They were a threat to Liara. Nothing was ever going to hurt Liara.

She forced herself to breathe, to think, to try to listen. Garrus had a point. If they bonded anything like what she'd experienced with Liara, Garrus would have known about Telanya's mission...and whether or not the asari intended to carry it out or not. Him coming to her with a bland statement of what she'd been put on the Normandy to achieve would have probably resulted in her wanting Telanya removed.

Turians were defensive and protective of their mates.

Asari were focused on obeying authority figures and the collective good of the race.

She knew the facts. But it hurt more than she expected. Garrus was the one she could relax around, the one who she could depend on to pick off the baddie she didn't even see. She'd been furious with him on Eingana because she realized that, like herself, when he got angry he forgot his personal safety, his limits, everything but his rage. She valued him and didn't want to lose him to that, like she'd lost herself for so many years.

Garrus's stark belief in absolute justice, his wit in tense situations, his iron-like calm when the stakes had gone to shit on Feros, on Eingana, on Therum...she'd come to depend on those, more than she had realized.

And a part of her, a new part of her, understood why he'd done what he had done. What would she do to keep Liara close to her? Kill? Maim? Break the law? Who the fuck cared? There wasn't anything she could bring to mind that would make her even hesitate in a choice between Liara and some other goal or purpose.

She took a second, longer breath, clenching her jaw, and finally spoke. "Telanya. I am not going to repeat this, so you had best listen. You and I are going back into this tower to talk to Tevos. You are going to tell that blue bitch what you know about Liara, and then you are going to tell her you are done with spying on her. I don't give a shit if that costs you your job, or pisses off your family, or what. You want to stay on the Normandy? You will have to convince me you aren't a threat to my bond-mate's life."

She hissed the last sentence out, and Telanya's eyes widened, and then her entire frame shook. "I ... I didn't know ... I ..."

Shepard ignored her babble. "If you ever, ever, become a threat to Liara, I will hurt you in ways you can't even fucking dream of." She heard the clicking growl of Garrus and turned to face him as he stepped between her and Telanya, struggling to control her anger. A flicker of biotic energy snapped around her, but she suppressed it a moment later.

"As for you –"

Garrus snarled, an animalistic sound that was hinged with unpleasant harmonics. "Shut the fuck up, Commander. I don't give a shit damn if you hate me or distrust me. I fucked up. I didn't let you know, regardless of why, and that's on me. You're pissed and upset, and I am sorry. But as the spirits of my ancestors are my witness, if you ever threaten Tel again I'll kill you myself."

Something dark snarled in Shepard in response, and she leaned into his space. "You have a lot of fucking nerve, Vakarian."

The turian's eyes narrowed, raptor like, his stance altering into something alien, jagged and predatory. "Nerve, Shepard? I was the one who lead you to Wrex. I was the one who stalled C-SEC long enough after the shoot-out at Doctor Michele to give you time to find Tali. I was the one who got his damned career ruined trying to help you out. Don't speak to me of nerve when you threaten my bond-mate. You want to be angry with someone, be angry with me, Shepard. You want to hit someone, hit me. Not her. Never her. She's been fucking hurt enough and I haven't been there enough for her and I will be damned in Kurtha before I abandon her. No matter what."

Telanya squeezed her eyes shut, misery written clearly on her features. She felt the anger and despair and shame in her lover. Garrus had hidden her task from his commander, already a bad thing in turian culture, and now he was face to face with an angry Shepard.

Who apparently was bonded to Liara T'Soni. How could she have been so blind? The submissiveness, the obvious adoration, even the shyness – it wasn't a silly girl with a crush, it was a maiden trying to cope with a bond most asari didn't pursue until they were three hundred or older. No wonder Shepard was furious.

But there wasn't any way for Garrus to back down, she knew. Even beyond the bond, his own instincts and culture would have made him fiercely protective of her, and feeling how badly she reacted when he was no longer on the Citadel had broken a part of him that might never recover. She didn't want to be a burden. She wanted to help. She despised Saren's actions – and worse, Benezia's betrayal – as much as Garrus himself did.

And because she had been too caught up in being by his side, Garrus was going to lose his chance to pursue the chase he'd thrown his entire career away for. She couldn't let that happen, no matter what it cost her.

So she stepped forward, putting hand on Garrus tensed forearm, pulling him back. "Garrus. Stop. Please stop." She carefully brought her hand to rest against the smooth line of his jaw, that profile she couldn't get out of her mind, and managed a weak smile. "Shepard needs ... to be able to trust me. To trust you. We're not her enemies. We're not Doctor T'Soni's enemies. We made a mistake..."

She turned to Shepard. "I ... made a mistake. And I am sorry if you felt I was a threat to your bond-partner's life. I did not know you were so connected, and if I had known I would have never, ever have taken the mission, no matter what that cost me. The Council of Matriarchs...was under the impression she was manipulating you. They... they wanted her to be put to a hard, deep link with a Justicar to find any plans her mother was colluding with her in." She lowered her gaze. "If you are bonded, you already... know the truth of her connection to Benezia."

Shepard scowled. "There isn't one. That bitch tossed her aside when she didn't measure up to her goddamned 'expectations' and ... " She trailed off, shaking her head clear of memories that weren't hers. "It doesn't matter."

Telanya nodded. "No, it does not." She took a deep breath and swallowed nervously. "I ... I am ready to face Councilor Tevos, Commander...if you can forgive Garrus. As you know Doctor T'Soni, so I know him. This mission...this hunt...means more to him than you can understand. It is his justification to his father, to his teachers, to everyone that abjured him to change and conform."

She felt tears spill from her eyes and wiped them again, angrily. "He would never betray you, because he's been betrayed himself by those he thought were friends. He admires you and looks up to you, and wishes he could get his father to meet you. He feels like he's – "

Garrus looked away. "Tel..."

She hissed. "Shut UP, Garrus. You can't throw away what you want over ME. " She whipped her head back around to face Shepard. "Please. Please, commander. Doctor T'Soni said we owed you an apology. So here it is. I am sorry. He is sorry. We were wrong and – "

Shepard glanced away, her voice hoarse. "...just...shut up, Sergeant." She swallowed thickly, the pain in the asari's eyes starting to look sickly familiar to her, the broken expression too much like Liara's, the barely visible tremors in Garrus's frame becoming more and more noticeable. The pain in that voice reminding her a bit too much of her own.

There was a time the emotional pain of others wouldn't have even registered with her. When sobbing pleas of forgiveness and apology evoked only a laugh and a shotgun blast from her. When the idea she'd be upset over mere threats of violence would have been laughable.

She wasn't the same person as she had been before last night. And despite how angry she was, she couldn't look the asari in the eyes and not understand the pain the other woman was in for putting Garrus in such a situation.

She needed a drink, badly. With a grimace, she straightened her shoulders, and glanced over at Garrus.

"Detective. Inform XO Pressly you two are to be allowed aboard, and to contact me at his earliest convenience. After that..."

She paused. Trust was so very, very hard. "...after that I expect you to escort Doctor T'Soni to the nearest hospital so she can have her shoulder treated. I expect her to be kept safe, Vakarian, and I expect you to override any protests she has about going today and get that shoulder fixed before it gets infected. Am I clear?"

Vakarian's eyes met hers, and he nodded very slowly. "And Tel?"

She let her own cool gaze flick down towards the asari. "This is the first time I've given anyone a second chance in ... well, ever. Don't fuck it up."

Telanya could only nod at that.

The meeting with Tevos was ugly.

Telanya managed to dig up her grit from somewhere, managing to pull her tangled, battered emotions together enough to not fall apart in front of the Councilor. When Shepard had walked in behind Telanya, one hand casually resting on the blunt handle of her (newly replaced) pistol, the councilor's eyes had widened.

Tevos's office, in the asari embassy, was every bit as opulent as the Council chambers. Thick rugs covered the marbled floors, runnels of water splashed down granite spillways and along channels cut into the side of the room. Asari plants were strung along heavy wooden posts in the ceiling, dangling down. The fact that the room featured a wide portal leading to a bedroom didn't exactly reassure Shepard that rumors of the asari sleeping her way to the position she now held weren't true.

Tevos, seated behind a curved, smooth desk of some dark black wood, had opened her mouth to speak, but Shepard cut her off. "I wouldn't say anything right now, Councilor Tevos. I'm having problems seeing the difference between you and Cerberus when you're willing to send emotionally compromised people onto my ship with orders to spy and possibly kill members of my crew. Before I let Sergeant Telanya make her report, I want to make something clear."

She leaned forward over Tevos' desk. "I grow tired of telling that pack of old bitches that call themselves the Council of Matriarchs to fuck off. Liara is not going to be given over to them so they can use her to pacify pissed off crowds of asari. Liara is not going to be a political chip for them to bargain over. Deal with it."

Tevos leaned back, her expression calm. "From the moment you mentioned she had 'helped' you with the Beacon, I suspected your connection to her was closer than you admitted. Infatuation with our kind is natural for your kind to indulge in, Shepard. As a Spectre, you're expected to put the needs of the many before the few."

Shepard narrowed her eyes. "I got my fill of siari when I was on Thessia from your commandos during cross-training. I didn't buy into it then and I don't know. Sergeant Telanya!"

The asari straightened. "Yes ma'am."

"Set the councilor's views straight on Doctor T'Soni and get your ass back aboard the Normandy so I can finish screaming at you for agreeing to this shit in the first place. If anyone else asks you to do something like that, the only words coming out of your mouth should be "fuck" and "you". Am I clear?"

Telanya swallowed. "Yes, ma'am."

Shepard gave Tevos one more hard glance and left the office, banging through the doors, and Tevos sighed before turning to face Telanya. "I surmise from this that your assignment was discovered?"

Telanya calmly pulled out her C-SEC badge, placing it on the desk. "I resign, Councilor."

Tevos glanced at the haptic gleam of gold on the plastic square on her desk, and gave Telanya a considering look. "So I see. A shame. And your ... report?"

Telanya huffed. "Nothing I saw of Doctor T'Soni indicates she's any threat to anyone, much less the Republic. She has no communications with her mother, ignores her holdings, has no retinue, and as far I can see, is very much anti-social. Comm security on the ship is so tight that I cannot imagine her being able to converse with her mother at any point without it being immediately discovered."

Tevos nodded. "You said she is no threat, but stories of her family's biotic strength are well-known. Is she weak?"

Telanya gave a weak laugh. "Prior to my arrival she destroyed a Geth war machine with her biotics alone, supposedly with no neural amp and after several days with no food or water. I have personally seen her stagger and nearly kill a thresher maw on foot with her biotics. Rumors from the Normandy crew indicate her power is nearly on par with that of her mother. I have also seen that she is capable of performing an ad-hoc kanquess while severely wounded from no prior knowledge. If she was a threat, I am completely outmatched on every level, and Commander Shepard has made it very clear any harm that comes to her by my hands would result in my death and that of my bond-mate. My loyalty to the Republic does not require me to sacrifice my entire life."

Tevos sighed and nodded, making a gesture of siari with her hands. "I understand. I fear the insistence of the Council of Matriarch's on this issue has damaged what little rapport I had developed with the Commander. You are being allowed to stay on board?"

Telanya nodded, a touch uncertainly, and Tevos smiled reassuringly. "That is good. I am relieved to hear that Doctor T'Soni is no threat, and that hopefully you can serve on the Normandy with a clear conscience. Before you leave, though I would like a shallow link, so that I can verify your impressions."

Normally, for a member of the Thirty to request a link with a mere clanless was a tremendous honor. Tevos T'Sael was one of the most powerful asari in the galaxy. To be able to say, however tenuously, that she had linked with Telanya would give the younger asari a certain cachet among other asari. Being able to say she worked for her directly would bring job offers, perhaps a career to replace the one she'd just discarded for Garrus's sake –

She saw Shepard's eyes, in that moment, angry, sad, furious ... frightened. She knew that if she linked, Tevos would learn of the alteration done to the files Shepard had given to the Council. She would learn that Shepard and Liara were bonded. She would learn of the Illusive Man.

With a swallow, she instead stood. "I'm very sorry, madam councilor. I cannot. In redress for my actions I plan to swear the Sixth Oath of Sublimation, and I cannot do so forsworn by my own actions. I swear upon the name of Athame, the Shield and the Sword, that Liara T'Soni is no danger to anyone."

Tevos' polite mask shattered. "You side with them, before your own race?"

Telanya trembled under the pulse of biotic anger the Councilor emitted, but lifted her chin. "I side with my bondmate, councilor. And I follow orders. Fuck you." She could hear the raspy, quiet voice of her mother in the back of her mind.

Be polite, for it is free. Live for yourself. Stay true to your bondmate, to what is right, and to joy.

She forced herself to meet the gaze of the Councilor, and after a long moment, with a thin and cruel smile of amusement, the Councilor nodded.

"Very well...Telanya of no clan. So it shall be. Get out of my office."

Telanya did so, stumbling through the corridors, trying to calm down. She'd just alienated a member of the Thirty. She would probably never be allowed back on Thessia again. Stupid, silly dreams of raising daughters on its azure shores with Garrus in laughing in the background evaporated like smoke, and she exited the building and stood blinking in the artificial sunlight of the Presidium for several seconds before wiping her face angrily yet again with her hands.

When she looked up, Commander Shepard was there, arms folded, her stance tilted to put her weight on one leg, hip cocked out, eyes level and calm. "I used a Spectre program to put a tap on the audio pickup of your omnitool, Sergeant."

Shepard closed her eyes, and shook her head. "I ... may have fucked up in jumping to conclusions."

Telanya managed a weak smile, but shook her head. "No, Commander. I – "

Shepard held up a single hand. "You could have fucked me over and out in there, Sergeant. You could have shown her everything and they'd have had my ass over a barrel. I know you didn't do it for me, but for Garrus." She exhaled, and stood up straight. "Doesn't mean I don't appreciate it."

Telanya swallowed and nodded. Shepard let the frown on her face finally vanish, and she jerked her thumb towards the docks. "Get back to the ship. I've already commed Pressly myself. Sit down and ... we'll thrash this out later, when we are all very, very drunk."

Telanya nodded, more firmly this time, and Shepard paused to put her hand on the smaller asari's shoulder. "I know what the Sixth Oath is. You are not doing that shit. What you did in there..." The human appeared lost in thought for a moment, the strength in her grip tightening almost painfully on Telanya's arm. "...it's been a long time since someone had the chance to stab me in the back and didn't. We'll call it even."

Telanya gave a last nod, not trusting her voice, and Shepard let her go. "I'll see you at Flux, Sergeant."

She pivoted on a heel, stalking away in the same predatory, pantherine stride like always, and Telanya was struck at how similar her movements were to that of the commandos who'd trained Telanya's unit. The comparison left her chilled, and she hurried towards the air-car terminal, suddenly eager to fling herself into the tight, shielding confines of the Normandy's forward battery once more.

---

Chapter 92: Chapter 83 : Anderson, Lunch

---

A/N: Fluff. Be warned. Flee now if the Happiness burns.

I don't usually indulge in fluff for the sake of fluff, but the stock romance between Shepard and Liara in ME 1 was just sad. It was less a romance and more a desperate fling between a shy hero worshipping girl and a hardened warrior. That isn't the way it should be...but then again, given the image the asari are given in ME, hardly surprising. I wanted a relationship to actually have elements of that in the mix before ME 2 happens, not after.

The asari depiction bothered me, a lot. To quote a forum poster on the Escapist:

"It's an entire race of incredibly sexy blue female bisexual aliens, every one of whom has a sworn duty to their race to go out and fuck other races as much as possible to keep the gene pool fresh. Furthermore, they live for several hundred years, beginning as a young innocent sexy, evolving into crazy, party crazed strippers and finishing as domineering MILF types, all while apparently giving the best sex in the galaxy AND being super smart AND having telepathic powers."

While the only pairing I always have is Shep/Liara, I can understand why many people end up not liking the asari as a race.

---

Shepard, after having a second comm with Pressly about Garrus and Telanya, finally made it to the apartment complex of David Anderson, nestled deep in a very upscale part of the Upper Wards right next to the main entrance to the Presidium. Located right next to the gambling and entertainment district, the narrow streets were crowded, the flashing lights of the casinos and loud roars of the crowd at the Armax Arena assaulting her.

People watched her as she passed, but for once she wasn't accosted by any reporters. She slid through the crowds, keeping her head down, focusing on staying calm. The building she finally entered was staggeringly tall, a cyclopean tower of heavy shaded glass and gleaming white metal. The lobby was sumptuously appointed, the asari receptionist giving her a winning, flirtatious smile and cheerfully giving her access to the apartment elevator.

The apartment was on the 26th floor, and she took the elevator up in mostly good order, her uniform crisp and her expression neutral.

Her emotional state was less calm.

The corridor leading to his front door – apparently, his was the only apartment on the floor – was done in multiple shades of cool, green glass, shutting away the sound and light of the Citadel beyond. The carpet, a muted gray, absorbed her footfalls, the air cool and carrying a hint of some kind of alien mint.

She reached the door and tapped respectfully on the key-comm, only to be answered by a woman's voice. "Who is ... oh. One moment."

Shepard blinked. Anderson wasn't married, as far as she knew...and this was the right apartment...

The door opened, revealing a tall, trimly built woman with diamond-hard blue eyes, faded blond hair tucked behind one ear, and a fierce, yet gentle expression on her face. She wore SA marine BDU pants and a faded SA exercise shirt along with a sweater, loose and baggy on her frame. Her feet were covered in, Shepard noted with amusement, Blasto the Hanar Spectre socks.

The woman raised both eyebrows. "Sara Shepard, am I right?"

Shepard licked her lips. "Ah..yes. I'm looking for David Anderson..."

The woman gave a crooked smile. "I know. Come in. I'm Kahlee Sanders." She stepped back and turned, allowing Shepard to step inside.

David's apartment was palatial. Close-fitted shiny black tile floors, offset by waterfalls and beds of white river stones, flanked handsome leather furniture. Bookcases and alien art set off the huge stone fireplace, and as she followed Kahlee, she saw a massive kitchen to her right, and a personal bar and lounge area to her left. The latter was where Kahlee guided her, with a small smile on her face.

David Anderson was asleep, tucked into a comfortable looking recliner. An empty glass of scotch sat on a table next to him, and his hands were folded peacefully over a blanket draped over his legs and stomach. Kahlee watched him for a moment before turning to Shepard and motioning her to follow.

The woman lead Shepard across the kitchen to another hallway, ending in an office. Decorations and shadow boxes of medals and commendations line one wall, while the battle flag of the SCV Toyko takes up most of another. Kahlee gestured to a comfortable looking couch while she sat on an overstuffed chair across from it.

Shepard sat somewhat stiffly, working to keep a frown off her face. Kahlee looked at her for a long moment before popping up and crossing the room, headed to another small bar. She pulled out two glasses and ice, pouring scotch into each, before coming back and handing Shepard one with a smile. "You look like you need it, ma'am."

Shepard sighed and drank, the scotch burning pleasantly as it went down. She leaned back against the couch and rubbed at her eyes. If this woman was living with David Anderson... she had to trust her. "I did. I ... have had a pretty rough day. Week. Couple of months."

Kahlee nodded. "David has told me some of it. He just managed to doze off before you arrived. I know you probably came here to talk to him, but ... he hasn't had an easy time of things either."

Shepard looked up, eyes dark. "I don't think anyone is having an easy time these days." She exhaled. "I.. I have heard David speak of you, but I didn't know you lived together."

Kahlee laughed. "Oh, god. This is the result of damn near ten solid years of nagging. I've known David for... a very long time. He's saved my life more than once. We got close... let our careers pull us apart. Got close again. Got pulled apart. I finally got sick of it and decided to make something stick." She glanced around the apartment, a smug look on her face. "It's amazing what you can do with fifteen years of back pay you never spent properly."

Kahlee leaned forward. "I've always wanted to meet you. David is so proud of you, talking about you almost every day. He's mentored a lot of marines and officers over the years, and every damned one of them has made him come in some night, muttering and angry. Disappointments. Failures. Except you." She leaned back, sipping at her scotch, pale blue eyes examining her minutely. "You are the only one he was always proud of."

The words hit Shepard harder than she expected, making her blink away tears and grip hard at her balance and equanimity. "I .. I don't know as I deserve that, Ms. Sanders."

The other woman snorted. "Call me Kae and I'll call you Sara. We're not on duty, dammit, and you look like you're about to go to pieces." She leaned forward, naked concern in her eyes. "I don't know everything about you and David, except that he cares a lot about you. He works all day at that shit-hole of a tower with those bigot aliens and that asshole Udina, trying to keep things going smooth for you. Talking down pissed off senators. Dealing with those suits from Exogeni. Screaming his head off at the media to leave you the hell alone."

There was a dry chuckle from the doorway, and both Shepard and Sanders turned. David Anderson stood there, a gentle smile on his face, leaning against the doorjamb. "I wouldn't put it quite in those terms, Kae. It's not like I am in combat with them, although punching one or two would certainly brighten my day."

Sanders uncurled from the chair, walking over to plant a kiss on his cheek. "Didn't want to wake you, since you were so tired..."

Anderson smiled wider. "And you had to indulge your curiosity about Sara, mm? Tsk." He tucked a loose strand of her hair back behind her other ear with a gentle, practiced motion, an expression on his face Shepard had never seen, before shaking his head. "I need some time with Sara, Kae. I promise, you'll get to interrogate her later, over dinner."

Sanders stuck her tongue at him. "Worry-wart. Fine. I'll be upstairs, working on the Academy proposal." She blinked at Shepard for a moment before taking off, and Anderson gave a rueful shake of the head before stepping into the office, heading for the small bar and pouring himself several fingers of scotch.

He looked up, dark brown eyes searching for something. "Alright, Sara. Lay it on me."

Her lips quirked at that old phrase, and she remembered the last time she heard it. "I.. I got a lot of shit on my plate."

Anderson nodded, placing one heavy hand on her shoulder and sitting next to her on the couch. "I have all day, Sara."

She tried to start out organized, framing her frustrations and confusions in logical and calm tones, but before she knew it, words were just tumbling out of her mouth. About the pressure. The fear of failing, of fucking it all up. About Ash and her damnable friendship, Kaidan's incomprehensible nobility, about the Thorian, Eingana, about Cerberus. About Liara, and the nightmares, and the bond, and about the mess of an argument and blow up she'd had with Garrus. About sex she felt guilty about and that look of near worship in Liara's eyes that made her feel both wanted and confused.

It was too much and it just vomited out of her, a jumbled mess of confused statements, and before she knew it she was crying and shaking. Anderson had his arm around her shoulders, stroking her hair. "It's alright, Sara. It's alright. Let it out."

"I .. I.. " She hated crying. She hated the emotions, they didn't make any sense and she couldn't fucking control them. She wiped her eyes, sniffing and feeling weak, and Anderson's arm just tightened around her.

Protective. Warm. Solid.

"I... I c-couldn't stop Major Kyle... I couldn't save those goddamned penals on Feros, couldn't stop Saren. I couldn't .. do what I should have done with the SA...with fucking Cerberus...with R-rachel..."

Anderson's jaw was set, tight. He was angry. She looked up, wondering if he was angry at her, and those eyes turned on her.

The gaze was hard, and yet still approving. "I'm goddamned proud of you, child. You have been bearing the weight of the galaxy on your shoulders with no one there to help you. I'm angry at myself for letting them talk me off this job. I should have been there. With you. Handling the political bullshit. When you needed someone to tell you that you were doing the best you could."

She exhaled shakily. "What if my best isn't good enough?"

David snorted, then looked her hard in the eye. "Do you remember when I told you, someday, you'd find something to fight for beside hate?" She nodded, and he continued. "If your best isn't good enough, then it won't be just you paying the price. Liara will, too."

That hit her like a sledgehammer, cracking hard at the little armor she had left around her soul. Anderson didn't stop. He held her shoulders, forcing her to look at him. "Living is hard, Sara. Living is pain. It's days of joy and delight that get cut to pieces by days of despair and failure. It's realizing that you are going to fail, one of these days. That you can't keep those you love safe all the time, no matter how hard you fight or try. That you take your life and enjoy it while you can, because you can't be sure when it all ends."

David wiped a track of moisture from her face. "God knows if I could have protected you from this bullshit, I would."

She shook her head. "...why..."

Anderson gave a slow exhale. "Might as well ask you why you're with this Liara girl, Sara. I don't have answers. I have a memory of a ragged shadow of a girl-child, bleeding in the dirt of the arcology, willing to eat a bullet rather than let me get killed because that wouldn't be right. I have a memory of a terrified girl spitting in the face of a Commissar before she'd let him kick a scared boy who was already down and bleeding, because that wouldn't be right."

He smiled. "I have a memory of the best goddamned soldier I trained fucking up everything in her path on Dirth, screaming out her rage at the murdering pirate bastards all around her, killing so fast even Kyle couldn't keep up. Shrugging off being shot, being stabbed, being blown up. To save those people. Because that was right."

Anderson's hand closed over hers. "I told you already, Sara. If I had a daughter like you, I'd tell everyone I met "that, there, is my child." I don't give a damn what the media says, the Council says, High Command, the AIS, or anyone. Somehow, through the trials and pains you've suffered, you are still that little girl who wouldn't do the wrong thing when she had a choice to do the right thing."

Anderson held her as she broke down again, muscular hands soothingly rubbing her back. His own eyes were hard but wet, as he clenched his jaw again to keep from screaming in fury.

He'd never seen Shepard this broken up. Whatever she'd gone through, it had finally gotten to be too much. Maybe, he mused, it was the asari breaking through to her. Giving her something to hold onto, but making her let go of her past.

Shepard didn't look like the Butcher right now. She looked like conflicted, exhausted young woman, too emotionally battered to figure out how to proceed. Anderson had never met Liara T'Soni, and he knew he needed to, sometime soon. He didn't want to doubt – Shepard's torrent of words had included things like the wonder of Liara's mind, and the hope she'd felt that she could be something new, something free – but if the asari was going to be part of Shepard's life, he had to know something about her himself.

He levered Shepard up, taking in her tear-streaked face, and shook his head ruefully. "I want you to take all that worry about if you're going to fail or not and toss that shit out the airlock, soldier. You are Sara Ying Shepard." He put his hands on her shoulders, supportive, his gaze boring into her. "Do you know what I'd do if you fucked up and failed at a mission, Sara?"

Fear entered her eyes. "I..."

He pushed a lock of her dark hair back into place as gently as he could. "I'd pick you up, dust you off, and tell you to get on the up-hop, marine. Because you've never failed me. You've done things I wish you hadn't. You've let, for far too long, hate and pain and most of all fear rule you, derail you from the the person you could be."

He loosened his grip on her. "Now, just maybe, you can get past this pain. You will get past it, Sara. I don't want to hear you ever wondering what will happen when you mess up, or what will happen when shit goes bad. I want to hear you tell me what you're going to do when you triumph. What you're going to do when you pull up to the Citadel with Saren's body and the pressure goes away."

His voice grew more gentle. "I want to see you live, child. I want to see you burn away all the chains people have thrown on you and see that smirk again, see that fire in your eyes."

She nodded, biting her lip and rubbing her face. "I.. .just have never done it before."

Anderson leaned back finally, picking up his scotch. "Sara, there isn't a manual or procedure for living. I've seen dark days, during the First Contact War, in my time with the N7's. I've seen enough politics and gesturing to make me glad I never made admiral. But I won't let that beat me down, Sara. I use it to push myself that much harder."

He sipped the drink. "And if there are days where it's too dark to see how to get back up, I have Kae to do it for me." He gave her a look. "Tell me about Liara."

An almost unwilling smile broke through the misery of her expression. "She's ... pure. Innocent. Good. Smarter than I can even get my head around. She had a family that didn't ever support her dreams, and she went out and made each and every one of them a damned reality..."

Anderson listened, as Sara told him about the asari. About her research, her inquisitive nature, her quiet, shy moods. Her pain and her hope, her unflinching, unbending belief in Shepard. He heard her quiet pride in how strong Liara's biotics were, how brave she was, how hard she fought – just a civilian, on a ship of hardened human and alien military types.

When she told him of her death, and her revival to save her at the last moment from Rachel, wounded, half dead and still there, he couldn't stop a smile from crossing his tired features. He sat back, happy to see her posture unfolding, her hands animated, her eyes bright.

He glanced at the wall clock – just after 1300 – and then back at her. "She sounds like...quite a woman. Asari." He smiled ruefully, and Shepard nodded. "Is your schedule clear, Sara?"

She frowned. "I was going to treat the crew at a nightclub at 1900..."

He nodded. "That's fine. That's actually a great idea. But before that...I'd like to meet Liara T'Soni. You have been eating those for-shit ship rations since Lord only knows when. I want you to get back to the Normandy and bring her back with you for a good, solid lunch."

She gave Anderson a slightly nervous nod, and he smirked. "It's a parents job to know about their child's dates."

She gave a laugh, but he saw the wetness in her eyes again, the tremble of emotion in her hands, and he stood, pulling her up with him. "Sara."

She looked up, blue eyes deep and dark. "Yes, sir?"

He gave her a soft, approving smile. "Well done, marine. Get yourself cleaned up and come back hungry. Kae isn't much in the kitchen – "

"I heard that, David!" Kahlee's voice was shrill with fake indignation.

He grinned "- but she can put together some mean burgers. I've fed asari before, so I know what kind of grease not to use. Swing by about 1600 if you can."

Shepard glanced at her uniform. "We don't...well, I don't have anything to wear besides a uniform..."

Anderson rolled his eyes. "Sara. Kae is wearing Blasto socks. Show up as you are, it's just some food and wine." He drained his glass, and Shepard nodded, unsteadily, draining her own glass of scotch.

She smiled as she set the glass down. "For the road and my nerves. I also have to thank you for leaving me your stash on the Normandy. Some nights..."

He nodded. "God knows this job will drive you to alcoholism. Just remember that your crew looks up to you, Sara. I don't expect you to be perfect. No one is. We all mess up. What makes us human is that when we do so, we pick ourselves up and go at it again, stronger than before. Inspire your people that way. It doesn't matter if you think you can get them, or reach them. It matters to them that you stopped to make time for them."

He adjusted her uniform collar, and smiled. "1600, Commander. Don't make me send Ambassador Udina to collect you."

Shepard finally laughed, rolling her eyes. "Heaven forfend, I can hear him bitching now. I'll.. be here. With Liara." She paused, then impulsively hugged him, squeezing her eyes shut. "T-thank you...for being...here. Being you."

He hugged her back, smiling. "I will always have your back, Sara. No matter what." He felt something icy and dark in his heart finally loosen up after long years as she broke the hug and departed, her shoulders straighter and her head unbowed.

Kahlee came down and watched her go, before turning to face David. "Do you ever blame me for not having children of your own, with our – "

He shook his head, firm and quick. "I had a couple of kids from my first marriage. Disgraces, both of them. I'm glad they don't carry my name. And I have never, ever regretted a moment with you, only the fact that I was too lost in my career for years to wake up to life."

Kahlee sighed. "I suppose I was too." She smiled. "She's nothing like I expected, David. How can she be that ice cold in the public eye when she's a bag of broken glass on the inside?"

Anderson sighed. "She's tough, Kae. God, she's tougher than anyone I know. She's been tested sorely so many times..."

Kahlee folded her arms. "Never broken?" She winced at the expression on Anderson's face. "Oh."

He sighed, running his hand over his forehead. "She's broken before. It was ugly. But I know why it happened. And why it won't happen again. And I don't blame her for it, not in the slightest."

He turned away. "I just wish I could have shot the bastards myself."

O-OSaBC-O

The trip to the Charlais Medical Center was a study in silence and stiffness for Liara, riding along with Garrus in a rented air-car. She'd not expected the turian to return so soon, or without Telanya. His conversation with Pressly had been clipped, cold, and sullen, and his attitude was...too quiet.

Angry. Brooding.

The doctors at the clinic treated her shoulder, the asari on duty asking her several pointed questions about the other injuries on her body. Liara had archly told her that they were from a related incident, and suggested politely she simply treat the shoulder injury with less questioning and more medicating.

The doctor – clearly Clan-born – had nearly swallowed her tongue at the rebuke, and had meekly maintained her silence afterward. Liara found her attitude – and that of Telanya – disturbing and yet somehow ... empowering.

She wondered why the asari she usually associated with did not defer to her in such a manner before remembering that, aside from the one or two words spoken to a family retainer, she'd never interacted with any asari who wasn't at least a member of a lesser House before the fateful trip to Therum.

That didn't mean she enjoyed it... but it was better than being sneered at and ignored. When her shoulder was packed with regeneration tabs, stitched shut and slathered in a medigel topical covering under a heavy bandage, she was ready to go.

Garrus was waiting outside by the air-car, staring at the serried ranks of the Presidium's walls, shaded from the false sunlight by an asari flametree. She sighed and approached him, and he stood up as she did so. "Ready to go, Doctor?"

She shook her head "We need to speak, Garrus." She felt very sad that things had blown up so rapidly, and she didn't want Shepard's friend alienated. "For your sake..and Shepard's."

Garrus' mandibles pressed tight against his jaw. "I'm not sure what I'm supposed to say, Doctor. According to the Commander, the actions I've taken all this time haven't proven my loyalty to her enough to – "

She folded her arms. "Garrus. You're upset because she threatened Telanya."

He turned to face her, legs spread apart, snarling. "Yes, spirits be damned! She had no right, I told her Tel would never do anything like that, and she just -"

Liara spoke, louder. "Garrus! If I tell you that from what I know, that Shepard would not do that to you or her, does it make you any less angry? If I say that Shepard admires your purity of focus on justice, if I say she is a nervous wreck I can feel from halfway across the Presidium because of this, does it stop you from feeling hurt?"

Garrus fixed her with a long stare. "No."

She nodded. "Then why do you think your words would stop her from feeling the same?" She exhaled. "We have .. we have not been .. bonded long. And she has never, in her life, had someone she could depend on and trust. She has never had anyone she could let herself love." She closed her eyes, swallowing. "And Telanya's given mission – however unlikely she was to actually follow through with it – threatened that."

She opened her eyes again, sadly, her gaze matching Garrus. "I .. I am not good at knowing what to say in this situation. I have never had this situation, in all my years. I have been digging and studying and writing books, and she has been killing and being betrayed by her filthy, worthless government. Neither one of us is well suited to handling this well. And for that, I am sorry."

She waited, and finally the turian gave a stubborn, jerky nod. She continued. "I .. I do not know if you can salvage your relationship with Sara. But I would ask you to try. Because she needs it. She needs to know that you did not betray her, that she can trust you, that this is something we .. we put behind us and laugh about in happier, brighter times."

She sighed. Wishing she had her mother's grace and charisma, her effortless ability with words. She found herself thinking back to her mother's lessons, and one seemed to fit. "It is not just about trust, Garrus. You do not know what she has suffered. She lashes out and is angry because she has been dishonored, cast out from her own.. groups, her own family, as it were. Because she makes hard choices they wish they had the strength to and do not."

That struck home, his reaction visible even to Liara. "Telanya didn't deserve what happened this morning."

Liara gave him a faintly hurt look. "And I deserved to have to wake up to have a human tell me one of my own kind had been sent to spy and possibly kill me? Have I mistreated her, or been cruel to her?"

Garrus shook his head. "She .. she thinks you're uppity because you didn't speak with her."

Liara sighed and shook her head. "I did not because I was mortified at not remembering the rituals or proprieties to greet a clanless. I have nothing against her, but I .. I do not handle my own species well, Garrus. Those below my station cower in fear and jealousy, while those of my station spit on me as the purebred daughter of a traitor to the race."

Garrus winced. "Tel doesn't ... handle other asari well either. She was chased and almost killed by an asari psycho. She called it .. Arda yahska? Something like that. It messed her up real bad, to the point where she .. " He trailed off at the paling of Liara. "Doctor?"

The asari had almost gone gray with shock and dismay. "She.. she was assaulted by an ardat-yakshi and survived?"

Garrus growled. "I shot her dead when she came after Tel again. Lost my chance to move to External Affairs to do it, but I could give a shit." He sighed, frustrated, and Liara nodded.

"She must be very strong to survive such an ordeal...and I do not think she could have done so without your support. And love." Liara could only hope she could be of such use to Shepard, to carry her when Sara's strength failed under her burdens. To have to live with the claws of the Night-wind in your soul...

Telanya's inability to stand up to the demands of the Council of Matriarch's made more sense in that light. She looked across to Garrus, still wearing C-SEC blue, still locked into a position of frustrated anger, and sighed. "Garrus. I know you are angry. I know Shepard is angry. But neither Sergeant Telanya nor myself need to feel that right now. She is likely reeling and in fear, and I..."

Garrus sighed, finally, folding his arms. "It's .. it's a turian thing. A threat to your mate ...I just need to sort out why I'm really doing this."

The gray eyes met hers. "Am I doing it to prove to myself that I'm right and my father is wrong? Is it less about justice and more about being petty? Am I right by dragging my bond-mate into this mess, which could get us all killed?"

He turned away. "It doesn't help that I'm watched. The humans watch, constantly. As if I'm plotting something. As if I'm going to stab them in their sleep."

Liara made a sympathetic noise. "Lieutenant Commander Pressly strikes me as a man fighting his own prejudices very hard. I find myself thinking he was so angry because, despite his own inclinations, he had begun to see you in a better light than other turians, Garrus."

The turian sniper shrugged. "Maybe. Or maybe my father was right, and I'm a fool chasing a stupid vigilante dream. Maybe Palin was right, and that the only way to get things done is the long way."

Liara frowned. She wasn't sure if she grasped his meaning, but that didn't matter. "Do you think Shepard feels that way? Do you think she looks on your method of doing things as wrong, or that she sees you as other turians?"

She smiled faintly. "How much of your anger is you at yourself for letting her expectations down?"

Vakarian fixed her with a piercing look for a long second before his mandibles flickered in amused irritation. "I liked you better when you were nerdy and quiet, Doctor."

She shrugged, feeling ... pleased at that comment. "Life is change, the sea tide is never still. I have had to change myself in unexpected ways to be ... to be a part of Sara's life. I am asking you to not give up on her friendship. To reach out and try to show her that you still follow where she leads. She needs that. I cannot explain how much that means..would mean...to her."

Garrus said nothing, and then glanced away, again gazing upon the bone-white slotted sides of the Presidium. "And how do I do that, Doctor?"

She stared at him a long moment before heading to the air-car. "By being yourself, Garrus."

O-OSaBC-O

Shepard arrived back at the Normandy to find Pressly waiting for her dockside, still in uniform. "XO, why are you not out getting smashed."

The balding man smiled thinly. "Not for a lack of desire, ma'am." He exhaled. "Both Detective Vakarian and Sergeant Telanya are on board. As is Doctor T'Soni. She said her shoulder is fine, and that she needs to 'straighten out' Sergeant Telanya." His mouth tightened. "I remember bringing up the dependability of aliens..."

She stopped him. "Liara is an alien, Pressly."

He actually flushed, muttering. "...sorry,ma'am. You're right. She's..." He exhaled again. "Ma'am, the crew knows. I think you know that."

She winced slightly but nodded. "I figured."

He folded his arms. "I am probably completely out of line by saying this ma'am...but I don't think anyone has a problem with it. We've seen Doctor T'Soni risk her life right alongside every marine, and while she's a bit quiet and shy, she's never rude, or mouthy, or ... anything but polite. And the men and women of this ship aren't blind. She's helped you too, ma'am. More than once."

She nodded, and he just shook his head. "The bottom line is that we're your ship's company. Your crew. Your soldiers and sailors. I think Liara is counted in that number. She's proven her worth. I have to admit, so has the quarian lady, Ms. Zorah."

He folded his arms. "I won't question your decision to let them back on ma'am. Nor will any other member of ship's company. But it's hard for me to trust Vakarian and Telanya the same way I do the Doctor or Ms. Zorah."

She nodded again. "I get your meaning, Pressly. I do. That being said...we argued a lot of it out earlier. It's not as cut and dry as it seems. The asari is under a lot of pressure. It's like a damned arcology orphan being given the same order by Lord Manswell or Lord Windsor, except even more extreme."

Pressly considered that for a long moment. "I.. admit that sounds more like coercion than anything else...but the fact they didn't tell us disturbs me just the same."

Shepard shrugged. "Garrus thought I'd throw them both off the ship to avoid any risk...and since he was bonded to her, he claims he knew she'd never, ever try such a thing. He figured it was easier not to mention it and have Tel just ignore it than risk having to choose between his bond-mate and his desire to catch Saren. It's a tough place for a turian to be torn between duty and family."

She sighed. Pouring everything out to David left her feeling empty, of anger, of strength, of almost anything except a desire to curl up around Liara and pretend nothing else existed.

Pressly nodded again at her words. "I've done my best to keep an open mind, ma'am. About the turian, even the krogan. I know I'm probably not the best person to have handled that...but you were angry enough that I felt I needed to step in. If the circumstances you describe are the truth..."

She shrugged. "Garrus was angry enough to risk going toe-to-toe with me when I was so angry I was having problems keeping my biotics down."

Pressly made a face, of reluctant admiration. "He's got balls, I'll give him that."

Shepard laughed, unexpectedly, the short statement hitting her in just the right way to lighten her mood. "I don't know if he has 'em or not, actually. Guess I can ask Telanya." She sighed. "Enough of that. I'm going down to pick up Liara and take her to meet Captain Anderson. After that, I'll head to Flux. Go ahead and have C-SEC set a security watch and get anyone still on duty off the damned boat, including yourself. That's an order."

The XO nodded. "Yes ma'am. You look...calmer."

She smiled. "I am."

O-OSaBC-O

Shepard's and Liara's lunch with Anderson and Sanders ended up being a memory that Shepard never let go of. In the darkest times in her life, that hour would shine forth, limned in happiness and contentment, and get her going a little longer.

Anderson and Kahlee had cooked handmade hamburgers, in some kind of strange salarian cooking oil that had a spicy aftertaste almost like barbeque. The fries were done up in the same oil, along with a strong red wine that made Liara's head spin with just a few sips.

Anderson spent half the meal gesticulating with a chewed burger at a wall screen, displaying images of Shepard through her career. Shepard was mortified to discover Anderson kept pictures and even low-res haptic video of the big party thrown after the release of her unit from the Penal Legions to the general military – pictures of what had to be General Von Grath, wearing a party hat, glaring death at the photographer, his handlebar mustache nearly quivering. Video of a clearly inebriated Shepard flailing about with Jason Dunn. Of Beatrice Shields having a drinking contest with a Commissar, ending with the much bigger man collapsing and Shields deciding to flash the marines around her in victory.

Liara could not stop her laughter at more images from the aftermath of Dirth, showing a beleaguered looking Shepard surrounded by small children, their little faces dirty but smiling. Of Shepard stripped to her t-shirt and shorts, pulling out rubble with her biotics and muscle, as sobbing families scooped up their trapped relatives and children.

Images of a younger Sara, chin held up high, dressed in formal dress whites, with Anderson on one side and Von Grath on the other, as she was made a Staff Lieutenant.

Shepard got back at Anderson by gleefully telling Kahlee about the one other mission she'd served with him on, which ended up at an asari dance club staking out a two-bit weapons smuggler. "I had to tap him three times to get him to tear his eyes off the stage."

Anderson muttered something, and Kahlee just snickered. "That happened too long ago to put him in the doghouse over it now. But it's nice to know that if I want to dress up I should look for my Naughty Consort outfit, mm?"

Liara had never seen a human go quite so red in her life.

The food was astonishingly good to Liara, and she was embarrassed to realize she had eaten three of the 'hamburgers' as they were called. Then again she had not been eating well on the Normandy, leading her to ask why they did not have better food aboard ship.

The ranting that erupted from all three officers was as amusing and invective laden as it was informative. Shepard felt there was a conspiracy to drive naval business to local restaurants by serving only garbage aboard, drawing snickers from the other two. Anderson, who'd served on larger vessels with actual full food service facilities, implied it had more to do with the cost of feeding several million personnel every day aboard hundreds of ships, and the cost of shipping the food, storage, and the like.

Kahlee Sanders, on the other hand, thought it was the cooks. "The last damned run I was on had a cook who was so incompetent he actually managed to fuck up boiling water. Bastard sets it on to boil, and decides to go catch a smoke. Forgets he has a pot on, ends up watching the World Cup in the port lounge, and acts surprised when the heating unit catches fire after being set on high for four hours. Managed to burn up most of the kitchen and food supplies before we got it out."

Liara was a bit surprised when, after the meal, Anderson left Shepard chatting with Kahlee and guided her gently by the elbow to a side room. Comfortable low couches, much like the ones in an asari den, littered the small space, enclosed by bookshelves, hanging plants, and trickling water.

"Your home is beautiful, Captain Anderson. It seems almost asari in tone in some areas."

He gave a smile, sitting down across from her. "I may have picked up some ideas from an old friend of mine in the Asari Republic." The smile faded. "Doctor... Liara. How familiar are you with human culture, human ... ah, relationships?"

She fidgeted nervously. "Not...very? I am not .. I mean, the topic never came up for me to investigate. Until recently."

He nodded. "You're aware that humans tend towards...single partner relationships, unlike your people?"

Her lips quirked. "Yes, that much I do know. Given that I have .. no interest in anyone else, though, I do not see that as a problem." She took a deep breath. "I can never go home, Captain Anderson. I will never be accepted by my people, or my family. For better or for worse... I am stuck with her. It is a fate I am hardly unhappy with, but I am not foolish enough to hurt her heart by ever betraying her, or anything that might be seen as such."

He nodded. "I know asari bond with their mates but... details have never been something I looked up. I hate to be blunt...but I care a lot about her."

She nodded. "And she you, Captain. She sees you as.. it is hard to explain. A father? A friend? A paragon of light and duty, without flaw? She speaks of you in hushed tones, as if your name was too ... holy to be spoken by her voice."

Anderson looked both pleased and discomfited by that, but she continued. "The bond is not ... mind reading. It is not some mystical connection, despite the more poetic words of my people. The science behind it has been known for millennia. I feel her – her emotions, her urges, her fears and needs. I am part of her, in a way that transcends attraction." She paused. "I don't know her thoughts. I know her feelings, her memories. At times they blur with my own. It is often ... confusing. And on occasion, troubling."

Anderson's eyes narrowed. "You've seen her ... past? Her childhood?"

She lifted her chin, trying to keep anger from her voice. "I have. It is very hard for me to find much liking for your people, if you treat children to the sort of life she has been forced to endure. It was sickening."

Anderson nodded grimly. "On that, ma'am, we are in perfect agreement. I only know .. pieces. And what I know makes me sick, gives me nightmares at times. It makes me ashamed to be a human being, knowing a woman I look at like a daughter was treated like that...and that God only knows how many more children are in her same plight right now."

He glanced back up at her. "I just ... she's been in rough places, Liara. She's had a lot of people...not handle things the way they should have."

Her voice was icy. "You mean she has been betrayed over and over again until it took me nearly breaking both our minds to convince her that I would not betray her? Yes. I am aware. That also has not endeared me to your species." Her voice gentled. "However...you have never betrayed her. And I thank you for that. She trusts you, more than even me, I think."

He exhaled. "That's a heavy load to bear, you know. I know if I'm ever forced to choose between her and the Systems Alliance, that to not chose her might destroy her. I dread it, every day."

She shook her head, sadly. "And she dreads the day you look at her with disappointed eyes and turn your back on her."

His nostrils flared, his mouth compressed to a thin line, and he heaved his shoulders, as if throwing off a heavy burden. "That day, ma'am, will never, ever come." He paused. "What about you?"

She bit her lip before speaking. "I am hers, to death and beyond. She is all I have..." She thought of the meal she just ate, of seeing Shepard laughing, smiling, free of pain and worry for once "...and all I need or want."

She glanced down, almost nervously, then back up at Anderson. "I .. as I have said, I am not familiar with human customs and relationships. But in my own culture, two people would never bond without the blessing of the mother."

Anderson's lips twisted into a pained grimace. "The woman Shepard looked at in that light – "

Liara nodded sadly. "I know. I killed her." She sighed. "I am glad I did. No child should ever have to kill her own mother."

Anderson suddenly knew why Liara did so. "You fear you will have to ... kill your own mother."

Liara nodded. "I wish...so very much...that I could free her or turn her aside. But I have tasted her hate, in the biotics she threw at me with every intention to kill, in the coldness of her voice and eyes. And I tell myself my mother is already dead, and her blessing is not the one I seek."

She looked back into Anderson's soft brown eyes. "But yours."

Anderson nodded slowly. "If you can help her, Liara, you have my blessing, my prayers, and my hopes. If you can keep her alive, and living, and hoping – I will owe you a debt that I can't repay."

She smiled, the expression warm and happy, bringing a light to her eyes. Anderson was struck by her elegant beauty in that moment, and smiled back. Her voice was soft. "It is ... good that you brought me here to meet you. She needed that. She is ... very proud that you are proud of her. Of .. how you feel about her. And of the fact that you are always there for her."

Anderson could only shake his head. "If anyone needs to be thankful, it's me. She kept me from doing a very stupid thing that day I found her...and every time I get myself laid out or down, I remember that she never let anything stop her. And if she needs me to have her back, I can't let anything stop me either."

He stood, smiling. "By know, there's no telling what Kae has dragged her into. Probably the armory, to geek out over guns. Shall we catch up to them? I hear you can't stay long since you are headed to a nightclub."

She nodded. "Yes, that is true. Although..." She rubbed her crests, smiling ruefully. "Never would I have imagined having to teach my bond-mate how to dance."

Anderson's clean, happy laughter bounced off the walls, and Liara let her smile grow as she followed him out.

---

Chapter 93: Chapter 84 : Citadel , Club Flux

---

A/N: The fluff continues. I'm going to have to let your imaginations decide what Ash, Kaidan, Shepard, Liara, and the rest get up to while on leave after the party. I could write some of it out, but writing about the aftermath is funner.

The Reegar Carbine is introduced in ME3 in canon, but I don't care, it's too awesome a gun not to use here.

Update: Thanks to the guest who pointed out that I'd killed off von Grath in the Service Record. I did a lot of changes to the story during my long hiatus and forgot to update that. As a bonus, the Service Record is now much more detailed, with a lot of the [REDACTED] stuff filled in.

---

To say that Joker was nervous about going into a nightclub was an understatement.

For once, it had nothing to do with his bones. Sure, he was rolling without crutches or his chair for the first time in his life, but the flight lieutenant trusted Tali's braces, without any doubts. Just being able to walk from the ship to the doors of Flux without having to stop in pain was a dream he'd never imagined being possible.

It wasn't even the danger presented by crowds of people, none used to watching where they were going, that set him on edge. Even a casual brush might make him lose his balance, and crashing to the ground would end disastrously, but he was pretty sure that Tali wouldn't let him fall if that happened. He didn't want to embarrass himself in front of Tali, but it wasn't stressing him.

He was nervous because he had Tali holding on to his arm, and he was going to a nightclub, on a date.

He discovered that he didn't have any damned idea of what to do in whatever sort of pseudo-relationship he'd fallen into with the quarian girl. It had started with the first trip on the Citadel, the one where he'd vastly enjoyed himself by railing at the assholes refusing Tali service. That still got to him. He was all too familiar with being looked at in pity or in vague discomfort. Of being overlooked, or treated like he was slightly stupid or something just because his body had betrayed him at birth.

Seeing someone as kind, as open and as hard-working as Tali being sneered at and spat on by aliens who assumed she was a thief or worse had been worse than all the looks he'd ever gotten in his own life. Maybe she'd never had someone stand up for her before, or maybe it was how he got her to laugh, but they'd been close since then. He spent a lot of time chatting via omni-tool messages with her, on the long mid-watches where he was the only one awake in the cockpit and she was the lone engineer watching the core. They ate together, usually with him making pointed comments about how even paste had to be better than something passing itself off as 'steak' that had the texture of glue.

He enjoyed talking to her, more than Alenko, or Ownby, or even Ash. And he sometimes found himself wishing he was a quarian. They treated people who worked hard and pushed themselves a lot better than the SA did.

At least, Tali did.

He'd nearly cried when she nervously presented him with the leg braces she'd made herself. Dr. Chakwas had been amazed at the complexity, the small size and disproportionate power of the harness, and Joker had, for once in his life, been left completely speechless. The eezo alone must have cost her a good quarter of a million credits – probably everything she had from whatever the Broker had paid her. And the hours and hours of work that must have gone into it still left him speechless. No one had ever given him a gift of that magnitude, and for what?

For not being a complete asshole? For bothering to help her with shopping? He wore them under his jeans, the slim lines not even visible under the cloth, letting him walk like a normal person. No one gave him pitying looks. No one drew back slightly as if he was contagious. He was just a guy.

For that? He'd have given Tali anything she wanted.

When she'd come up to the mess deck after Shepard's announcement and stammered out a question about what he was doing before going to the nightclub, he hadn't given much thought to his answer. "Thought I'd go hang with Kaiden a bit, catch some grub."

Like Tali herself, Joker had long ago become very aware of the body language and impressions other people gave off. Some of it was just his way of utilizing the time he had from being forced to sit around, some of it was jealousy, watching everyone else get to be normal. No matter the source, he knew what that slight slumping of shoulders meant, the tiny dip of her head. And thus he'd quickly spoke a second line of words.

"Unless maybe you wanted to hang out.? Not to be cliché and all, but I know this turian place..."

That had been hours ago, and Joker knew he was, just maybe, in some trouble.

They'd eaten at the turian joint he'd mentioned, where the dirty glances were for once thrown at him and not her. She'd had her food processed into some kind of paste and fed into a tube in her mask, while he'd eaten the 'Levo Special', some kind of salarian fish with what hush puppies would have looked like if described by someone who'd only seen and never tasted them.

He'd found out about her father, as she slowly unwound with several glasses of turian brandy, and found himself smiling at how cute she was sipping slowly from a straw.

They'd walked on the Presidium, and he found himself unable to stop smiling as she gushed over just about everything – the beauty of the buildings, the engineering it required, the sheer scale of the curving imitation sky. The hint of bitterness in her voice, as she wished the simple lifeships of her people had been like this, made him a bit sad for her, and he jokingly suggested the quarians stop asking the Council for planets and go the SA – they'd kill for engineering talent like hers.

The comment had left her with a thoughtful tilt to her head.

They'd browsed a weapon store – not for him, as firing anything heavier than a pistol would probably break his arms, but for her. She'd been looking at shotguns, and submachine guns, chattering about how the fleet marines aboard quarian vessels used electrical-shock weapons, and he'd been nodding along (and thinking how cool an electro-shock flamethrower sounded). Who knew quarians were secretly badasses?

That's when he'd seen it, tucked into a corner of the shop mainly given over to sniper rifles. "...hey Tali. Check this out."

She'd padded over, and the pale glowing eyes behind that purple faceplate had widened as she took in the weapon hanging on the wall. "...a MFM shotgun? What is it doing here?"

Joker had asked the asari shopkeeper, who'd shrugged and said some quarian had sold it for funds a few months back. No one had shown any real interest in it, and she'd moved it to the back of the store to make room for better sellers. Tali's voice was sad as she spoke. "Probably another quarian on Pilgrimage...selling his parent's weapon gift to keep himself in funds."

Joker hadn't missed the wistful note in her voice, nor the titanic price tag on the weapon. "You should get it, then. Put it back to good use, frying up some geth."

She shook her head. "Too much." And then protested when Joker had (carefully) pulled it down from the wall and walked to the counter with it. The cost was high – and spilled over into the ship's account, he was sure – but he didn't really care.

The warmth and gratitude in her small, wavery voice was something he was coming to like a lot, and hearing it again made him fully aware he wasn't just doing this out of niceness any more. Despite his condition, he was still a healthy male. And she was very, very curvy, and the tightness of the suit she wore didn't help.

And they were both very lonely.

The fact they were, in a way, both prisoners of their bodies only made the attraction he felt a bit more bitter. But he wasn't immune to the fact she made him feel good about himself. Made him feel like the struggle he'd gone through in his life to excel meant something. The admiration in her voice when she spoke of his skill as being beyond even the best quarian pilots left him grinning.

She laughed at his jokes, and he laughed at her stories. The endlessly complex culture of the quarians would have been boring to some, but for him it was seeing into a new world, one defined by how good you were, how hard you worked, how much you cared about the job, not how well you fit in or if you were popular or not.

And that brought him to the real problem he had. The more he hung out with Tali, the more bitter he felt about how his own life had gone, and Tali made him feel good. Like a man, not a cripple.

He knew, in his head, he shouldn't be feeling that way. His parents had done the best they could – his father nearly killing himself working two or three jobs at a time to pay for Jeff's surgeries and medicines. His mother always cheering him up when he became frustrated. Hilary's silly attitudes falling away to become a fierce, angry little lioness when someone bullied him, even if she was five years younger.

He couldn't say he hadn't been loved. But the effort and work he put into his pursuit of piloting, his dream, had not always paid off the way he wanted. Sure, he was recognized. He'd been promoted straight from cadet to first lieutenant, and in four months he'd be up for auto-promotion to lieutenant commander, on the strength of his piloting abilities and perfect performance scores. He had flight command of the most advanced warship in the entire SA, one tasked with the most important mission ever, under the command of humanity's first Spectre.

But at the end of the day, he had about five friends, and three of them were on the Normandy. He had a tiny apartment he almost never saw, and his last girlfriend had ditched him for some over-muscled jock of a Marine a day after he got the Normandy assignment. He didn't feel appreciated, or wanted, or valued...except by Tali.

He sorta doubted in his ability to do much to help her out. Her father was an asshole with a stick up his ass so far he made Garrus look laid back. Her mother was dead and the rest of her family were all super-duper important admiral types, all of them demanding Tali be some kind of genius. Her closest friends had failed their Pilgrimages, three dying, two coming back broken failures, and she was on a mission that was terrifying to her in it's scope and what it meant for her people

He did what he could. She got him braces, so he got her a kickass, electro-plasma shotgun. She made him feel good about himself, he focused all his attention onto her. It wasn't exactly a fair trade in his eyes – to be able to walk around painlessly required a much bigger payback, like, say, him buying her a cruiser or six – but it was all he was able to do. That, and keep up the jokes.

Having her next to him as he walked towards the club at Flux, though, was ... confusing. More than one marine had made giggling little remarks about how sweet Tali was on him, and he'd originally played it off as mere teasing. As the days went by, it became less funny and more painful. If he'd been normal...if she was anything but trapped in a suit...

He sighed, trying not to think about it. She meant a lot more to him that he knew what to do with or say, and jokes couldn't cover the frustration he felt. For tonight, though, he was going to set that aside, have fun, and pretend he didn't care what anyone else thought, as long as she was laughing and having fun and not twisting her hands in anxiety and worrying she wasn't good enough.

He was so caught up in his thoughts that he didn't see a turian turn away swiftly from his argument with another turian. The turian was moving quickly, and Joker, unable to avoid him, crashed almost directly into the taller alien. He staggered back, panicking as he felt pain bloom in his arm, but Tali was there, stopping him from falling, the soft feel of her body against his comfortable.

The turian snarled, his dark black face smeared with wild red, spiky facepaint. Cold green eyes stared down at him, and his mandibles flared as he sneered out his words. "Watch where you're going, monkey, and take your filthy quarian slut back to the Lower Wards."

Hate and anger flared in him as Tali cringed from the buzzing tone of the turian. "Make me, you spiky plated asshole. You ran into me." A part of his mind screamed at him to stop while the rest of him gently positioned Tali behind him, despite the fact that she was armed and healthy and he was broken and fragile.

He was angry and sick of people talking shit to someone he cared about.

The turian slowly turned to face him, towering over he and Tali both by a good foot. The alien's eyes narrowed, and he smiled, displaying a row of needle-like teeth. "Or what, primate?"

Joker opened his mouth to respond when a heavy grating voice from the side spoke up. "Or we'll beat your punk dinosaur ass into the ground for fucking with our pilot and engineer, spike."

Joker turned, as did Tali and the turian, to see the blocky form of Sergeant Ownby standing there. He was shorter than the turian, but his shoulders were nearly as broad, and thick muscle danced below his skin-tight shirt. Next to him, Corporal Haskins pretty features were twisted into a sneer, her knuckles cracking. The four Normandy marines behind them all glared at the turian.

Haskins shook her head. "Just like a fucking spike. Pick on the small guy and the quarian. Real big man we got here."

Joker smirked. "You should make the like the Mu Relay and get lost, buddy." The turian snarled again, and stalked off, shoving past Ownby and vanishing into the heavy crowds coming down from the stairway leading up to the Presidium proper.

After a moment, the group of marines broke down snickering, and Ownby proffered a fist-bump. "That was ice cold, man. Make like the Mu Relay, hee."

Joker bumped fists, swallowing as he realized he was breathing too fast. He exhaled, trying to control his nerves. "He's lucky you guys came along or he would have been fucked."

Haskins raised her eyebrow. "I know Cutie-pie fixed your legs up, but that don't mean you can go whooping ass on turians, Joker." She giggled as Tali's head dipped in embarrassment at the nickname Ashley had dropped on her, but Joker just grinned.

"Naw, not me. Tali. Show 'em what we picked up." Tali nodded, displaying the heavy lines of the Reegar Carbine. "It's an electro-plasma flamethrower shotgun the quarians use to fuck up the geth."

The marines traded looks and sighed. Ownby spoke first. "Alright, it's official. Quarians are complete raging badasses, no matter how cute Tali is."

Tali chuckled and put it back in the shopping bag, and Haskins punched Ownby in the arm. "You cheap bastard. Joker buys his girlfriend a freaking flamethrower shotgun and all you get me is an omnitool?"

Joker couldn't help but notice Tali's grip on his arm tighten fractionally, and he took a deep breath. When she said nothing in denial, he felt a smirk come over his face. Worrying about what it all meant was something he could deal with later.

Tonight, he had his marine buddies ... and Tali.

Ownby shot him a sour look, and Joker just cackled. "Don't hate, appreciate."

O-OSaBC-O

Garrus was surprised when Shepard came into the cargo bay of the Normandy, an hour and a half before the scheduled party at Flux. He found himself conflicted about how to handle the situation with Shepard, and had decided to tinker some more with the MAKO to figure out to deal with the mess he was in.

He was down here alone because he was upset as well that part of him, however small, was angry at Tel for putting him in this situation. That wasn't fair to Tel, but his father had always warned him fairness in life was about as common as honest thieves and smart vorcha.

Shepard walked across the otherwise empty cargo bay. Most of the crew had left even before Shepard and Liara came back from wherever they'd gone to, and Shepard had been throwing people off the ship with a good-natured, happy smile ever since. Telanya and himself were probably the only two left aboard.

He put down his tools and turned away from the MAKO as she walked up. "Commander."

She looked at him for a long couple of seconds, blue eyes searching for something. "Liara says I should make up with you." She looked away, eyes seeking the rubberized decking of the cargo bay, the lines in her body tense. "Says this is just a big, stupid mess, that Telanya was in a place where she couldn't say no, and that you just made a bad call."

He said nothing, merely watching her, and her face twisted into a sort of smile, lined with pain. "That a fair statement, Vakarian? A bad call?"

He gave a turian shrug, shoulders rolling. "That isn't my place to decide. You're the commander of the mission and the ship, you decide what is acceptable or not."

She narrowed her eyes. "I told you when you got on board, I don't need any of that me-turian-me-good soldier zombie bullshit."

He stared right back. "And I told you I follow orders just fine when they aren't completely full of shit. Telanya is my spirits damned life."

She smiled coldly, and cracked her neck. "Your race has a lot of stupid fucking ideas, Vakarian, but you all have one thing right, how to get through a problem." And then she hit him with a right cross that sent him staggering before kicking him and sending him to the deck.

Anger exploded in him, and before he knew what he was doing he was up, swinging his leg out in a snap kick. She blocked it and he spun on his heel, faster than she could react, slamming his fist into her stomach with a satisfying thud. She grimaced against the pain, scissoring his forearm between her own forearms, pinning the hand and then shifting her footing and flipping him completely over her shoulder.

He hit the ground with a horrific boom, feeling his fringe hit the deck hard enough to chip a tip, and the pain only made him madder. He kicked out, sending her flying back against the MAKO, and leapt into a pounce. His shoulder rammed into her chest, and his arms snapped out, a heavy punch clipping her jaw, an uppercut into her face. She staggered and his knee came up, crashing into her face, and with a roar she slammed her foot down into his knee.

He screamed, the joint of his knee crackling, and her elbow came up and out of no where, crashing into his face hard enough to make his plates creak. Blood was running from her mouth and nose, but she didn't care as she leapt up in the air, her entire body twisting as her leg scythed around, her heel crushing his mandible against his jaw and sending Garrus thudding down to the deck.

He spat blood, his vision blurry, and smelled her blood on his fist. "Impetuous human, you think you can take me without your damned biotics?"

He rolled to his feet, circling her, and she gave a bloodied smile. "I can kick your ass any day of the week, chicken. I'm your fucking commander, and this is the last time you'll pull shit like this on me."

He roared, leaping again, and his claws slashed at her. She blocked them with a forearm, hissing in pain as the talons cut into her arm, and put a knife-hand strike into his chest. His entire chest made a hollow booming noise, knocking the air out of his lungs, but he managed to stay on his feet and block several kicks, catching the last with his hand, wrapping his grip around her ankle and pulling her into a grapple.

She was strong, but he was stronger and larger, and he just wrapped his arms around her smaller frame and squeezed as he lifted her from her feet. She gave a scream as he felt something begin to give in her body, and slammed the back of her head into his face.

He felt a nasal plate break, and the pain bloomed, his grip slipping. He staggered back as blue blood dripped sullenly from the break, and she dropped to the floor and coughed up blood, heaving.

He coughed, shaking his head to try to clear the blurriness, and focused on Shepard. "Admit you fucking over reacted, damn you. She'd have never done anything to her...you'd have killed Tel if she was a threat to Liara..."

Shepard spat blood, wiping her mouth on her sleeve, the cuts on her arm bleeding freely and staining the cloth red. "Fuck you...you think I'd have killed Tel, your goddamned bond-mate, if you'd told me? I was the one who got lied to here..."

He snarled and rushed her, and she brought her fist up, this time flaring with blue biotic energy.

There was a horrific collision of force and both Shepard and Garrus went flying, as a pair of biotic barriers stopped their respective assaults. Garrus landed in a heap, cracking his head on the MAKO's hard tires, and Shepard rolled into a pile of cargo boxes, which fell on her.

Liara T'Soni stood in the elevator, framed in blue power, the smaller form of Telanya standing behind her, looking appalled. Liara's steps were slow and measured as she walked down the length of the cargo bay, wincing as she sidestepped drops of blood here and there, red and blue.

"What in the name of the Goddess are you two idiots doing?"

Garrus looked up from the floor to see Telanya looking embarrassed, and as his anger faded he could feel her shame. "I..ah.."

Liara narrowed her eyes at him. "Telanya and I were trying to have a simple tea ceremony and discussion when you two decided to engage in some kind of alpha-male krogan dominance ritual!"

Shepard groaned, flinging a box off of her battered form, and sat up blearily. "Liara...I'm not a male..."

Liara's eyes narrowed. "Yes, I found that out already, thank you. But you are both acting like fools! We are supposed to be relaxing and preparing to face Saren and my mother and you two are in some kind of ... of... " She threw her hands up in frustration. "... argh! Neither of your stupid languages has a word for it."

Liara walked over to Shepard, and pulled her out of the tumbled down cargo boxes. "You need to accept that Garrus is sorry. Telanya and I have already addressed the issue and the woman flung away her C-SEC career to make a point. Stop trying to solve every problem with your fists!"

Her gaze shifted to Garrus. "And you need to stop justifying what you did as acceptable since Tel is your bondmate and yet being upset with Sara for doing the same for her bondmate."

She huffed, hands on her hips, and all of a sudden it was too hilarious for Garrus. He erupted in laughter, falling back against the MAKO, the pain in his plates flaring but not stopping him. Liara's eyes widened, and she fell back into what he realized was Shepard's stance, folding her arms, letting her weight fall back onto her right leg.

At that, something set off Shepard too, and the woman cracked up, stifling her laughter behind her hand, her hair falling into her face as she shook with mirth, collapsing back into the stack of boxes. Liara gave her a sour look as well, and shook her head. "Telanya?"

Tel looked up, still standing in the elevator bay. "Yes, Lady Liara?"

Liara sighed, and turned to leave. "We are going to find something to wear to this event tonight. These two idiots can clean themselves up."

Telanya's voice was edged with very slight amusement. "Yes, Lady Liara."

As they got onto the elevator and the doors began to close, Liara spoke again. "And it is just Liara. Or Doctor if you must..."

The doors shut, leaving the cargo bay in silence, except for an occasional snicker. Shepard scratched her head after a second. "That was...different."

Garrus coughed, mandibles quivering in amusement. "That was...hilarious." He leaned back against the cool deck of the cargo bay, closing his eyes, and the two of them were silent for a couple of minutes.

Finally Garrus spoke as he sat up. "...maybe she has a point, Sheep. I fucked up. I've ... gone at my life wrong in so many ways I just couldn't risk missing out on this, but I couldn't ... miss out on her either. That doesn't mean I don't trust your lead. I'd die before betraying you. I would. I swear that on the spirits." He hung his head, watching drips of blood hit the deck. "I told you I wasn't a very good turian."

Shepard said nothing for a few seconds, before she groaned and managed to get to her feet, shuffling over to where he lay. She triggered her biotics and levered him to his feet, grunting with pain as she did so. "I should have tamped down on my anger and done this different, talked to you, heard you out. Because I didn't, Tel is worried she pissed off the Councilor...and I'm sorry for that. I've had so much shit in my life go directly to hell because people...betrayed me."

She finally met his gaze, her battered features tired. "I'd like not to fuck up anymore. If I could figure out how to stop, I would."

Garrus nodded. "A good first step would be to not beat the shit out of your sniper."

She wiped blood from her nose again. "Pfft." She shook her head. "Shit man, you hit like a fucking truck."

Garrus exhaled. He hadn't gone hand to hand with anyone since his days in the Turian military, and in the aftermath of the fight he felt surprisingly calm and ... better. "I will say it's a good way to work out tension, but next remind me not to piss you off. I think you broke my face."

She smirked. "Like I said, your people got at least one thing right. Not much else though, elevators suck, coffee makers suck..."

He laughed again, and held out his hand. "Forgive me for ... not thinking how you'd see what I didn't tell you as a lack of trust in you. You are my commander."

She looked up at him again and then shook the hand. "Forgive me for being a crazy overprotective bitch with all the empathy of a car tire, chicken. I don't intend on going anywhere without my sniper covering my back."

My sniper. It sent a warm feeling up Garrus's fringe. He nodded. "Fair enough, sheep."

There was a moment of silence, then Shepard spoke. "Fuck, we're going to have to get Chakwas to patch us up before the party. This will be fun to explain. Maybe she'll buy that we were jumped by Cerberus assassins looking for revenge."

She turned to the elevator and he followed, limping a bit, and he chuckled.

O-OSaBC-O

Flux was not completely packed by the time the Normandy crew rolled in, but the additional business clearly made Doran very happy, especially when Shepard – dressed in a simple pair of long pants and a long-sleeved shirt she's gotten from somewhere – sent her account chit to his cashier and told him to charge everything the crew got to the ship's account.

Wrex was tucked into his usual corner booth, muttering war stories to Cole and Vega, both of whom looked impressed, while they kept a careful eye on the crew members to stave off any trouble. Joker and Tali sat together with several marines, both of them getting increasingly hammered as Ownby decided a constant stream of turian brandy (consumable by both levo and dextro races) was the best idea since sliced bread.

Garrus sat nursing his own drink, Telanya to his left, and Dr. Chakwas to his right, as she worked carefully at decimating a rapidly decreasing bottle of Serrice Ice Brandy. She'd already drunk two of the ship's marines under the table, and wasn't even slurring her speech. When Telanya had politely inquired why the doctor didn't sit with the other ship's company, she had laughed. "They can't keep up with me, the poor dears, and I don't want to make them all look bad by out-dancing them as well as out drinking them."

Liara, rather than show up Shepard – whose civilian clothing was about as plain and dowdy as she could get, Sara clearly being uncomfortable with the idea of showing off her body – had dressed in a long, pale blue dress that complemented her slender figure. The two sat quietly at a private table in the overhead floor, Liara sipping at a tall thin glass of something blue and asari, while Shepard indulged in scotch.

Shepard's eye was drawn to the dance floor, where Kaidan and Ash were having a dance off of some kind with an asari and her turian date. Neither the turian or Kaidan were bad, per se, but Ash and the asari girl were performing moves Shepard had to admit looked impressive and difficult. "Yeeahh, I'm glad I'm not down there. People would die laughing at me."

Liara's lips curved slightly. She'd felt the waves of amusement and calm acceptance from Shepard after she'd left the cargo bay, and the sight of Shepard and Garrus walking into Flux together, bickering about sniper rifles, had settled the few looks of suspicion she'd seen on the faces of the crew. She wasn't angry at Shepard for the fight she and Garrus had any more – somehow, that had worked out whatever remaining anger the two had, and for that she was grateful.

More to the point, maybe it had given Shepard something to let loose with, as she seemed utterly relaxed right now. Seeing her in civilian clothing put her in a whole new light to Liara. The simple lines of her shirt didn't exactly obscure her figure, but they did soften her image, and despite the bruises on her jaw, she looked...beautiful. Alive. Happy.

Liara smiled, and laid her hand over Shepard's. "It is merely dancing, Sara. It is not as if you are engaged in combat."

Shepard muttered. "No, it's worse. Me dancing is like giving a flamethrower to a vorcha and then wondering why the room is on fire. Just a bad idea." She took another sip of her scotch. "Besides, the chicken and I sorta banged each other up too much for me to dance."

Liara rolled her eyes, then returned her gaze to the info-pad in front of her. Shepard raised an eyebrow. "Just because we aren't dancing doesn't mean you need study...whatever that is. Relax."

Liara smiled. "I am trying to. I find myself more able to do so if I can get certain thoughts off of my mind." She gestured to the pad. "I have gathered all the information I can on Noveria in preparation for our ... trip. My mother has been seen several times on the planet, and the Corporate Court there has not even tried to detain her."

Shepard snorted. "Neither would I. Rent-a-cops and two bit mercs against a matriarch and a bunch of commandos? Not good for business, I suspect. It doesn't matter." She looked up. "Are you going to be okay if things go bad and... we can't talk her down?"

Liara's mouth tightened. "If what Shiala said was correct, we will not be able to talk her down." She exhaled. "And perhaps, Sara, there is no longer anything for me to say to her. What can be said? Saren is her bond-mate, as I am yours. If you decided tomorrow to attack your people for the pain they had subjected you to, do you think I would try and stop you?"

Shepard winced, and Liara took another sip of her drink. "It may be she is coerced. Or it may be she is doing it out of her own free will. Whatever the cause, Sara, she was not trying to subdue me on Feros. She was trying to kill me."

Liara sighed, and her hand slipped across the table to fold around Shepard's again. "I keep wishing that the situation was different...even as I sit here, planning how I will go about murdering my own mother." She recalled her conversation with Anderson. "No child should have to kill their own mother."

Shepard nodded, sipping at her scotch. "If there is any chance we can subdue her without killing her, Liara, I promise to find a way."

Liara smiled sadly. "The situation with Benezia is almost identical to that of ... Rachel." She glanced around, making sure no one was listening. "The Asari Republic cannot afford to leave her alive, for she knows too many secrets they are clearly worried about getting out."

Shepard shook her head. "Figures. Sometimes I wonder if the entire universe is just fucking evil. Surely normal people don't have to put up with this kind of shit."

Liara shrugged, trailing her fingers up Shepard's arm to turn her head to face her, and with barely a hesitation, kissed her on the lips. "I did not intend to darken your mood, Sara." She shut off the info-pad with an exhalation and slid it across the table. "As you said, we are here to relax."

Shepard smiled. "Oh, I am." Her gaze flickered to the entrance, where the pair of krogan bouncers hurled yet another reporter out into the walkways, and punted his hovering camera after him. "Besides, watching the krogan kick the shit out of reporters trying to get into harass me and my crew never gets old."

Liara was about to say something when the two krogan glanced at each other and stepped back. A single human strode between them, barrel chested and tall, dressed immaculately in SA dress whites, his shoulders festooned with gold bars. His hard gray eyes flickered over the crowd of aliens and humans, his heavy gray handlebar mustache moving slightly as he spoke to a nearby Marine. The older general turned his gaze up towards where Liara and Shepard were sitting, and he took off his hat, tucking it under one arm and striding confidently for the stairs.

His presence was immense, commanding, and people drew back from him as he walked past, paying them no mind whatsoever. Liara shot a look at Shepard, whose face was a mask of nervous worry, and she could feel the questioning panic bubbling up inside her.

The man walked up to their table, the lines of his face drawn into an almost fierce frown. "So, I see you didn't learn your lesson about throwing wild parties and not inviting the Old Man after all, did you?"

Shepard gave a nervous smile. "General von Grath, I didn't know you were on the Citadel..."

Von Grath's stern expression suddenly broke into an amused smirk, and he sat down with smooth ease. "I'd forgotten how easy it is to spin you up into a worried little wreck, Shepard. I'm here as part of whatever crazy-ass plan you've cooked up with Admiral Chu, and thought I'd swing by to see how you were doing."

Shepard blinked in confusion, before stammering. "Ah y-yes sir."

Von Grath raised one graying eyebrow before turning to Liara. "At least your taste in women has improved...sharply. You must be Doctor T'Soni. I'm Jason von Grath, newly appointed fleet general of the Fifth Fleet's Marine 1st Brigade. Captain Anderson is very impressed with you, and he does not impress easily."

He appeared amused as both of them looked slightly panicked at his knowledge, and made a motion with his hand. "Relax. David told me. As long as she's willing to put up with your crazy, I haven't a problem with it, although I can guarantee you the SA PR bastards will."

Shepard coughed past her embarrassment. "We're not... advertising it, sir."

He made a commanding, brisk motion with two fingers to a turian waiter. "Shit, you might as well be. You both look about as smug as a rooster with twenty hens." He turned to the turian, and his voice dropped into more cold tones. "Riesling icewine, bring the bottle." He handed the turian a 5k credit note and turned away dismissively, fixing his gaze on Shepard.

"You look good. Less like you're going to flip out and kill everyone, more like a woman. Command suits you, it seems. I'm proud of what you've achieved, without a damned jot of help from the SA I might add, but it's about time we stop fucking around with this Saren cretin and put a round in his head. That's why I'm here." He paused, gaze flicking between the two of them. "You're usually not this quiet."

Shepard gave a shrug. "I ... I'm doing good, sir. Just...surprised that you're here is all. I thought you were running for office...figured you didn't want to be openly associated with me, given all the bad media press I get. And I didn't know how you would react to Liara."

Von Grath's eyebrows drew together in a frown. "Shepard, you saved my damned life at Dirth. What you did there was magical. You saved those people, and ... I know what that cost you." He didn't continue with that line of thought, instead folding his hands in front of him. "But regardless of that, I sponsored you, along with Anderson, for damned good reasons. The idea that I'd be ashamed or unwilling to associate with you is laughable. If we fell out of contact with each other, that had more to do with my own budding political aspirations and less to do with any fault on your part."

She smiled, relaxing a bit, and he continued. "As for the election, I got a very ... unpleasant note from Major Kyle a few weeks back." Her face fell, and his own took on grim overtones. "I was running on a Northstar platform, and he informed that they were not what they seemed. Rather than try to start over from the beginning, I asked myself if I was running for office to improve the SA, or merely to convince myself I was improving the SA."

He leaned back. "When the news broke about you crushing Cerberus, I couldn't have been more proud." He gave a look to Liara. "I haven't always been ... open to some alien races, and I've made some statements along those lines that I have come to regret. Regardless, Cerberus was slime not even good enough for SA bullets, and I'm glad you handled them. Thus, when Admiral Chu asked me for advice on working your little plan for Noveria, I decided it was past time I handled things myself."

He glanced up, as an asari approached with a bottle of chilled wine and a slender glass, and nodded gracefully in response. He let her pour his first glass, lifting it with a sniff and an appreciative smile, and handed her another credit note, drawing a brilliant smile from the asari as she walked off.

His eyes followed her for a moment, until she was out of earshot, before he turned back to Shepard. "As for my feelings about your relationship with Doctor T'Soni...I've never had problems with the asari. And like I said, your taste has improved sharply." He gave another confident smirk, bringing back a host of memories to both Shepard – and Liara, through the bond shared memories they had.

"As to why I am here, as I said, Admiral Chu found your plan to deal with any resistance from Noveria fascinating, and the Commissariat is already giggling. While we certainly hope the bluff you plan to present is good enough to make them let you investigate, if not, well..."

He took a sip of the wine, eyes sparkling. "It has been entirely too long since I did a hot drop with the DACT and put my boot into smug turian faces."

She shook her head, her spirits rising and her worries evaporating. Von Grath was powerfully politically connected, one of the most important generals in the SA, and was the single figure that had protected her from the ramifications of her actions over the years. She had thought, after the disgrace at Torfan, that she had lost his patronage and approval.

If she had not...then God help anyone who was trying to bring her down, because von Grath would fucking bury them.

She swallowed. "It means a lot for you to support me in this, sir. Going up against Saren and Benezia is nerve wracking enough without having anyone at my back."

Von Grath sniffed. "Anderson would skin me alive if I were let that happen, young lady. Tonight isn't for worry, but celebration." He turned to Liara. "I have also been reading some of your monograms on the Prothean Extinction. I must admit, I was impressed by the methods you used to link the Second Exodus-era ruins on Orri to the design styles on Tura Prime based on nothing more than mineralogical analysis. Did you also study geology?"

Liara immediately brightened, and Shepard laughed in her head as the famous von Grath charm swung into play. She couldn't follow half of the conversation that followed, even with Liara's memories swirling about in pieces, but she knew enough to realize von Grath's hobby of archeology had just won him big points with Liara.

On the dance floor below, the Normandy marines were cheering on Ashley as she danced against the lithe form of Ops Tech Siradra and the Ops Alley team shouted encouragement. Garrus and Wrex were having some kind of drinking contest, Joker was laid out in Tali's lap while the quarian lolled against the solid form of Master Chief Cole, and Vega and Haln were pushing tables together as Doran brought trays of appetizers.

She turned back to Von Grath and Liara, as the asari looked almost embarrassed as Von Grath praised something else from one of her papers. "I will say this, Doctor. If the University of Serrice is too ignorant to offer you a place, I assure you that Harvard or the University of Arcturus would sell their own first born children to have you on."

Liara looked stunned and a touch uncertain. "I am not that much of a figure in Prothean studies..."

Shepard snorted. "You mean, Prothean loot-monkey auctions? You know the asari and salarian universities are just digging up stuff for more artifacts, Liara." She took a sip of her scotch, smiling. "And you wouldn't have to deal with uppity asari who don't like you, either."

Liara's face took on a thoughtful expression, before smiling. "Perhaps after we are done with our current mission."

Von Grath nodded. "Good, good." He turned to Shepard. "By the way, there was a rather attractive lady mingling with your marines below. Strong face, wonderful green eyes, silver hair. Your crew?"

Shepard smothered a giggle. "Ah, er, yes. That's Major Helen Chakwas."

Von Grath tilted his head at a rakish angle. "Well, I don't want to keep you two from your own entertainments, so perhaps I should introduce myself to some members of your crew." He stood, taking the bottle with him. "Bring your BDO and your team leads to dock sixteen the day you plan to ship out, Shepard." He nodded respectfully to Liara, and turned away. "And try not to get arrested, girl. If I had a quarter for every time I had to cover for you..."

He strode away, humming, and Liara let out a little breath. "So that is General von Grath. He is certainly...interesting."

Shepard smirked. "He's a smooth, brilliant bastard, and I'm glad he's still in my corner." She saw Liara's nod, and shrugged. "Anderson was always there for me, but he didn't always have a lot of pull. Von Grath is the one who salvaged my career from my own fuckups."

Liara's voice was soft. "He strikes me as a formidable person, Sara."

Shepard's smirk widened. "Yeah." She finished her scotch, and stood up. "We'd better get down there and get some food. I shudder to think what's going to happen to my poor marines if von Grath decides he wants to organize a dance party or something."

Liara nodded, and smiled as she took Shepard's hand. "Does that mean you plan to make an attempt on the dance floor yourself, Sara?"

Shepard just rolled her eyes. "Not happening. I get out there and you'd have to hire the STG to find my goddamned dignity when I got done." Liara followed her after picking up her info-pad, smiling.

O-OSaBC-O

The upper deck was left abandoned, until a shimmering form erupted from thin air, seated at a nearby table. Tetrimus glanced over at the three empty glasses on the table, and chuckled softly to himself.

He tapped his omnitool, and spoke quietly. "I've confirmed it's Noveria. Have Parasini and Qu'in alerted." He waited until the omnitool flashed a confirmation, before triggering his cloaking field again and leaning back into the chair.

He'd learned a lot tonight, and it would be easier to slip past the crowds once they thinned a bit.

---

Chapter 94: Chapter 85 : Citadel , Solarch

---

A/N: Another day, another twist.

---

The morning after the party was one of hangovers and grim taking of stock. In the Alliance, most shore leave events were hosted and thrown by the XO. For the commanding officer to throw the party and pay for it was an old Alliance tradition.

One conducted when you were going into battle, probably to die.

Thus, it was with a mixture of deja vu and amused irony that Kaiden once again awoke in a hotel room clearly beyond that of his modest lieutenant's salary, with Ash sprawled out in all her naked glory next to him. His head pounded with it's usual intensity, but he didn't feel as trashed as he had the first time this had occurred.

That, and while Ash was clearly toasted, I wasn't that drunk.

He sat up gingerly, gratified to note that at some point they'd actually dropped their clothes in neat piles next to the bed, and wiped sleep out of his eyes. He wasn't sure what to think or to do at this point, honestly.

He'd spent the morning at Huerta Memorial, having a scan of his brain conducted. The asari doctors there had been gentle with the diagnosis, but it pretty well matched up with that twitchy little salarian on Omega had said. He had, if he stopped using all biotics and took suppressive drugs, maybe a year and half to two years to live. If he spent six hours a day hooked to neuron regeneration equipment and took some highly experimental drugs with a full detox, he was looking at three or four years, the last six months of which would be spent in dementia.

He was, quite literally, a walking dead man. Despite knowing, in the back of his mind he'd assumed that maybe the salarian was wrong, or maybe there would be some way to change it. At the same time, he wasn't just going to quit.

His parents would be devastated at the news. His father, in particular, was already wracked with guilt over the business trip that he'd gone on, forcing his mother to use public transport the day the merchant ship had detonated in the skies over Vancouver, exposing her and her unborn child to eezo. They'd felt for his headaches, were proud of his military career, always boasting about their son.

He bit his lip, wondering how the hell to explain this to them. He heard Ash mumble something in her sleep, and shook his head.

Ash would not take the news well, either. The relationship they had was one of mutual attraction. She was a lot smarter than any line infantryman he'd met, quoting poetry and philosophy at the drop of a hat, and her strong faith in the Lord was sometimes a comfort to him as well. Her mental scars from Eden Prime had not healed, merely crusted over with revenge and hate, and when she was with him she could let a little of that go.

It was not the kind of relationship that would work. The military was very strict on fraternization between officers and enlisted personnel. Then again, it was even more restrictive on relationships between officers and aliens, so maybe Shepard would not say anything.

He exhaled. That didn't really matter – he knew Shepard didn't approve, and that was just too bad. Ash needed someone there to hold her shit together, and quite frankly, staring death in the face left him wanting to hold onto something as well. Being put in charge of two aliens in a ground assault team and having his marine squads taken was a hard blow, but he put the best face on it that he could and would continue to do his duty.

If only to hope he could die a death that meant something. He shoved off from the bed, standing and going over to his day-bag, digging out fresh boxers and a t-shirt, before heading into the shower. Laying them on the counter, he turned the water on, letting it get warm as he stared at the small blue and gray tiles of the floor.

He'd barely had time to step in when he heard Ash slip into the shower with him, eyes bleary. "It's big, scoot. Her smirked as she slid against him, the hot water splashing over them both, and the next half hour took his mind off of events for a time.

It was almost nine fifteen by the time they got dressed and packed away yesterday's clothes, Kaidan wearing a black jacket over a slate gray shirt and long black slacks, Ash in tight jeans and a shirt that said "My eyes are up here" in bold white print on a black background. He snorted when he saw it, before sitting down tiredly on the bed.

She sat across from him on the couch, pulling at her ear, her hair down around her shoulders. "You look tired as shit, Kai. Is everything okay?"

He shook his head. "No. I mean, it has nothing to do with us. If there is an us. Trying to ... get my head in order, I suppose."

She tilted her chin, blinking. "You probably could do with some more sleep. Not that I don't appreciate the workouts." She stretched, doing interesting things to her chest that Kaiden watched avidly, before grinning. "Mmmm. I really appreciate the workouts. PT with you is awesome. But I don't want you so worn out that you, like pass out on me."

He smiled, picking up the cup of tea he'd set to brew before getting dressed, and inhaling the scent. Sipping at it cautiously to avoid burning his tongue, he made a gesture with his free hand. "It's just all the things we've seen in such rapid succession are getting to me a little, Ash. And the fact that Shepard threw the party lets me know she thinks we're going into seriously bad shit."

Ash frowned. "Aren't you a little ray of sunshine? C'mon. We kicked the shit out of Cerberus, we fought off a pack of plant zombies that took out a hundred turians, we kicked in Saren's shit on Feros, on Therum... I'm ready to put my foot into this bastard's face and get my own back for what he did on Eden Prime."

He sipped the tea again, his shoulders relaxing at the warm brew broke up the hardest edge of his headache. "I know, I know. I worry too much. I got a lot on my mind right now, and ... I just have a bad feeling."

She arched her eyebrow, rubbing at her wrist and flexing it back and forth for a moment. "You're an officer. You're supposed to worry all the time and have bad feelings."

He snorted. "You could be an officer, if you wanted, you know. You're clearly intelligent enough for it, and – " He stopped as she raised her hand, her smile fading.

"I am pretty sure the OCS wouldn't take a Williams, Kai. That's...a big reason why I've had to fight so hard to get just as far as I did before...Eden Prime went to hell. I've been stuck at E6 for years now, since I made it at twenty four. I'm twenty nine now, almost thirty. If Shepard hadn't promoted me to Senior Chief, I'd have been force-reduced at my next promotion cycle. The Systems Alliance doesn't want my service, and that hurts."

Kai's mouth tightened into a grim line. "It's also unfair, Ash, and you know that. You know Shepard doesn't buy into their thinking, and I doubt she'll let you languish as long as she's in command."

Ash shrugged. "Still, I'm hoping with something like being part of the Marine unit that took down Saren...I can get the fucking SA off my back and do something with my life." She shrugged, then glanced up at him almost hesitantly. "You got big plans for when this is all over?"

Kaiden set down his cup. "Not...really. I've got something I need to tell you."

O-OSaBC-O

Shepard sat in a reclining chair on the balcony of Anderson's palatial apartment, smoking a cigarette, gazing down at the unknowing masses of people crowding the walkways below. After the party had finally wound down – mostly due to Chakwas and Von Grath utterly destroying Ashley and Chief Hahn in a dance off, then a drinking contest, and finally arm-wrestling – the group of crew had broken up for the night.

Some of them ended up in the Consort's Garden, entertained by the welcoming 'counseling' the Consort provided. Others ended up watching the Armax Arena games, gambling, going down to Taseri Ward to catch a concert, or checking out hotel rooms.

Shepard would have gone back to the ship, but Anderson wouldn't have it, demanding she and Liara stay the night in a spare bedroom. Of course, being all banged up from going fist-to-claw with Garrus hadn't left Shepard in any kind of shape for her usual taste in bedroom adventuring, yet before dozing off Liara had wrapped her arms around Shepard and engaged in a lower intensity meld, a calming, soothing presence that chased away nightmares and made Shepard feel oddly safe.

Liara was off, shopping for scientific gear, and that left Shepard with time on her hands. She gazed down into the battered leather journal in her hands, and putting her cigarette out, picked up the pencil she held and began to add lines and shapes to the drawing there.

The journal was the only real object, aside from a few pictures of Anderson and her Penal Legion blanket, that she owned. She had bought it as soon as she left the Third Penal Legion, with her very first paycheck, and started sketching in it. She considered herself a fair hand, but with the designs in the book she was exacting.

Half of the book was taken up with drawings of ships and models, or quick sketches of people she knew. But a good third of it was nothing but ideas she'd had for weapons, some outlandish, some possible.

She'd drawn shotguns that drew on multiple acceleration chambers, arm mounted mass accelerator paks that launched tiny bits of metal, pneumatic assault rifles and dozens of other designs. In an era where omni-gel and pattern fabricators made creating at least prototypes easy, being a weapons designer was a choice, not a career. It was one she felt she was good at, and yet her efforts with the ODIN had left a bad taste in her mouth.

The journal had gathered dust in her rucksack, hauled from duty station to duty station, until now. Until Liara had woken her from the haze of anger, pain, and frustrated misery she'd been in, all these years.

She inhaled a puff and gazed up at the towering buildings above her. "Awake. And alive."

God, that sounds so sappy.

She smirked, eyes bright as she drew delicate lines on the exploded diagram she was making, thinking of acceleration ratings and ZEV curves in her head. The armory that Anderson and Sanders had in the small corner of the apartment was beyond amazing. It had a minifactory computer that was top of the line, stocks of omni-gel, and the ability to stamp heat-channels into what it made.

As Shepard drew, she tried to concentrate on the coming operation on Noveria, but her thoughts were going in all different directions. With a sigh, she completed a few more strokes, then stood up, carrying the journal with her as she went back inside the apartment.

An hour later, she looked up from the workbench she labored over, fans overhead sucking out fumes. She paused, wiping sweat from her forehead, and lifted the goggles over her eyes with a smile. The minifactory was cooking the omni-gel shell she'd made, and the finer components of what she had built from her notes were mostly complete.

The shotgun Benezia had carried was impressive, but the asari components that utilized the asari's own natural mass effect fields had made no sense to her. The firing mechanism itself was wrapped in a block of DRM-static omnigel and thus unrecoverable. Instead, she'd popped out the ammo server and the acceleration chamber of the weapon, particularly the part that ignited the ammo wedges.

She'd known Liara was simply too lightly built to handle a shotgun well, and not aggressive enough. Plus, Liara was best at range, where she could put her biotics at use. Benezia probably used the weapon to stop anyone closing with her, but that wouldn't work for Liara as well.

She had instead set the ammo block to a dual-load design, alterable at the flick of a switch, along with a dual configuration for the gun she was cooking up. One setting turned into a hand-shotgun, a fully automatic rain of micro-flechettes storming out of the weapon for close range fighting. The other setting bypassed the ammo splitter to shoot solid slugs of ammo at long-range, like a heavy pistol.

The dual nature of the gun would give Liara the ability to supplement her biotics at both close and long-range, and she was pretty damned proud of the result. The mechanics were tricky – no military would use such a weapon due to the complexity and the likelihood of a jam. And the heat build up was not very manageable either, although she had installed a frictionless rail system to mitigate that.

No, this was a strong backup weapon for when biotics failed, which is exactly what Liara needed. Shepard smiled as she reassembled the firing chamber and wrapped it in a nodule of omnigel, along with the control chips needed to integrate it. She dropped it into the assembly side-chamber of the minifactory, and tapped the haptic controls of the factory unit, adjusting the burn rate.

She was absorbed in the last adjustments to the unit when the door to the armory swung open. David Anderson stood there, face wrinkled in confusion. "Thought I heard that infernal machine going in here, but I figured it was Kahlee and more of her crazy knives she was making. What are you up to, Sara?"

She smiled, setting the goggles down on the table, next to her journal. "Just making a little something for Liara. It's an idea, I had, kicking around in my head the same time I came up with the ODIN...but I never had the..."

She trailed off, staring into space, then her smile faded a bit. "...reason to want to continue. What brings you here?"

Anderson gestured, and she followed him out of the armory and down the stairs, towards the kitchen. "A few things, actually. There's been some communication from the Asari Republic – not the Council of Matriarchs – regarding Benezia, and another geth attack, this time on Sherat III, a mining colony with no known Prothean ruins." He gestured with his thumb. "C'mon downstairs, we'll talk there."

Shepard frowned, but followed. "What's this from the asari?"

Anderson shrugged, his face in a thoughtful look as they hit the bottom of the stairs. "Damned if I know. Udina got the call early this morning and was told a VIP would be incoming to see him with information about Benezia of some kind. All we know is that the Council of Matriarchs isn't happy with whoever is bringing the information but hasn't tried to stop them."

Shepard nodded. "Anyone who pisses off that pack of old biddies is good in my books." They entered the kitchen, Anderson peeling off to pull down a pair of thick, colorful ceramic mugs. He filled one with icewater, and half turned, looking at her over his shoulder from the corner of his eye.

"Still like your coffee black, Sara?"

She smiled, sitting at one of the barstools in the kitchen, and nodded, before turning to the video-screen, displaying images of burning buildings and dead people. "Sherat III ... that's a turian colony, isn't it?"

He nodded, as he worked the Keurig/Ashland coffee maker. "Yeah. They mine mostly for bauxite and some other industrial metals there, but also nickel. There's a manufacturing plant there that produces some kind of acid-resistant nickel plating, distributed in omni-gel. That's what got hit the hardest."

He pulled out the cup of coffee and handed it across the counter to her. "Seventy dead, three hundred plus wounded, and six thousand pounds of the stuff stolen."

She nodded, taking the cup of coffee absently, mind working. "The hell would Saren need with acid-resistant nickel for? You think he's found another Thorian?"

Anderson raised an eyebrow, sitting next to her. "Your guess is as good as mine right now, Sara. Reports don't place him at the attack, nor that black ship, but it looks like the Council is finally taking the issue more seriously. They responded with several battle groups that are fighting the geth."

She nodded. "And the SA?"

He drank his water, frowning. "There's three squadrons of SA ships looking for geth bases right now, per the plan you laid out to strip Saren's support system. We also sent a cutter full of AIS agents to Tuchanka to turn up anything we can on this Okeer figure."

Shepard nodded. "I might ask Wrex, too. He should know something, he was real irritated with the krogan we – well, he – killed on Feros, seemed to know him." She took a sip of the coffee, and moaned. "Ah, god. Why can't I get this on the damned ship?"

Anderson's broad face twisted into a grin. "Because the machine to make it costs fifteen thousand credits?"

She waved a hand dismissively. "Bah." She took another sip, closing her eyes, and then smiled.

"So...why only three squadrons? Why not several fleets? The geth are a serious threat, and the quicker we find their base of operations the better."

He nodded. "I know that. But the AIS has new information on the geth that makes our plans ... less likely to come about. Our initial baselines of the geth fleet indicated the force we'd seen outside the Veil at roughly forty or fifty cruisers, and maybe twice that in frigates. Heavy, but hardly overwhelming. Yesterday, the first picket boat we built using the IES system did a penetration of the Veil, and pulled up this image from Benabis, old quarian system just inside the Veil."

He punched a few controls on his omni-tool, and the broadcast was replaced with a static image. The sun was low in the background of the shot, several planets displaying crescents against the blackness of space. Between two of them, eight massive curves of metal hovered, surrounded by dozens of smaller shapes.

She swallowed. "Estimates?"

Anderson exhaled. "AIS and ONI are calling it eight dreadnaughts, upwards of sixty heavy cruisers, at least one hundred and fifty light cruisers, and nearly that many frigates. Assuming the geth went for maximum stow capacity, they can put ten drop ships on each one of those heavies, with twenty geth a dropship."

She did the math. "So just on the heavy cruisers, ten to twelve thousand geth soldiers? Jesus."

Anderson's grim look tightened. "That isn't counting the capacity of the dreadnaughts, Sara. They have enough manpower to swamp anything taking them on. The SA is gearing up First and Second Fleet, but this single gathering of geth ships is a match for the entire SA Navy."

He tapped the omni again, and four more images appeared. "That's only a fraction of their strength. If the estimates are right, the damned geth have nearly as many ships as the Citadel Main Fleet."

She winced. "And they all answer to Saren. What a goddamned mess."

Anderson killed the images. "That's one reason why the AIS and General von Grath are keeping a lid on your plan for Noveria. The Senate can't do a damned thing about stopping it – neither the AIS nor the Commissariat answer to them. But we'd rather not give Saren any advance notice we're coming."

She nodded, then shrugged. "Assuming he doesn't have spies on the Citadel who could pick up on that." She sipped her coffee, rubbing her temple with her free hand. "Any good news?"

Anderson shook his head, then frowned at his omni-tool as it beeped and flashed red. "Udina, urgent. Wonder what's gone wrong now?" He tapped the comm-link. "Anderson here, sir."

Udina's voice was tight, with an undercurrent of annoyance. "Good. Is Shepard with you? She has a visitor in my embassy who is ... insistent on meeting her."

Shepard glanced at Anderson, who shrugged. "She's just getting dressed to head out, Ambassador. I'll send her your way in my aircar. Who is the visitor?"

Udina merely grunted. "I'm not .. sure. The asari didn't identify herself, gave me a pad full of data about Benezia's biotic cult, and informed me she needed to speak with Shepard herself. Tell her to make haste, I don't need things like this disrupting my day."

He clicked off, and Anderson raised an eyebrow. "He sounds displeased."

Shepard drained her cup and stood. "In other news, sun still on fire, water still wet. That guy is never happy. Have Kahlee check my cooking in the minifactory if I'm not back in a couple of hours. I have to put on my ... shit. I didn't bring a uniform."

Anderson only smirked. "Your XO brought a ship bag for you while you were asleep early this morning. It's sitting on the couch in the main room."

She laughed. "God, Pressly thinks of everything."

Freshly showered and dressed in working blues, Shepard arrived at the Embassy aircar parking area twenty minutes later. She hadn't driven an aircar since the time she stole one back on Earth, and she was rather surprised Anderson let her drive his. The feeling of freedom was nice, even if the seats were squishy, due to the asari influence on most aircar models.

She walked inside the embassy, nodding politely at the asari secretary who handled incoming visitors to the human, volus, and elcor buildings. "I understand someone is waiting for me? I'm Commander Shepard."

The asari nodded, looking very serious all of a sudden. "Yes, Commander, in the reception area. Ambassador Udina said to send you directly to her once you arrived." She glanced around, and leaned forward. "A word of advice, she's .. very direct. Don't be off-put by that, that's just how they are."

Baffled, Shepard only nodded. "Who is it?"

The asari leaned forward. "It's a priestess of Athame. Maybe a high ranking one. I'm not sure, she was heavily veiled and the security unit didn't like me trying to look more closely." She smiled, and gestured. "Don't keep her waiting."

Shepard nodded, and walked down the hall, turning sharply to the left halfway down. The reception area was on a secondary passageway leading towards the Presidium proper, and as she approached she noticed the first strangeness. Two asari commandos, in full battle armor, with drawn weapons standing guard. And six more in a loose circle on the balconies nearby...along with two war priestesses, in ceremonial armor, with hands on their warp swords.

The war priestess on the left looked up as Shepard rounded the corner and gave a faint nod. "She is waiting for you. Be polite."

Shepard only arched an eyebrow, and stepped through the door. The reception area was large – hardly surprising, given it's function – but most of the lights were still off. Stark, looming shadows dominated the area, casting everything in a sinister relief. Standing in a pool of light thrown by the few lights that were on was a single asari.

For an asari, she was fairly tall, standing straight, one leg behind the other in an almost thoughtful pose, examining an info-pad. She wore a thin silver shawl over her muscular shoulders, and an even thinner set of shimmering white robes that were very close to translucent, the smooth fabric stretching tightly over her voluptuous frame. The robe split into ribbons halfway down the thigh, revealing intricate tattoos that trailed down her leg. She wore a large, swept back headdress, stylized blue flames done in pale blue on black fabric, that trailed down her back to almost touch the floor.

A wide, black leather belt was slung at an angle around her flared hips, and on one side of the belt was a heavy, sharp blade-like implement, gleaming bright silver even in the dim light, a faint and irregular blue glow barely viable around its edges. The asari's spare hand rested almost casually on the pommel of the blade, long fingernails tapping tiny pinging notes on the hilt.

She looked up as Shepard approached. Her gaze was strikingly powerful – large, liquid eyes of an exquisitely pale gray, almost white, in a sensual, strong face. A single white line split her lip, and then curved around her cheekbones, coming together on her forehead in the asari symbol for "sun".

Her feet were bare, and they made no sound as she gently turned to face Shepard more fully. "So, you are the the dartfish in the oceans that has riled up so much attention. Your aura is less bloodthirsty and more at peace than I was lead to believe would be the case."

Shepard stopped, folding her arms. "I'm afraid I don't know who you are, or why you wished to speak with me. Perhaps I could be of more help if you let me know that much, instead of cryptic asari bullshit."

The woman laughed, a languid, liquid sound that was not very mirthful. "I am Thana Vathan, High Solarch of the Temple of the Sun Ascendant of Athame's Glory. I suppose you would call me the High Priestess of the Sun. I am here to ... question and educate you."

She frowned. Even without the tangled swirl of Liara's memories in her own, she'd have recognized that title. The High Solarch was the highest asari in the temple of Athame, a devastatingly powerful biotic – perhaps the most powerful in the entire galaxy. The blade at her hip would be a warp sword, a metal blade that could have warp-fire channeled through, enabling it to cut almost anything.

Liara's memories of the woman were blurred, but the sharp sense of danger rang through all of them. With a motion she remembered from her days with asari commandos and prompted by what little of Liara's lessons from her mother could be scraped together, Shepard made a gesture of asari and a deep bow. "I am honored, Solarch. But confused. I fear I don't have any idea what you could ask me that I'd have any answers for ... unless this is about Doctor T'Soni."

The asari woman shook her head. "My, your biotic field flares so fiercely when you say that name." Vathan walked forward, every movement lithe with power, sensuality, and confidence. Shepard could smell some kind of sweet, lingering perfume in the air, and exhaled to retain her composure.

Vathan smirked as she drew closer. "I am not interested in you, or your entire race, to be honest. Your species' entire recorded history started since the Temple has had haptic devotional scenes on the ceiling, and that makes you somewhat boring. You are too new, too unformed to be of any real interest yet."

She smiled wider. "Nor am I interested in ... Doctor T'Soni. The fumbblings of the Council of Matriarchs show their fear of Benezia, which is wise. But in that wisdom they made the mistake of alienating – pardon the pun – the person most likely to try and stop her. That is foolishness."

The asari woman began circling Shepard, her right hand never leaving the hilt of her sword. "I respect your lethality and the ... devotion, whatever it's source, to the T'Soni girl-child who is swept in your wake. But that is not why I am here."

Shepard sighed. "Then why are you here?"

She tapped the info-pad in her hand. "As I said, you are hunting Benezia T'Soni. Who has knowledge of the Temple we would prefer outsiders not to ... access. Things that might cast the asari in a poor light, things we do not even inform the Council of Matriarchs about fully. These secrets must be kept such. And thus, I need to know a few things. And seeing as your hunt for Benezia is likely to end in a fight, give you some advice."

Shepard rubbed her chin. "My objectives are pretty straightforward. If I can capture Benezia, I –" she broke off as the asari erupted in laughter.

"Capture Benezia? Oh, how droll." The asari woman's laughter rang out again, this time truly amused, and she looked at Shepard with a curious tilt to her head. "You certainly do not lack for confidence, human!"

Shepard felt her anger flare and tamped down on it. "I'm aware that Benezia is a very strong biotic, as my team and I faced her in battle before."

Vathan fixed Shepard with a stare. "Commander, I have no doubt that you feel you have some kind of idea the power Benezia wields. But you are sadly mistaken if you think you have an idea of her full power. At the height of her grace, she held the same position I hold now, and she held it for longer than I have. She invented several of the more potent invocations of the biotic community. And I doubt she has grown weaker over time."

Shepard folded her arms, eyes cool. "I'll make a way. As I said, we survived her before."

Nathans smile faded. "You are unwilling to listen? Perhaps a .. demonstration will suffice."

Shepard glared. "A demonstration of what?"

Vathan stepped back from Shepard. "Of the gulf between a Lunarch and a mere mortal."

Shepard frowned, and watched as Vathan made a rather loose gesture with her hand. Five singularities erupted around it, circling her palm, each one glowing white-hot as they began to pull and throw the gravity in the room off. Shepard staggered back, as they rotated outwards, forming a barrier between them, and then a spiderweb of warpfire erupted from each lashing out.

Shepard took a hasty step back, but the warpfire merely hung in the air, before Vathan made another gesture and a titanic lift field enfolded the entire large room. Chairs, tables, and Shepard herself all gently floated up.

Shepard grunted, triggering her own biotics, and dropped back to the ground. Vathan smiled and gestured again, and Shepard felt tiny sparks of pain erupt across her body. Her jaw dropped as she felt her own biotics fade with the distinct feel of pulse suppression.

"Holy shit."

Vathan let the singularities, warpfire and lift field dissipate, and then pointed her finger at Shepard, and blue light flared.

A second later, Shepard shook her head, and realized she was crumpled in the far corner of the reception hall, nearly forty feet away, near the door she came in at. As she looked up, the asari priestess flashed into blue light, erupting in front of her in a mass corona that battered Shepard's natural biotic barrier down before it could even finish coming up.

Vathan sighed. "You are a child, Commander. A very talented child, with a rare touch with the kanquess, but a child nonetheless. Benezia could paralyze your entire team, cut them in half with a wave of her hand, or tear the very life from your fragile bodies."

Shepard groaned as she stood, glaring. "It wouldn't be that easy if I was in armor and ready for a fight, you know."

Vathan shrugged. "Commander, your armor would not matter when she melts it around your form with her warp field. Nor would your preparation, if she was to turn the very air around you into plasma. Before her fall, almost no one could contest her biotic might, save perhaps myself and the Mistress of the Hunt. She is a trained commando and war priestess, and served as a Royal Paladin in her house."

Shepard snarled. "Her daughter managed to match her when we fought on Ferros!"

The priestess smiled. "Did she? Precocious little thing. Tell me, Commander, did Benezia look as if she was fresh and rested in this ... battle of yours?"

Shepard opened her mouth, then stopped. Thinking back, she could remember that both Saren and Benezia had clearly been in combat, having fought their way to the Thorian's chamber. And based on the report from Garrus, Benezia had killed the giant plant after putting Wrex and Liara down. Shepard sighed, and shook her head. "No."

The asari priestess gave a slow nod. "As I thought. You are going to attack her in a place she has prepared – for she will have prepared any place of habitation against assault. She will be ready for you, Commander, and no matter how strongly little Liara plans to fight her, it will not be enough."

Shepard folded her arms, grimacing. "So what are we supposed to do? You planning to come along for this trip to deal with her?"

Vathan smirked. "As ... entertaining as that might be, I am afraid not. I merely wished to confirm that you do plan to go after her. A pitched battle between the Solarch and the Lunarch would be ... inadvisable."

Shepard looked at her in incredulity. "If that's the case, why the hell did you want to talk to me? Just tell me 'hey, have fun dying'?"

Vathan examined Shepard for a long moment. "No, not ... exactly. As I said, I have some advice you should follow. Do not attempt to engage her in open combat, Commander. She will beat you, and probably kill you in short order. She was trained as a commando and still likely thinks as one will, so she will try to ambush you, mislead you, and break your organizational formations up. Do not let her. Engaging her in a battle of biotics is suicide of the highest order. Distract her with explosions. Use fire, use terrain, snipers, anything to take her out from a distance and nullify her ability to respond."

The asari tilted her head. "Her commandos will attempt to assist her if they can. They are trained assassins, but are weak against high explosives and not familiar with distraction devices. Be wary, they have been fighting for centuries, but they can be handled if you are willing to take casualties to do so."

Vathan met Shepard's gaze evenly. "Benezia favors the use of biotic cutting fields, singularities designed to hurl you out of cover, and biotic flares. She is very, very good with her barrier and can drop your biotic abilities to nothing just as I did. She can hurl warpfire like no other asari I have seen in all my years, and if you get in close, you are going to die. Benezia is adept with the kanquess and many other abilities we do not teach to those not of the Temple. She can stop your attacks, turn your biotic punches and kicks back against you..."

Shepard frowned. "If she's that dangerous, I don't get why you won't help us take her down. Don't you want her dead?"

The High Solarch smiled, sadly, pale white eyes narrowing. "The answer is complicated and too nuanced to explain here. The short version is that we suspect Benezia is trying to lure another member of the Temple into battle to obtain access to something we safeguard. She requires the knowledge of two such figures to access it, and we cannot allow it to fall into her hands. Anyone without the knowledge is simply not powerful enough to be of any real use."

The Solarch sighed. "There is also the ugly possibility that if we sent anyone and they were to die, that would only add to the guilt price already hanging over the House of T'Soni. It matters not. I have three very important questions for you, Commander, in return for which I offer a gift that may be of great use to you in your hunt for Benezia."

Shepard rotated her shoulder, where it still ached from being thrown across the room. "Fine."

The Solarch nodded. "You interrogated and melded with Shiala M'than Soni'a. According to young Tevos, she was ... coerced by this ship Saren uses. I find that very curious. This ship is identical to ones you have seen in the memories of the Prothean Beacon. Tell me ... have you seen the enemy who flies these vessels?"

Shepard opened her mouth to answer, then stopped. "No. Just the ships themselves...when I see ground combat it is always Protheans fighting corrupted husks of Protheans."

The asari nodded, as if confirming something. "Second, your report included a minor detail, a shrine of some kind erected by the geth on Feros before it's destruction, one dedicated to a figure known as 'Nazara'. Are you sure that is the name that was given, Commander?"

Shepard nodded more slowly. "We were not able to find any references to it, in any database we had."

The Solarch nodded again, and then shuddered. "I ... am not surprised. If you had I would be very worried. One final question." The pale eyes met hers. "In the message from the Protheans, was there any mention of a weapon to use against these... Reapers?"

Shepard nodded. "The ... Tyth Kashan, the figure in the message. He spoke of an Inusannon super weapon being assembled. He didn't say where but he summoned the Protheans to Ilos, so I assumed it was there."

The High Solarch nodded. "Thank you."

Shepard frowned. "You know something. Something about these Reapers."

The asari gave her another sad look. "I know only ancient myths, Commander. Bits and pieces that do not form a coherent answer. But the name Nazara is known to me. It is inscribed on the oldest stone of the Temple, along with the ancient glyph for darkness, death, and annihilation. Whatever Nazara is, that is the true threat that you must fight – not the ship, or Saren, or even Benezia."

She turned to one of the tables by her side – one, Shepard belatedly noticed, she had not lifted with her little demonstration earlier. "As I said I promised you a gift for aiding me, and so I shall give it to you. When she took up the office of High Lunarch, Benezia laid aside her family warp sword to take of that of the Temple of the Moon, which she still has."

The asari woman tapped her fingers to a narrow box laying on the table, allowing it to open. A narrow warp sword, hammered silver and blue, lay in white silk inside it. "The T'Soni warp sword, I suppose, should really be handed over to the new House Matriarch. Sadly, I seem to have mislaid it somewhere."

The asari walked up to Shepard, until they were face to face, and handed Shepard her info-pad. "Within is the recollections of battle and service that I and other priestesses have of Benezia. I would offer you training, but we are forbidden to share our knowledge with outsiders – even giving you this much is nearly heresy."

Shepard gave a slow nod, taking the pad. "I appreciate it. I ... was not aware how powerful she was. Maybe I should just bombard the damned site from orbit."

Vathan strode past, opening the doors to leave, her entourage gathering around her as she did so. She glanced over her shoulder, an expression of faint sadness still on her features.

"If you have the opportunity to do so, Shepard, I would take it. You are unlikely to survive the coming fight otherwise."

---

Chapter 95: Chapter 86 : Saren, Awake

---

A/N: Punching the reporter would have been funny, but Shepard is still laid back from being with Liara.

I have debated whether or not to put in another Saren and Benezia section. I went with half of what I originally planned, as a kind of preview of just how damned bad Noveria is going to be.

Thanks for all the reviews I am getting, and let me know what you like the most and what needs moar details.

If you haven't already, and you are interested in asari or salarian culture, my companion background document to this AU, A Season of Sorrow Unending : The Cerberus Files, was recently updated. Check it out.

---

Saren awoke to sensations of cold pain and a feeling of tired heaviness in his limbs. His vision was strange, unfocused, and he sat up slowly, realizing that one of his eyes had been replaced by cyberware. The vision it gave was tinted faintly red, turian script flashing up as he focused on various objects around the room.

My head feels as if I was kicked by a herd of vakar.

He pushed a thin blanket off of him, sitting up the rest of the way, glancing around. The eye made a whirring noise and finally his vision snapped into clarity, and he blinked as lights came on in the room in response to his movements.

The bare steel walls were vented, letting warm air drift down from above, and he was on a medical bed, dressed in a jumpsuit of black medical cloth. Medical packages encircled his waist, and his feet were bare, his talons gleaming faintly in the dim light. Aside from a bed, there was a great deal of medical equipment and haptic charts of his body on one wall, and a pair of heavy metal doors on the far wall.

He swung his legs off the bed carefully, stretching slowly. His last memory was of agony as the krogan that had accompanied Shepard shot him in the face, blurs of motion and bursts of fiery pain the only other things he could recall. He took a deep breath, finding his thoughts curiously clear, the doubts and worries that had plagued him so much seemingly gone.

He stood, feeling his body shift as he did so. He felt more cyberware in his arms, along his back, across his face, but that didn't matter. He felt stronger. Faster. Ready for anything.

The double doors opened, a pair of asari in medical scrubs standing there, eyes blinking in the slightly unfocused expression of those who were dealing with the second stage of indoctrination were apt to fall into. He turned to them, adjusting his stance. "Where am I?"

The leftmost asari answered in a quiet voice. "Peak 13, on Noveria. You were hurt. The Lady brought you here. She is waiting for you." The other asari began tending to the medical equipment, but that hardly mattered to him.

He followed the first asari into a narrow corridor, and into a nearby room. Laid out on the table was his armor, repaired and reinforced with thick black plates of material across the chest, shoulders, and shins. His pistol and custom-built Krysaë sniper rifle lay next to it, along with his omni-tool and bandoleer of Spectre gear. He smiled at the efficiency shown, dressing in his armor and loading himself down with his usual weapons, patting his pistol as he left the room ten minutes later.

The asari had waited for him, her faint purple skin darkening in the weak light of the overhead halogen system. They walked down two long corridors before reaching a wide, open space on what he finally recognized as the third level, stepping through the massive containment doors into the room beyond.

High vaulted ceilings and thickly laid walls surrounded a sunken circular pit. Geth hoppers moved around the pit, spraying the sides with a slurry of omni-gel and metal that hardened in thin, flexible sheets. In the center, constrained by glowing fields of biotic force, a titanic being huddled. Long tentacles thrashed in fury, as angled limbs pulled tighter to the pulpy, insectile body.

Ten asari stood in a circle around the pit, hands lifted as they coordinated their biotic power to contain the creature within. Behind them, dressed in silver robes, stood Benezia, who turned as he approached.

Her face, he noted absently, was somehow colder, sterner than before. Her cheeks were more sunken, her eyes almost unnaturally bright. Her already slender form was more so now, making the bulge of her breasts seem almost vulgar. She walked to his side slowly, and laid her hand upon his unscarred cheek.

"You very nearly died, beloved." Her voice was cool, almost emotionless, carrying the barest whisper of her former fire.

He nodded. "You continued without me."

She shrugged, letting her hand fall. "Things ... became bad. The krogan's shot damaged your mind, to the point you can no longer call upon the memories of the Beacon and Cipher. Nazara became ... displeased."

Saren shuddered, and cast around in his mind. There were shreds, bits of the vision, of the cipher, pieces...but no context. He felt a thin film of alarm over his thoughts, but not as much as he expected. Instead, he felt resigned.

She continued. "Thankfully, when I joined your mind to organize the thoughts and images imparted by the cipher, I ... implanted a copy of the cipher and your visions within my own mind. I was able to convince Nazara nothing of value was truly lost, as long as you could be ... made whole again. Our own doctors did their best, but when they failed, I was forced to ask for Nazara to aid you."

He looked up at her. "What was done to me?"

She gave a long side, trailing her fingers against his mandible. Once that would have sent delightful sensations along his spine and spurs, now it was merely a touch, an echo of what was. "You were dying. Nazara sent his servants to rebuild you. They implanted you with his technology, remade your flesh. You are his, now."

Saren felt something empty rise up in him, his gullet contracting, his fringe settling. Old, ancient instincts made him wish to bare his fangs and howl. "And you agreed to this?"

The fingers against his face paused, and he felt the push of her mind against his, through the bond they still shared. Her fear. Her confusion. Her stiff, stoic pride, maintaining appearances, as she crumbled within. The sloshing, ugly feel of the visions and the cipher, slashing inside her very soul.

He felt her despair at losing her last link to being alive. She lowered her head and her hand, a sad expression on her beautiful features. "I could not let you go. Even at the cost of throwing over all that we have sacrificed for. That is weakness."

A part of him, deep inside, exulted, and the rest of him relaxed. That he could still feel her love, her loyalties. She had no other choices, he knew. He trusted her as he trusted nothing else in the galaxy, and he could feel the trickling anxiety in her, the fear this act would have turned him against her.

She smiled as he traced his claw against her cheek as delicately as he could. "What is it you always tell me? Life is the refusal to let go of life?" He exhaled slowly. "We cannot change what has happened, Benezia. Only what is left to come. I will always trust you."

She smiled more brightly at that, if only for a moment, before sighing and turning away. "As you were incapacitated, I had to move ahead on our planned actions. The cipher, combined with the visions, gave us a place to start. It took me some time to piece it together, but the answer to our search is at Ilos, as we already suspected."

Saren frowned. "Behind the lost Mu relay." He glanced at her. "You took Nazara's suggestion regarding the rachni, then?"

She nodded. "The lab at Peak 15 finally produced a proper queen. The secondaries we have already indoctrinated, and through them the children from the eggs are obedient. But the queens are ... decaying rapidly. The technology Nazara gave us is corruptive. It claims it can control them better through indoctrination..."

He laughed thinly. "I just bet it does. I presume you have not agreed to such yet?"

She gave a faint shrug. "I am not prepared to swim against the morning tide yet. I have suggested that such control is one more distraction to Nazara's concentration. Instead, I have decided to utilize what we have. As for the true queen, I am in the process of preparing her to be subdued."

She turned, heading towards the queen's pit. The geth were nearly done building now, a hexagonal lattice surrounding the top of the pit, the sides and bottom floored in acid-resistant nickel. Heavy chains were lifted biotically to wrap around the queen, and plates of transparent armorplast fitted into the gaps in the lattice.

She gestured. "The true queen has the genetic memories we seek. She resists...and she is strong. I will break her mind and take what we need, the location of the relay leading to Ilos."

Saren folded his arms, thinking. "And the geth?"

She shrugged. "They are becoming a concern. I have brought in many of the more militant and useful of my Triune movement, cycling them through Virmire to indoctrinate them to the first and second stage. We have lost a few hundred. The Ganar scientist Okeer sent finally went off the rails, Rana put him down. So far, she still is the most resistant to the indoctrination."

She turned back to face him. "The geth have convinced more of their kind to join them. Now nearly eighty percent heed Nazara's call. They are more numerous than we even dreamed, Saren. The plan will work. The krogan brutes are entering the final phases of production, now that we have the proper rachni genetic material to splice. We have prepared the mass relays as instructed, towing them from that uninhabited system to the Veil itself, and linking it using the codes Nazara gave us to the Widow Relay."

She walked ahead, towards the lift in one corner, and he followed. "But there have been setbacks. Shepard has destroyed Cerberus, completely. We are going to run out of funds soon, and our intelligence network of my people and yours is too shallow to know when the next strike will come."

Saren frowned. "Then why Noveria?"

She smiled. "I am very sure that Cerberus knew where many of our bases were, since they sold us the locations in the first place. I suspect Virmire will come under attack first...and that will solve that problem neatly, since Nazara is unlikely to appreciate interruptions of whatever he is building there. In the aftermath of such a failed assault, we will have plenty of time to move."

He considered this, tracing his free hand over the cybernetics in his face. "And if they strike here first?"

She snorted. "I have paid good money to certain members of the Corporate Court to hide our presence. On top of that, Peak 13 appears on no charts, maps or blueprints – only Peak 15. And we've cleaned up our work there...all that remains is studies of rachni genetics, and medical work. No one knows of this facility."

She reached the lift, and he followed her in. It began ascending, and he faced her more fully. "You seem confident that Cerberus did not know about this place, but the Illusive Man was very good at ferreting out some of our other secrets. Have you made plans for how to react if they do come here?"

She nodded, as the lift slid open, revealing a brightly lit space of computers, maps, and consoles, manned by turians and asari. "I have taken that possibility, however slight, into consideration. Come."

She swept ahead, along side the consoles, and came up to a semicircular platform built into the wall, jutting outwards, with a wide and heavy window set into it. Metal shutters slid aside as she grew close, and she lifted her chin with a faint smile as she gestured with her hand. "Observe."

Saren stepped up to the window, which overlooked a rough hewn cavern deeply cut into the rock around the facility. Massive doors abutted the rock walls at the far end, with heavy hydraulics ready to pull them open. The room must have been nearly a mile wide and half that long.

Bright, staring glowing eyes rotated up to gaze upon the window, flickering tentacles lashing in agitation. Plates of pale gray and white chitin gleamed dully, spike-edged legs clattering against the ground that was layered in acid-resistant metals. There were hundreds upon hundreds of them, all ready for battle.

The rachni had returned.

On the ceiling, hanging from rack after rack, were the folded up forms of hundreds of geth soldiers and snipers. At the far end of the huge cave, protected from the rachni by a high wall of metal and force fields, sat nine geth drop-ships. The wall itself was patrolled by hulking primes and armatures, which kept their weapons trained on the fractious rachni below.

Benezia's voice was cold and triumphant. "They will regret coming to Noveria, if they come."

He tilted his head, surprised and confused. "This is ... a great deal of progress in a short amount of time, Benezia. How did this come about?"

She sighed. "Cutting corners. We don't have full control over the rachni, only the lesser queens. The geth are sending more forces because Nazara commands it, but they take orders from it, not me. I can ... suggest to them, but I do not command them with the same power you did. That is why I have brought more of my commandos along."

She folded her arms. "As to the rest, I drained our accounts of money. Liara, damn her, turned over what funds I had not spent to that worthless sister of mine."

He exhaled, hearing the pain in her voice as she spoke her daughter's name. "Did she survive Feros?"

A sour, half-pleased expression crossed her face. "She did. She ... fought well. Better than I expected. The same could also be said of Shepard."

Saren snorted, mandible flickering in irritation. "Yes, how brave they were, to fight us after we were already exhausted from battling our way to the damned plant. I'm surprised she lived. You didn't finish her off?"

Benezia shook her head. "I did not have the time. Your pilot told me Citadel forces were coming, the geth reported more of Shepard's people were topside and incoming, and I was nearly dead." Her features tightened. "I ... considered taking Liara with us. I did not."

Saren's own expression grew grim. "I'm not sure whether that is a mercy or a death sentence. I know you care for her, more than I did for Nihlus or even my brother. But we cannot afford to draw aside now."

Benezia gave him a look of faint amusement. "I am aware. There is little space left in my mind for my wishes or desires, it seems. That is what leads me to the next issue we have, and why I am glad you are awake." She paused. "The Matriarchy has finally moved. They have sent no less than five Royal Hunting parties after me and you. Lead by the Mistress of the Hunt herself. The ancient bitch hasn't stepped off of Thessia in eight hundred years."

Saren winced. He knew a little of the asari culture, and how they would put together bands of noble warriors, Justicars, commandos, and asari assassins together to form what they called a hunting party. Lead by a senior member of the Thirty Families, equipped with the best gear and small fleets of ships, they would hunt until they found their targets and then tear them apart.

The Mistress of the Hunt was the high mistress of the various hunting lodges that trained commandos. For her to take part personally was akin to the Primarch leading soldiers into battle himself. It was a staggering concentration of strength and threat.

Saren eyed her. "Why now? What drew this reaction?"

Benezia exhaled. "I received a call this afternoon from one of my people on the Citadel. This morning, Commander Shepard met with the High Solarch. She was unable to bug the room, but was able to listen in." Benezia closed her eyes.

"Saren, the Solarch learned from Shepard something about Nazara. What we are not sure, but my follower heard the name. There are ... artifacts in the Grand Temple that speak of Nazara. The Matriarchy may be able to piece together the truth."

Saren shook his head. "They would never believe the truth, even if it was told directly to them."

Benezia hissed in anger. "That is not the threat! There are things in the temple that speak of countermeasures. Messages, shared between the hidden sites of Athame and whatever ruins were left in the human solar system. The super-weapon the Inusannon tried to build, the one that would have summoned the Darkness – it's design is a part of those secrets. They will not see Nazara as a being, they will see it as a threat to their lives, and will seek any weapon they can find. If they try to build such a thing, or experiment with the technology that Nazara warned us of... they could attract the attention of the Darkness."

Saren's eyes narrowed. The horrifying things eating at the universe were so vile and alien that even the Reapers seemed sane and understandable in comparison. To attract their attention was a fate worse than death, slavery, or even madness. "They can't possibly be that insane, that –"

She made a gesture of siari frustrated, a sign of disagreement. "They do not know, Saren. And they will not agree even if told. To them it will sound as if we have gone mad, and they will panic at the answer we give to the question. The scales and the stakes are too large, the time frames too big, for mere ... ants like us to grasp." She sighed. "It drove Matriarch Dilinaga insane in the height of her power, to possess the merest fragment of that knowledge. The asari would recoil from such, as it shakes the foundations of our society, of the standing of the Thirty, to it's core. The turians would try to fight it, the salarians, Athame damn them, would want to research it, as crazy as that is."

Saren sighed and folded his arms once more, setting back on his spurs. "There must be some way..."

She shook her head. "There is none. That is why I have spent all of what we have to accelerate our efforts. That is why Nazara builds with frantic haste and urges the geth to do our bidding. We must strike before they awake to the action we truly plan, before they get desperate enough to start searching for answers."

She would have continued, but an asari technician slowly approached. "Lady Benezia...Okeer requests communication with you."

Benezia's jaw tightened. "Hopefully good news." She walked over to the center of the room, where a massive haptic map of the galaxy rotated serenely. Asari glyphs of red and silver indicated her scattered units. Blue turian marks showed Saren's remaining loyal forces. Bold geth markings polluted the map in an ugly dark green, spreading outwards from what were once the quarian worlds.

A moment later the map vanished, replaced by the broad, even features of Ganar Okeer. "Greetings, my fellow conspirators. It is good to see you remain among the living, Saren. I had so despaired at the news you had fallen against a mere human." As usual, his educated, dulcet baritone voice set Saren's teeth on edge.

Krogan should not sound like movie announcers, by the spirits.

Saren's mandibles spread slowly. "I remain well. But Skal died."

Okeer made a dismissive noise. "As do all krogan, eventually. Even I will pass on one day, but not before I correct the flaws in the krogan species and remind the galaxy why we once made them tremble in fear."

Benezia's cool voice lanced out. "You wish to speak of something concerning our goals?"

Okeer smiled, his bronze armor gleaming in the light of some subterranean lab. Krogan shapes in tanks of green gel blocked the view behind him. "Ah yes. Always to the point with you. Admirable. I have transferred the last batch of krogan to your labs on Virmire, as you requested. Unfortunately, the lovely Rana Thanoptis was unable to meet my full fee for doing so. You have acquired funding difficulties, gracious Benezia?"

She gritted her teeth. "Troubles in the aftermath of the destruction of Cerberus. Until we can reroute our money securely, we have frozen our accounts."

Okeer's smile widened. "A pity. I am neither given to charity nor delayed reciprocity. Until you can sort out your funding issues, I will have to withhold any further ... donations of my kind to your cause. Your experiments, while intriguing, are not true krogan, and are thus useless to me and my goals."

Saren experienced a moment of dark humor at imagining the look on the smug krogan's face when the truth erupted over Tuchanka in a rain of Reaper ships. Out loud, he merely spoke calmly. "As you wish, Okeer. I trust that your silence does not require any extra ... funding?"

Okeer's expression of good cheer somehow intensified, as if his false bonhomie could allay their fears. "Of course not, mighty Saren. While giving away the lives of my lesser brothers is a distasteful act I soothe with your cash, knowing that I invest in the future of the species, betrayal is a different coin altogether. I have no intentions of breaking my trail with you over such piddling issues as banking concerns."

Benezia nodded. "Very well. We will contact you when we are ready to resume operations ... and update you with our progress on the genophage's anti-cloning measures."

Okeer nodded in return. "Should you manage to solve that little roadblock, I would consider it payment in full for any number of krogan you wish to ... utilize. Until then, Clan Ganar will withdraw and watch events with interest."

He killed the link, and Saren sneered. "Mercenary filth."

Benezia managed a small smile and placed her hand on his forearm. "Every tide has its shoreline. Come, let us review the other forces we have ready."

O-OSaBC-O

By the time Shepard had talked to Udina, and gotten him to calm down, the media had gotten wind of her meeting with the Solarch. Shepard managed to get past several sets by dint of glaring death in all directions, but was pinned down at the air-car parking area by the familiar form of Khalisah Bint al-Jilani, who introduced herself with predatory glee even as Shepard considered using a biotic throw to move the news vehicles blocking access to the lot out of her way.

"Commander Shepard! I just have a few questions for you, Humanity's first Spectre, on recent events!" She smiled brightly, her makeup garish in the pale acetonetic light of her camera drones, which covered just out of range of a good kick. Al-Jilani wore a stylish purple and black bodysuit, accented with some kind of wrap over her shoulders, and her long hair was tied into a ponytail.

Shepard regarded the woman with visible distaste. "Ma'am. I believe you once put out a publication regarding me that referred to me as the 'murderer-in-chief' of our armed forces. Why would I wish to answer any questions you would have?"

Al-Jilani's fake smile narrowed, her eyes going hard. "I am merely representing the interest and the wishes of the viewing public back on Earth and the Colonies, Commander. Given the fact that so much death and destruction has come from a single rogue Spectre, surely you can see the need for showing that you are indeed answerable to your species. And if you disagree with my positions on your past actions, you can defend yourself with your own words."

Shepard folded her arms and sank her weight back onto her right leg, eyes narrow. "I won't answer any questions about operations we are or might be conducting, nor investigations we are currently working on."

The reporter waved an airy hand. "Of course not, Commander. Now. Charles Saracino recently released a statement lambasting the SA for going along with the Citadel's attack on the purported terrorist organization, Cerberus. Cerberus was responsible for fighting off pirate attacks on the Traverse Rim where the SA was ineffective at doing so. Given that you're supposed to be hunting Saren, Commander, how do you justify going after a human organization?"

Shepard smirked. "First of all, I have information suggesting that Charles Saracino took direct cash payments from Cerberus." With a certain sense of glee, she triggered her omnitool, forwarding just that segment to the Westerlund News link. "Additionally, our raid on Cerberus found some data that indicated that it was Cerberus themselves who sponsored these pirate raids on independent colonies, to drum up support."

Shepard leaned forward. "But to answer your real question, Cerberus is the one who tipped Saren off to the existence of the Beacon on Eden Prime in the first place. Cerberus was involved in trying to block our investigation to prove he was behind it. Cerberus was experimenting on humans, not just aliens, at their HQ that we took out. The only thing purported about those sick bas..." She stopped herself in frustration. "...those criminals was their sanity."

Triggering her omnitool again, she sent a video snippet of a wide view of the labs they'd found in the first Cerberus HQ, with dripping blood and mangled human and alien corpses laid on out slabs. "This is the organization Saracino is defending. This is the organization that people are cheering on as heroes."

Al-Jilani blinked, her face looking strained. "I ... see. Then you disagree with the position being taken by political parties on Earth, who say the Coleman administration is handling the Saren crisis incorrectly? That perhaps a more aggressive stance with less subordinating the SA to alien demands would have saved human lives?"

Shepard shrugged. "I'm a soldier, not a politician. I don't think I'm qualified to answer that, since I don't know all the information involved. I will say that Saren is a danger to everyone, not just humans. He's gone after asari. He just blew up a turian colony. He's slaughtered volus merchant ships and attacked mixed race colonies with impunity. This isn't about humanity losing people, it's about everyone losing people. The Fourth Citadel Fleet lost a dreadnaught and over fifteen cruisers fighting Saren's ship at Feros, over eight thousand casualties."

Shepard allowed herself a frown. "As for the SA's reactions, I don't see how not cooperating with the Citadel would make stopping Saren any easier, and I haven't seen anyone explain that argument either. If we try to handle things alone, we end up side-lined like the batarians and quarians are. That isn't progress and it's not going to get the job done."

The reporter folded her arms. "A telling point, Commander. You then approve of the Coleman Administration? That they have done a good job in how the SA deals with the Citadel, and the Council?"

Shepard felt a flicker of alarm. It wasn't from her. Liara. She didn't think Liara was in danger...could Liara be watching the broadcast Al-Jilani was sending out, and knew the question was somehow a dangerous one?

Trusting her gut and the faint sense of alarm from Liara, she shrugged. "I really don't have an opinion either way, ma'am. I can't exactly vote, after all."

Al-Jilani's smile faded. "Ah, yes. Your convict restriction. It seems curious that a former gang member with such a long criminal record could be rehabilitated so completely, but it is indeed proof positive that our Commissariat and government's guidance can work wonders. Given your background, have you any thoughts on the recent decision by the Parliament to reduce the number of criminals taken into the Penal Legions?"

Shepard gave another shrug, this one more jerky. "I changed myself because I was ashamed of what I had let myself be turned into. I became a soldier in the hope of stopping any more girls like me from being ruined by evil beings. I can't say that gives me much of an understanding of why Parliament would rule on an issue in that fashion, though."

Al-Jilani's expression was frustrated, to Shepard's vast amusement. "Your public persona is one of a bloodthirsty, out of control killing machine, one who sacrifices her troops to achieve goals, and whose own unit refused to work with her after your victory on Torfan. Do you honestly believe that you are the best person to represent humanity as a Spectre, given that you are unwilling to take a firm stand on the government's position, your own criminal background, and – "

Shepard held up a hand. "I know I'm not the best choice for the job, ma'am. But that may be a good thing. The model for Spectre behavior for the past fifteen years, after all, has been Saren. You see how he turned out." Shepard unfolded her arms and folded them behind her back. "I have striven never to embarrass or shame the Systems Alliance, and I would do so regardless of whether or not I was a Spectre. At the end of the day, a Spectre not only has to be able to make tough choices, but to live with them and explain why they had to happen. The Council has to be cautious of who it chooses to hand that sort of power to."

Al-Jilani pushed down her frustration. "Given that humanity has tried to have a Spectre position for the past twenty-six years, don't you think humanity was overdue to be recognized?"

Shepard tilted her head. "I think that humanity isn't going to sit at the kid's table forever, ma'am. That doesn't mean that humanity is owed anything. If we want to be recognized as an equal player, we have to step up and show that we are capable of pulling our own weight."

The reporter's expression was neutral. "I see. Certainly, the Systems Alliance had done it's share in pulling it's weight in recent months, I would think. The ship you command, the Normandy, is one of humanity's most advanced warships. Do you think it's appropriate to hand it over to aliens for their own purposes?"

Shepard sent a very hard look at al-Jilani, who blanched and stepped back. "I'm the commanding officer of the Normandy, and I still wear an Alliance uniform. No one gives the orders but me. The Normandy was assigned to me to assist in the completion of my mission, hunting Saren. At the conclusion of that mission, her further assignments will come from SA High Command, not the Council."

Al-Jilani arched an eyebrow. "It's said one cannot serve two masters, Commander. Despite your strong answer, many on Earth are concerned that you now answer to aliens. Have you had any situations where the Council has attempted to utilize their command over you in a way that runs counter to human interests?"

She sighed. "Ma'am, the Council are professional diplomats who have dealt with Spectres for centuries. They have more than enough sense to ask me to work against my own people. What I instead find, all too often, is that the roadblocks I encounter are from the Systems Alliance who cling to some kind of view that humanity can shoulder its own problems."

Al-Jilani smiled thinly, eyes narrowing. "Surely you understand the public's concern about the detrimental influence of alien cultures on our society. They do not share our values, our laws, or even our morality. Is it wrong to wish to safeguard your own culture against such ... contamination?"

Shepard gave her a cool, dismissive look. "That's funny. That's the line the old American and Chinese governments used when they decided to obliterate the countries of the Middle East back in the twenty first. Given that you're of Middle Eastern extraction, ma'am, you tell me if that's a valid argument, or merely racism covered in patriotic noise." She folded her arms. "I don't have the time or patience to cater to everyone's views on how I should do my job, much less entertain their opinions of galactic politics. I'm sure Ambassador Udina would be delighted to explain in further detail why bald assumptions of alien misconduct when Cerberus was cutting up aliens for experimental purposes is a tad hypocritical."

She glanced at her omni-tool. "I'm afraid I'm very late for an appointment, so I'll have to cut this short."

Al-Jilani's voice was laced with venom. "Of course. I've just interviewed Commander Shepard, first human Spectre, hero of the Battle of Torfan. Have a pleasant day."

Shepard nodded, squeezing past the woman and her damnable drones to reach the parking lot. She paused, opening the hatch, and tossing in the box with the warp sword inside. She'd barely gotten into Anderson's car and shut the hatch when her omnitool displayed an incoming call from Liara. "Shepard here."

Liara's voice sounded worried. "That ... woman was transmitting live, directly over the extranet. I am glad you did not lose your temper and do something ... violent."

Shepard smirked, as she tapped the car's controls. "Like what? Losing patience with her disingenuous assertions and punching her lights out? That would be stupid, and then I'd have to listen to Udina rant about how much of a Neanderthal I am." She exhaled. "I .. I need to talk with you. I had an unexpected meeting with the High Solarch and she told me some things about your mother we need to discuss."

Liara's voice was thin. "I ... see. Where shall we meet?"

Shepard turned the car into the main air-lane. "Head to Anderson's apartment. I have something to give you there anyway, and we can have a damned drink to settle my nerves." She clicked off, sighing.

"I hate reporters."

O-OSaBC-O

Udina sourly shut off the haptic screen displaying the interview of Shepard on Westerlund News, and rubbed his temples as he sat down.

Given Shepard's usual anti-social behavior and general lack of political or social savvy, the interview hadn't gone badly at all. She came off as somewhat bitchy and icy, but that was better than giggling and holding skulls in each hand. Al-Jilani had clearly been trying to provoke a hostile reaction from Shepard, a stance that, while resulting in huge ratings, would have probably ended in al-Jilani needing cybernetic correction and facial reconstruction.

Note to self. Check into buying body armor if you have to give Shepard bad news.

The ambassador for Humanity cleared his desk, the haptic surface resetting to show his day planner and the comms board. Already there were incoming calls, mostly media, but a few high level bureaucrats seeking his viewpoint. He routed the entire mess to Osaba's office – let that morose bastard deal with the fallout.

Instead, he pulled up a single, encrypted comms channel, and triggered it. "Councilor Tevos, I am returning your call."

The image of the asari councilor sprang into view on the far wall, revealing her to be wearing a multicolored dress that had heavy leather flaps covering her shoulders and chest. "I appreciate your prompt response. The Matriarchy would again urge you to reconsider their proposal. I understand that Commander Shepard does not wish Dr. T'Soni removed from her protection, but the political situation on Thessia is becoming increasingly chaotic. There is a great deal of resentment among some of the clanless population in the aftermath of more attacks by Benezia's cultists on asari properties on Ilium."

Udina shrugged. "The meeting I had with your High Solarch, while brief, was very enlightening in regards to the difficulties the Triune Unity is causing the Thirty Families, Councilor. There is, however, a very large legal and cultural disconnect between asari and humans on this issue. Humanity does not assign the sins of the father – or the mother – to the offspring, unlike asari. And at the current time, it's politically ... undesirable to be seen to accommodate alien demands, given the mess Saracino has stirred up back on Earth and Arcturus."

Tevos frowned. "The ramifications may cause the Systems Alliance difficulties as well. The Matriarchy is now informing me that the Justicars refuse to accept the authority of the Systems Alliance over an asari citizen and plan to attempt to remove her with or without the SA's permission."

Udina ran his hand through his hair and muttered. "My condolences."

Tevos looked at him in confusion. "What?"

Udina smiled very thinly. It had no humor or joy in it, it was merely moving the muscles into place. "Madam Councilor. If your Justicars are stupid enough to try to remove Dr. T'Soni from the Normandy by force, I have no doubt Shepard will kill them. As we indicated in her psychological reports, Shepard is fiercely protective of her crew. Worse, you ask me to order Shepard to turn her over to you, which places me and the SA in a very nice catch-22. The Spectre Code says Shepard can ignore orders from us that work against her duties as a Spectre – which in this case, is to catch and kill Saren and Benezia. Shepard has made a persuasive case that Dr. T'Soni's assistance is needed in this regard."

Udina folded his hands. "If I try to order Shepard to surrender T'Soni, I violate the Spectre Code, since Shepard needs her for this mission. If I violate the Spectre Code, the SA will be penalized. If I don't order her to do so, then your Council of Matriarchs will claim we are being obstructive and complain to the Council, and the SA will be penalized. I find it very unfair that you place me and my government in this position. Particularly in light of the wild comments by political elements on Earth that are trying to convince voters that you are not acting in the best interests of Humanity."

Tevos sat back, her expression thoughtful. "That is a ... novel, but accurate viewpoint of the situation as it stands." She exhaled. "And after Saren and Benezia are brought to justice or killed?"

Udina shrugged. "At that point Shepard is a full fledged Spectre, who can be supported by the Citadel. The Normandy reverts to SA control and Citadel Observers and non-SA citizens will be forced to leave by regulations." He spread his hands. "I understand this deprives you of a way to easily answer the clamor for punishment from your lower classes, but that is the best I can do."

Tevos nodded. "It is a better answer than we have had from the Systems Alliance military, and I appreciate you clarifying your own difficult position. I will endeavor to explain events to the Matriarchs. Go with grace." Her image vanished, and Udina huffed.

He turned on the haptic screen again, this time to ANN, where the stern visage of Jack Tyson was commenting. "... and in a firm, no-nonsense interview with Westerlund's Khalisah al-Jilani, Commander Shepard was faintly critical of the views of many who saw Cerberus in a more gentle light. Her claims of Cerberus involvement with pirates adds yet another layer to this already complicated story..."

With a small, tired sigh, Udina reached for the brandy. It was going to be a very long day.

---

Chapter 96: Chapter 87 : Citadel , Piano

---

A/N: If you've ever had to attend a military staff briefing, you'll understand why I skipped it. They are dreadfully boring. Instead, I did my last little pieces of fluff. I'm sure people liked it (based on the reviews) but the end run is very close now, in terms of chapters. And I'm getting impatient to start working on the ME2 version of OSABC (which is happening, people! No more hiatuses until next year).

Since I may not update again until the weekend (depends) , I'd like to wish everyone who celebrates it in the US a Happy Thanksgiving. I am thankful for every person who has reviewed, commented, PM'd or otherwise left feedback on my stories. I'm continually astounded that (by reviews) my story is the 40th most popular out of over 13,000. That's all due to your support, and I really appreciate it.

I'm thinking of writing a little series of one shots about some characters, and reworking and expanding my Systems Alliance Order of Battle document. If you have any ideas for docs you would like to see, let me know :D

---

Shepard's return to Anderson's apartment was a quiet one, thankfully uninterrupted by any more reporters. She piloted the air-car to a stop at the elevated landing pad that connected to the apartment building, and exited, tucking the warp blade's box under one arm.

She'd been so flustered by the reporters at the exit to the Embassies that she'd just dropped it on the ground when al-Jilani had pinned her down, and she examined the box carefully, checking the plain silvery surface for damage but finding none. She didn't know how to open the thing – it had clicked shut when she picked it up, and right now it looked for all the world like a solid piece of metal.

Shrugging, she walked down narrow steps to the doorway leading inside, the hum and screech of air-cars overhead drowning out the sounds of her footsteps. Stepping into the corridor that lead to Anderson's apartment, she wondered just how much scratch it took to afford something this palatial.

She mused over this as she let herself inside, the big-screen haptic screen on one wall displaying a football game. Anderson sat on his couch, wearing his uniform pants but having doffed his jacket, and glanced up as she entered. "I see trouble found you on the way home, Sara."

She grunted, placing the box on the top of Anderson's large grand piano, and exhaled. "I'm really not good at that kind of thing, sir."

He laughed. "Knock off the sir bullshit, Sara. Liara called a few minutes ago to let me know she was on the way, so you have time to get changed if you want. You've only got the rest of the day to enjoy yourselves before you head right back out into it, so don't sit around brooding about mouthpieces like al-Jilani"

Kahlee Sanders walked downstairs, dressed in naval working blues, fussing at her hair. "Plus, from what I saw, you owned that bitch on live TV. The expression on her face when you dropped that line about the Middle East was priceless." The hard blue eyes were crinkled in amusement. "I can't stand that bitch, anyway...she should stick to news shows, instead of her so-called 'reporting'"

Anderson stood and picked up his coat where it was neatly draped over a nearby chair. "In any event, Kahlee and I have to report. Udina's involved in some discussions with the salarian Institute of the Mind to work with Grissom Academy, and Kae's been tapped as the new Academy Commandant. We've still got months of work ahead of us, but Udina wants the military to have a say in the biotic training that happens there..."

He trailed off, looking disturbed, and Kahlee smiled ruefully. "More politics, Shepard. We'll be out of your hair until tonight, and then I'd like you and Liara to come with us to eat dinner."

Shepard smiled, uncertainly, and nodded. "Sure. I guess. I ... kinda need to talk with Liara, but that shouldn't take long."

Anderson finished buttoning his coat, brushing lint from his sleeves. "Good, good. It's 1100 now...meet us back here at 1900 and we'll head out for something upscale." He smiled gently and patted her on the shoulder as he walked by, Kahlee next to him.

Shepard half turned. "I don't own anything ... I mean, clothing for that kind of occasion."

Anderson opened the door, ushering Kahlee through. "Well, you had better buy some, then, don't you think?" With a laugh he stepped out, and Shepard glared hard at the door before huffing and turning away to pick through his fridge.

She'd just finished eating a simple sandwich – cooking not being a skill she'd ever had a chance to pick up – when Liara entered the apartment. Rather than her usual University uniform, she wore a long gown of black with faint opalescent panels running down the right side, splitting just above the knee to reveal long black boots. She carried a sheaf of paper receipts in one hand, and a shopping bag in the other. "... Shepard?"

Shepard wiped her mouth with a cloth napkin and waved. "Kitchen." She couldn't contain her smile as she watched Liara set her bag down and walk over to her, the dress was both elegant and form-fitting. "You look...wow."

Liara glanced away, a bit embarrassed but a pleased smile stealing over her features. "It's quite old, really...my mother bought it and several other dresses for me when she became ambassador to Earth after retiring from the Temple of Athame. I never had much chance to wear them in the field." She set the receipts down. "I ... purchased some other scanning equipment, and two light combat drones that I can slave to my omnitool. I also bought an upgraded second stage spectrophotometer, for some better analysis capacity, and a Mark IV dual configuration material analysis – "

Shepard grinned. "It sounds like you enjoyed yourself."

Liara blinked at the interruption, then tilted her head, considering. "It was...different. I liked it. I fear that I have spent so much of my life focused solely on my work that I let the tide wash me to foreign shores. Before, whatever equipment I needed I had to apply for, and try to convince my superiors to let me use or at least share time on. Mo...Benezia...kept my access to House Funds extremely limited."

She closed her eyes. "There were whole years that I spent on remote dig sites with a luggage case full of fifty-thousand credit dresses, and not enough money to my name to buy a new blanket." She shook her head. "What a fool I was."

Shepard arched an eyebrow. "To go after your dream, Liara? Bullshit. It was..." She paused, thinking of the wonder of those memories they had shared. To be able to choose your own path, in however limited a fashion, to struggle against ennui and disbelief and the puzzles of ages long past and physical dangers.

She smiled. "Your life was...lonely and sometimes boring. But you made your own way, Liara, dealing with everything – finances, support, planning your theories, publishing, figuring out how to get through the stupid University systems. You accomplished a hell of a lot just through your own grit and will. Don't look down on that effort."

Liara's expression warmed, and she gave a gentle smile. "For someone who claims they worry about dragging me down...it is always you who makes me believe in myself again, Sara."

She rounded the kitchen bar, sitting next to her on the narrow bar-stools. "I was about to consider your words on buying a new weapon when that ... person ambushed you with her video camera. I was worried that you would lose your temper and answer unwisely, especially when she tried to goad you..."

Shepard smirked, eyes twinkling. "I could feel your concern. It kinda tipped me off, and I thought about it..." She trailed off, noting the concerned expression and flare of alarm from Liara. "What?"

Liara forced herself to calm, and took one of Shepard's hands. "I was ... some distance away from you at the time. The strength of bond required for you to feel me at that distance..."

Liara trailed off, then sighed. "Perhaps it is time we discussed our ... connection. Normally, maidens such as myself do not take a single mate at such an early age. Most of my kind link only shallowly, for, er, pleasurable reasons. Or at best, a shallow meld of surface memories and emotions."

Shepard nodded slowly, and Liara continued, that slow bubble of panic tickling the back of Shepard's mind. "The bond we have is .. something that is usually only done by longtime partners, and usually by asari who are older than I. It requires a great deal of trust and faith in another to join yourself to them in this manner."

Shepard nodded again, keeping her features calm and accepting. "You sound...and feel...upset, Liara. I trust you with my memories, with .. all of me."

Liara shook her head. "I do not doubt that, and that is not what concerns me. After seeing your entire life laid before me ... for you to trust me with your soul is a great honor. Beyond my papers or studies, your belief in me is what lets me know that I am not a failure. At least in this."

She gave a small smile, and Shepard ran her hand through her hair. "So what is bothering you? The, uh, strength of our connection? Is that bad?"

Liara gave a shaky nod. "I had not .. seriously thought much about everything that happened, too caught up in the feeling and the .. safety of what we share. The happiness. The knowing I am not alone." Liara bit her lip nervously. "But such deep bonds are not safe, Sara. I do not have enough control to regulate what we share...and if we are not careful that could end up causing us confusion and grief."

Shepard adjusted her position. "What do you mean, Liara?"

Liara squeezed Shepard's hand lightly. "That moment of ... confusion ... when we broke our meld and became two people again. That is a sign of the deepest level of bonding, where two become as one. It is something mostly done by matriarchs, who have full understanding and control of their minds, and years – decades – of experience with that of their partner's mind. They can keep themselves apart, while sharing fully. That is a skill I do not have."

Liara looked up. "I have begun to wonder how much of me is still me, and how much of .. you is still you. I know you as I know myself. Had al-Jilani spoken the same words to you a few weeks ago, would you have acted as you did?"

Shepard took a deep breath, thinking it over for a second before shrugging. "No. I'd have dropped kicked the bitch in her face, probably." She gave a little laugh. "But honestly, Liara? I ... I find myself not caring if your influence has changed me."

She took in the hurt expression on Liara's face and hastened to explain. "I don't mean I don't care about your worries. But ... you being a part of me makes me feel alive, Liara. Like I can fucking function. I've been more...alive, more aware, more happy, in the past few days than in my entire life up to this point. And making me less hostile, less willing to resort to violence, makes me a better person."

She paused. "But I am finding myself acting a little less like myself at times, I guess. It's just to me, that if I act less ... like me and more like you, that's not such a bad thing."

Liara nodded. "I have also found myself affected, Sara. There may be a point in your impression that I have made you more than you were. I have found, perhaps, a measure of your fire in my blood, a reluctance to let others simply walk over me as I did before we met."

Liara sighed. "However, there is a dark side to such a loss of self. I was angry when I saw the interview. My first impulse was to find this woman and feed her a singularity. That...that is not my way of thinking, Shepard."

Shepard slid off the bar-stool, pulling Liara close. She suddenly understood why Liara was upset. The burning anger that had ruled her entire life had infected the gentle and lovely asari, and it frightened her. "I'm sorry I messed up your mind with my own shit, Liara. I am. You ... you're a good person, in a way I never have been. I don't want you corrupted by me, or upset that my stupid anger is making you act in ways you hate. I don't want you having to worry about -"

Liara interrupted her. "Sara. I do not regret. What we are now is infinitely better than the broken people we were. The fact that I feel your anger and that I draw upon it is not my concern. As I told you, the very first time we touched memories, my first impulse was to wonder exactly how you had not simply slain all around you. I understand, Sara. You never need explain or apologize to me for the person you are. That is ..."

She looked at the floor, and then back up, almost shyly, but with a hint of boldness in her gaze. "...that is the woman I love. That I want. That I wish to always walk beside, through darkness or light. If anger is a part of you then it is a part of me."

She touched Shepard's cheek with her hand, biting her lip. "I am merely worried that ...there are often problems caused from such deep bonds when done by younger asari. Those who get lost in the deep bond often become mentally unstable, or have problems controlling their emotions. I do not want us to continue this relationship unless you are aware of that. Feeling me from such a long distance is the kind of thing that happens when two people are so bound they cannot live without one another."

Shepard gave a small smile and kissed those delightful, wickedly beautiful lips gently. "Liara, I don't want to live without you. If the bonding thing is dangerous, then we can work on not getting so carried away when we do that." She gazed into Liara's eyes, letting her feel her love and concern. "I won't put you – or myself – in danger."

Liara nodded, inclining her head against Shepard's shoulder for a moment. "I ... worry. Having gained something of value beyond words, I am terrified of losing it. I have never done this before, and for my people it is not as simple as the body finding pleasure in another. This bond is deep, so deep that there is a point where neither Sara Shepard nor Liara T'Soni exist any longer."

She felt Shepard's arms around her, and closed her eyes in a moment of happiness. "I do not want to push you away. Goddess, I do not think I could survive such. I was just taken aback at the power of the bond, when I know that there are dangers in such."

Shepard nodded. "Like I said back on the ship. We can take things slow. Hell, we haven't even worked out how to deal with the crap I get off on, or how we're going to make this work with the SA after I put my foot up Saren's ass, or whatever turians have back there. If this is a problem...we'll figure it out."

Liara nodded, eyes still closed. "I am just thinking of old stories. Urban legends, I suppose, of maidens who bound themselves too deeply to their lovers and lost their minds, or when one died dragged their bondmate to death with them. I do not wish to be a danger to you."

Shepard kissed her again. "Liara..." She sighed, emotions jangling together in her head in a smeared mess, a sharp ache somewhere in her chest. "What am I supposed to say? I wanted to die before you. I wanted it all to end, to simply lay down and not have to kill any more. I fought for nothing. I bled for nothing. I was turning into a brutal machine of red vengeance before you saved me."

She bowed her head, resting it against Liara's, the smooth, cool pebbled skin soothing in its temperature. "If shit goes bad, then dragging me with you is better than living alone and in pain." She smiled, wrapping her arms around Liara. "Enough gloom and doom. We'll be fine. We will get through this and have ... all the time in the world to sort this out. I want us to be able to enjoy each other, not make things hard on you."

Liara's lips quirked, and she opened her eyes. "Liar. You quite enjoyed making things hard on me a few nights ago." She stepped back out of Shepard's embrace, heading back out to the main room, the motion of her dress entrancing Shepard for a moment before she shook her head ruefully and followed.

"Touche, Doctor."

Liara only grinned, and sat down on the couch. "You said, when I contacted you, that we needed to talk about your meeting with the High Solarch. Having gotten what worried me out of the way for now, what is it you had to discuss?"

Shepard took a deep breath, and pulled out the info-pad the High Solarch gave her, going back over her discussion with the priestess in great detail. About halfway through Liara shook her head and simply motioned Shepard to the couch, and laid her hand upon Shepard's own. "I need to see. There are messages in her nuance and stance you cannot convey, that I must observe from your memory."

Shepard felt the ghostly, shivery feeling of the link they had expand, the sensation of Liara losing cohesion as she touched Shepard's memories, her eyes black as night. There was no sensuality to it but the sheer closeness made Shepard's heart hammer nonetheless. A few moments later the feeling faded, and Liara opened her eyes with a pensive expression on her face.

"She did not have to assault you to prove her point." Liara's voice sounded ... upset and petulant, and Shepard couldn't help but chuckle.

"I'm fine, just my ego is bruised. I am guessing you saw the sword."

Liara's expression became one of confusion, and she nodded, standing and walking over to the piano in the corner, where Shepard had laid the box. She trailed her fingers over it, a faint smile crossing her features. "This sword is old, my love. It is the most ancient piece of my family's long history. Its blade cut through the evil Silent Queen in ancient times, blessed bond ceremonies and funerals, was waved in defiance during the Rachni invasions, and slew three warlords in the Krogan Rebellions."

She made a gesture with her hand, biotic energy seeping from her fingertips, and the box fell open, revealing the crescent-shaped blade, glowing faintly silver in the light from the overhead lamps. "It is the beating warrior heart of a Guardian house, the unbroken tide of our ancient pride, a reminder of a time when House T'Soni was powerful and respected, rather than a mere shadow of its former glory."

Her smile was sad as she looked at Shepard. "I rejoice in my very soul to know it is safe and not defiled with my mother's fall...but I do not see how this can help us with my mother."

Shepard frowned. "Can't you use it?"

Liara shrugged, lifting it carefully out of the silk coverings with one hand, then bringing it to hold before her face. With a small frown of concentration she focused on the blade, and pale warp fire erupted silently along its edges, creeping up the glyphs hammered into its surface in darker, fiercer shades of blue.

Liara's voice was pensive and small, as if reciting from memory. "Its name is Ocean's-Nightfallen-Mist, and it was forged by my ... how do humans say it? My great-grandmother, six times removed. It took her two centuries to make it. Every matriarch of the house has trained her daughters in how to wield it, to hold it and feel the history of the blade. I have held Ocean's-Nightfallen-Mist before, when I was barely out of childhood."

With a flicker and a cascade of drifting smoke, the fire died, and Liara let the tip of the blade sink until it gently rested against the black tiles. "I have practiced with it perhaps a few weeks, all told. Enough to call forth its edge, to use it in a ceremonial sense. To cover the basic assaults and defenses."

Liara lifted it again, holding it with both hands, and kissed it gently before setting it back into its box, hands reverently covering it again with the silk. "My mother fought with this blade for two centuries, against pirates, krogan, and worse. She was a master with it. For me to match myself against her in a bladedance ... would end with me headless or worse."

Shepard folded her arms. "Then why give it to us? To you, I mean."

Liara shrugged, shutting the box with solemn care. "I do not know, Sara. Perhaps to send me a message. For the High Solarch herself to leave Thessia, to travel to the Citadel to give me my mother's warp sword ... she is telling me to beware my mother's power." Liara let her gaze fall. "And to end my mother's ... life. Even if that costs me my own."

She smiled as Shepard's expression twisted into anger. "There is one method by which I could possibly use this weapon against my mother, by overloading it with warp energy until it burst asunder. The explosion of the eezo matrix that empowers the weapon is very destructive, enough to even crush my mother's defenses. It would slay us both, surely, but it would clean the name of T'Soni again, even if it was wielded by a pure-blood wretch no one wanted."

Shepard crossed the room, laying her hand on Liara's shoulder. "That's not the case. I could give a shit what she intended, killing yourself to stop Benezia isn't the answer to anything. What she is doing isn't your fault...or your responsibility to fix."

Liara's expression was strained. "It is in our society, Sara. A child is the sum of a parent's teachings, their focus, their ... goals. More so in the lineages of the Thirty. In the minds of many asari, the old saying 'Tainted rivers come from tainted lands' has very deep meaning. My .. my own family believes that if I had spent more time at home, trying to become what my mother intended, she may not have ended up on the course she has taken."

Shepard spat angrily. "That's a damned lie, Liara. Your mother, from what I've seen in your memories, became obsessed with controlling things. I don't know why, but it's clear to me she lost it a long time before you even left to pursue your own dreams. She didn't value you for you, just your potential!"

Shepard seethed as she spun away, pacing. "And as for clearing your family name? For you to die for those walking pieces of shit? Fuck them. I gotta say I have to rethink how bad my own damned life was after seeing the shit you put up with. My parents sold me for another high, but at least they didn't fuck me over and out for my whole life. Your family is supposed to support you, to love you. That's what I've always been told. They didn't do shit but look down their nose at you and attack your right to be your own self person. They hurt you, shut you out, made you feel like a thing instead of a person, and they never, ever cared about you."

She spun on her heel, eyes blazing. "And if your goddamned government starts any more shit over you being responsible for Benezia's crimes..."

Liara felt the heat of Shepard's anger, and the hidden fear, and the helpless feeling of despair that she couldn't make Liara feel better. It was like a torch burning away shadows of grief and inadequacy, and she gave a small smile at the angry expression on her face. "I do not ... feel responsible for what my mother has done. I worry, as a child should, that I did not do enough to ... let her know I appreciated what she taught me, and why. That perhaps I should have made more of an effort to see things her way, if only so that I would have more good memories of her." She exhaled, and stroked the box in front of her again.

"I did not cause her to twist in the manner she has, and I will not throw my life away to please my family when I have only now found a reason to live, Sara. Do not fear that." She tapped the box. "But the High Solarch is trying, I suppose, to offer me an honorable way to salvage the name of my family should I choose to take it. It is what a ... dutiful daughter would do."

Shepard snorted indignantly, and Liara smiled. "Sara, I will not let the High Solarch's intentions, whatever they might be, force me into anything. I lesson I learned long ago comes to mind."

She shrugged, turning to face the piano, and her smile widened. With hesitant fingers, she touched the keys, trailing over white and black ivory, bringing forth dulcet notes, a simple, slow tune.

Shepard stopped, watching, and Liara played a few more notes, hesitantly. "When I was younger, on my third expedition... we were trapped in a sandstorm. I was impatient to get back out and explore, bursting with restlessness. One of the researchers there brought a keyboard with her, a gift from her human lover who had died some years before."

She touched the keys gently, ascending the scale, remembering. "It was during that down time I learned more about humans for the first time, about the marks I had tattooed on my face that you call eyebrows. Doctor Orlena played for us as the sandstorm battered our little shelter."

"I remember being entranced by the music, the simplicity and the calm. Doctor Orlena told me that the keyboard and the music was all she had to remind her of her lost human lover, but that although she missed him terribly, she valued that loss. She had taken him for granted until he was gone, and she was so terribly sad when she told me to never let go of what made me happy."

Liara touched more keys, the notes ascending and then falling once more, a simple, tragic melody. "At the time, like a fool, I thought merely that I should throw myself ever more into my work. I would show my mother that my choices had value, that I would not forsake it to make her happy, and I commented as such. She gave me the most wounded look – even today I cannot get it out of my mind – and said that the work was not what would lift me when I was broken, or calm me when I was hurt, or make me want to live in the face of death."

Liara finished the section of the song she was playing, still quiet. "I learned there that sometimes what we hold most valuable to us is what others expect of us, or even what we think we want. It is those things that cry out to our souls when we are still and quiet. A reminder that we are but sparks from the fire, flickering for a few moments of brightness before the dark. That we cannot hold onto everything we cherish unless we take time to actually cherish it."

There was a moment of silence, something almost tangible, and Shepard found herself holding her breath. Liara traced a finger over two last keys, and the last fading note was bittersweet.

The asari looked over her shoulder at Shepard. "I will not leave you alone, Sara. I am never going to submit to the wishes of those who, as you said, never cared about me, or my pain. I merely wish you to grasp some of what my people hold over my head.

Liara smiled, a film of tears coming to her eyes. "And ... why I can never go back home to the flametrees and tides of Thessia. Never hear the booming surf, or walk its silver beaches. Never smell the fragrant shantha mist of the Outrier, or the laughter of the children at the Maiden's Walk. If I have a family, it will be you and I, not them." Liara swallowed, the grief in her voice subdued but audible.

Shepard gave a little exhalation of breath, and sighed unhappily. She hadn't really known how likely Liara was to be cut off when she got into this. "I know how that pain feels, Liara. I ... can never see Earth again. Never walk in the old arcology, or lay out under the sun. But I'm being punished for something I did, that I caused. You ... are being punished because of what your mother did. And that...just isn't fair."

Liara shrugged. "Life, I have found, very rarely is fair, Sara. But I lose a home that despises me and a family that dislikes me to gain you." Her lips formed a small smile again. "I am not displeased with the trade off."

Shepard laughed. "Fair enough, then." She paused, wondering what to say after a conversation like that, then gestured to the piano. "I... didn't know you played piano."

Liara nodded. "Finding the light out of the darkness is something that my mother always stressed." Liara turned away from the piano, looking up into Shepard's eyes. "Do not fret and worry over my fate, Sara. I am happier with you than I would be alone amid Thessia's shores, have no doubts. I merely wish my people would see me as something else besides a useless sacrifice."

Shepard scratched her head. "Well, their loss, my gain. Since the sword didn't go over so well, I got something else for you. Stay here for a bit, I need to grab it and make sure it's ready." She left Liara at the piano, heading upstairs, and opening up the armory.

Kahlee had shut down the manufacturing unit, but not before it had finished Shepard's work. She picked up the two pieces laid out on the tabletop and slid them together, smiling as the power unit hummed with an almost ominous sound and the shotgun pistol shifted into pistol form. She paused to attach the handle unit to the weapon's base, checking that the rubberized grip she'd installed had fixed properly, and then the pressure sensor that acted as a trigger.

The resulting weapon was a smoky greyish-black, almost ten inches long and two wide, with a cavernous barrel that promised nothing but painful death. The ammo block was slung into the barrel's length, a shallow concave metal shape below the barrel, and the handle was wrapped in interlocking puzzle shapes of rubber for a better grip. The heat-sink was along the top back of the weapon, venting waste heat up and forward at the barrel-tip to fight muzzle climb. The mode shift switch was an easy thumb-press away on the left side of the weapon.

She picked up the simple holster she'd bought for it, testing the fit, then exited the room, heading back downstairs. Liara was watching the haptic view-screen, having turned it to the salarian's "Science Weekly" channel.

Shepard cleared her throat, keeping the gun behind her back. "I .. I did some thinking. About this fight we're going into. I know you already have a gun, a light pistol. It's a pretty good model, no mods but solid enough for light work."

Liara nodded, tilting her head, and Shepard shrugged. "Problem is, we're not going into light work, but maybe into combat with geth, commandos, krogan, and Jesus knows what else. At this point if the fucking Protheans came back from the dead and tried to kill me I wouldn't be that shocked. A pistol isn't always going to be enough gun."

Liara's lips formed a soft smile. "And as your General von Grath says, there is no such thing as too much gun?"

Shepard grinned. "Exactly. So...I was going to show you how to use that shotgun of Benezia's we found, but that thing's a monster, meant for a close-range fighter, someone more like me than you. What you needed was flexibility, a good shotgun for inclose work but a nice heavy pistol for longer range fights. Unfortunately, those guns are both very heavy."

Liara nodded.

Shepard gave a weak smile and laid the pistol she'd made for Liara on the kitchen countertop. "So... I sort of made you a weapon of my own design. Something I'd been kicking around in my head for a while."

Liara's face went very still as she walked forward, her graceful hands moving carefully as she drew the weapon from the fabric holster. Her right hand snugged against the grip that Shepard had planned and fabricated to fit exactly right, as she examined the smooth angles and dark coloration. "Goddess...you...made this?"

Shepard nodded. "It has a selector switch. On the left. One sets it to the heavy pistol mode. Like what you use already, but more range and stopping power. Fires a sub-fragmenting round that drives fragments of armor into a target but blows up when it hits an unarmored one for more damage." Shepard gestured. "If you shift it..."

Liara pressed the switch, and the gun slid forward, the ammo block sliding back and down as the barrel lengthened two inches, and the firing casing slid upwards and over the top of the gun. "...it shifts into a light automatic combat shotgun. I mimicked the firing action of the shotgun Benezia used, so it basically superheats the fragmentation ammo and blasts it out in a cloud of frag flechettes. It should tear down anything close."

Liara ran a finger along the weapon. "You have not made a weapon since you designed and built your ODIN prototype." It was not a question, and Shepard nodded slowly.

Liara met Shepard's gaze. "I know, Sara." She triggered the control again, and the weapon contracted into its pistol form, and Liara replaced it in the holster. "You fear for my safety...but you trust me to take care of myself. The best gesture you can give me is to honor me with your own work." She smiled, and kissed Shepard's lips, almost hesitantly, before stepping back. "I will carry it with me always."

Shepard actually blushed, to Liara's delight. "It's just a gun."

Liara trailed a finger against its cool metal surface. "No, it is not. It is, to me, as much of a symbol as my mother's warp sword. Both were crafted in a time of great fear and danger, to fight enemies that many regarded as invincible, and to protect those people the crafter loved. I do not claim to know everything about you yet...but I can feel you in this weapon. I can feel your anger in its vicious attack design. I can feel your care and concern in the way you made the lines more asari-like than the blocky weapons you yourself use. I can feel your love in the time you must have taken to design something this... complex."

Liara smiled. "Besides, now I can compare favorably with Tali and her plasma flamethrower shotgun."

Shepard laughed. "Oh, god. Joker's never gonna live that down."

O-OSaBC-O

The third day of shore leave brought about the sobering realization for the crew of the Normandy that battle was fast approaching. This was underlined by the arrival of the Commissariat's dreadnaught, the SD15 Manswell's Wrath.

The ship dwarfed the Normandy, being of a third generation design, taking some queues from both volus and asari designs. The blue, black and silver color scheme of the blocky vessel didn't detract from the ominous red line that ran the length of the vessel, indicating it was a Commissariat ship. The long line of bulky figures in Judgment battle armor that disgorged from the ship for a few hours leave on the Citadel didn't help much either.

Shepard had spent a night out with Anderson, Kahlee and Liara. Still refusing to wear a dress, she'd been dragged along (unwillingly) by Ashley Williams and Chakwas to go shopping, which was the third time she'd ever done such a thing, the first two times being with Beatrice Shields back in her 2RRU days.

She'd ended up buying several suits, mostly in shades of gray, black and silver, and simple blouses to wear, along with sensible shoes. Chakwas said she looked dignified, and Ashley said she looked like a pissed off lawyer. That was good enough for Shepard.

The dinner had taken the edge off the tension running between herself and Liara, and she'd enjoyed herself more than she had expected. They'd eaten at a very upscale asari restaurant that catered to humans, and Liara had especially delighted in fish fresh from Thessia. Shepard had her first experience with flamepears, the fruit both spicy and cool, and with Thessian silverfish, small shrimp like crustaceans that tasted like a minty sort of pork. Anderson had spoken at length about his tour of duty with the turians in the "Goodwill" campaign the SA had waged in the aftermath of the First Contact War, his respect for their honor and determination. Kahlee had told the story of Anderson and her own brush with Saren, and the horrible lengths Saren would go to get the job done.

Shepard was uncomfortably reminded of her own way of doing things, and lost track of the conversation as she thought about that. Saren was, from all the reports she had read, a bona fide hero who made the hard calls when he had to and didn't let sentiment or mercy stop him.

If things went bad enough, could she end up like him? At what point did a figure like that decide to throw away his whole life on whatever he was planning with the Reapers? And why?

She felt a cool chill creep up her spine. She tried to put herself in his place. Why bring the Reapers back? To pass judgment on society itself?

No, that wasn't it. She remembered that strong, flanged baritone. Tired, determined. "There's time for you all. You've seen what I've seen, haven't you? They are coming. There is nothing to be done about it, except to die fruitless and in futility...or try to survive the coming storm."

The memories in her head of the Beacon stirred, and Shepard shifted uneasily in her seat, picking at her food. Whatever Saren was doing, he was doing it to survive ... something. Something he saw as inevitable.

He wanted to be on the winning side. That meant he didn't just plan to bring back the Reapers. He must have been in contact with them.

She glanced at her plate, thinking. The words of the High Priestess came back to her, voice strong and yet fearful. "...the name Nazara is known to me. It is inscribed on the oldest stone of the Temple, along with the ancient glyph for darkness, death, and annihilation."

Shepard found herself the center attention as Liara and Anderson both stared at her. "Are you alright, Sara? You look like you saw a ghost." Anderson's voice was concerned, and Shepard answered him with a weak smile.

"Fine, sir. Just ... thinking."

O-OSaBC-O

Much later on, after Anderson and Kahlee had decided to stay out enjoying themselves at Flux, the night wound down with Shepard and Liara doing a bit more experimentation with each other. Liara tried not to let the bond slip out of control, and Shepard had tried not to be so rough, but they both ended up doing things more violently than the first time, and somewhere in the middle of her ninth or tenth screaming release, Shepard pretty much lost track of who she was and who Liara was once more.

The fact that Liara seemed to enjoy it more than she did at this point made Shepard both smug and guilty, but also thoughtful. In the small hours of the morning, as she lay against Liara's exhausted form, the swirling emotions and memories that persisted after their meld made Shepard almost dizzy. The feelings made her feel more complete, and it was almost addictive. She wondered how much of her was being imprinted onto Liara, and how much of the little asari's more gentle, pure nature was filtering into herself.

When Liara awoke, they talked about it briefly, and Liara shamefully admitted that she had simply too little control to prevent the bond from intensifying when she was overwhelmed with physical sensations during sex. Shepard had suggested perhaps taking a break from the sex if it was making things difficult for Liara, which made Liara stammer out an embarrassed, blushing admission that she didn't really want to stop.

Shepard didn't want Liara to feel obligated, but the asari had clung to her all the more tightly and they'd ended up doing it again. Desperate fear and worry lashed across Shepard's mind, as she felt Liara's dread of the coming fight, the fear that they might not survive. She took and Shepard gave and eventually they'd both collapsed, barely able to breathe, battered and spent and simply holding each other as they drifted off, still bound, into calm dreams.

She'd paid for such exertions the next morning, wincing as she forced herself to bandage up some sore scratch marks and wondering if she could walk straight by the time she was supposed to meet with von Grath. Liara was curled up in the bed, her features softly radiant in the faint light of the Widow Nebula that came in through the windows, and Shepard found her worry evaporating just looking at her.

Despite Liara's worry, Shepard herself felt fine. It was sometimes a little disturbing to know things she never had experienced, but Shepard found she needed that. It was a constant reminder that she wasn't alone, that not everyone was going to betray her, that basing her present actions on the wounds and shit in her past would only destroy her future.

It was hard being supportive, of not letting her fears win out. But Liara needed that. She had no one else to rely on besides Shepard, and that meant she couldn't afford to back away from Liara now. She resolved to talk to some other asari – maybe a doctor or something – once they got back from beating down Saren and Benezia.

O-OSaBC-O

By dint of painkillers and moving slowly, she'd showered, bandaged a few wounds, carefully put on her dress blues and managed to get down to dock 16 by 10 AM, after a quick breakfast made awkward by her stiffness.

The dock was swarming with SA military police, commissars, and various AIS types, and Shepard had to pick her way past slowly, finally reaching the pier. General von Grath was already there, chatting amiably with Doctor Chakwas, who had an almost wicked gleam in her eye. Von Grath made a satisfied noise as Shepard approached and turned to Chakwas. "Alas, Helen, duty calls. Perhaps we can speak more of your experiences with the Ninth Regiment once we deal with this turian criminal and his asari flunky?"

She smirked as he kissed her hand. "But of course, Jason. I mean, General. Be safe." She turned, headed for a parked aircar, and Shepard regarded her former CO with a raised eyebrow.

Von Grath merely shrugged, and Shepard sniggered. "This puts me in the mind of that time on Tahtra, sir."

He coughed, a smug smirk barely visible under his handlebar mustache. "You have a very energetic and skilled doctor in Major Chakwas, Shepard. Lord knows, with how you seem to treat cover as some kind of plague to be avoided, she must have lots of practice. Also, good work on not being arrested or nearly starting a war with the salarians on this leave. Unlike the last one."

She muttered. "You punch one smartass salarian..."

Von Grath gave a shattering bellow of laughter and turned towards the dreadnaught, Shepard trailing in his wake as she had all those years ago. His energy was infectious, as he strode ahead, features fixed in a patrician half-sneer, uniform perfect, calling out amiable if brief greetings to a few of the Commissars that stood around dockside.

The sentry at the gangway saw the Butcher of Torfan and the Grand General and nearly pissed himself coming to attention, stammering out their ranks as they came aboard. At the far end of the gangplank stood two figures, waiting patiently.

Admiral Chu was in working blacks, his slender form more revealed by the tighter fitting combat outfit. His arms were lean but sinewy with muscle, crisscrossed with old scars and badly healed wounds. Next to him, the cruel visage of Commissar Chisholm flickered in a sardonic grin for a moment before he saluted, still dressed in his black great-coat and armor.

"Admiral Chu, it is good to meet you again, sir." General von Grath saluted in a cool if sharp manner, and the admiral returned it. "I haven't had a chance to work with you before, and I appreciate being able to get back into harness."

Chu chuckled. "Yes, well, you won't thank me if this little trip goes south, General. We don't know exactly what we'll find on Noveria, after all. And the Senate Defense committee was informed of our intentions this morning, and 'furious' would be an understatement. Senator Jackson said he'd kill you, me, Shepard, and Senator Adkin's dog if we ended up getting our 'shit kicked in' by that black ship of Saren's."

Shepard snickered under her breath at the idea of the grossly obese Senator doing bodily harm to anything not food related, and Von Grath gave her a quelling look before responding. "I'm sure the Senators are not pleased, but this is the best option. If the Noverian Corporate Court wishes to protect Saren, they should be prepared to pay the price."

The Commissar behind them just chuckled. "The High Commandant of the Commissariat did not take being yelled at by the Senate kindly. He is, probably as I speak, informing them of some of the ... ramifications of the intelligence Commander Shepard was able to obtain from Cerberus HQ. Something along the lines of opposing a strike against Saren makes the entire Senate politically unreliable in the commissariat's eyes."

Shepard suppressed a wince. The term 'politically unreliable' was very nearly a death sentence in the SA, as it indicated the Commissariat had evidence you were acting in a manner that violated the Manswell State Security Acts, which had never been rescinded since the Days of Iron. While free speech was still tolerated and even encouraged, any material actions – even something as innocent as donating money – to a cause that the Commissariat judged as a threat was an offense that would strip citizenship from the violators.

At the awkward silence that fell upon the Commissar's statement, Admiral Chu cleared his throat. "Let's head down to the briefing area to review what intelligence we currently have. After that, we'll have a light lunch and I expect all ships to be ready to cast off by no later than 1400. I've given liberty to the crew of the Wrath until 1300, so you may wish to alert your own crew, Shepard."

Shepard shrugged. "Liberty for my ship was set at noon. We should be good."

Chu merely nodded. "Let's get this show on the road, then, shall we?"

---

Chapter 97: Chapter 88 : Noveria , Approach

---

A/N: I'd like to answer a review here, since this is one of those things that I should have really covered in my doc on the SA, and it's a damned good question brought up by NarwhalWarlord

The Commissariat is the organization responsible for ensuring everyone toes the SA line.. including the SA navy. That's why there are Commissars and Commissariat spies and the like on every single ship in the Fleet, and why the Commissariat does not answer to the Senate. As I have said before, they are the very worst of the Soviet Political Officer Commissar and the Warhammer 40k Commissar mixed together with a package of biotic power.

The Commissariat has its own dreadnaught (and escorts, but there wasn't enough dock space for the escorts described below) in the event that some portion of the SA navy tried to commit a coup d'tat. It ensures the Commissariat has enough power to put down anything up to a full squadron of rebelling Naval personnel without needing to rely on the rest of the Navy to do so.

It's also to allow the Commissariat to have access to a bombardment platform under their sole control, rather than relying on the reliability of naval personnel to carry out unpleasant orders. Keep in mind that SA and Citadel restrictions against orbital kinetic bombardment apply only to garden worlds – that is, naturally life supporting worlds with native life. The majority of colonies in the SA are not garden worlds but terraformed, and there is no restriction on bombarding those. (Which is why the turians were able to bombard Shanxi, btw.)

The Commissariat is not 'secretive' exactly. The Commissars are designed to be very visible and to ensure that people know they are watching.

The same concerns will probably be put forth regarding the number of ships the AIS can bring to bear. The AIS has its own paramilitary force and naval structure for purposes of 'plausible deniability' and to provide a force multiplier when going after other forces (STG, etc) that have space support.

The Wrex portion...well. It's Wrex. I can't help it.

---

The trip to Noveria was one done in a feeling of edgy trepidation by the crew of the Normandy. The departure had gone off smoothly – no one got arrested this time, although Friggs had been carried back to the Normandy by a pair of drunken asari, and Pressly and Adams had shown up hungover and groaning that morning.

Shepard stood at the railing before the galaxy map in the CIC, suppressing a small grin as Pressly stalked around the edges of the map, clearly still under the weather. The laconic Adams had wasted no time in regaling the crew with Pressly's cutting loose while on leave – he'd ended up with a couple of the human ladies at the Consort's Gardens and burned a fair sized hole in Shepard's expense account doing it.

And then he'd gone on an alphabetical drunk, starting with shots of Absolut and ending up with Zetan Ale, cursing his ex-wife, Cerberus, turians, and the difficulty of finding a drink that started with the letter X before passing out in the Darkstar Lounge. She shook her head, coughing slightly to cover her chuckles, and tapped the small control panel on the console next to her to alter the map.

Noveria was at the fringe of Citadel space, in a system with only no mass relay links that had to be reached via FTL from the nearest connecting system. Their FTL blueshift would be visible to sensors hours before arrival, which meant Noveria would know they were on the way.

The briefing with Admiral Chu and General von Grath had outlined the broad strokes of the plan Shepard had concocted. The Noverian Corporate Court had a small fleet of ships it used for 'self protection', consisting of at least four heavy cruisers, a small number of light missile cruisers, and about two dozen frigates and system patrol boats. More than enough to see off all but the heaviest pirate raid, not quite enough to fall under Citadel regulations about private navies. The planet itself was safeguarded by a large missile base on it's outer moon, supplemented with missile drones and fifty or so light fighters – turian, mostly.

Added to this were over fifty orbital defense satellites, and at least twenty heavy GARDIAN towers with GTS batteries nearby. Not to mention any other surprises the Corporate Court had lying around. All in all, Noveria was well above the ability for anything but a full military squadron to handle.

The Commissariat had lent it's dreadnaught and fifteen battle cruisers, and the AIS had added twenty more cruisers and nearly a dozen heavy frigates to the count. Under Commissariat orders, Admiral Hackett had been forced to let go of the Fifth Fleet's regimental marine detachment – five light cruisers refitted to assault landing ships, and ten battle transports. Commissar Chisholm had dragooned the SC5 Da Vinci, a carrier-cruiser, to come along and provide fighter support.

A dreadnaught with forty cruisers and a carrier, backed up by a full four regiments of troops, a regiment of Commissariat assault troops, and thirty Commissars, was a terrifying force to bring to bear against one world. Admiral Chu was famed and well-known, both for his combat prowess and his role in the AIS. Shepard and Chisholm were both seen as bloody handed lunatics, and General von Grath had fought some of the bloodiest and controversial fights in SA history.

As Chu had put it, "They'd have to be insane to defy your landing in the face of that kind of threat, Shepard."

Even so, Shepard was a firm believer that there was no such thing as everything going smoothly. The light at the end of the tunnel, most often, was from an oncoming train. With that maxim firmly in her mind, she'd begun preparing how to handle events if the stupid businesspeople tried to stop her from investigating the planet.

Noveria was not a garden world – much of the planet was an icy hellhole, complete with a subarctic methane atmosphere laced with enough chlorine to kill everything but a volus that inhaled it. There were four primary settlements on Noveria, each one shielded against the atmosphere and partly buried underground. The capital, Port Hanshan, was a large city, with every luxury and amenity a traveler on business might require.

The nearest two cities to it, Regulus and Daystani, were primarily banking and commercial centers, and industrial areas. Farthest out, Sertaci was an entirely asari settlement funded by the Ilium Corporate Court, a joint investment in building a series of utterly isolated resort "fortress homes" for wealth emigres who wished to live free of restrictive tax burdens. A collection of private ecodomos linked by high speed underground rail to a central town where the support personnel and servants worked, it was located far away from the hustle of the towns.

Littering the huge mountain range that towered over Port Hanshan were the research facilities that made Noveria famous. Each one was a self-contained hotlab over the massive glacier that was edging downwards from the mountains above. In emergencies, they could be detonated and sunk into the two-mile deep river of frozen ice, rendering anything dangerous inside utterly harmless. Dozens of such labs festooned the mountains, but the most impressive was the massive structure that sprawled over the highest peak in the range, Peak 13 – the research and development center of Binary Helix.

Shepard had noted that the Illusive Man had mentioned Peak Fifteen, not Thirteen. Yet according to what information the AIS had, there was no such location. The Illusive Man's information spoke of a geo-thermal facility down the peak from the main buildings, but where to find an entry?

As much as she would have liked, she couldn't just storm down there and poke around. Weather conditions were horrible on Noveria, with snow-storms boasting winds of over 150 miles per hour and ice accumulations of over nine inches in a few hours. Noveria maintained narrow roads and skybridges to the various mountaintop labs, but traversing these was at the pleasure of the Corporate Court – to prevent industrial espionage, no one could move across the skybridges without a VI encrypted passkey, or ground defense turrets would open fire.

Worse, she had zero authority on Noveria. The Corporate Court paid no taxes and did not accept or tolerate Citadel interference in its affairs. They tolerated Saren – more due to the fact that he was an investor than anything else – and Saren was the sole Spectre 'responsible' for Noveria. As long as his reports indicated the planet was clean and not harboring anything dangerous, the Citadel had no real power to simply enforce it's will.

Humanity had only a few businesses active on Noveria, despite the fact that it started as a human concern. The Corporate Court that had started the colony had swiftly cut ties with the SA, in protest of tax hikes, and for the past nineteen years the SA had not seen fit to reign them in, but they had stopped doing business with any corporation that maintained it's headquarters there. That meant a large number of businesses simply couldn't operate in human space and yet remain on Noveria. The weakest capitulated, the stubborn went slowly bankrupt.

The strongest – Synthetic Insights, Nolan Arms, Nirvana Technologies, and the Sirta Foundation – had thumbed their nose at the SA and continued on, inviting alien corporations to help them build a "place for business to get business done", as the advertising went. It had allowed Noveria to flourish, but had ended up giving it a sinister reputation as well.

Shepard sighed, running her hand restlessly over the railing and wished the damned FTL flight would hurry up and end. She had a bad feeling about this entire trip, and wondered how exactly to go about finding Saren and Benezia on a world honeycombed with secrets.

She arched her eyebrow as an incoming comm request caught her eye. Thessia?

O-OSaBC-O

The boardroom of the Noverian Court of Corporations was lavish on a scale that stunned the unprepared mind.

A long table of asari trellwood dominated the room, trimmed in eezo-stained icesteel from Thessia. Over twenty-five feet long, and several inches thick, it was pierced by haptic pop-up displays and a rotating globe displaying Noveria in real time imagery from the various security stations and defense sats in orbit. The floor was marble inlaid with trceries of gold, the walls polished wood pierced by broad armorplas windows framed in rich draperies of damask.

Exquisite objects of art, an expensive hundred-inch wide haptic display, and hanging plants from Thessia, Sur'kesh and Palaven completed the setting.

On the left side of the table, the nearest to the door, twelve seats were placed, plush leather and hand-carved wood encasing their owners. The beings in those seats – mostly asari, but three humans, a couple of turians, and a single batarian – watched the haptic viewscreen on the wall with discomfort.

The far side of the table had only five seats. The center seat was occupied by a salarian, flanked by a turian and an asari. At the far ends of the table sat two humans.

Administrator Anolais' voice was thin and irritated as he spoke into the silence that had enveloped the room. "That is our first report. The FTL sensors do not have firm designations on the force's exact composition, but the footprint indicates at least one dreadnaught is present. Given that it is coming from the Ralx-Goras link, it is most likely the ships are either coming from the Citadel, or are asari in origin. Either possibility is disturbing."

Director Adham Kahl, a rather plain featured human sitting on the same side of the table as Anolais, shrugged. "It may simply be a task force in the area looking for pirates. There's no reason for the Citadel or the asari to send a massive fleet to Noveria."

There were several snorts from the far side of the table, and Anolais glanced that way, his large eyes narrowing. "Is there a comment someone needs to make?"

A slender human woman, with her dark hair slicked back and tied off in a severe bun, made a throw-away gesture. "Why bother, Anolais? We all know why they're coming. Saren and Benezia."

Anolais folded his hands neatly on the table before him, frowning. "We have covered this exhaustively. Lady Benezia and Saren both departed Noveria in the aftermath of the news reporting after Eden Prime. They never returned, to the best of our knowledge and our customs department. Despite the fact that Binary Helix was owned in large part by them, that does not criminalize the company nor suggest they are hiding on this world."

The turian next to him nodded. "Binary Helix is not engaged in any way with Cera Arterius or Lady Benezia. Their stock has been frozen and we have already endured two inspections of Peak 15 by the Corporate Court." He flicked his mandibles to one side. "In any event, if these ships coming this way are here for that, they have wasted their time."

The asari on the senior side of the table spoke, her words slow and cautious, almost robotic in tone. "It is unlikely in the extreme that the Asari Republic would send ships here ... unless it is a Royal Hunting Party. Notices of the Hunt went out yesterday evening. The Thirty have declared Benezia a criminal that is a threat to our unity and will stop at nothing to end her. If this is the force of a Royal Hunting Party, it is in our best interest to simply acquiesce to whatever they wish – they will have no interest in our research here."

The turian stirred. "I am not letting anyone traipse around my damned facilities, looking for bogeymen. By the spirits, do you really think my company would hide a pair of galactic fugitives?"

Anolais voice was very dry. "I think for enough credits you would slaughter your own Primarch and your wife alongside, Tevek." The explosion of sniggers after this statement made the turian flare with anger but Anolais continued in a serious voice. "It does not change the fact that I agree with you. Investigating our own is one thing. Letting outsiders do so sets a legal precedent I am not willing to accede to at this or any other time."

He turned to the stiff figure standing at attention at the room's entrance. "Captain Valdais, get your ships ready for a fight. Do not take them beyond the orbit of the outer moon's missile envelope, but make it very clear we are not about to put up with nonsense."

The turian saluted and departed, and Anolais stared at the sensor map on the wall, which flickered with new information. Anolais stared at it a long second, dumbfounded.

"There are troop ships in this incoming fleet. Someone get me the Citadel Council, this is intolerable."

O-OSaBC-O

Wrex finished the final adjustments to his suit of armor, checking each piece with a sounding tool before beginning to put the completed suit on. It was part of his battle ritual. Checking his weapon. His armor. Going through the motions that would call the soulfire in his mind.

Tracing the gouges across his muzzle, remembering the day in the Hollows where his faith shattered. And that day on Bortra where his only son had died a senseless, stupid death, after Shepard and Shields had nearly died on Torfan to keep him alive.

Wrex shunted the old pain aside, focusing on his battle readiness. Battle and the blood rage was all he lived for any longer, that and the slow downward spiral of despair he'd locked himself into. Perhaps if Urv had not died he would have found his fire again, his will. But in the loss of his son, Wrex had been forced to look at himself, his people, and the future.

There was nothing there. The krogan would never rise above their own need for violence, above the call of the blood and the roar of the battle. It was not their way. Others looked at them like they were brutes, too stupid or simple to grasp how to act civilized.

But the krogan knew civilization was simple a false veneer the weak used to survive alongside the strong. They had no desire to change. They liked the decline that the race had fallen into. It gave them an outlet for their helpless fury over the piles of stillborn babies. It let them try and ignore the helpless rage they felt when they comforted the broken forms of their mates, or watched as the barren females wandered into the central deserts to die and thus not be a burden on the clan.

Convincing the krogan to act like those who had condemned them to a slow, lingering death? No krogan would do so, without a clear reward for it. And the Council races were much too frightened of the memories of the Rebellions to give the krogan anything to hope for.

No, to change the krogan was like drinking the ocean. Not only impossible, but you made yourself sick trying to do so. The only reason Wrex was on this ship, in this fight, was the ugly name that had popped up during his shotgun interrogation of that thug of Saren's back on the Citadel.

Okeer.

Wrex inhaled, the trembling of his hands growing marked. Clan Ganar, cursed oathbreakers, filthy traitors, salarian catpaws. Okeer was the eldest of their kind still living, a mockery of krogan endurance. It had been Okeer who had turned the tribes against one another, using them like game pieces in some deranged match of ch'tha, before the salarians had come. Okeer had been the only one strong enough to stand against his great-grandfather to lead the krogan.

Okeer, when his grandfather had broken with the Citadel races, had sold them out. He'd given the salarians enough krogan to make their demonic genophage, and then laughed when it had torn the beating heart out of the race. Okeer's madness had infected his clan, and they'd vanished into the dark of space, somehow outwitting the CDEM.

For centuries, the clan had simply been gone. They'd returned barely fifty years ago, Okeer's poisonous brood having somehow swelled rather than shrunk. Did he have some cure for the genophage, or a secret stash of fertile females?

Wrex never knew. He'd clashed with Okeer's eldest, Skal, dozens of times in the past half-century, in a variety of conflicts. Crushing him on Feros had been sweetly satisfying, but that didn't stop the ugly knowledge that Skal was merely one of many.

Okeer's clan took bloodthirsty work so sick even the Blood Pack wouldn't take the jobs – putting down slave revolts, capturing samples for Collectors, the destruction of hospitals and nurseries in conflicts to demoralize defenders.

Clan Ganar had killed Urv. For that, Okeer would die. His entire filthy clan was somehow entwined with Saren, and Benezia. Wrex didn't care much about the turian, or the asari. But Okeer he would face, in single combat, if the honorless pile of pyjak droppings would agree to such. Whether he did or not, Wrex would tear out the lunatic's hearts and eat them raw.

Then, perhaps, he could rest. Die, or go back and haunt Omega's corridors, become a sad and broken exhibit like old Patriarch was now. That'd tickle Aleema's sense of humor...

Aria. Right. She can't be linked to her old self, after all. Silly girl.

Wrex looked up as the elevator opened, disgorging the figure of Ashley and Kaiden, both talking animatedly about something.

Wrex merely grunted. He still didn't get humans. Shepard, Shields, Dunn, and Jackson, those he could understand. Tormented warriors, full of angry rage that never calmed, wild and free. Jackson was nearly a krogan in his mindset, his madness no worse than a krogan's blood rage. The rest of the humans? Soft. Weak. More concerned with appearance than facts. He'd overheard one of them babbling to the womenfolk, boasting about how 'perception is reality'.

Wrex doubted that fool would live six minutes on Tuchanka. In the nicer parts. In spring.

No, reality was reality. Perception was stupid, it varied from alien to alien and time to time. Wrex examined his shotgun, running his hands against the smooth barrel. Reality was a good gun, a good fight, a good drink, a good meal, and a good nap after. Anything beyond that was pointless. Those who fought for a cause either ended up dying for it or ended up betrayed by it.

He turned his bulbous eyes away from the two humans, the scent of their weak pheromones blending making his muzzle twitch. He wiped his nose absently, and then looked up again as Tali approached out of engineering, walking towards him.

He lifted his head, shoulders spreading as he faced her. For whatever reason, the little quarian always made his mood improve. Maybe it was memories of her knifing that stupid Weyrloc right in the eye. "Quarian."

Tali immediately stiffened, glowing eyes narrowing. "My name-"

He held up a hand, grinning. "I know, Tali. Just like seeing you go all angry like that. Gotta say, you changed my whole view on you quarians. Figured you were soft. If they're all like you, you might be worth more than a cooked varren in a fight."

She merely snorted, folding her arms. "I did not come here to be insulted by a being who drinks hanar tea."

He shrugged. "You don't know what you're missing, then. Typical quarians, all pissy because you have to eat your steak with a straw." He chuckled again, as she rotated her helmet in an annoyed away, and shifted in his seating. "So what did you come here for? More shotgun tips?"

He'd been surprised the first time she'd come to him, asking him how to use her shotgun in a better fashion. He'd taught her what he could, about how the shotgun was never just a weapon, it was a threat, a cone of hesitation an enemy would fear, an extension of a kick to a downed enemy. Using a shotgun was a way of thinking, a way of holding your body so that you could bring it to any angle.

Only time would tell if she could absorb his wisdom, or if she'd end up dead and broken like so many other warriors he'd taught.

Like Urv. He winced at the thought, exhaling.

She shook her head. "I need some advice, Wrex."

Wrex stifled a long-suffering sigh. First Shepard, then Shields, then Dunn, then the freaking asari, and now Tali? "When I find whoever told this crew I'm the ship's counselor, I'm eating them whole."

She laughed, then shrugged. "It's not that. I mean..." She twisted her hands together. "My father always told me a krogan would tell you the truth, even if it hurt, and that they never lied to themselves about what the world was like."

Wrex's levity, thin as it was, faded again, and he fixed her with a stern look. "Your father is wise, but that sounds like the kind of wisdom he learned the hard way."

She nodded. "I know...I mean, he did things in his life I never knew about...but he worked with Tetrimus once, at least that is what Tetrimus said, and he didn't deny it..."

Wrex ran his tongue against his teeth and wished once more he could get some kind of scent tell from quarians. It was impossible to read the suit rats when they got all quiet like this. Grunting, he shifted again, setting one massive armored foot out in front of him to prop his arm on his knee. "Alright, then. What you need advice on?"

She looked down. "I...well, it's kind of embarrassing."

He shrugged. "I once took a piss in what I thought was a field and ended up being a flower park of an asari matriarch." He smirked at the memory of her face when she'd beheld him. "Can't be much more embarrassing than that."

The little quarian giggled, then folded her hands together. "Riiight. It's about Joker." Her voice dropped. "I ... I don't know how he puts up with the way he gets treated, sometimes. It upsets me. The humans don't appreciate him. He only has a few friends and I don't think any of them really understand what he goes through every day, trying to win their approval."

She sighed. "We were talking and I was trying to convince him to maybe pay a visit to the quarian fleet...just to see how we live. And maybe he ... took it the wrong way? He got real quiet and said he didn't want to be a burden on me and then said he had to go on watch, and he hasn't spoken since then."

Wrex folded his arms. "You're asking me for... dating advice. You're asking the krogan for dating advice."

She shook her head. "No, you bosh'tet. I'm asking you if I'm being stupid trying to drag him away from everything he knows. I'm doing it to make him happier...or maybe it's to make me happier. I don't know any more. And this whole fight against Saren ... the marines were talking like we were all going to die or something."

Wrex grunted again. "Humans are soft, Tali. Despite how hard they fight sometimes, and how bad they got clawed up in the Relay 314 incident, they still have never really faced death as a race, the way my people have." He paused. "Or your people have. They don't get it, that everything is failing and crumbling. So they fear death, and they cling to what they already feel comfortable with."

She tilted her head, curiously, and he continued. "Joker – which, by the way, is a stupid name – still thinks he can make a difference. That his actions matter more than finding happiness. It's the kind of stupid that leads to heroism and all that sacrifice and duty turians spew off about all the time, and it's what gets people killed."

He set his shotgun aside, focusing on the quarian. "I've lost my mate, my boy, my father, my clan, and my entire rightful place in Krogan society. My greatsire fathered the Krogan Imperium. My grandsire challenged the entire Galaxy. My father was the last Warlord to unite more than five clans under one banner. And I'm a broken down old merc, tagging along on a quest to bring down a lunatic turian because I wanted to see Shepard fight and to take out an old enemy. I don't believe in causes, or in much of anything anymore. Joker still does. He's too young to do otherwise."

He turned his gaze to hers. "Joker doesn't get that you don't have the rest of your life to pursue what you want. He probably reacted the way he did because he doesn't want to have to choose between you and his fleet or duty or whatever stupid ideal humans put in his head that made him want to not be a cripple in a chair. He's brave and tough – for a human – but that doesn't mean he's not soft when it comes to going after what he wants."

Tali nodded. "... so I shouldn't make him choose?"

Wrex shrugged. "Why does he have to leave his clan to join yours? Is yours so much better?"

She stiffened. "The quarians would reward him for his skill, instead of ostracizing him for his disability!"

Wrex sneered. "And the Krogans and turians would have killed him at birth for being born flawed. You can't lay your values onto his. That's how the Salarian Uplift ended up ruining my people, why the Relay 314 turned from a suppression to a damned war, why when your people and the Geth blew up the entire Citadel turned their back on you."

He rolled his shoulders. "From the little I've heard you saying, life in your fleet of ships isn't exactly easy. It'd be less easy for him."

She sighed. "I ... I need to think, I guess."

Wrex leaned back against the wall. "If you want advice, you'd be better off asking the boy what he wants to do with his life rather than tell him. I'd say that he got angry not just because you're making him choose...but because he wants to choose your way over what he has, and he feels guilty about it."

She looked at him a long moment. "You are ... wow. Really good at this."

Wrex rolled his eyes. "I can smell their damned emotions. It's pretty irritating when they get around me and all I get is the smell equating to 'oh god he's going to eat me' over and over." He smiled, displaying his even row of large teeth. "But oh so satisfying."

With that he turned his attention away from her, picking up his shotgun again. "Krogan counseling is over, unless you'd like the hand to hand portion. That didn't go so well for Shepard, and you're so small and squishy..."

The look she gave him was filled with such scorn he couldn't help but guffaw. "Don't knife me in the eye, Tali."

"Wrex..." She reached for her knife, and his laughter doubled.

Liara had spent the morning aboard the Normandy upgrading the science lab, installing her new equipment, organizing her chemical supplies, and checking her shoulder injury, which was healing nicely. The latest set of bruises and minor injuries from her wild night with Shepard was starting to slowly fade already, and she decided that a short nap on the cot still set up in the lab would be in order.

She awoke to the feeling of the ship shuddering in FTL, the subtle vibration of the inertial dampener having disrupted her biotic field enough to wake her. Shepard's presence pulsed softly in the back of her mind ..she was nervous, preoccupied and worrying. Probably about the battle ahead, Liara realized.

She sat up, blearily going to the small sink in the corner and running some water to splash over her face. She wiped her face with a small towel she kept next to the sink, before turning to the terminal installed on the lab's countertop.

The High Solarch's information on her mother's abilities was very detailed, and very terrifying. She had known her mother was strong, of course. But having her abilities spelled out and illustrated with a few short video clips was another thing entirely.

Even on Feros, she could just barely manage to match her mother for a short time, and it was clear that Benezia had already been very tired and stressed in that fight while Liara was fresh and rested. In an even match up, her mother would overwhelm her in short order.

Shepard had endless faith in her, especially after Liara had saved her life several times. That didn't mean Shepard's faith was well placed, and Liara worried that the High Solarch had not meant the gift of her mother's warp sword in a cruel manner at all, but to give her a desperation move if the fight against her went poorly.

If both she and Shepard were about to die against Benezia...then it was better to drag her down with her than allow her to roam free. Liara didn't know if she had the willpower to do such a thing, to knowingly embrace death to defeat her mother.

She feared very much that she did not.

She scrolled through the information again, looking for some weakness, some angle of attack that her mother would be vulnerable to. The mention of snipers and explosives was promising, but Benezia would never allow herself to be cornered in an area where they could prepare the area against her. Whatever they did had to be so fast, so overwhelming, that her mother had no time to ready her defenses.

The force that Shepard had brought with her gave Liara no comfort, remembering the video she'd seen in the hospital after the fight on Feros. The Fourth Fleet had been powerful, and the black ship Saren commanded had torn it to pieces in minutes while not suffering the slightest visible damage.

That got Liara thinking. There had been fragments of hull on EIngana that had corresponded to the same make up as the black ship. Something had been powerful enough to at least damage it. She pulled out the sample from the drawers of samples she kept in the wall storage unit, sliding it into her upgraded analysis unit.

An hour later, and she finally had her answers. The Inusannon weapons systems were all high energy blasts of some kind of anti-particles, far beyond the scientific ability of the Citadel races to understand. But that indicated that while conventional mass accelerators might not hurt the hull, antimatter tipped disruptor torpedoes might at least have a chance.

The Tho'ian weapon systems had been some sort of coherent energy beam, one that left a thin trace of deranged matter on the surface of the fragments of hull she had. Again, not a weapon that could be easily replicated. But it confirmed her suspicions. The shielding the black ship used was almost impenetrable to conventional weapons. Only very strong energy reactions, antimatter or degenerate matter bombs, would break through it and the hull.

Of course, bringing such to bear would be difficult. Removed from a ship's strong magnetic bottle, torpedoes would not be stable for long once launched, giving them a short range. Short range against the horrific weapon the black ship used was nearly suicide.

Liara shut her scanner off, rubbing her temples. Every answered question only lead to more questions. If the creators of the black ships were this technologically advanced, why had they not simply conquered the galaxy? If the weapons of the Tho'ian and Inusannon had only succeeded in damaging but not destroying the black ships that had in turn destroyed them, what kind of weapons could be brought to bear that would be achievable to build?

She stared blankly at the readout of the analysis, jumping a bit when she felt a spike of hot anger and disdain through her bond. A moment later, the comm activated. "Doctor T'Soni, please report to the Comm Room immediately."

Shepard's voice sounded so cold.

She stood, straightening her Alliance issue BDU. She wasn't sure why she'd gone to the trouble to locate several sets of the rather tight-fitting military uniforms, but when she'd explained her desires to Kahlee Sanders, the woman had only nodded and appeared a few hours later before departure with a pack of the things, tailored and with Liara's name stitch-stenciled on the chest, like the rest of the crew. Pressly had nodded approvingly when he'd seen her in it, and no one had commented negatively yet.

Perhaps she was fitting in?

She hastened up the stairs, smiling faintly at the guard in front of the comm room, who dipped his head respectfully and stepped aside so she could enter. Shepard was already inside, an expression of absolute rage on her face. She whirled as Liara entered, exhaling as she did so. "Sorry to bring this shit up now...but you have a message from Thessia."

She stepped back, tapping her clearance code into the comms system, and the viewscreen blanked before displaying the T'Soni symbol of flametree and rose. A few seconds later that vanished, replaced with the muscular form of her cousin, Shian.

The asari was dressed in battle armor, armor that showed splashes of purple blood and scorch marks, and her bare arms were spattered with more asari blood. Behind her, Liara could see the courtyard of the Outrier courtyard, with T'Soni huntresses manning the walls with ready weapons. She heard the faint yowl of emergency alarms and sobbing in the distance.

Shian looked up, grimacing, before exhaling slowly and going into a deep bow. "Lady Liara. The House of T'Soni has been dealt a deep wound."

Liara swallowed, her entire body going cold. There was only one reason Shian would treat her with that title. "What has happened, Shian?"

Shian's eyes glittered with rage. "Your mother's Triune Unity fanatics attacked the House. We did not ... we had no warning. We were having chathesi with a member of House Vielsa, discussing those blasted Devir." She wiped her eyes, revealing a long burn mark on her elbow. "Mother...Matriarch Mithra...was about to head into Armali to meet with the Guild when the main gatehouse detonated."

She half turned, jerking a thumb over her shoulder to something out of the camera feed's pickup. "Saris...she didn't have a job, and she was good in a fight, so she was acting as the House Paladin. She went with the huntresses to investigate, and there was a missile fired. Then the Triune just came out of nowhere."

She shuddered. "Mother and Matriarch Senia Vielsa tried to fight them off. I was on the far side of the compound, training the guard, and I had to fight my way through the damned cultists. By the time I got here, she was... they killed her, they butchered her with biotics and hung her from Grandmother's flametree, after cutting her eyes out!"

Liara covered her mouth, eyes widening in horror. That was the asari ritual of marking betrayers, to signal that an asari had committed crimes so horrific that they should wander in the Great Beyond blind and lost. Liara swallowed, regaining her composure. "I...Goddess. Mithra and I never ... got along, but she ... did not deserve anything but to live out her years with honor and peace." She hesitated, then spoke. "And Yrael?"

Shian said nothing for several long seconds. Finally she spoke, her voice quiet, almost dead sounding. "She was one of them. I had to kill her myself. I couldn't...I lost control, I meant to subdue her for ... I ..."

Liara put a calming note into her voice. "Shian...I need you to be strong now. You have done what you had to do. Who is in .. charge?"

Shian gave a whimper of a laugh. "I am an adoptee, Liara. None of the daughters of Suria can serve, and as an adoptee of the secondborn I am not even in the running. If Yrael had not been a damned traitor, she would now be ... but ..."

Shian closed her eyes. "Lady Liara, you are the only legal holder of the title of chatelaine. You are the Matriarch presumptive. You are needed here."

Liara's eyes flashed. "The House would never accept me!"

Shian opened her eyes, a weak smile crossing her features. "Perhaps it's payback, cousin. Fate's tides are cruel and confusing. But there is no one else. The rest of us are either daughters of the thirdborn and thus not in the lineage or cousins promoted from the Lesser House. I am an adoptee...and lowborne, considering. I ran with the Sisterhood, by the Goddess. I cannot lead the house guard into a damned battle without muttering. The law is clear. You are house leader."

Liara shook her head. "The High Solarch herself delivered me my mother's warp sword yesterday."

Shian staggered back, eyes slowly filling with a mixture of guilt and horror, mixed with some emotion Shepard couldn't interpret. "I...she..." She shook her head, a trickle of blood visible on her neck from a shallow wound there, obscuring the edge of her Eclipse tattoo. "You cannot mean to – "

Liara lifted her chin. "I will do whatever I must do, Shian. I have no wish to die. I have found ... if not peace, then at least a reason to want to live." She closed her eyes, and Shepard felt her pain and worry wash over her.

After a long moment, she nodded to herself, and opened her eyes. "This is what you will do. Record my words." Her voice was hard, Shepard noticed absently.

Shian nodded, tapping her omnitool, and Liara spoke. "I am Liara T'Soni, only child of Matriarch Benezia T'Soni, chatelaine and heir of House T'Soni. I reclaim my heritage, my rights as house heir, and my voice in Family Council. I am engaged in the reth'shan, and I must destroy the dishonor on our name and avenge the murder of Matriarch Mithra before I can take up my duties. I expect to either die or kill my mother in the next two days. At that time..."

She paused. "...I will return to Thessia and call for Family Council, and accept any challenge from the thirdborne to be the mainborne. Until that time, my word is law. Follow the lead of Shian T'Soni in the defense of our House, and ..." She paused again, thinking of her many cousins.

"...the lead of Manae T'Soni as my voice until my return." She made a slashing motion with her hand, and Shian killed the recording, her face conflicted.

Shian finally frowned. "Why me and Manae?"

Liara smiled almost coolly. "You were the most cruel when I only wanted someone to accept me, cousin. You hated me for having all of Benezia's attention, never seeing how hard she pushed me and silenced my voice. I hated you for the freedom you had to explore the galaxy and live how you wished with no one screaming at you to change the person you were."

She gestured. "You can deal with events until I arrive. You can explain to the Family as a whole why my aunt lies dead when you were supposed to be responsible for House security. And I will be as cruel to you as you were once to me." The smile turned absolutely hateful. "Your words, dear cousin, to never return to Thessia, to blame Benezia's fall on me, were not something I will forgive. You may go."

Shian stared at her aghast. "Liara..."

Liara's expression blanked, eyes hard. "You may go, Shian." With that she killed the link, and then sagged, biting her lip and nearly falling, before Shepard wrapped her arms around her.

"Oh... Liara..." Shepard had no idea what to do except hold onto Liara as she shook with ragged, heaving sobs. Fragments of shattered, broken pain and old memories, bits of old arguments and ugly, ugly self-hatred raged through the young asari, and Shepard just held her.

After almost a full minute, Liara shook and wiped her eyes. "Mithra...was often cruel. She was never approving of me. She was bitter...jealous of mother...but I barely remember a time when she was sweet and polite. Her bondmate died and she ...changed."

Liara swallowed. "She was not my favorite person...but I never hated her. She didn't hate me. She told me ... she didn't want to steal my birthright from me...she felt guilty about that, I think." She shook her head, almost angrily. "She didn't deserve to die at the hands of .. of..."

Shepard stroked her back, lips pressed together, urging her strength into the slender frame that leaned against her. And she could feel the slow burn of anger begin in Liara, a familiar black fire roiling from some unnamed hell.

It felt like her own. Hot. Uncontrollable. A burning rage that could only have one possible outlet, one release. Shepard closed her own eyes as Liara clung to her, hoping that Liara would handle such anger better than she had.

One way or another, though, Benezia was going to die.

---

Chapter 98: Chapter 89 : Noveria, Arrival

---

A/N: Anolais was another character I felt Bioware could have made more of. The whole 'hunt down a garage pass' thing was okay as a game mechanic, but felt so kitschy in execution. Shepard is a Spectre. If the local flunky doesn't let you pass, then you go over his head. As he stands in this story, he's basically a barely restrained dictator, the ultimate authority. He's also former STG.

My original plan (before I rewrote my outline) for Noveria was a James Bond style infiltration by Shepard and Liara, but that fell by the wayside. We'll see if what I've come up with instead is better.

Also, to a reviewer: Pressly die? HERESY. Why kill him when I can be so much more evil?

---

Captain Zerzo Hallas was that most rare of beings, a drell without a service of history to the hanar. In a race who were basically the mercenary cat-paws of others, it was a distinction of questionable choice. He was a mercenary, the son of mercenaries, and mercenary work had consumed his life.

Zerzo had become a mercenary at a relatively young age, ending up with a long-term contract doing light patrol work with the corporate court of Ilium. That had parlayed into piloting, first fighters, then light patrol ships. By the time some of the companies had made the jump to Noveria for tax purposes, he'd found himself as one of the few professional starship commanders they had available. Unlike Ilium, however, Noveria didn't want to waste money on defenses, and relied more on cheap tracking systems, GTS missiles, and the threat of a handful of ships to keep themselves safe from slavers, pirates, and criminal raids.

As he stood on the bridge of the Noverian Corporate Defense Force flagship, watching his command plot in slowly growing horror, he realized belatedly that the Noverian love of cutting corners in the name of profit was likely to end his career as a mercenary with his death.

On paper, his fleet was impressive, and the defenses lethal. His cruisers were all of turian make, but with a few upgrades here and there, and his frigates were older salarian assault models, very heavily armed for their size.

None of that amounted to a hill of beans against a dreadnaught, of course, that would be able to blast them to pieces without ever entering his effective weapons envelope. Nor would the defenses stand up to a missile barrage from forty plus cruisers.

His comm tech, a salarian, spoke rapidly. "Incoming comms packet, Force Commander. Standard Systems Alliance protocol headers."

Zerzo cursed. "Understood, Manso. Put it up on primary plot, please. Signal the Corporate Court that we're in comms." He straightened, turning to face the plot more fully, and forced his features to calm.

The woman that appeared had a cold appearance, dressed in a blue uniform liberally sprinkled with the small patches of color humans liked so much as representations of honor. Her black hair framed her features, ones he would have found quite attractive if not for the icy chips that were her eyes.

Her voice was cool, almost amused sounding, but with a hard edge to it. "I am Commander Shepard, an agent of the Citadel's Office of Special Tactics and Reconnaissance. I'm here based on sources of information that suggest Saren Arterius and Benezia T'Soni are on this world. I'd like to request landing permission to discuss this with the Corporate Court's board of directors and perform a search."

Zerzo nervously licked his lips. "Commander, I am Captain Hallas, Noveria CDF. The world of Noveria is not a Systems Alliance charter member. I'm afraid landing is out of the question...although I can certainly connect you to the Board if you wish to take it up with them."

A flicker of something dark crossed the Spectre's face, and he suppressed a shudder. The humans had sent the Butcher of Torfan to his world. The stories he'd heard of her were as wild as they were bloody, rumors that she'd shot her way through civilians and her own men to get at the enemy, and of course all that coverage of her fighting, shown when they'd made her a Spectre.

He glanced nervously at the tac plot for a second. Her forces outnumbered his two to one and outgunned them ten to one, not to mention the dreadnaught. If this turned into a battle, he'd have to get behind the moon and drag that cruiser escort away from the big ship...

She finally spoke. "Very well. Connect me to your board of directors. Note that if your fleet makes any hostile moves, we're assuming you are hostile and will open fire."

He swallowed and tapped his comms link. "Of course, Commander. Transferring." He killed the link, cursing a second later. "Tactical, get the weapons hot, just in case."

His tactical officer, a turian, shot him an astounded look. "What for, Captain? In case you hadn't noticed, they have a damned dreadnaught."

Zerzo sighed. "And we have our orders. Worst case, we hide behind the moon and make them come inside our weapons range."

The turian shook his head. "This is not going to end well..."

O-OSaBC-O

Shepard adjusted her uniform as she waited in the Comm Room. The link finally cleared, revealing a lavish looking boardroom, a huge window in the background framing a majestic, snowy mountain range.

At an expensive looking table sat five figures – two humans, a turian, an asari, and in the middle, a slender salarian. Each was dressed in a nearly identical manner – expensive looking black suits, collarless and trimmed in silver, and elegant silver accessories.

The salarian in the center spoke first. "This is Administrative Director Bel Anolais, chief executive officer of the Noverian Development and Technology Corporation and the Noverian Court of Corporations. Why do you bring warships and an invasion force to my world, Spectre Shepard?"

Shepard folded her arms. "Mr. Anolais, we came into possession of documents with the fall of Cerberus indicating Saren Arterius had built a facility on your world, possibly one you were not informed of, and that he is present on your world as we speak. Acting on both the orders of the Systems Alliance and the Citadel Council, I am authorized to utilize any means to apprehend him and his associate, Benezia T'Soni."

She stared at him. "I would like to land and search for his whereabouts, and if possible, to localize and destroy any forces he has with him."

The salarian's expression didn't alter in the slightest. "And doing this requires a fleet including a dreadnaught and troop ships, Commander?"

She smiled thinly. "I'm afraid that depends on you, Mr. Anolais. Noveria does not adhere to either the Council or SA charter and shot at the last Spectre attempting to investigate events on the world. Assuming I have the full cooperation of the Corporate Court in my pursuit of Saren, then the ships are merely a precaution against any geth ships coming to rescue him. They will not close within your inner system defense limits and will withdraw upon completion of my task."

Her features hardened. "However, Mr. Anolais, I've been told that it's unlikely for you to agree for me to land and search for Saren."

She wasn't surprised when he nodded. "This is a sovereign world, Commander. Corporations come here to be free of the heavy hand of governance, the shallow morality of those who would commit atrocity in the name of empire but judge those who merely wish to explore the limits of technology. We are in business to do business, not to acquiesce to the demands of foreign nations. Allowing you to land would set a precedent of us submitting to the laws and legal powers of outside parties, which our Charter expressly forbids. Furthermore, we have already conducted two exhaustive searches for Saren Arterius, as we have no wish to shelter a war criminal. It's bad for business."

He lowered his head slightly. "Having a Spectre down here poking into our business is not something we are prepared to allow."

She smiled.

"Well, then, Mr. Anolais, allow me to explain exactly why I brought these ships. If you are not going to let me do my search, then the Systems Alliance has decided you are effectively aiding Saren, regardless of your protestations of innocence. The SA is fully prepared to weather whatever economic sanctions your various corporations might levy on us, since Saren has cost the SA more than money. It's cost us lives, our most promising colony, and he has cost the Citadel an entire fleet. Thus, behind me is the full force of the human Commissariat Security Force, along with several hundred AIS agents and four regiments of assault troops."

She gave her hardest, coldest look at the board. "If you refuse to allow me full access to your planet, your scanning systems, your financial logs and all mapping information, these ships have orders to blast your little defense force out of the sky, bombard your GTS defenses, and once your defenses are suppressed, invade. We will search for Saren but we will also loot and pillage anything of interest to the Systems Alliance. We'll leave this place a wreck, as a very firm message for uppity corporations who think their money can protect them from reality." She let her smile widen. "I brought along Major Chisholm for the ride, I'm sure your human board members can tell you who he is."

The two humans looked torn between panic and outright nausea, and the turian's mandibles were literally quivering. The asari's eyes were so wide Shepard wondered if they'd pop right out of her head.

Anolais, being made of sterner stuff, merely brushed a bit of lint off of his jacket. "Very droll, Commander. But we know that neither the Senate or the Citadel would allow you to parade about so recklessly and assault core components of the galactic economy – "

The human on the left coughed. "Sir...the Commissars don't answer to our government. They can shoot you dead on the street for wearing shoes they don't like. If those really are Commissars, they don't need authorization...good God, they sent their fucking dreadnaught! They only bring that thing out when they plan to 'chastise' rebelling colonies!"

Shepard smirked. "Very true. As for the Council, why don't you give them a call and see what they say. I'll wait."

Anolais gave the look on her face careful consideration. "You seem to imply the answer will not support my position, Spectre."

She nodded. "The Council is pretty tired of your so-called 'independence' and thumbing your nose at galactic law. They aren't going to get involved in this...but they aren't going to stop me, either. They've washed their hands of the incident. Like I said, we can do this the easy way, and I'll try not to fuck up anything. I'm not interested in your goddamned labs, or whatever bullshit you're cooking up down there that you want to hide. I'm here to kill Saren and Benezia, that's it."

She let her weight fall back onto one leg and folded her arms. "Or you can be obstructive, and we can do things the Shepard way. That usually involves..."

She paused, letting her smile grow vicious. "...violence." Her voice was almost a throaty whisper, and she laughed in her head as she saw the human man on the right side shudder and look away. "But like you said, Mr. Anolais, it's a sovereign world. A sovereign world that, may I point out, is not a garden world."

She turned to one side. "XO, time until the Manswell's Wrath is in bombardment position?"

Pressly's voice sounded firm and cool. "Nine minutes, ma'am. Primary fire control from the Wrath indicates they are ready to fire on your command."

She turned back to the view-screen image. "Thank you, XO." She tilted her head. "Well?"

Anolais was still ice calm, and that was impressive to Shepard. For long seconds of silence he merely stared at her, as if measuring her. Finally, something like a tiny smile altered the cold planes of his sallow face for a second.

"If you are bluffing, you do so very well, Commander. It seems I have no choice. Your ship – and your ship alone – may land at Port Hanshan, dock 34. You will be met by Noveria SDF personnel and escorted to One Noveria Tower so that we can present our known information and the results of our previous two searches to you in person. Assuming that you have a specific target for your ... search ... we'll discuss options at that time. If your troop ships approach without authorization we will open fire, consequences be damned."

He matched her gaze. "I will not allow you to destroy everything we have worked so hard to build without a fight, Commander. I won't protect Saren if he's here, but I will not allow him to be your excuse for attempting to conquer my world. If you are here for any other reason than what you claim –"

She shook her head. "I have no reason to lie, Mr. Anolais. And I'm not here for anything but Saren and Benezia, you have my sworn word. My ship will be arriving shortly. I have a small marine contingent I will be deploying to protect my ship, but they will remain in the docking area. The only people I will be bringing with me are two four-man teams that will be conducting the initial search."

Anolais twitched, but nodded. "Very well. I'll alert the docks. We'll discuss this further once you land."

O-OSaBC-O

"Well, that went...better than expected, all things considered." The voice of von Grath was dryly sarcastic, and his image on the comm screen showed him wearing BDU's and checking his weapons in the armory of the troopship he was on. In the background, DACT and marines moved about, and several HAMRHEAD tanks were visible.

Admiral Chu merely nodded, his background that of the bridge of his command cruiser. "I've got several ships screening the relay, and the rest of the force is in Latent Spear, ready for a charge if needed. The carrier has deployed it's fighters as CAP and to check out the asteroids in the system, but so far we haven't found anything suspicious."

Commissar Chisholm puffed calmly on his cigar. "The Commissariat stands ready regardless of the outcome. That was a masterful performance in browbeating those pitiful businessmen, Shepard. You should apply for the Commissariat, we could really use someone like you to put uppity senators in line." The bridge of the Manswell's Wrath was dim, lit in red combat lights, and armored in black panels of steel pierced only by the light of haptic control panels.

Shepard laughed at the thought, and shook her head. "Maybe later. For now, we're headed in. I can't imagine Saren hiding out here without having some kind of preparations, so be ready to do a hot landing with troops if you have to. That drell captain didn't look too confident of his chances, I'm pretty sure you can get past him without a fight if shit goes bad down here."

General von Grath merely nodded. "Don't worry. If you get in trouble, I'll be there to pull you out. As usual."

Shepard muttered something under her breath the others couldn't catch before rolling her eyes. "Yes, sir. If there's nothing else, I'll head in now."

Chu spoke. "There is one thing, Commander. I don't have any data on the other members of the Board, but Anolais is known to me. He's getting older, but I still recognize the stone-cold bastard from his STG days. He won't fold up like the others, and he was a dangerous little bastard back in the day. Don't underestimate him."

She nodded, and severed the comm, leaving the comm room and entering the CIC. "Helm! Take us in, high observable posture, weapons cold. Dock thirty-four."

Joker's voice came back over the communications system. "Dock thirty-four aye ma'am."

Shepard turned to Pressly. "We aren't wanted down there, so I'm not setting any liberty. Shit could go bad here, XO. Once we land, get the crew into suits and pass out the small arms. I'll be leaving the marines behind to cover the Normandy, under command of Cole."

Pressly nodded. "Will do, Commander. Are you taking the MAKO tanks?"

She shook her head. "We haven't had time to test them since we got them fixed on the Citadel, and besides, I don't know if there's a roadway for them from the docks. For now, we'll hold them aboard."

Pressly nodded again, pulling out an info-pad. "In that case, we'd best get started." He turned away, and Shepard clicked the comm again. "Lieutenant Alenko, Counsel Observers, Lieutenant Cole, report to the Comms Room."

It only took a few minutes for everyone to arrive. Shepard was slightly amused to see Telanya arrive with Garrus, but didn't raise a point about it. Technically, she was marine contingent...sort of.

Ah, who cares? As long as she's not trying to kill Liara.

Cole arrived last, giving Shepard a dirty look as he did so. "Lieutenant Cole, ma'am? It's a field brevet. Don't insult me like that again. I work for a living."

She burst out laughing, and motioned him to a seat. "Very well, Master Chief." She smothered her mirth and took a deep breath. "We'll be landing on Noveria in a few minutes, and from there we'll be meeting with the Board of Directors and trying to get a lead on Saren's position. I expect a lot of passive resistance on this one – you don't act this defensive and passive-aggressive unless you have something to hide."

She began to pace. "The Normandy is vulnerable when docked. Cole, you and the marines will deploy dockside to ensure the physical security of the ship. That also will hopefully let you act as a hot standby if we need backup. I'm not used to deploying without marine support, but I somehow doubt Anolais will let us come through with a detachment of soldiers and two DACT lunatics."

She turned to Kaiden. "You'll be in charge of Tali and Wrex, I'll take Garrus and Liara. Since three man teams are a bit light, pick one of your marines from Squad two to back you up."

Kaiden thought for a moment. "I know it would disrupt the squad a bit, but Chief Williams would be my choice. Chief Haln is good, but he's mostly heavy weapons. Ownby is too junior, and either of the two DACTs would attract too much attention. Charlais and Jackson are grenadiers, and in close quarters they won't be much help."

Shepard thought about it, then nodded. She was sure that it had more to do with Kaidan and Ash's relationship than she liked...but given her own relationship with Liara, and Garrus with Telanya...

Speaking of which...

Shepard smiled. "That works. For my part, I'll go ahead and snag Sergeant Telanya for my team. An extra biotic won't hurt." Telanya looked surprised, and Garrus grateful, which she ignored as she continued. "Cole, you'll have to ride herd on Squad Two without Ash to act as LCPO."

He shrugged. "Not a problem. I'll be handling the entire detachment anyway while you are off after Saren." He paused. "On the way up I saw Pressly telling the off-watch ops alley guys to get suited up. How much trouble you expecting here, boss lady?"

She folded her arms. "Lots. I can't imagine why Saren would hide out on a world where you conduct super secret research unless it was to do just that, and I really worry about what he'd researching." She shook her head. "In any event, when we go in, we stay in contact. If you run across Saren or Benezia, do not engage until we get there. Benezia is... even more dangerous than we thought. She might be stronger than all of our biotics combined can match, and in that case we have to be ready to try something else. Saren's also no pushover."

She glanced around them. "We had them on Feros, for a few minutes, then they beat our asses like drums – and let's keep in mind we were fresh and they clearly were not. Here, it's going to be a straight up fight, and we don't know what else we'll find. If anyone has any additional intel or ideas..."

Tali spoke up. "I've made some more drones, for scouting...and seeing as Liara purchased some gun drones, I've been working on a missile drone. It's not very intelligent yet, but it's more firepower. We can use the drones to scout ahead and maybe avoid any traps?"

Wrex rolled his head. "Krogan don't fare so hot in the cold, and it's unlikely we'll find too many of my people here. We hate being underground...and standing around topside outside of those nice bio-domes would kill even a krogan. Other than that, I can't think of much, aside from the fact I shot Saren pretty good, he may not be fully recovered yet."

Garrus looked at her steadily. "I upgraded my sniper rifle, and I loaded up some more info-war programs while I was on the Citadel. I also managed to get a friend of mine in C-Sec, Detective Chellick, to get me some more data on Saren. Aside from his pistol, he typically uses a Krysaë sniper rifle. Turian model, fires high-explosive shells that burst on proximity. Designed for anti-personnel area denial." He flicked a mandible. "Aside from that, he's got a ton of devices and info-war systems available only to Spectres, and he was mainly an assault biotic. Okay on the defense, but better offensively."

Shepard nodded, turning to Liara. "You finished reviewing the data we got about Benezia, Liara?"

The asari nodded reluctantly. "My mother is extremely powerful in biotics. She has many abilities, but the most dangerous are her attacks. She can use singularities to injure and flush us out of cover. She can create biotic blades of force that can cut through almost anything, warp fire stronger than I can produce, and she can disrupt your biotics for several minutes, including your barrier. Her own defenses are strong enough to withstand almost any conventional weapons." She paused. "She may also have a biotic weapon called a warp sword. Getting within melee range of her is not advisable."

Wrex gave a grunt. "I've seen those. Nasty. We should take flamethrowers and grenades."

Telanya hesitantly spoke up. "Lady Liara, I was able to obtain a handful of pulse suppression rounds from ... a friend of mine. They will not stop her biotics entirely but they may weaken them for a few critical moments if we can land a hit with them."

Shepard grudgingly admitted to herself the asari sergeant had thought of something she'd not even considered. Dammit, the Spectres probably had all kinds of nifty biotic suppression gear, and she hadn't even asked. "Good idea, Sergeant. Garrus is the best chance to land them with his sniper rifle, so give them to him."

Shepard finally turned to Alenko. "Make sure you keep your positional beacon on at all times, Lieutenant. If we get into trouble, the fleet is ready to hot-drop DACTs on us, but only if they have a firm lock."

Alenko nodded, then gave her a worried look. "Ma'am, with all due respect...isn't it likely that Saren and Benezia might try to flee once they realize we're here? The last time they were cornered they had that black ship bail them out."

Shepard nodded. "I discussed that with the Council. Admiral Victus is at the Ralx mass relay with the entirety of the First, Second and Ninth Citadel Fleets. Thirty-six dreadnaughts and a ton of missile cruisers. From what we know, the black ship can jump into a system without a mass relay but still needs one to get out, and the Ralx relay is the only way out. If the thing shows up, the Commissariat and AIS ships will retreat and we'll alert Victus to go on hot standby. The thing is tough but I doubt it can take that many dreadnaughts."

Alenko gave a sour smile. "Let's just hope it doesn't decide to incinerate Port Hanshan the way it did Feros, then. No other questions, Commander."

She exhaled. "Get armored up and we'll get out there."

O-OSaBC-O

The view of Noveria as the Normandy came in for landing was both impressive in its raw beauty and daunting in the scale of what the Noverians had achieved. Port Hanshan was a looming sprawl of dark buildings, glittering armorplast, and haptic advertising, set against the rough black rocks that jutted from the base of the mountain range it was set against. Dozens of docking slips were carved out of the shelf of rock, over-watched by a line of ugly GTS missile turrets and GARDIAN laser towers, below which a rushing river carved a narrow canyon through the valley below.

The weather was a swirling morass of snow and ice crystals, building up on the Normandy's wings as Joker fought the gusting winds to bring the ship in. "This weather is crap, commander. There's so much static electricity that ECT sensors don't work, and so cold the thermal sensors are useless too. And the icing on the wings is affecting maneuverability."

She nodded absently, watching as the ship neatly glided into the assigned dock, coming to a slow stop as mag-clamps descended and attached to the hull. "For now, keep the core hot and put a four man team out on the wings with de-icing gear. We need to be ready to move out if shit goes bad."

He nodded, and she turned away, already in full armor, to see her team moving up through the CIC towards the forward airlock. "Alright, people, let's move."

The extending bridge between the Normandy and the dock proper had just slammed into place when she opened the airlock door. Her team filed behind her, looking around. Tali huddled out of the wind behind Wrex's bulk, while Ashley grunted at the biting cold. Both Liara and Telanya looked intensely unhappy at the icy temperature, while Garrus seemed to perk up.

At the far side of the bridge, a high wall finally blocked the worst of the wind. Moving past it, she found a ten man security team dressed in red light powered armor, all carrying Monokrome light machine guns. A pair of JOTUN robots, painted in the same red coloring, had weapons ready.

The leader of the security detail had her helmet off, revealing finely chiseled Asiatic features and long, flowing dark hair that whipped faintly in the wind. Alone out of her men she carried no weapons. She made a short bow to Shepard, and then a longer, deeper one to Liara. "Greetings, Shepard-dono. Greetings, T'Soni no kimi. I am Major Makao Matsuo, commanding officer of the Noverian System Defense Force. I am to escort your people to the One Noveria Tower to meet with the board."

Shepard nodded, even as her marines began crossing the gangway. One of the armored figures alongside Matsuo stepped up. "You're not bringing your entire marine group with you."

Matsuo made a calming motion. "She is not, Stirling-kun. Undoubtedly she wishes to protect her ship from the ... possible stupidity of others."

Shepard nodded, rather intrigued by the woman's way of speaking. "I'm grateful you understand. My marines will not leave the dock area of the Normandy without prior consent, I assure you. May I ask how you recognized Doctor T'Soni?"

Matsuo's face expressed no emotion as she spoke. "T'Soni no kimi resembles Benezia-sama greatly, and I was shown a picture of her some time ago by Benezia-sama on her last visit." She gestured, and her group began moving, escorting Shepard's people.

As they walked, Shepard glanced around. The docks ended in heavy metal walls pierced by dull green glass windows and heavily secured entry portals, through which they proceeded. Inside, the floors were done in pale green tile, overlain here and there by long rich strips of pile carpets. The room was long, almost a hundred feet in length, and the ceiling was festooned with security cameras and turrets. Matsuo spoke calmly. "This is our customs checking area. We will bypass it and proceed directly to the tower."

Shepard nodded. "You say you saw Benezia recently. How long ago was that?"

The Noverian major gave her a cool look. "Around the time of the unpleasantness on Eden Prime, Shepard-dono. She was very agitated at the time, which was unusual for her. Benezia-sama always maintained a very composed manner in her interactions with her peers and lessers, to see her alarmed was ... noteworthy."

They left the customs area through a side door, stepping out onto a wide bridge over a titanic space that was carved below the mountain rock. It was akin to an underground city, tall buildings reaching from the floor to the cavern roof some four hundred feet up. Air-cars and ground-cars crossed a grid of buildings, while crowds of people moved in sluggish waves.

Shepard's team followed Matsuo to a large air-car transport, almost twenty feet long. "There are seats enough for everyone, plus a few of my people. This vehicle will convey you to the Tower. The rest of my people will secure the docks along with your marines."

Shepard nodded, and Matsuo turned to the one she'd called Stirling. "Stirling-kun, keep your squads in Customs. If there is an incident, it had better be due to outside aggression and not your temper, so ka?"

The other woman nodded, grudgingly, and swung away, sneering. Matsuo's expression didn't change as she opened the door to the transport. "After you, Shepard-dono."

Shepard and her team clambered in, even as Matsuo got in the front. The aircar lifted away a few minutes later, moving slowly through the tightly packed buildings before coming to an opening in the cavern roof and emerging back into the light.

The topside portion of Port Hanshan was just as impressive, towering skyscrapers and large open plazas filled with bustling ground vehicles everywhere the eye landed. She noted that there were very few people above ground, most heavily bundled against the cold. The aircar moved quicker, lifting from the ground and approaching a single gleaming building that towered over the skyline, its curved architecture pierced by graceful arching windows, beautiful lines of haptic lighting, and ugly pods of defensive turrets.

The aircar entered a car-port halfway up the building, a docking bay outlined with red-flashing haptic lights. Turrets tracked the air-car as it landed without a bump in the bay itself, and more red-armored soldiers watched it carefully, relaxing only when Matsuo stepped out of the car.

She waited for Shepard's team to disembark before speaking. "This is One Noveria Tower, the seat of the NDC headquarters and also the center of governance for the planet. The Board is awaiting you in the boardroom. I have been given instructions that only Shepard-dono was to meet with them, but they will surely make an exception if T'Soni no kimi wishes to accompany you."

Shepard arched an eyebrow, not needing to glance at Liara to feel her eagerness to come along. "That is acceptable. Lieutenant Alenko, hold here, and I'll be in contact. Wrex, try not to eat anyone."

Wrex actually made a pouting face, drawing laughter from her squad and a narrowed gaze from Matsuo. Shepard turned to Liara. "Shall we, Doctor?"

Liara merely nodded. "It will be enlightening to meet some of my mother's fellow investors."

O-OSaBC-O

If the opulence of the Citadel Council's chambers made her wish to take a flamethrower to the place, the almost disgusting lavish nature of the boardroom made her long for some good old fusion explosives. It wasn't bad enough that the entire tower was done up in that tacky wood paneled, marble floored, art-on-the-walls look that made her feel uncultured and stupid. It wasn't even the sneering expressions on the people they passed on the way, all dressed in expensive suits and fashionable dresses.

No, what pissed her off the most was the fact that the boardroom had portraits of Saren and Benezia on the walls outside, as "benevolent investors in the future". It left a bad taste in her mouth that these people, clearly more concerned about money than the fact that people had died or that Saren was as crazy as letting a krogan run a salarian hatchery.

Entering the boardroom, Liara beside her, she found herself facing the same five figures she'd seen on the comm-link, plus another dozen figures in seating around the table. Major Matsuo entered after them, and gave a deep bow to the figures that were seated. "Anolais ue-sama, honored members. Commander Shepard, Systems Alliance military and Council Spectre. Her Grace, Lady Liara T'Soni of Thessia."

Shepard was gratified to finally see an expression on Anolais's face, one of surprise and poorly concealed fear as he shot a look at Liara, before his features blanked again. "I see. Thank you, Major Matsuo. Please stay, your security and tactical knowledge may be required." With a slow exhalation of breath, Anolais focused his gaze on Shepard and Liara.

"I was not expecting Lady Benezia's daughter to accompany you, Commander. However, I can see why she is here. Benezia's investments in Noveria and Binary Helix were extensive, and I presume that by asari law Lady Liara is now the owner of those."

Liara merely inclined her head, gracefully. "I have not ... formally ... assumed leadership of the House as of yet, Director. Perhaps another time we can discuss those matters."

He nodded, turning his attention to Shepard.

"Now that you are here, Commander, we can hopefully dispense with this ridiculous farce that has already disrupted business on my world. I have here the security searches and examinations we performed in looking for Saren and Benezia." He paused, tapping a control on the table in front of him, triggering a data transfer to her omnitool. "That included a complete examination of Binary Helix facilities at Peak Nine and Peak Fifteen. We found nothing indicating they were at either site. Nor have there been sightings of either person since the events at Eden Prime."

Shepard smiled as the data hit her omnitool and she spent several minutes paging through it. The Noverians had done a good job, but their examination had been more financial than physical. Based on Cerberus's information, the bulk of the work had been done on Noveria long before anyone thought to investigate Saren.

"I appreciate this, Director. The information I have, however, is of more recent vintage. Cerberus was doing business with Saren, for a number of reasons. Saren was believed to be possibly experimenting with the geth, and Cerberus wanted in on that. In return, they gave him a great deal of financing, laundering it through their own subsidiary corporations. One of which was the Sirta Foundation."

The human male on the far left side of the table went utterly pale, and Anolais fixed him with a look. "I see, Commander. One moment."

Anolais stood. "Fredricks, you seem to have placed the NDC in a position from which I may have to let these people break the precedent that has insured our independence for the past nineteen years. We made a very clear point of what the consequences would be if anyone did further business with Saren after his disbarment. I somehow doubt Commander Shepard would be able to gather such a large force from her superiors without cast iron proof, and your expression tells me it is true."

Fredricks, a large man with mousy brown hair and a large goatee, shivered. "Anolais, it's not like that. All we did was handle some cash transactions...before Eden Prime. It wasn't like we were doing business with him on a regular basis!"

Shepard triggered her omnitool, displaying the financial movements Telanya had found, most dating back to barely a month ago. "Really, sir? The C-Sec investigators who ran this show payments in the millions of credits from Cerberus through Sirta pretty recently."

Anolais looked at the transactions, then back at Fredricks. "Major Matsuo. Have Captain Parsini lead Internal Affairs Security to the Sirta Building and begin a detailed search. Execute any resisters. Have them bring back any evidence to the Tower." He tapped something on his omnitool for a moment, then bent down.

From under the table, he pulled a large-caliber handgun, lifted, and fired, putting three slugs into Fredricks from barely ten feet. The first blew through the man's heart, the second his right eye, the last one his throat.

Liara's eyes widened, and Shepard could feel her shock and upset. She only barely managed to stop herself from pulling her own pistol, instead forcing herself to calmness and laying a hand on Liara's shoulder. She was impressed by the savage accuracy of the salarian, and the shots ensured no possibility of survival.

She spoke. "Now we can't interrogate him."

Anolais lowered the pistol, glancing around the chamber. "There is no need. He was guilty. We'll find everything we need to know from Sirta records. I cannot take the risk he was an agent of Saren."

He paused, his gaze lowering to the board members. "The penalty for treason is that I blow your brains out. I trust I have reinforced my point sufficiently? Is there anything else anyone on the Board would like to reveal before I am embarrassed further?" His voice was cold but also angry, and vicious. Shepard thought back to Admiral Chu's words about him and found them apt.

She finally spoke, after no one else did. "Well, Director, I don't think we'll have any problems working together if that is the way you handle business. Moving along, the other piece of information I have is that Saren may be at a geothermal facility called Peak Thirteen."

Anolais' head snapped around to glare at the turian to his right, who gave her a confused, frightened look. "I am Tevek Akaris, CEO of Binary Helix in the ... ah, evacuation of the seat by Lady Benezia. I'm afraid we don't have a Peak Thirteen. We did, a mining facility, but we shut that down almost five years ago, converting the space to bulk storage, and we shut that storage facility down two years back. There's a geothermal plant next to it, yes, but ... it's just a plant. There's nowhere to hide."

Shepard shook her head. "I presume Benezia gave the orders to shut down the storage area? That's where they are, then. The power plant would block any scans giving away their activities and they could tap it for energy to power their ... whatever they are doing." She paused. "From the information we obtained, Director, it's unlikely anyone at Binary Helix were aware of the facility."

Anolais nodded. "Good, as replacing board members is a chore."

One of the people across the table, an asari, had finally recovered from her shock. "You just shot a member of the Board in the head! You didn't even –"

Anolais fixed her with a look. "The investors only have one concern, Ms. T'Baela. Your own matriarch owns nine percent of the NDC. Do you think she will be pleased that we are forced to admit outsiders to search through our facilities or that one of the Core Corporations was involved in money laundering for Saren? This will make enforcing the Charter more difficult in the future. There is only so far this Board can afford to push our agenda of independence and tax freedom, and that does not extend to defying the Citadel in their pursuit of a war criminal."

He turned back to Shepard. "That being said, I expect that your investigation will be strictly limited to the Binary Helix facilities. I do not see any reason to authorize you or your people to venture elsewhere. The matter with the Sirta Foundation will be handled by our own Internal Affairs department."

There was little give in his voice, and Shepard didn't really need to be bothered with it all. "That's fine, Director. However, depending on what we find, we may need additional backup from the forces I brought with me, especially if Saren and Benezia have any number of troops or geth."

Anolais scowled. "I find that extremely unlikely. We keep a very close watch on what transits through our docks and customs would have noted any such events." He sat back in his seat finally, putting his pistol away, looking displeased.

Tevek spoke up. "Actually...if I remember correctly, sir, that old storage facility had it's own docking facilities."

Anolais shook his head. "We would have tracked any large ships, including geth vessels, entering our airspace."

Tevek shrugged. "...assuming, sir, that Saren didn't compromise the Planetary Defense Force. Are we willing to assume that?"

Anolais fixed the turian with a searing glare before turning to Major Matsuo. "Major, can you speak to this?"

The woman gave a short bow to the director. "It is ... difficult to say, Anolais ue-sama. The space security detail operates mostly under the control of Captain Valdais and Captain Hallas, both of which have other responsibilities. Internal Affairs has not, I believed, performed any analysis of the space security detail for infiltration. Additionally, the Peak Fifteen facility is on the edge of the monitored airspace envelope. It's very possible that someone would be able to sabotage the sensors that would allow us to pick up incoming ships."

Anolais folded his arms and leaned back in his chair. "That doesn't explain how they could have gotten past our space security net. We would have seen them coming in FTL, surely."

Matsuo gave an apologetic bow. "It is possible, Anolais ue-sama, that if Sirta was involved in this sordid and dishonorable event, that the ships in question were mixed in with Sirta's shipping vessels. As long as a convoy had the appropriate clearance tags, we would not have paid close attention to it's composition. I can recall at least six instances where heavy Sirta freighters were off course and had to be corrected. It is likely these events may have been shipments to this ... Peak Thirteen."

Anolais gave a small inhalation of breath. "Intolerable. Lax security. Money thrown away for unimpressive results..." He took another breath, closing his eyes momentarily, regaining his composure, before turning back to Shepard.

"We appear to have some internal issues to correct, Commander. This may take some time."

Shepard frowned, rubbing at her jaw. "Perhaps my people could help?"

Anolais shook his head. "No. Major Matsuo, pull the shipping logs for everything in the past month. Deploy every security person we have at the entrances to the city proper. Alert Captain Hallas and Captain Valdais to stand down from fleet defense and prepare for space to surface suppression." He gave a sour look at the cooling corpse of the human director of Sirta. "And get maintenance to haul Mr. Kahl out of here."

Turning back yet again to Shepard, Anolais made a flicker of irritation. "It will take some time to prepare transport to Peak Fifteen. The weather, as you can see, is not being cooperative. I'll alert the garage to prepare a ground transport of sufficient quality to get you there, along with a detachment of NDC security. For the moment, Commander, I am not prepared to allow you land any of your troops on my world until I see a compelling reason to do so. Let us hope this is merely a storage facility and that your information is wrong."

Shepard sighed, but figured that the half-ass cooperation of Anolais was better than invading the planet. The chaos of that kind of event might let Saren get away, after all. "Very well. Where should my people wait?"

Anolais glanced at Matsuo, who was quietly issuing orders into her omni-tool. "Your squads can proceed to the transit lounge area near the garage, which is near the Synthetic Insights building. Major Matsuo can escort you there. Unless there is additional business to discuss, Commander? The Board is going to need to react to investor reaction to these events."

Shepard shook her head. "That's fine, Director. Thank you for your assistance."

He merely looked back. "You can thank me by finishing your business and disrupting mine as little as possible. Major Matsuo, make sure the garage has those transports ready."

She nodded, motioning for Liara and Shepard to follow. They left the boardroom, emerging back into the art-filled corridor that lead to it from the elevator, and Matsuo paused. "Shepard-dono, it is possible Saren has additional infiltrators in my defense force. If he was able to suborn a Board Member, then his access may go deeper than Anolais is willing to publicly admit."

Shepard nodded. "I kind of figured that much, Major. I'm going to play along with the Director for now, since he seems to hold pretty much unlimited power here. But if Saren has troops on the ground, I'm landing mine, whether he likes it or not."

Matsuo nodded. "Very well, Shepard-dono. Please follow me, I will lead you back to the bay, and from there to the transit lounge, where you can wait in comfort while we prepare proper transport. The weather outside is getting worse, and air-cars cannot make the trip."

---

Chapter 99: Chapter 90 : Noveria , Revelation

---

A/N: And now the shadow of just what I have planned for poor, poor Noveria is revealed. I did warn you I have shot canon in the head, no?

In other news: a reviewer had suggested I write a story about Admiral Ahern and the Legacy Team (Yonis Chu, Major Kyle, Rachel Florez, and Saracino). I'll be working on that very soon.

---

Shepard waited impatiently in the luxurious transit lounge for NDC personnel to come let her know the transport was ready, leaning against a wall next to Liara. Alenko, Ashley and Tali sat on the leather-padded benches in front of a large haptic entertainment screen detailing the amenities offered by the Noverian "Alpine Tour" vacation packages. Wrex was in another corner, conversing quietly with a krogan mercenary dressed in black and blue armor, with a white crest and scarred greyish skin. Not too far away, Telanya and Garrus sat quietly on another bench, talking in low tones.

Liara stirred, fidgeting. Her hand fell atop the hilt of her mother's warp sword, now worn in a black scabbard decorated with the T'Soni rose and flametree design down its length. Shepard hadn't been happy to see her wearing it, but something in Liara's expression kept her from saying anything. Her new pistol rode on the other side of the belt supporting the sword, and Liara's new armor – the same style as her old Colossus armor, but with armored shoulder guards and a thicker chest piece – gleamed faintly under the lights from overhead.

Shepard gave an impatient sigh and turned to the figure of Major Matsuo, who stood serenely nearby, occasionally speaking quiet orders into her omni-tool. "How much longer is this going to take?"

The major checked her omni, frowning. "My apologies, Shepard-dono. I was occupied in the reports of the search of the Sirta Foundation, and lost track of time. It should have been done by now." She tapped her commlink. "Lieutenant La Silva, status?"

There was no reply, and Matsuo's frown deepened. "Lieutenant La Silva, respond. Lieutenant Vaon? Sergeant Vakur?" She cursed, tapping another comm-link. "Lilhierax-san, respond."

A grating turian voice answered. "I'm here, sweet lady. Kinda busy at the moment, two downed air-cars. What's up?"

She rolled her eyes at his comment. "Li, Lieutenant La Silva and a detachment of NDC security should have headed down to the garage to prep transports, but I can't raise any of them on the comm."

The turian's voice spoke once more. "Probably static down-charge from the storm, Makao-chan. But I'll check it out anyway." She hissed at his mode of address, blushing, and then clicked off.

Shepard only raised an eyebrow. "Problems?"

Matsuo huffed. "Only a turian who uses overly familiar modes of address, Shepard-dono. We will –" she was cut off by the blare of an alarm, and then the turian's voice over the omni. "Mak, they're dead! There's spirits-damned geth in –"

There was a crackle of some sort, and a turian screech of pain. Matsuo's eyes widened. "Li!" With a rapid motion, she was off, running flat out for the garage entrance.

Without a weapon.

Shepard cursed. "Alenko! Weapons hot! Follow her!"

The two teams chased after the human major, who had slammed through the entry doors in a rush. Wrex barreled through first, followed by Alenko, and the team entered shallow, concrete tunnels sloping down.

They rushed ahead, cold seeping into the air, and the concrete tunnel met a metallic tube, slatted with narrow windows, showing a view of the valley below and the very edge of the city. Ahead, they heard a scream of anger, and the unmistakable sound of geth plasma rifles discharging.

Shepard concentrated and performed a biotic charge, erupting into a wide foyer. Potted plants and gear lockers lined one wall, near the doorway to the tunnel she'd just come from, and a low concrete wall painted in yellow and black striping read "NO ENTRY".

Matsuo huddled behind this barricade, her fist illuminated with biotic energy, as she yelled and hurled another blast of warpfire at the shifting forms of geth ahead.

Shepard slammed into cover next to her, pulling her Revenant and letting off a long stream of cover fire. Geth jerked back, out of range, and she ducked down again. "Major, status!"

The Japanese woman snarled. "Watashi no kusogarēji de gethmachines ga arimasu!" Shepard's translator packet wasn't calibrated for earth language, and a moment later the major spoke again, in a slightly calmer voice. "Li is hurt. He's over by the far wall. Can you reach him?"

Shepard nodded, taking in the battlefield. The garage was enormous, well over two hundred feet long and half that wide. MAKO tanks, a HAMRHEAD hover tank, and even a huge cargo carrier were parked neatly alongside dozens of air cars, ground cars, and armored scout cars. A pair of Vixien turian light fighters were hung from the ceiling, and crates of supplies and freight shipments lined the walls.

Geth troopers were tucked into cover among the vehicles, mostly the white-painted forms of the soldier-form, but here and there the dark gray forms of missile units. The bodies of the NDC team were splayed out in gory splashes in the middle of the garage, where they had been apparently caught in a crossfire, and the long armored vehicle they were preparing was a burning wreck, holed by missile fire.

Alarm systems were finally blaring, but fell silent a few moments later. Shepard cursed, the geth were probably in the Noverian data network.

Her team burst through the door behind her, and she motioned Alenko with a sign indicating a defensive stance. "Yeah, I can do that. Stay put. Wrex, Tali, suppressive fire.. Liara, Garrus, Long range. The rest of you cover fire."

Shepard charged again, flashing through the air to emerge near another doorway. Sitting in small pool of blue blood, a turian in a jumpsuit and wearing a belt of tools slumped behind a heavy shipping crate, his right hand cradling his torso. He looked up as she appeared, mandibles flickering. "Hope you're with Mak and not the geth."

She nodded. "Commander Shepard, SA military. How bad are you hurt?"

The turian grunted. "They got me in the gut. Not too bad, for now. I'll need treatment but I don't think I'll bleed out if you have some medigel."

She moved his hand, slapping a patch of the soft green gel over it, and triggering her omnitool to set it off. He hissed as it hardened against his skin, and then nodded. "Thanks, Commander. Mind telling me why geth are in my garage, shooting up my vehicles?"

Shepard glanced around the crate, as booming explosions erupted nearby. "Talk later. Keep in cover." She unclipped her Predator pistol and tossed it at him. "Take this and try not to get your head blown off."

He nodded, groaning as he came to a sitting position up against the crate. Shepard triggered another charge, landing back next to Garrus and Matsuo. "He's alive, wounded but okay. What's our layout?"

Garrus's eyepiece rotated and scanned as he spoke. "I count seventeen of them, Commander. Spread out and under heavy cover. Two have missile launchers but haven't used them, they may be out of ammo. There's also one of those damned hopper things in here, and it has a sniper rifle."

Shepard nodded, glancing about. Wrex and Tali were in cover behind boxes, Alenko just behind them, the glow of his omni-tool illuminating his features as he triggered an info-war program to counter geth jamming. Liara was crouched next to Telanya, holding her new pistol and looking at Shepard. Ashley had tucked herself behind a standing shipping crate, her sniper in her hands and an ugly expression on her face.

Shepard put her hand on Matsuo's shoulder. "Major, let us handle this. We've dealt with geth before."

Matsuo snarled. "They killed my men, Commander. You expect me to sit here?"

She shook her head. "I expect you to get to your wounded man over there while we engage them and get him to safety before he dies of internal bleeding. And then I expect you to get us some backup, since your damned boss wouldn't let me land my troops or bring my own marines. Go."

The woman gazed at her angrily for several seconds before nodding. Shepard turned to Garrus, lifting her Revenant. "Alright, team. Garrus, Williams, snipe. Liara, Telanya, Alenko. Cover us with throws and warps. Wrex, Tali, you're both with me. Wrex lead the charge, I'll follow. Send your drones up ahead, Tali, then follow in behind us with that shotgun. You know the most about the geth so I expect you to give us some warning if they try something."

"Understood, Shepard." Tali's voice had gone cold, almost distorted with hate, and Shepard gave a cool nod in response.

She glanced at Wrex with a grin, and he returned it, before throwing out a titanic blob of biotic power. Several heavy crates went flying as the krogan roared and charged ahead, shotgun leveled, his biotics wrapping him in a cocoon of defense.

One of the crates impacted a geth, crushing it flat. Three more geth opened up with their rifles, flickers of plasma tinkling against Wrex's barrier. He answered with blasts from his shotgun, blowing a hole into the geth in half at the waist. Shepard leapt into a biotic charge, booming back into solidity in the midst of that trio, detonating her barrier with a nova blast that sent all three geth flying back brokenly.

Tali's drones zoomed up high, two spitting micro missiles at the geth missile troops. One geth fell to the ground with staccato shrieks of digital static as parts of its chest were penetrated by explosions. The other one took several micro-missiles to the face and simply detonated, whatever ammo it had cooking off. The blast took out yet another geth, and sent smoke billowing into the air.

Tali hurtled ahead, ducking low, popping up above a crate with a spring of her powerful legs. She yelled out a war cry in Khellish as she landed, her shotgun vomiting forth a spray of blinding white bolts of arcing plasma, catching two geth at point blank range. Both of them recoiled and stumbled back, half melted from the barrage, and Tali lifted her omnitool.

A third drone slid down, discharging a plasma bolt at the two geth, which seared through their bodies to smash against the ground. Tali fired again, and the two geth collapsed, runnels of molten metal and fragments of burning plastic sloughing from their ruined forms.

Alenko was throwing blasts of warpfire as Liara hurled singularities ahead. Telanya, less strong, concentrated on a biotic barrier, turning aside answering weapons fire. One of Liara's singularities slammed directly into a geth, turning it into a crumpled wreck. Another singularity destabilized a stack of cargo crates, and even as the blazing biotic ball crunched into a geth's chest unit and detonated, the boxes fell. Each crate was six feet long and evidently heavy, as when the stack fell on the four geth next to the one crushed by Liara's singularity, the booming sound was deafening.

One geth staggered free, only to be transfixed by the snapshot from Williams' sniper rifle, crying out in digital agony as it slumped to the floor. The geth hopper leapt up to the ceiling, firing its sniper rifle in counter-fire, the shot driving hard into Williams' shoulder, breaking her shields and sending her to the floor in agony. Garrus traced the shot back, his eye scanner projecting its source, and he fired two explosive rounds at the hopper. The machine managed to swing down from its initial aiming point, dodging the first one, but the second shot caught it right in the chest. The detonation blew its arms and legs free of its burning torso, bits of synthetic flesh raining down to plop against the concrete floor, white blood pattering down upon the combatants.

Shepard ducked under a stream of plasma darts from her right, locking up the geth shooting at her with her Revenant and cutting loose, the heavy slugs juddering into the machine and gouging out huge holes in its frame. It crashed to the ground, and another geth leapt over it, just to be smash-tackled by the charging form of Wrex. They landed hard, and Wrex's meaty fist descended in a biotic-augmented punch that flattened the geth's head, the glowing eye fading as it popped out of the distorted socket to bounce against the ground.

The last few geth fell back, spraying covering fire, only to run smack into Tali's circling drones, which showed no mercy as they sprayed them with micro-missiles and electro-shock charges. One geth managed to take out a drone with concentrated fire, but Alenko used the opportunity to lift yet another crate and send it down on the geth soldier. The crate broke as it hit, fragments of metal breaking off, and the geth tumbled to the ground, trapped.

Tali stepped up to it, making sure the other two geth were dead before emptying her Reegar into the geth's face, leaving nothing behind of its upper torso but a cooling pile of white-tinted slag. "Filthy bosh'tet."

Shepard slowly stood, glancing around. "Garrus, any others?"

Garrus shook his head. "Clean kills, Commander. Thank the spirits they didn't have one of those damned armatures in here. That would have been ... dicey."

Alenko and Telanya were kneeling next to Williams, who had removed her shoulder armor and slapped some omnigel on the wound. Williams looked up as Shepard approached. "Sorry, Skipper. Just a graze, but it hit me with some armor fragments, too. I'm still good to go."

Shepard nodded. "If you're sure, chief. Remember what I said about letting your anger get to you."

Williams exhaled and nodded. "I'm sure, ma'am. Let's get us a chicken."

Shepard smiled and turned to find Matsuo approaching from across the garage, supporting the form of the turian Lilihierax. "You downed sixteen geth that quickly?" She looked at the carnage, the smashed forms of the geth, and the burning, bubbling remains of the ones Tali had blown away.

Shepard shrugged. "What can I say? My people really, really don't like geth." She held out her free hand, and the turian sheepishly handed her back her pistol, which she placed back in her holster.

Matsuo's omni blared. "Major, this is Director Anolais. What in the name of the Collapse is happening down there? Sensors report fires and weapons discharges."

Matsuo took a deep breath. "There were geth deployed in the garage, Anolais ue-sama. They killed the security team and mechanics we had preparing transport for Shepard-dono and her people, and they wounded Technician Lilihierax. They also inflicted heavy damage on the icecrawler. Shepard and her team have terminated the geth in question."

Anolais's voice was cool, almost disinterested. "I see. How, exactly, did geth warforms get not only inside the city but into the maximum security storage garage we keep our ground combat vehicles in, Major? This had better well be a very good answer."

Matsuo swallowed. "I am still investigating, Anolais ue-sama. The fact that they targeted the icecrawler indicates we may have additional leaks in our staff."

Anolais's voice cooled even further, becoming almost clipped in its tone. "Major, the icecrawler was a very expensive machine, and the only method we have of clearing the skyways during heavy weather such as we are now experiencing. You had better find a good alternative, fast."

Matsuo winced and spoke in a submissive manner. "Of course, Anolais ue-sama. I will contact you again shortly with more information and an alternative plan."

Shepard gazed at the vehicle Matsuo called an icecrawler. It was a heavily armored tracked vehicle, probably thirty feet long, with a wide, low bearing and sloped sides. Three large holes had been punched in it by missile fire, and the treads were torn and ripped. The main cabin had been blown open and the vehicle was still on fire, even as more NDC soldiers finally entered the garage, carrying fire extinguishers and medical gear. Shepard shook her head and turned to the major.

"That was the only way to get to where we are headed?"

Matsuo gave a small nod. "Unfortunately. The labs connections are solely through the skyway, which was designed to ensure nothing dangerous could escape if the containment systems failed on the labs. That means the skyway is narrow. Normally in calm weather it can be traversed by MAKO or other vehicles, and in the summer by groundcars. But in the middle of a blizzard, the icecrawler was the main method of transport." She frowned. "There should be several more, however we had an incident earlier in the week that has two of them out of commission. It will take days to repair them."

She pulled up her omnitool, as NDC soldiers laid Lilihierax out and began treating his wounds. Shepard waited several seconds before turning to face Alenko and the rest of the team. "I need options, Alenko. What have you got?"

Alenko was studying his own omnitool intently, looking at weather reports. "Not much, I'm afraid. She's right. There are winds gusting to over 160 miles per hour out there, and the temperature is way below freezing. HAMRHEAD tanks would lose their engines in ten minutes due to icing, and the MAKO's aren't rated for that kind of environment at all. Those tires are great on turf and the urban environment, less so on half a foot of slick ice."

She nodded. "What about DACT jumps?"

He snorted. "In this, Shepard? They'd end up slamming into the mountains or being blown miles off course. You can forget landing craft too, they can't deal with that kind of wind, and icing would make them unstable."

She folded her arms. "So we have to send for what? Great White MBTs?"

He shrugged his shoulders. "Maybe. Still, moving troops in MBTs isn't going to work, they only have room for three people. Gunner, driver, ECM tech. You could maybe squeeze a fourth person in, but Wrex won't fit in one. Not to mention, but how would you get them down here in the first place?"

She sighed irritably. "When is it likely for the storm to break?"

Alenko cut his omni-tool off. "Could be days, or even longer. It's the storm season."

Matsuo was standing next to several open crates, a murderous expression on her face. "Shepard-dono, a moment of your time, please."

Shepard nodded, walking away from her team to stand next to the Japanese woman, who grimly gestured with her omni-tool to the crates. "These geth appear to have been packed in these crates, here. They were in long term storage from Binary Helix's Peak 15 facilities. They were shipped in this morning on the cargo transport, and signed for clearance by one of the security team." She gestured to one of the dead bodies. "He was hired by, unsurprisingly, Director Kahn, the man Anolais ue-sama executed earlier. Supposed to be spare parts being set aside for spring replacement."

Shepard nodded, then tilted her head. "This ... cargo carrier. Is it still here?"

Matsuo blinked, then turned her head to gaze at one of the larger vehicles. "...yes. It is. Why?"

Shepard smiled. "It made it through the storms alright, if it was able to drop off geth. Why not take it back to Peak 15?"

Matsuo shook her head. "It is an autonomous VI driven vehicle, and there is no place for passengers. It is certainly stable enough to make the trip, but how would you travel?"

Shepard smiled. "Why not just use the cargo system to strap down some more shipping crates and haul us in those? Hell, you could pack an entire force in them with no one the wiser."

Matsuo thought for a moment then nodded. "You are clever, Shepard-dono. Lieutenant Parker!" She called out to one of the soldiers who had entered the garage. "Get some of the cargo techs to put together a large shipping crate, size nineteen at least, and have it loaded on the cargo carrier. Make sure the carrier is ready for transport and program it for Peak Fifteen."

Matsuo turned back to Shepard. "I will gather another detachment of NDC troops to accompany you. I will ensure that none of them were hired by questionable influences."

Shepard grimaced. She'd much rather use her own marines for the operation, but given what they were headed into, that might just get them all killed. "Very well, Major. My people will be ready."

Matsuo stepped away, and Shepard brought up her omnitool. "Cole, come in."

The voice of the master chief crackled. "Cole here, ma'am."

Shepard pursed her lips as she spoke. "It looks like there's definitely rats in the woodwork of Noveria, Master Chief. We just got jumped by geth who sabotaged our ride. We found a backup way in, but if the geth managed to get inside Port Hanshan this deep, there's no telling where else they might be. Keep your guard up and have Pressly set repel boarders watchstatus."

Cole's voice came back strong. "Understood, Commander. Do you need us to come back you up? I can cut squad two loose and keep the DACT here..."

Shepard shook her head. "Not yet, Master Chief. Right now, the boss of this place wants us to use his troops, and if that's the case, then I'm inclined to play along. Alert General von Grath that landing troops on this icy shithole is going to be tricky and that he may have to go with storming the docks after all, if only to get boots on the ground."

Cole's voice sounded dubious. "Yes, ma'am. Given the hard looks their security people keep giving us, that's going to involve shooting."

Shepard snorted. "Like I give a shit. Anolais is just lucky I'm in a good mood, or I'd have burnt his fancy-ass little tower down around his pointy head. If things go to shit, I'm going to pick survival over placating him. Shepard out."

She turned back to face her squad. "So...who's ready for a ride?"

O-OSaBC-O

The asari technicians sat in silence, tapping quietly at their haptic keyboards, as data rushed through the system. Benezia stood above them, overlooking the tactical area from a shallow balcony, her features pinched with faint pain. Events were moving too quickly. Her Triune forces on Thessia and Illum had acted, but none of them had fully achieved their goals. The codes possessed by her late sister had been codelocked, leaving the assault on her own house a pointless endeavor. And the attack on the Temple had failed spectacularly, all of the commandos and cultists dying before the enraged forces of two entire Royal Hunting Parties.

And now, this. The comm chatter from Noveria had gone deathly quiet, and her calls to Adham Kahl had been answered by Captain Parasini of Noveria Internal Affairs. That could only mean Kahl's true allegiance had been discovered, which boded ill for her plans.

Nor did voice of Nazara pounding away in her skull help. It drained her, sapping her will, her very ability to think and reason. She focused her mind on the Sixty-Four Mantras of the Moon, letting her senses fall away one by one, and found some measure of stability in the action.

One of the asari spoke. "Mistress. Geth units have been suppressed at the garage. They reported destruction of the icecrawler and sabotage of the skybridge defenses was completed. Their last report indicated the presence of Commander Shepard before all units went offline."

Benezia snarled, her features twisting in rage, and biotic light spilled from her hands, warping the edge of the balcony. Shepard. Always Shepard! Meddling, insolent child. Leading her beloved daughter astray. Mangling and shaming her lover. Interfering in things the fool had no comprehension of.

Benezia mastered her anger, standing straight and tall. "Very well. If she is here and Anolais sees fit to cooperate with her, there is no more need for secrecy. Instruct the Triune within the city to begin the purge, and tell the geth to make ready for the move. Have the engines of the Talon's Justice brought online, and bring all of the Rachni out of coldsleep."

She turned away from the tactical area, walking down the shallow steps that lead to her own private rooms in the complex. As with all aspects of her life, her personal chambers were simplicity – bare, plain white walls, a simple bed, a fountain of sparkling water to meditate upon, and basic care facilities.

She unclipped her ceremonial robes, letting the black silk slither down her body to fall to the floor, leaving her naked, even as she pulled the headdress from her crests. That too, she let fall, stepping over the spilled cloth with strong legs as she opened her cabinet.

She pulled out a jumpsuit of dark gray ballistic cloth, and slipped into it, the fabric tight against her frame, cool against her skin. Over this she pulled on her armor, smoky gray plates of duraplast and ceramic, etched with ancient asari symbols for defense and aggression. A skirt of linked metallic triangles followed, snapped over her waist, each triangle inscribed with another asari rune. Armored, thigh-length boots of duraweave slipped over her feet, and her battle amp, set into a bronze gauntlet chased with encrusted eezo and sapphires, fitted over her left hand.

A narrow black pair of belts slipped around her waist as she buckled them on, hanging the warp sword of the Moon from one side, and a large-caliber pistol from the other. She missed her old shotgun, and hoped it had not been looted by Shepard's gang in their flight from Feros. Finally, she drew a cloak around her shoulders, the cloth stiffened with reactive omnigel packets, before fitting a face-mask of the same smoky crystal as her armor was made of over her features.

She half turned as her door slid open, revealing Saren. He took in her militant appearance with a faint smile. "You are preparing for battle?"

She nodded. "The geth have sighted Shepard, at the Port Hanshan garage. I have no doubt she will find some way here."

Saren only nodded. "My last agent in the docking area said there are troop ships and a dreadnaught from the Systems Alliance in high orbit. And my ally on the Board says that Shepard is following up on information she received from the assault on Cerberus. Adham was executed by Anolais. Perhaps they followed the money?"

Benezia smiled faintly. "No matter. I have already instructed the Triune as to their actions. They will wreak havoc and confusion, and we'll unleash the rachni upon them. We have enough information to breed them as we need on Virmire now, and the corrupted queens will be unmanageable in any case. Okeer's data and krogan will be better fitted to our purposes."

Saren tilted his head. "And you plan to slip out in the chaos."

She nodded. "We can make it to the asteroids, and then call for Nazara."

Saren shook his head. "That .. won't work this time. It's what I came to tell you. The geth tried sending a small reinforcement force here, and they found a huge fleet waiting at the Ralx relay, the only way in. Nazara can't fight his way past over thirty dreadnaughts. We are trapped with no way out."

Benezia exhaled. "Then what shall we do?"

Saren gave her a sad smile. "The only thing we can do. First, we deal with Shepard. I grow tired of this monkey interfering with our plans, and the more she learns the more dangerous she becomes. I have read of her. She is arrogant, bloodthirsty, a creature ruled by anger and rage. We'll draw her out and kill her. Once that is done, I expect they will attempt to attack us in force."

He crossed the room, staring at her. "When that time comes, Benezia, you must leave...while I must stay. Once I am dead, they will loosen their watch, and you can escape back to Virmire."

Shock crossed her features under her mask, and her breath failed her. "No." Panic erupted in her heart, and her hands reached towards him, imploring. "I cannot do this alone, Saren."

Saren shook his head. "It is the only way, my soul. They will never stop looking as long as they think I am out there. If they find me dead and not you, they will assume you were simply not here. They will grow complacent, thinking me the greater threat. They will tell themselves the geth answered to me, that I warped your mind, that with me out of the picture they have nothing to fear. That will give you the time you need to finish."

She shook her head. "I am not going to abandon you! Nazara – "

Saren's expression didn't change. "Nazara is inside my head, in a way he never was before. I am calm. I am ... ready. My fears, doubts, and worries are all gone. I know you will succeed, where I dallied and failed. You will never fall the way I have. You will remain you. And as you always tell me, I will live on within you. The ... real me, not whatever Nazara has turned me into with his cybernetics."

She closed her eyes, hands forming into fists. "You do not need to die to make this plan work, beloved."

Saren's voice was calming, coming out of the darkness. "Yes, I do. I am ... no longer myself. Even at this great distance, whatever he did to keep me alive has made me ... pliable to Nazara's will. Nazara no longer needs me. I am broken, I cannot see the vision or the cipher. And already I feel the third stage of indoctrination setting in. I am not me. Only you can succeed now, and so you must escape."

Benezia reached out to touch his face, fingertips tracing the broken surfaces of his skin. "They will pay for this, Saren. They will pay."

His mandible flickered under her touch, and he merely nodded. "We must prepare." He paused, then gave her a considering look. "...did you bring your war-suit with you? I find myself having an idea."

Benezia nodded in confusion, and he laughed. "Come. I am not dead yet. Bring one of your commandos."

O-OSaBC-O

Neither General von Grath nor Admiral Chu were wild on Shepard's plans, but both grudgingly agreed to let events proceed as she had stated rather than invade the planet, as long as Anolais continued to cooperate. In less than fifteen minutes they were on the skyway, wrapped in a heavy cargo container with an environmental system installed.

The troops Matsuo had picked were clumped at the far end of the cargo container, all wearing red armor with white detailing, carrying a mix of heavy assault rifles and light machine guns. For mercenary soldiers, they looked professional and hard, and Shepard had spoken quickly with their commander, a Lieutenant Parker.

Parker, as it turned out, was former Alliance, but had surrendered his commission after his wife had died, ending up doing mercenary work and trying to start his life over. He was quietly wary of Shepard and had warned her that he had no intention of sacrificing his men if push came to shove, which Shepard had quietly laughed at, leaving him discomfited.

The travel was hardly comfortable – even with an environmental unit pumping out heat, the cold was bitter, and the winds pummeling the cargo container gave them all pause. Shepard tracked their progress on her omnitool from the defense satellites in orbit, watching as they ever so slowly drew nearer to Peak Fifteen. The fact that the storm cut off their communications only made her more edgy, but Shepard passed the time talking quietly with Liara, about little things.

Their arrival some thirty minutes later couldn't happen soon enough. Shepard and her team piled out of the cargo container into a broad concrete garage much like the one they had just left, except the soldiers here wore white armor and the stylized DNA symbol of Binary Helix. There were six of them, and they gave hard looks at both Shepard's team and the NDC troops that exited after them.

Their leader stepped up. "Captain Ventralis, BH Security. The Board said you'd be coming, but that your search was to be strictly limited to the power plant area. So don't overstep your bounds."

Shepard gave him a smile, walking up to him, ignoring the nervous shifting of his men behind him. "Captain, if you and your men get in my way, I'm going to kill you, then them. The only reason I haven't had your two bit criminal cesspit set on fire from orbit is that I'm trying to be polite this week, and given that your corporation appears to be in bed with Saren, I'm not real inclined to cut you any slack." She stepped up to him and shoved her ODIN right into his face.

"Am I perfectly fucking clear, or do I need to clean your ears out for you?"

The human captain went pale and stumbled back, stammering. Shepard ignored him and turned to Parker. "Unless we ask for it, keep out of the way. Tali, send your drones down into the power level and tell me what you find. Everyone else, weapons hot."

Tali obliged, two small glowing spheres erupting from her omnitool to speed down the corridor. Using the blueprints they'd been given by Anolais, Shepard lead the two squads down the hall, which was done in boring white armor paneling. Every so often security doors hissed open, until finally they reached a long, down-sloping tunnel with broad armorplast windows along the right side. A few dozen feet ahead, the tunnel was sealed by a heavy security door, imprinted with haptic warnings.

"POWER GENERATION : HEAT HAZARD"

Parker spoke up. "If the blueprints are correct, this leads to the geothermal plant. It's maintained by mechs, not people. I doubt anyone has been down here to check the place out in years."

Shepard nodded, going to the heavy security doors and triggering them. A gust of heat puffed out from beyond, carrying the scent of dust and brimstone. Garrus groaned. "Great, it's Therum all over again." Wrex chuckled, while Tali tilted her head in confusion.

Liara shuddered. "Do not remind me." She lifted her pistol and stared ahead, as Tali's drones zoomed off down the tunnel.

Several seconds passed before Tali spoke, gazing at her omni. "So far, it's clear. Temperature is hot, but not critically so. There are ... mechs down there, doing basic maintenance, and a heavy security door that is not on the blueprints."

Shepard nodded. "Move out."

The walk down the long tunnel was almost oppressively silent. Shepard lead, her ODIN loose in her hands, Liara trailing close behind. Garrus and Telanya advanced in C-Sec stances, Garrus covering the corridor with his Phaeston he'd looted from Eingana, Telanya's Spear of Athame rifle glowing faintly in the dim lighting.

Alenko, Wrex, and Tali walked along behind them, Williams bringing up the rear with her own sniper in her hands. Parker and four of his men followed her, the last five forming a rear guard. The tunnel was floored in cheap, chipped concrete, the lights simple halon lamps that cast long ugly shadows across the bare white walls. The armorplast windows were caked with ice, revealing flashes of gray mountain rock and swirling clouds thick with falling snow.

Eventually, the snow covered the windows entirely, and the heat increased, flickering red lights visible at the end of the tunnel. It bottomed out, a grated metal walkway proceeding from the end of the tunnel.

Shepard made her way into the thermo plant, which was a natural cavern with areas smoothed to make room for power generation equipment. Below, faint reddish luminance shone from giant cracks in the earth, with heavy machines and pumps of some kind working incessantly. Large battery banks were bolted directly to the smoothed rock walls, while the floor was layered in sprayed insulation, tacky to the touch. A few mechs scurried about, tending to the machinery, while a row of more mechs sat quietly in charging stations along the north wall.

The drones Tali had sent were circling behind one of the battery racks, up against an armored doorway that had two broad crossbars of solid steel reinforcing it. The doorway read "Thermal Access: no admittance, hazard area". Shepard checked her blueprints and smiled – no such door or access was visible on them.

"Get ready. Here we go."

She attempted to open the door, using the access codes Anolais provided, but it stubbornly flashed red. She smirked and triggered her omnitool, letting the Spectre decryptor tool go to work, hundreds of runtimes attacking the door for a few seconds before it finally shifted to green. The door opened slowly, more reinforcing bars on the far side retracting into the earth, revealing a plain, bare steel corridor.

Shepard entered first, Liara following, and the group followed, walking slowly and carefully. The corridor curved slightly, eventually coming out onto a broader hallway. A huge security door was set into the rock walls, while off to one side a broad armorplast window was set.

Shepard approached the door, but paused, seeing a flicker of movement outside the window. She stepped up to it, wiping at the condensation that clouded it, and looked through it. Far below, in a natural cavern, hundreds of alien creatures thrashed around, packed tightly together. Shepard was left speechless, even as Wrex stepped up to take a look, and a vibrating, angry growl began to emit from his chest.

She turned to him, and he looked at her. "What are those things, Wrex? They look like goddamned xenomorphs from old human scifi flicks."

Wrex bared his teeth at her. "Worse. Those, Shepard...are rachni. Our old enemy, resurrected from the dead. Each one would tear apart a squad of humans. They spit acid, bleed corrosives, and their carapace will bounce most of your tiny weapons."

Shepard cursed quietly, tapping her comm-link. "General von Grath, respond."

Only static answered her. She tapped a different code. "Cole, respond."

The voice of the master chief was weak, and gunfire could be heard in the background. " – can't make – intruders – chaos in the streets"

The signal terminated, leaving Shepard staring at her omnitool. Parker cursed and tried his own.
"Parker to NDC HQ, come in."

More static erupted, then a weak transmission. "Parker-kun, this is Matsuo. Port Hanshan is under attack. There are things pouring down the mountainside from Peak 15 headed to the capital, and there are geth and crazy asari everywhere. They got to the GTS systems somehow and opened fire on our own ships, and the Systems Alliance types are being attacked by geth ships that were hidden in the asteroids!"

Matsuo's voice crackled to static for a moment before continuing " – so that's all we know. Follow Shepard's orders for now. We'll send what help we can."

Parker nodded, and turned to Shepard. "What now?"

Shepard grimaced. Going back the way they came would take too long, and there wasn't much she could do. Cole would have to hold his own, or else Saren might escape in the confusion. And she trusted Admiral Chu could see off any geth in orbit. He'd have to figure out how to deal with the rachni headed towards the city. "We head on in."

Wrex stiffened. "Shepard. The Rachni that they had in this cave are moving, heading through a door on the far wall...into the complex. If they're in there, we're seriously outnumbered."

Shepard gritted her teeth. "We'll just have to find Saren fast, then, won't we? Everyone get ready."

Shepard opened the security door, and moved through it, into wide, open area that was clearly a security room. Two barricades stood in the middle of the room, with geth standing there, and as she entered one geth touched a control, and turrets popped up out of the ceiling, floor, and walls.

The geth leveled their weapons as everything opened fire at once. Shepard barely had time to pull Liara with her as she threw herself out of the line of fire before streams of plasma darts tore through the air. They missed Tali by inches, searing her reik, and slammed directly into two of Parker's men, tearing through shield and armor with ease. Shepard tucked Liara behind her and peeked around the corner, even as a heavy booming sound could be heard.

Looming above the geth gunners and the turrets, the bowed, silvery form of a geth colossus stood, eye gleaming with plasma as it began to charge it's weapons.

---

Chapter 100: Chapter 91 : Noveria, Chaos

---

A/N: This is the 100th chapter of OsaBC. I'd like to thank all my readers again – your encouragement and reviews are a big part of why I write this, and your feedback is important. When I started this story, I had planned for only modest changes to canon, to fix a few plot holes. What it has evolved into over time is something that is, I hope, worth the time to read. That I've managed to get this far - and that people still like it - is amazing to me. Again, thank you :D

I'm aware that the method Benezia plans on using is not that different from the method employed by Richard Williams. There's a reason for that, partially because I'm a hack, and partially because it is logical and works.

I'm also aware that reversing the polarity, so to speak, of who dies where is one of the things that no one ever seems to mess with. It's perhaps the most sacred of cows : the Big Bad is Saren.

Ridiculous. Benezia has the money. Benezia has the biotic power. Benezia has the mental fortitude to resist utter domination. Benezia has cultists in her movement. Benezia could smear Saren all over the floor, just by what canon says about matriarchs. But Bioware has a thing against strong females, so it never came to be. Benezia's character got more exploration in ME 2 and ME 3 than in ME 1, which is a shame.

The payout of Peak 15 was interesting in canon, but the whole thing was so confusing that I ended up with more questions than answers. I tried – honestly – to rework it in a way where it made sense, but I couldn't. Thus, we have the Siege of Port Hanshan instead.

Bonus points if you can recognize the second latin phrase von Grath shouts out.

It was only with the greatest of will I avoided a Robocop shout out of "There's trouble in this Tower!"

---

"All forces, this is Admiral Chu. Assume Ocean Fist tactical stance. Helm, bring us around to course zero nine zero, tac zero. Battle stations." The blare of the ship's alarms competed with the babble of target designation calls and running feet as Admiral Chu barked orders. The lighting on the cruiser's bridge went from white-blue to the red of battle-stations, haptic screens shifting from bright to darker orange.

The plot was filled with hostile contact designators, breaking free of the asteroid field that separated the outer system from the inner planets. The geth ships had been cleverly hidden in a thicket of iron-bearing asteroids overlapped by the magnetic field of the system's gas giant, obscuring their signatures from the cursory fly-by the fighters had performed. Now they were advancing on his force, fifteen cruisers and a few dozen of the lighter geth frigates that had deviled Alliance forces in several other actions.

That, by itself, would not have been a problem. The more serious issue was that the Noverian defense network had been hacked, and it was now engaging both the Noverian fleet and his own ships. The Noverians had already lost three cruisers, and six of his own had taken hits from sprays of missiles from the automated base on the moon.

"Orders to the Wrath: suppressive fire on that lunar missile base, full bombardment!"

The comm tech nodded, keying the orders, even as more alarms blared and the tactical officer called out. "Additional contacts, bearing one five seven tac one three zero, above the ecliptic plane. Initial target designation is geth heavy cruisers, designating contact Sierra Tango three, in ATF Tracker beta through gamma. Fire control is plotting firing solutions now, Admiral. Estimates are nine ships, moving to flank."

Chu exhaled. "Bring the fleet around, comms. I'm not going to let these mechanical bastards flank us. All ships, fire for effect, come to course one one zero."

The Alliance cruisers slung themselves ahead, frigates breaking off to the side, spreading in an inverted V shape from the wake of the Manswell's Wrath. The dreadnaught turned ponderously, lights over its surface dimming for a moment as its main gun erupted several times, kilogram mass slugs lancing out to slam into the small moon over Noveria. There was a flash of light and a blare of alarms. "Direct hit on the missile base, sir, severe damage. Missiles have stopped firing."

Chu nodded. "Very good, Tactical. Detail the fighters from the Da Vinci to mop up the orbital satellites. Range to the geth line?"

The tactical officer, a slight and stooped man with a receding hairline, squinted at his plot. "Eighty light-seconds, sir. Initial missile launch is away. Incoming missiles detected, GARDIAN array is prepared."

Chu sat back in his command chair, eyes narrowed. He hadn't commanded a space battle in over fifteen years, but he wasn't going to let that lunatic of a Commissariat captain in charge of the Wrath take command. "Signal the Wrath and the Commissariat cruisers to deal with the heavies, we'll take the lighter cruisers. Inform the Noverians we'll handle this and to focus on dealing with their damned defense network."

The admiral fixed his eyes on the plot, as blue and white icons began tangling with red, and dots streaked in jerky patterns, indicating missile and torpedo salvos. Chu really hoped the Noverians got control of their defenses soon, because if the GTS missiles on the ground opened up they were going to get cut to pieces.

"Signal from General von Grath sir, along with telemetry from the ground."

Chu swiveled in his chair. "Inform him I'm rather occupied at the moment, Comms."

The comm tech swallowed "He says it's critical, sir."

Chu snarled, rising from his chair. "Shunt it to my screen, comms." He stooped over his tactical console, even as he steadied himself against the railing as the ship lurched in an evasive maneuver. He heard the faint thud of missile impacts against his cruiser's shields and winced.

The image of von Grath lit his view-screen, flashing red damage control lights casting his features in a surreal, strobe-like glow. "Admiral, I'm going to need fighter support to get my ships down to Noveria's docks. There's trouble down there."

Chu hissed. "There's trouble up here, General. We're facing a nearly equal number of geth ships and out of control space defense networks! I can't split my force now."

General von Grath shook his head, splitting the video feed. "There is a horde of things coming down from the mountains, Admiral. My science officer says they are rachni. They're going to hit the city in less than forty minutes. There are already asari cultists and geth in Port Hanshan, and they're fighting their way towards the GTS control stations. If they take those your ships are going to have to break orbit or be shot out of the sky!"

Chu watched the grainy image from a satellite, showing a series of mountain peaks overhanging the dark blur that was Port Hanshan. A tide of scuttling pale creatures surged forward, racing down the mountainside with incredible speed. "How can they survive in the cold and atmosphere?"

Von Grath's voice was thin. "They're rachni, sir. They can survive deep space, from the old reports we have. And there's no way the for-shit Noverian military can repel them, they can barely handle the geth. The weather is too bad for my ships to land or my DACT to hot drop, so I need your permission to take the docks, damn what that ponce of a salarian who runs the place says."

Chu closed his eyes. In the background, he heard the chatter of the combat pit, the reports of damage to his ships, the dreadnaught engaging the geth heavies and blowing one apart. More impacts rattled his vessel, a tac tech muttering at the destruction of an AIS cruiser.

"Very well, General. I'll detail off the Da Vinci to cover your cruisers and landing ships as they land, and let's hope you don't lose too many to the NDC defenses. You'll have to deal with Anolais and his reactions yourself."

Von Grath snorted. "Nothing a shotgun blast to the face can't handle. I'll send my cruisers back up to the fight once we've disembarked. Von Grath out."

The link died, and Chu turned his attention back to the battle space once more. "Tactical, new deployment for the Da Vinci and her escort, Sunset Spear. All other units, close range on the geth and go to rapid-fire missile launch. I want them blanketed in so much ECCM they can't interfere with our troop drop." He paused. "Detail off a frigate with a comm buoy to the Citadel ships at the Ralx relay, let them know company might be on it's way, and to be ready."

Chu fervently hoped that his ships were up to a real fight, given they weren't regular Navy. The AIS hadn't fought in space since the First Contact War, and the Commissariat ships, while heavily armed, were still not professional naval people. This could end very badly.

O-OSaBC-O

Administrative Director Anolais watched the scenes of destruction from his office, atop the highest floor in the Noveria Tower. Fires and explosions raced through the city, and the ugly blob coming down the mountainside grew closer second by second. The agonized screams of his populace could be heard even at this height, the smoke trailing from several large office buildings letting him know that thousands were probably already dead.

His emergency response teams were in full swing, but they were overwhelmed, and the approaching things rushing at the city from the mountains had thrown the rest of the Board into a telemetry had identified them as rachni.

Part of him found the concept of resurrecting a dead species fascinating. It was an act of hubris that touched both the warrior and the scientist in him and made him briefly wonder how they'd managed to accomplish it. The rest of him was considering the end of his ambitions was at hand, the personal failure of the goals that would have propelled him to the very heights of salarian society in a few more short years.

The fact that he was very likely to die in the next hour, next to that, was of little moment. The rest of the Board, cowards all, had already fled, either to the docks and waiting starships or to fortified holdouts in the lower city. Neither was a good choice, in his opinion – the space battle was not going well, and the city was overrun.

He sighed, directing his gaze to the far wall, where a haptic screen was a riot of conflicting reports and broken comms. The screen, flanked by a pair of expensive, obscure and strange turian representations of the spirits, could only tell him that Port Hanshan was, at the moment, a chaotic mess. The incoming information was not reassuring.

Screaming demands for information from investors. Panicked reports from the defense stations. Corrupted data spills from the geth hackers tearing his systems apart. The space defense net had gone wild, blowing his own very expensive ships out of the sky, including one that had one of his relatives aboard. Panicked crowds of civilians had been attacked by asari in white robes, screaming about the end of days, being born apart by biotic assaults that had been beyond the ability of the NDC defense force to stop.

Anolais was out of anger, watching it all tumble down around him. He barely reacted as his door opened, and the bloodied form of Major Matsuo entered. "An...Anolais ue-sama. . . we have stopped the assault on the Tower, but only nine detachments of the NDC Guard remain. We have lost over three hundred of our people, and over a thousand civilians. The asari biotics are . . . too powerful, and our automated defenses are being turned against us. The geth are hacking our mechs and JOTUNS faster than we can perform countermeasures."

Anolais merely nodded. "Contact the Alliance ships. Inform them that they may land troops at the docks, assuming they aren't already on the way. Move your forces to defend the central business area, and slag the ground defense control center before it falls into enemy hands. Shift ground defense control tasking to the Tower."

He turned, walking to a section of the wall paneling near the corner, and touched his hand to a shallow brass plate there, letting the wall slide open and down, revealing a small armory. He withdrew a long salarian rifle, checking its load and then setting it aside as she stood there.

He turned to face her. "You have your orders, Major." He withdrew a belt of grenades, clucking as he noted he didn't have any high explosive variants.

Inexcusable lapse. I have gone soft.

She swallowed. "I .. I have begun to evacuate the Tower. We cannot hold it. You must flee."

He snorted. "I will do no such thing. I am the founder of the greatest commercial concern in the known galaxy, in control of over three hundred billion credits. I am not about to allow geth, asari, rachni or anyone else to gain control of Central Processing, the damage they could do to the economy is staggering. Nor can I allow the Tower to fall into enemy hands. They could detonate the power stations and deactivate the protective environmental fields." He pulled out a set of armor, draping the suit over his arm, and turned away to walk back to his desk. He touched a control on it. "Vesias?"

A salarian voice answered him, calm and cool. "Yes, Bel?"

Anolais gave a thin smile. Very few living beings could call him by his first name. "Gather all the former STG we have in my office. The rest of the Tower is to evacuate with Major Matsuo's soldiers. We'll hold here."

The voice said nothing for a second, then coughed. "Very well, old friend. Do we get a nice speech like Kirrahe used to give?"

The smile widened. "No. Move. Anolais out." He glanced up at Matsuo. "You should go, Major. Protect the investors and the civilians, and await relief from the Alliance forces."

She grimaced. "My duty is to you, Anolais ue-sama."

He set his omni-tool down, preparing to put on his armor. He paused before speaking. In his own way, he realized, he was touched by her devotion. A curious feeling.

He shook it off. "Your loyalty and dedication is appreciated, Makeo. But I am not your ... what is the term? Daimyo. You have a duty to protect the interests of the NDC as well. Not to mention the civilians."

Reluctantly, she gave a deep bow. "Yes, Anolais ue-sama. It has been the greatest honor to serve." With that she turned and left the office, limping slightly.

Anolais sighed. "Humans. Romantics, the lot of them." He pulled off his expensive suit jacket, draping it over his chair, and with another small smile, began putting on his armor. "Then again, there is something to be said for nostalgia. I almost look forward to the battle."

The tower shook again.

O-OSaBC-O

Shepard's eyes widened at the growing glow around the huge war machine's eye. If it fired, the blast would cook everyone in the corridor alive, shields or no. She screamed out "BARRIER!" even as she threw her entire strength into creating one.

Liara, Telanya, Wrex, Alenko and two of Parker's people immediately responded, each layering their strongest barrier field behind hers, even as the Colossus fired. The heavy bolt of energy lashed against the barrier fields, shattering several of them. Shepard and Telanya staggered back from the backlash, and Wrex sank to one knee groaning. Both of Parker's biotics shuddered, blood running from their noses, and Alenko moaned and sank to the floor.

Liara gritted her teeth as biotic energy fought against blazing plasma, curling wisps of power swirling around her form as she concentrated. With a yell, she made a spreading gesture with her arms, flinging them wide.

The raging plasma fire on the other side of her barrier was hurled backwards, right into the geth forces and turrets. There was a series of sharp explosions, and even as Liara sank to both knees in exhaustion, Parker grimaced. "Fire, fire everything!" He triggered his heavy machine gun, lashing out with streams of automatic fire, and his people reacted.

Tali and Ashley glanced at each other and opened up as well, Ash with her Avenger, Tali with a spread of tech grenades. Garrus contributed with an info-war burst from his omni, triggering an overload cascade of electrical energy in the space beyond the door.

Smoke and heat pulsed from the broken doorway, as Shepard swayed on her feet drunkenly before lifting her ODIN, peering through the smoke. "Stay...in cover. Don't know if that thing is down or not..."

Almost thirty seconds passed with no further fire from the room, and Shepard cautiously motioned to Tali to send a drone head. The small glowing orb darted into the room, vanishing into the smoke, emitting pulses of light as it did so. Tali frowned at her omni. "...I think it's clear, Commander. I'm not detecting any movement, and there's a high energy plasma fire inside."

Shepard nodded, walking over to help Liara back to her feet. The asari was trembling, her features drawn and pale. "I...Goddess, I almost did not have the strength. Without the rest of you..."

Shepard smiled. "You got that backwards, Liara. Our barriers all broke, yours didn't." She smirked. "At least you didn't do your biotic pile-driver on this one. Although that would have been so kickass..."

Liara covered her amusement with a cough, going off to check on Wrex, and Shepard glanced over her shoulder. "Alenko, Telanya, you okay?"

Telanya blinked and nodded weakly. "Tired, but I am unhurt."

Alenko winced and got back to his feet. "Head hurts, and my vision is a bit blurry. I think I'm okay, but my amp shut down due to field strength loss. I'll need a few minutes to bring it back online."

Shepard nodded, and turned to Wrex, who was slowly getting to his feet with Liara's assistance. "You okay, big guy?"

He grunted, and slid his shotgun onto his back, pulling out a missile launcher instead. "Next time, let's just shoot the damned thing. My head feels like a varren is gnawing on it."

Shepard smiled, turning to face Lieutenant Parker. "Good thinking with the firepower, Lieutenant. How are your people?"

He sighed. "Phillips is dead. Marks is torn up so bad he can't be moved, and both of my biotics blew their amps, they need time to recover. Other than that...nominal." He grimaced. "We don't have the equipment to fight siege walkers, Commander."

Shepard snorted. "And my people do? Hopefully that's the only one we'll see."

Parker shrugged. "I'm leaving one of my people here with Marks, and sending both my biotics back to the Binary Helix facility. They have a security force of at least a few dozen, and I need them to secure this entry point. The rest of us will follow you, per Major Matsuo's orders." He didn't look happy about it, and Shepard nodded.

"Very well. Keep your people back as fire support, my team's armor is much better." She wasn't wild about putting her team in danger, but the heavy weapons Parker's team carried would provide much needed fire support, and putting the man's less well trained soldiers on point would just get them killed. Parker looked relieved, and went over to his people to dispatch orders. Shepard grimaced, and glanced back through the security door. The room beyond was finally clearing of smoke, showing the shattered and half-melted heap of the Colossus toppled over to the ground. The backlash had evidently detonated the ammo in the turrets all over the room, sending explosions and shrapnel everywhere. The two geth they'd seen were on the floor, along with several more also destroyed by the blast. The walls were buckled here and there, and the far side of the room was blackened.

Another security door had been blown off it's hinges, showing another narrow metal corridor curving gently to the right in the distance.

Shepard waited until Parker got his team in order, then gestured with her ODIN. "Tali, drones up. Alenko, follow my team in. Keep frosty, people. If this is the appetizer, I can't imagine what the main course is gonna be."

Garrus muttered. "You never take us any place nice, Commander. Creepy-fringe mines, abandoned colonies full of plant zombies, crazy terrorist bases. It's getting real old."

She smirked and stepped into the room beyond. "We'll go someplace nice after we shoot Saren in his pointy face. Promise."

O-OSaBC-O

"Another transport down, sir. The fighters are doing their best, but the defense sats are nasty."

General von Grath nodded, standing in the landing bay of his command lander. The bulky figures of his DACT team stood around, checking their weapons one last time, while his attendant checked the connection cyberlinks of his pilot-suit. "Very well, Ops. Alert the Admiral we are touching down hot at the docks."

He smiled as his attendant, an attractive younger woman with blazing red hair, finished her final check of his suit, and he stepped up into the stirrups of his battlesuit. Settling back into it's seat, he couldn't suppress a grin as the front of the suit sealed around him with a series of locking thuds, HUD's popping up in his vision as cyberlinks from the suit connected to those on his pilot-suit.

Heavy metallic legs groaned ponderously as he brought the battlesuit online, heavy slabs of armor sliding down over the knees, the arms, and shielding the back. He stretched experimentally, the suit mimicking his moves, and brought the weapons systems online.

With his hand, he tapped his unit-wide comm-band link. "Marines of the Fifth! We came here to stop a great threat to our society, our people, to the galaxy itself. The vicious nature of our foe has been revealed before, in his callous murder of our glorious colonies, in the cruel murder of innocent traders in deep space."

He began walking his suit towards the docking doors, still speaking, his booming baritone audible in every ear. "And now this walking excrement dares bring back the rachni, a menace that required the entire galaxy to unite in order to stop their last assault."

Von Grath smiled. "He thinks that oversized bugs will somehow stop us, or frighten us. That geth and asari witches will awe or terrify us. But we are Marines, ladies and gentlemen. Fucking up bugs is our business!"

He heard the roar of approval from his men, his DACT, his armor units. "Let's show this cretin what happens when you dare mess with the Corps."

He swayed slightly as the ship slammed into the docks, the jump doors cracking open and falling down to form ramps across the dock's edge. "Master-at-arms, sound the charge. Semper Fidelis, and Repensum Est Canicula!"

The marines roared, a recorded bugle sounded, and von Grath lead them out in his armored, twelve foot tall THERMOPYLAE battlesuit, the minigun in his hands spinning up to combat motion as he ducked under the dock edge and kicked in a security door. "Squad leaders, your orders are clear. Kill hostiles, secure the civilians, and keep them from bypassing us to the civilian areas!"

In the distance, the underground city was lit with fires and explosions, the screams of civilians tearing through the darkness. A pair of asari in white robes bounded out of cover, hands coated in blue light, throwing blasts of biotic energy at him.

With a sneer he raised his right arm, the omnishield leaping into existence over it, catching both blasts and dissipating them harmlessly. The minigun rifle in his left hand erupted, spitting out 4cm projectiles at two hundred rounds a minute, sawing both alien women in half with a splash of purple blood before cutting a deep line into a nearby building.

"Squad eleven and five, left. Squad nineteen and six, right. Squads one through four take the center streets, seven through ten get to elevation. DACT, on me. We're headed to the Tower, first, and then the edge of the city."

DACT units triggered their jump packs, leaping ahead, breaking up asari ambushes and packs of geth. Their heavy weapons tore through their enemies, flamethrowers turning Triune cultists into burning, screaming torches, heavy flechette sprayers reducing geth to broken and fractured bits doused in white fluids.

Marines stormed into the city, firing for effect, covering their advance with grenades and short bursts. They managed to get to a pack of NDC soldiers pinned by geth, blowing a hole in the geth ranks and driving them back.

Other marines inserted themselves into the shaky defenses of the NDC troopers protecting the city center, humans slamming into cover next to turians, asari, and salarians. They added to the weight of fire, slowing the geth and Triune advance to a crawl, as more DACT leapt overhead and came down in the midst of the enemy lines.

Von Grath put down an already heavily damaged geth Prime with a long blast of minigun fire, kicking the broken machine from his path with contempt. "I've fought indigestion more dangerous than these mechanical freaks. Captain Taylor, status."

The deep voice of the captain responded. "So far, so good, General. These asari pack a mean punch, but they don't have any protection against flamethrowers or gas grenades. We're punching through their main line, holding around the center areas of the city. The mercs here say the big boss up in the Tower told 'em to slag the GTS controls so they couldn't be captured."

General von Grath nodded. "Wise move. Do we have comms with Director Anolais yet?"

Taylor's voice came back muted. "Not yet, sir. According to the CO of the mercs, he and some of his former STG buddies are camped out inside, something about the control center of the city being there. They've got to be under heavy assault, if we're going that way we should hustle."

Von Grath nodded, tapping another comm-link as he put a string of rounds through several more geth, bisecting them. "Colonel Carnet, move your force and the Commissars towards the Tower. If you can, punch through and reinforce the defenders there."

The voice of the Commissar was a mechanical rasp. "Understood, General. We've ... captured ... several asari. Do you object to us putting them to the Question?"

Von Grath grimaced. "Hell no, but is this really the time to do it?"

The Commissar gave a wheeze. "There is no better time to get intelligence regarding Saren and Benezia. It is possible Commander Shepard is headed into a trap."

The general's grimace deepened. "I have considered that. First, we have to deal with the mess here in the city. Question them later, secure the Tower for now."

He clicked off, then staggered as several blasts of high energy hit his battlesuit. He rotated, his targeting systems illuminating the trio of asari in white robes with black trim that had struck at him. Missiles from his shoulder unit bloomed and flashed upwards, detonating with the blue-white flames of white phosphorus, and he grinned. "I am your doom, witches. Burn and die!"

He stomped ahead, weapons ready. "Bring me a challenge, marines! Hurl the enemy back into the ice and let us get to killing bugs!"

O-OSaBC-O

Shepard's teams advanced slowly into the facility, weapons at the ready. The corridor ended in another security door, and they broke through it, coming into a wide, open area nearly two stories tall.

The room was vast, and a heavy lift dominated one corner of the area. Low-slung one story buildings jutted from the walls, each one topped with storage crates or heavy, unfamiliar machinery. As her unit spread out, there was a roar from one of the buildings, and three krogan in black armor trimmed in glowing red tubing burst out, leveling their weapons.

Garrus was the first to react, a single shot blasting through a krogan eye, sending the hulking figure crashing to the ground as the explosive round took off a quarter of its thick skull. Tali, Wrex, and Liara all opened fire at once, a storm of rounds slamming into the second krogan, which only drew another barely coherent battle-cry and a charge.

It stopped a moment later, as Ashley put two rounds into its face, the back of its head blowing out in a spray of blood, spattering its last companion. Shepard flung a grenade at it, the flat disk landing at its feet, detonating before the krogan could react, sending the alien stumbling back. Parker's people opened fire, heavy machine guns tearing hunks of armor and flesh from the krogan.

Even as that happened, though, geth came from another building, and asari from a third. Shepard ducked behind a nearby crate, as her squad scattered for cover and opened fire.

The geth sprayed wildly with their rifles, plasma darts skittering overhead. One managed to catch Garrus in the leg, and he fell heavily. Another burst ripped its way up Wrex's side, drawing a roar from the krogan, and a lash of biotic energy that smashed the geth in question against the wall hard enough to detach its limbs.

The asari were nearly naked, dressed in thin, short white shifts trimmed in blue, each one holding a slender pistol and glowing with biotic energy. Shepard emptied her ODIN at one, the blasts ricocheting off the asari's barrier harmlessly. Several of Parker's gunners trained their weapons on the lead asari, streams of tracers cutting into her defenses until they shattered. She came apart in bloody chunks from the impact of four machine guns, her last expression almost relieved.

Tali's drones were firing back at the geth, as were Liara's gun drones, the glowing orbs sparking as they absorbed hits. Liara hurled a spear of biotic energy at one of the charging asari, catching her in mid leap and throwing her backwards with incredible force. She hit the ground hard, screaming as her arm bend at an unnatural angle, and Liara lifted her pistol and fired twice. The first heavy round blew a hole in the asari's chest, the second took off the top of her head. Liara looked faintly sick, and Shepard felt her revulsion at having to kill her own kind.

Telanya was dragging Garrus out of the line of fire, anger on her face, firing her Spear of Athame rifle one handed. Plasma bolts lashed across a geth, sending it to the ground, but two more opened fire on her. She was hit several times, grimacing as the rounds blasted through her barrier, but kept moving, pulling Garrus by the armored collar.

Shepard dropped her ODIN and pulled out her sniper rifle, sighting in. Her first shot took down a geth perched atop one of the buildings, blasting it's head apart. She swung the rifle to the right, gritting her teeth as plasma darts dug into her armor from one side. She heard Tali shouting and firing, but concentrated on her shot, taking down the other sniper.

The roar of machine-gun fire rose to a crescendo as Parker's unit stepped forward, sweeping their fire in long scything sprays. More geth fell, and another asari that had come from one of the buildings was transfixed and blasted back to the ground, blood gushing from her mouth as she clutched her vicious wounds before slumping.

There was a final shotgun blast from the wounded Wrex, and then the gunfire stopped. Shepard coughed, checking her side, feeling the armor applying omni-gel to a shallow wound.

She glanced over her team. Garrus was leaning up against the wall, wincing as his hand pulled away from a wound in his side, more burned punctures dotting his right leg, trickles of blue blood seeping from each hole. Telanya had been shot several times, blood dripping from her armor, as she applied omni-gel to Garrus.

Wrex was on his feet, his armor scorched by plasma darts, grunting as he examined a downed geth before stomping on it's head. Tali was unhurt, but shaking, her chest heaving. Alenko was next to Ash, who'd taken a few rounds but seemed alright.

Liara came over to Shepard. "Those...those were my mother's followers. Triune Unity...they look drugged or .. altered."

Shepard winced, standing. "Great. If the whole place is full of freaky asari and pissed off krogan, we'll be half dead by the time we make it to Saren." She exhaled. "Get everyone patched up, while we take a look around."

Liara nodded, as Shepard turned to examine the lift. It was clearly code-locked, displaying a red status light, and her Spectre hack programs did nothing to it. She motioned Tali over, and the little quarian hustled up, still breathing heavy.

Shepard examined her. "You okay?"

She shrugged. "Yes? I don't know, this is ... a lot. I-I have never been in such h-heavy combat before..."

Shepard placed a hand on Tali's shoulder. "You're doing a kickass job. Now. I need this lift hacked, and you're our tech expert.."

Tali nodded firmly, and triggered her omni, working for some time before cutting it off with a hiss of disgust. "It's manually interlocked. There should be a release somewhere on this level, in a security station or something."

Shepard nodded sourly. "We'll have to look for it, then. Stay in your teams and let's get moving."

It took five minutes for Garrus to get back on his feet, but they began poking around. The buildings on the right were all barracks or rest areas, fitted with comfortable bedding – sling racks for turians, pallets for krogan, beds for asari. There was a curious lack of any sort of amenities – no haptic entertainment screens, no books, nothing but bare racks of weapons and a small ceramic black pyramid with several cushions around it.

Something about the thing set Shepard's nerves on edge, and she avoided it. Beyond the barracks, there was a geth area, some kind of monitoring station for the front entry. Geth charging stations of strange materials were meshed with the walls, while green-tinted displays showed activity.

Shepard's comm blinked. "Shepard here."

Alenko's voice sounded worried. "Ma'am, we've...found something. You better come see."

Shepard turned to leave, Liara following, and walked across the wide floor to where Alenko's team was gathered, a long low building set against the back wall. Alenko was outside, a strained look on his face. "We found the security station and unlocked the lift, but it will only go to the next level. But ... inside, we found...well.."

He led her inside the room, which was low slung and taken up on one wall by racks upon racks of weapons. Mostly turian rifles and lance cannons, but also plasma flamethrowers and several missile launchers. "Alenko, have the squad take some of the heavy stuff with us. If we run into another fucking Colossus I want something heavier than a shotgun."

She turned, and walked to the forcefield partition that covered the other half of the room. In a long storage area beyond, she saw what had rattled Alenko.

In long metallic racks stacked at least fifty feet high were hundreds of geth bodies, each one folded up and in some kind of stasis. On the ground at the base of the racks were heavy pallets of black steel, each one imprinted with bio-hazard and radioactivity symbols. Each one was labeled identically.

"POLONIUM ENRICHED DEVICES: RESTRICTED USE"

Shepard shuddered. There were at least twenty dirty nuclear bombs in this one room, and hundreds of geth platforms. And that was one of six identical bays. "The fuck was Saren planning here, I wonder?"

Alenko had an ugly expression on his face. "I don't know, ma'am. But that many geth makes me nervous."

Shepard nodded, looking on as Wrex lifted a lance cannon approvingly, hefting it over his shoulder with one massive hand. She glanced around the armory, finally fixing her eyes on a rotary assault cannon, which she lifted with a grunt of exertion. "Arm up and move out, Alenko. We can't do much about this right now, and the quicker we get fuck away from all these bombs the better."

Alenko nodded, and Shepard exhaled, walking out of the armory and applying her biotics to lighten the weight of the gun she carried. Liara walked up, carrying her ODIN shotgun, and carefully clipped it to Shepard's lower back. "You dropped it."

She smiled. "Thanks, Liara." She glanced over the asari, and set the barrel of the weapon on the floor, so she could touch her shoulder. "You looked a bit shaken back there, are you okay?"

Liara turned away, a sad expression on her own features. "I am not yet used to killing my own kind, yet, Sara. I hope I never become accustomed to such, either."

Shepard could only nod at that.

O-OSaBC-O

Benezia stood before the suit of Paladin armor, taking in its pale yellow and silver colors one last time. She patted it affectionately. "Farewell, old friend. You go with glory into the annals of T'Soni history, for a greater purpose than you can ever understand."

The limited VI aboard made a sound, delicate chimes. A moment later it spoke. "This system is prepared for battle."

Benezia nodded, turning to the figure of the commando standing next to her. "This is your last fight, loyal Serea. You are the only one related to me by blood, the only one who can make this sacrifice work. I trust you to see it through, even though it shall cost you your life."

The asari warrior bowed her head. Her eyes were faintly glassy, showing the first stage of indoctrination, but she was still mostly herself, and there was a tremor of both fear and determination in her voice. "I shall not fail you, Matriarch. For the House."

Benezia smiled gently. "For the House, indeed. Do not let leave the suit, and ensure that you trigger the destruct system when you can no longer fight."

Serea nodded, and began the process of synching herself to the battlesuit. Benezia turned away, walking to where Saren stood, checking his weapons. "It is done. When the time comes, your pilot will send the Talon's Justice out on autopilot, launching as much ECCM and ECM as he can with drones, while deliberately attracting attention. In the confusion and sensor jamming, my own small ship will take off, staying as close to the ground as possible, and land in the valley on the far side of the mountains. Assuming we can keep it in the air that long. We can shut down the non-essential systems and wait until the Alliance fleet leaves, then slip out in a few days."

She turned back to the battlesuit. "As for the Talon's justice, the defense sats will not engage it, but the course it will take will bring it in range of Port Hanshan's GARDIAN towers, which will bring it down. If the flight path is correct, it should land just outside the city."

Saren nodded. "And you are sure the suit will survive the crash?"

Benezia shrugged. "Either way it does not matter. If it doesn't, the wreckage will at least remain mostly whole. Serea is a close cousin of the thirdborne branch, close enough that casual DNA analysis will show that she is of T'Soni blood. It will be days, maybe weeks before they obtain medical data on me to determine I am not truly dead."

She sighed. "By that time, if the plan works, I'll be safely away from the system." She paused. "There is no reason for you to sacrifice yourself here, Saren. They have yet to locate Virmire, or any of our other bases. We can simply move -"

He shook his head. "Virmire is too important, and there is too much happening there to move now. With me dead and you apparently dead, they will stop their chase, let their guard down, and give the plan a chance to work. With only you dead they would redouble the chase for me." He gave a flicker of a mandible. "Besides, Nazara has spoken and agrees with my plan. I am .. of no use to him."

The conversation she had endured through the pyramid artifact that Nazara used to communicate with had left her with an even stronger headache, and a sense of despair. The Reaper was not about to risk its existence to rescue them, even if it meant a setback to its plans. When it learned of Saren's plan to fool the Alliance and the Council with his death and Benezia's seeming demise, it had commanded them both to implement it, and for her to return to Virmire with the location of the Mu Relay.

Breaking the will of the true queen had taken up most of her time, the beast finally submitting only a few minutes ago. Benezia was tired, and in no real shape for a fight after such exertion. She still did not want to leave Saren behind to die alone, but their bond was slowly, fitfully failing, as whatever the cyberware that had been sunk into Saren continued to alter and shift him.

It was like having him die slowly, and it was driving her mad. Anger and shame pulsed through her body as she drew him close one last time, pushing herself body and soul against him. There was a flicker of gratitude from him, as she shared her emotions and memories, letting his strength, his essence sink into her soul one last time.

With tears in her eyes she broke the meld, drawing away only reluctantly. "I..."

Saren shook his head, tracing a single talon down her jawline, the gesture so familiar that it sent shivers up her spine. "It is time, beloved. When this is all done, perhaps we will once again see each other on that beach, and forget the agony we endure for the greater good. The sun will beat down upon us, and the warm sand cushion us."

She closed her eyes at the image. "Yes." She touched his hand, exhaling shakily. "You will wait for me there, then."

He nodded. "There is no Arterius without T'Soni."

She blinked back more tears and stepped away, her body screaming at her not to do so, to cling, to hold on. Saren stood alone, as he had always stood alone. Confident. Powerful. Ever prepared to sacrifice everything for what had to be done.

Her vision dissolved as sobs shook her, and she weakly managed to turn away, wiping her eyes. Saren watched her go, feeling the agony from what was left of their bond tear at whatever remained of his soul.

A part of him screamed in fury and loss, pounding in futile anger against the barriers in his mind. The rest of him turned away, picking up his Sunfire pistol and heading to the lower level to intercept Shepard and her team and put them in their graves.

The glassy eyed figure of Serea T'Soni watched, as the battlesuit enfolded her, sealing her away from the air and light one last time. She thought the parting very sad, and then her compromised mind turned to her mission, soothing voices telling her of the need to obey.

---

Chapter 101: Chapter 92 : Noveria, Crescendo

---

*A/N: The battle continues. I found myself too weak to resist Progman's suggestion of a line to use :D
Updated to fix a few stupid typos. Thirty food tunnel, indeed*

---

"Rally! Rally to me, Marines! If we are to die, we are going to die standing, die fighting, and die marines!"

Von Grath's voice boomed from his suit's external speakers as his minigun fired almost non-stop, the barrels beginning to glow from the heat. Endless waves of chitin-plated things hurled themselves at the makeshift barricades at the entrance tunnel leading to the city proper, and his marines were giving everything they had.

It wasn't enough.

He'd heard the stories, of course, in polite discussions over brandy and cigars with other generals of the SA. Chatted about the rachni with a turian general once, even. The supposedly ultimate warriors, only stopped by endless waves of krogan invading their worlds and detonating bio-warfare bombs deep below the planet surfaces. He'd heard the stories, the old tales. Heard the fear and horror in alien voices at the power of the rachni.

But he'd never really listened, not in detail, to the threat the rachni represented. Why should he? They were dead.

Until a damned lunatic brought them back.

The insectile horrors had dashed down the icy mountainside through a storm that would have frozen even the most angry krogan solid, through winds that would have torn a human right off the mountain to a gory death. They'd ran at speeds upwards of fifty miles an hour, relentless, and right into the automatic defenses of the city border.

Automated turrets had sprayed thousands of rounds, cutting down dozens and dozens of the creatures. Their companions had trampled over them, swarming over the outer wall, tearing the turrets apart with razor-sharp claws mounted on flailing tentacles, or with hard serrated blades of bone and chitin four feet long that parted steel like cotton.

The NDC troopers at the city edge had, unsurprisingly, bolted, with the exception of a handful of krogan. Those had roared out battle cries and charged ahead.

The first surprise was when the rachni had backed off...and a single rachni had met each krogan in single combat. None of the observers knew why, but the krogan only roared louder and met them with screaming charges. The results were messy, the krogan had all died, but not before wounding or killing their opponents. The rachni had swept past them into the city outskirts, mostly landing facilities for small craft and warehouses.

The only good news was that the rachni could not simply clamber over the walls and eat them all. The force shields protecting the city from the outside environment were impermeable to the rachni. The bad news is that, for some reason von Grath would never understand, the idiots who built the city had left a thirty foot wide access tunnel through the wall leading to the area outside, and the rachni headed right for it.

At least the designers had not been completely insane – the tunnel had some defenses around it, which killed a few more of the beasts before the turrets were torn from their mountings. The tunnel also featured blast doors a good foot thick, backstopped with a kinetic barrier. The second surprise was the rachni being able to carve their way through that barricade in barely five minutes.

Von Grath had hustled his marines through the city, coming up topside into temperatures of twenty below and heavy winds broken only by the outer walls. He'd lost over a hundred of his marines in the fight against the geth and asari, and had to leave a quarter of his men behind in the city to continue that fight, alongside the dwindling ranks of the NDC guard.

There was chaos at the Tower, as asari and geth continued their assault on it. Commissariat forces had assaulted the attackers three times, and had been horribly repulsed each time. The asari were dug in, and the geth had several armature units. Von Grath couldn't detail off his DACT to that fight, he needed them against the rachni.

He'd barely gotten his troops to the city's edge in time, just as the rachni burst through the tunnel's far end. His force's initial salvo had torn down dozens of the monsters, but that was like stomping on a handful of ants after kicking over the entire mound. The rachni had shrieked and screamed, ignoring their casualties as the missile fire and heavy weapons took their toll, until finally his units had shot their bolt, and needed to reload.

And then they had hit his forces, like a tide of death and frenzy, leading to the third, and worst surprise. Most of his unit's weapons did about as much damage as spitting at them.

Avenger rifles were basically useless, their chitin-plated hides were so thick and tough that most rounds bounced off. The heavier Crossfire rifles used by the AIS troopers punched through, and the DACT's miniguns and assault cannons could splash a rachni easily, but the bulk of his marines had to rely on flame units and grenades.

Most of his men were out of grenades by now. The rachni were pushing them back. Getting in close enough for heavier load shotguns was beyond suicidal, a marine might get one shot off before he found himself ripped in half or bathed in acid spit so strong it would melt battle armor like butter.

With a screech, yet another rachni warrior reared up, scythe-like front legs slashing two marines apart, sending one tumbling to the ground in bisected halves, the other marine screaming as his guts spilled out and he collapsed on the ground. Hard spiked legs smashed into his broken body a moment later, silencing his cries.

Von Grath fired again, slugs shattering the rachni, spilling its acidic blood all over the ground to hiss feebly. His suit reported minor breaches in six locations, two critical, but he had enough omnigel to patch them.

He had burned through two ammo blocks and was on his third. After that, he had one left, and he'd be down to his flame unit, omnispear, and missiles. He cursed, putting another burst of fire across several rachni surging through the tunnel, and hit his comm-link. "Captain Taylor, where is my damned air support?"

The voice of Taylor sounded tired. "We're still dodging fire from the damned defense satellites, General, and some geth are on the ground with GTS missile launchers. They're dug in near the water facilities, and I can't get at them to shut 'em down."

Von Grath watched as a DACT was taken down by leaping rachni, two more DACT rushing up to blow the creature away, but not before it savaged the armored man on the ground. By the time they drove it off, the trooper was scattered gore and broken armor plates over a pile of .. chunks. He grimaced and spat. "Not good enough, Captain. If we don't get some suppression on these overgrown spiders they're going to break my damned lines."

Taylor started to say something, then broke off as an explosion sounded over the comm. Von Grath frowned. "Captain Taylor. Captain Taylor, respond." He triggered another comm circuit. "6th Company, respond."

There was only silence, and von Grath clenched his fist. Turning back to the battle, he keyed his divisional XO. "Major Laxar, have the marine units without heavy weapons fall back to the third barricades, and see if we've gotten any of those armored units the NDC had out of that garage yet. Have the DACT set a goddamned defensive line here and lay prox mines."

The voice of his XO answered. "At once, sir."

There was a series of explosions ahead, and von Grath looked up to see that some cunning marines had rigged up several linked belts of grenades to detonate at once, sending a huge bubble of fragmentation shrapnel across the entire length of the tunnel. Rachni were cut down like weeds by the blasts, and his DACT followed up by firing several rockets at the staggered survivors. Finally, the tunnel was cleared, if only for a few minutes.

He heard Major Laxar pass the fall back order, and he nodded in relief as wounded and exhausted marines began falling back, while some heavy weapons units and grenadiers from the rear arrived. He was about to take his DACT into the tunnel proper to form a defensive line when there was a crash of masonry as part of a building behind them collapsed.

He swung his battlesuit around, grinning as he beheld the sight of a pair of HAMRHEAD tanks from his landing ships. How the bulky vehicles had negotiated the narrow streets of Port Hanshan he didn't know, but he was glad when they swung their main guns and missile pods to face the tunnel entrance.

His comm system pinged, and he answered. "Lieutenant Varson, reporting, sir. General von Grath, Captain Jerne managed to have the MAKOs blast a hole in the port wall. Most of us were dispatched to the Tower to support Captain Taylor, but he detailed us to join the fight here. Where do you need us?"

Von Grath looked back down the tunnel, where the rachni were howling and hissing as they regrouped. "Right where you are, gentlemen. Big ugly things, five rounds rapid, if you please."

The two hover-tanks swiveled, turrets coming about in unison before their main guns barred, flashing high explosive shells down the tunnel to impact heavily on the rachni forces. More bits of chitin and splashes of acid blood pattered down in the wreckage of the tunnel entrance, and his marines cheered.

"Capital. Let's see if we can't hold off these damnable cockroaches a bit longer, eh?"

O-OSaBC-O

The Battle of Noveria (space) would go down in the Systems Alliance history books as one of the largest and most vicious space battles in the race's history. The Noverian fleet, hammered by its own missile base and orbital defense satellites, had been shattered, only a handful of frigates and the command cruiser managing to fight their way free of the close-range crossfire.

Geth frigates poured on the speed as they closed with the Commissariat and AIS ships, whose crews, while competent enough at navigation and the occasional scrap with a special forces transport or rebelling colonies, were not trained for heavy naval combat. Rather than maneuver for position, the Commissariat vessels opened fire at range and then powered up their broadside GARDIAN weapons for knife-fighting range.

The clever geth lost several frigates to the incoming fire, but they slewed to right angles to the fleet just outside of GARDIAN range, opening up with sprays of missile fire and ECM drones. The heavy Commissariat cruisers, designed more for suppression than evasion, were caught off guard.

Six of them were torn open by the attack, four more heavily damaged. The geth cruisers in the wake of the frigates broke through the line of the humans headed for the dreadnaught.

The crew of the Manswell's Wrath, however, while Commissariat, had the distinction of also all being former Navy. They swung the bow of their ship towards the heavy cruisers in the distance, while the ship disgorged its own fighter wing to deal with the incoming cruisers and frigates, and its broadside included both disruptor torpedo tubes and mass accelerators, both of which spat answering fire. The lead line of geth cruisers managed to evade the fire, but several frigates, in a running gunfight with the remaining human cruisers, could not break out of range fast enough.

The Manswell's Wrath dimmed again, its main gun firing a group of slugs through space, striking the lead heavy geth cruiser dead on almost twenty seconds later. The blast tore the cruiser apart, breaking its curved shape in half before carrying on to strike another cruiser behind it, crumpling its forward half and sending explosions racing through the silvery hull.

Aboard his own command cruiser, Admiral Chu winced at his own incompetence. The command and control suite he had aboard his ship was doing its best, but these ships had never fought or practiced together, and the Commissariat and AIS captains simply fought their ships differently.

As a result, the geth, while losing, were inflicting severe casualties on his force. He was down a total of twelve cruisers, and the Commissariat had lost eleven. The carrier had lost almost all of its fighters covering von Grath's landing on Noveria itself, and the general had lost five of his transports and over four hundred marines before they even landed. From the horrifying reports on the ground, he'd lost more than that once he hit the rachni attempting to break into the city.

His tactical officer spoke, voice tense. "We have copy from the Citadel Ninth Fleet, sir. They've detailed off two dreadnaughts and an escort of cruisers and frigates here at top speed once they got our message. ETA is .. fifty seven minutes. Salarian ships, going at top speed."

Chu grunted in irritation. Of course salarian dreadnaughts could outrun his light cruisers, the superior bastards. "Very well, Tac. Status of the fleet?"

The plot flickered, zooming in a bit. "The geth line is bowed into our own, sir. The Wrath is holding her own, but she's vulnerable."

He sighed. "Detail off the Da Vinci's escort to cover the gap, and bring us around to course zero two five tac seventy. If any ships have drones, now is the time to launch the damned things."

He watched as his own small packet of cruisers swung into the battle. Typically speaking, command and control vessels tried to remain out of the fight, especially short range GARDIAN knife fights, but things were dicey enough that he had no choice but to engage. He reached for the IMC. "All hands, stand by for point blank engagement. Proceed to don your hardsuits. Engineering, once suited, evacuate air from all engineering spaces in preparation for possible hull breach."

He clicked off, and turned from the plot, stepping down from the deck to head to the nearest suit locker. "Tactical, eye the battle while I suit up, then get suited yourself. Comms, orders to the fleet: close and engage. We're out of missiles and I will be damned if let geth stand off and blast my ships to pieces."

He grimaced, as he eyed the suit hanging in the locker. He hated these things, they always reminded him of that crazed fight on Tysor II against the turians, alongside Ahern. He sighed, and began to put it on.

O-OSaBC-O

The lift took Shepard's team down a level, stopping abruptly. It's doors slid open, revealing another huge space, this one with natural stone walls smoothed by some form of machinery.

Shepard led off, followed by her team, as Tali's drones zoomed ahead. The entire giant room was mostly dark, illuminated here and there by racks of industrial lighting. More heavy crates lined the walls, alongside more low-slung buildings, and one large, two-story building along the left edge.

The drones swirled about, sensors reporting nothing, before returning to hover over Tali. "Nothing moving, Commander, and no life signs...but there is something strange in that building in the northwest corner."

Shepard nodded. "Parker, your people stay put and cover us from the lift. Alenko, take the two southern buildings. We'll take the big one and the weird one."

Alenko, Wrex, Tali and Ashley moved off, and Shepard turned to Garrus. "You gonna make it, chicken?"

Garrus gave a weak glare, mandible flickering. Telanya had patched the wounds in his leg and side with medigel and omni-gel patches, but he was clearly in a lot of pain. "I'm still walking, sheep. I'll make it, don't you worry."

Telanya spoke softly. "I am using my biotics to lighten his weight." She had tied off her own wound, purple blood staining the medigel infused bandage on her hip. "We will endure, Commander."

Shepard glanced at Liara and then nodded, heading to the building Tali had identified as having something weird about it. The floor was plated in metal, and portions of it were scuffed and damaged from some heavy load being dragged across it. The ceiling was lost in darkness, the rough broken edges of a few stalactites visible.

Garrus and Telanya split off to explore the other building, while Liara and Shepard headed to the first building, which had a code locked door. Rather than bother with hacking it, she shot the lock off, kicking it in and barreling through, sweeping the heavy assault weapon across the space.

The room was well-lit, six huge tanks of greenish liquid mounted against the far wall, each one framed in unfamiliar medical machinery. Four of the tanks were stained with curling, dark fluids, bits of flesh that were completely unrecognizable. The fifth tank contained a horribly malformed krogan, with twisted limbs covered in what looked like bone plating, and short, spiked tentacles growing from its misshapen back. The last tank held a rachni, curled against itself, with patches of dark corruption all over its insectile body.

Vats of some kind of bubbling white fluid under heavy plastic lids dominated another wall, along with long computer banks, haptic screens a soft white and covered in asari scrawl. Liara walked over to these, as Shepard scanned the room further.

Laying out on a slab in the middle of the room was a naked asari, her form covered in ritualistic tattoos of some kind. She'd been cleanly shot in the head, the ugly wound marring her otherwise pretty features, and there were several info-pads by the body. What looked like a neural scanner was clamped to the end of the table, beeping softly, and Shepard walked up.

The first info-pad she picked up, the one by the scanner, was in asari, and it took her omnitool a few seconds to translate it.

Dawnfall 6

The third experimental trial of the Suppression failed today, with Ralere succumbing at last to the final state of indoctrination. As with all others who fall into that state, she became irrational, unstable and dangerous. Neural scans show the same lesions in the brain we all experience.

The effect, as Rana theorized, is indeed a combination of things. It is part subsonic, part nanoinfection, part some kind of energy field that operates in a dimension we can't even see. We've tried everything we can think of, but nothing seems to stop it once the baseline time has been spent in close proximity to anything Reaper related.

The safe exposure is nine hours. That is cumulative, not per exposure. Turians appear to last longer, krogan longer still, salarians crumble in only four hours. Brain complexity may have something to do with it.

As far as the clones go, that is also a fallen tide. None of series nine or ten are viable. Series eleven shows some promise, but we've already sent that data to Vir mire for full clone workup, so further testing here is inefficient. Series twelve is an abomination that I'll have the geth handle once we deal with the invaders.

The info-pad had no further data, and the rest of the info-pads had only diagrams of dissections of a brain. Shepard gathered them all up, sliding them into her storage pack on the back of her armor, before turning to Liara. "Find anything?"

Liara shook her head, carefully tapping a console control. "Nothing ... concrete. They were experimenting with krogan and rachni DNA, Sara. Trying to blend them. This console suggests there is an entire breeding pit somewhere in this cursed base." She winced. "My mother has notes here. They are unpleasant to read."

She nodded. "Copy it to an OSD. We can't dawdle."

Liara did so, and Shepard tapped her omni. "What did you guys find?"

Wrex's voice rumbled in disgust. "Another warehouse full of shut down geth bodies. More guns. Nothing heavy. Some armor, mostly asari, and rations and medical supplies."

Tali's voice chipped in. "We did find the security override panel for the lift, Shepard. We... we also found a dead krogan. He seems to ... have smashed his own head in against a wall." Her voice was filled with disgust and confusion.

Alenko's link beeped. "We found some kind of ... arena. Lots of blood on the floor, observation areas above, cells in the floor below. Like they were having pit fights in here or something. Lots of corpses, Commander – asari, turian, krogan, a couple of vorcha even. Most of them look, well, deformed."

Garrus's flanging voice spoke. "We found an assembly line in the big building. Looks like this is where those damnable hoppers come from, Commander. There's also enough equipment in here to churn out guns and armor for an army. What in the spirits was Saren planning?"

Shepard exhaled. "We found freaky fucked up clones and a dead asari. Meet up at the lift." She clicked off, and motioned to Liara, who pulled out an OSD from the computer she was working at and followed.

The lift was clear of enemies, Parker's people standing around looking a mix of bored and terrified. "You find anything?"

Shepard shrugged. "Disturbing research. Let's head down. There can't be too much more to this place."

The next level down was well lit, and the lift opened up onto a corridor, lined with the occasional door. Lights in the ceiling and vents puffing out warm air let Shepard know this was an area people actually lived in. "Get ready...this may be it."

They moved ahead in two groups, weapons ready. The side rooms were simple bunk rooms, empty of any people. The corridor ended in a pair of double doors. Shepard pushed through them.

They entered into a high-ceilinged room, a good two hundred feet wide and twice as tall. Windows were carved into the walls, some lit, some not. A huge tactical command area dominated the center of the room, surrounded by concentric circles of consoles, while a broad window in the distance showed an empty cavern space.

Doors lead to the south and north, but Shepard's attention was seized by the moving forms of asari, taking cover behind the consoles in the tactical area. "Spread out, people."

The asari huddled behind the consoles, gripping at small pistols or preparing biotics as Shepard's team moved. There was little cover near the doorway, but there was a low wall and some crates in one corner across from the door, and Shepard's group huddled there. Alenko and his team ducked behind a wide status console near the other wall, and Parker's team pressed up against the doorway itself, letting the doorjamb act as their cover.

The asari in the tactical area were not firing. "You are Shepard. You must ... not see." The asari who spoke had a glassy eyed look and an almost droning note to her voice.

Shepard frowned. "Throw down your weapons and you can get out of this alive. I'm not here for you, just Saren and Benezia."

The asari gave a ghastly smile, too wide, too serene. Her eyes widened with some shattered knowledge and she spread her arms. "Freedom...at last."

She pressed her thumb down on the grenade in her hands, and smiled even as it detonated. More asari fired into their consoles at point blank range, and a few lashed out with biotics at her team.

Shepard leveled the assault cannon and fired, along with Wrex and Parker's people. The storm of superheated flechettes from the assault cannon spewed forth in an ugly red stream, alongside the blinding beam of the lance cannon, and several explosions rocked the room.

A few more grenades went off, and Parker's people sprayed the area again before all fell silent. "Cease fire. Wrex, check for survivors."

The krogan grunted, the smoking maw of the lance cannon bobbing slowly from side to side as he advanced, Tali and Alenko following in his wake, weapons ready. "Everyone's dead, I think."

Shepard stood, scowling. "Damn it, that didn't need to happen."

Liara looked sick again, taking in the torn forms of the asari littering the floor, or blasted apart atop their own consoles. "I.. I know some of these asari, Sara. They were acolytes of my mother, some of her more trusted advisers. Some were minor members of other families. The one who spoke was a very distant relative from our Lesser House family."

Shepard approached. "...they deliberately sacrificed themselves to blow up their computers. See if anything recoverable is left."

Tali moved forward, flinching as she gingerly levered a shattered asari corpse off of a console, and giving a slight shake at the purple blood spattered all over it. She tapped hesitantly at a haptic keyboard, and sighed. "They wiped everything, Commander. I think they blew it up just to make sure we couldn't salvage anything."

Garrus found one more console in one piece, but it too was devoid of data. The big tactical plot in the middle of the room was displaying the local battle-space, but a heavy data cable leading to a small room on the right had been severed.

She grimaced. "Tali, drones up. See if there's anything else waiting for us. Everyone else...search pattern. Keep in omni-tool contact."

Shepard and Liara headed to the southern doors, along with Garrus and Telanya. Wrex and Tali headed to the northern door, while Parker lead his team to the elevator that lead to the windows cut into the high walls of the chamber.

Alenko and Williams walked slowly towards the big window cut into one wall, looking out over an empty, acid spattered cavern. Huge doors cut into the far wall stood open, letting in snow and ice. A heavy metal wall bisected the cavern, partially disassembled and revealing only blackened rock from where some kind of ships had lifted off.

Alenko paled. "God, how many rachni would this cavern have held? Hundreds? Thousands?"

Williams shrugged. "As long as we don't have to fight the damned things, I could care less." She frowned as he gave her a sharp look. "What?"

He grimaced. "If they aren't here, Ash, the only other place they could be headed to is Port Hanshan...where the Normandy is." He triggered his comm. "Commander, it looks like a lot of the rachni you saw in the upper level were not routed to inside the base, but a chamber on the south face of the mountain. I can see the outskirts of Port Hanshan from here...and the cavern is empty. It's possible a rachni force is headed to the city."

In the corridor beyond, Shepard cursed. "Understood, LT. Keep searching." She clicked off, kicking open another doorway, revealing only an empty room with a medical bed.

And a chart on the wall of a turian. She stepped closer, examining it. "Saren, you fuck."

She set her omnitool to translating, and gazed around the room. It was spartan and simple, a blanket tossed on the floor by the bed. The omni beeped and she took in the translated notes on the chart.

Severe cerebral damage. Ocular damage. Damage to anterior lungs, right arm, right knee, left shoulder. Severe infection. Biotic impact hematoma.

Cybernetic correction. Utilization of Ascension Protocol.

She blinked. "Clear as mud."

She glanced over the room looking for other clues, but found nothing. She left, opening the door across the way, and found only a black jumpsuit and an empty weapons or armor locker. She scowled, when Liara's comm channel chimed. "Sara...I have found something."

Shepard nodded, leaving the room and passing several more doors before entering another corridor, one that lead back to the tactical room. Liara was standing in a doorway to yet another room, holding something in her hands.

Shepard stepped closer, and realized it was a black headdress of some kind. The room was a bedroom, with simple furnishings. A white fountain with stylized waves and a crescent moon carved into it's basin bubbled quietly along one wall, and a small bathroom could be seen through a doorway to the south.

Liara looked up. "This...is my mother's. She was given this upon her ascension to the position of High Lunarch." Her fingers carefully rubbed the black silk and embedded silver circlet, the hammered polished crescent moon gleaming in the bright white light. "And I do not see her armor, or her sword. I fear she is prepared for us."

Shepard gently touched Liara's shoulder. "Ready or not, Liara, we're going to stop her." She watched as Liara folded away the headdress and gently placed it in her own carrypak.

Wrex's voice sounded. "Found something bad, Shepard. You'd best get here."

Shepard cursed. "On my way." She turned and headed through the door, Liara following a moment later, and walked through the tactical center. Alenko and Williams joined them and they headed through the northern door, entering into another wide, open area. Several doors opened off of it, but Shepard's omni indicated Wrex was behind the northern set and she pushed through them.

Wrex stood in the middle of another sizable room. The floor was rubberized decking, and a large maintenance table covered in tools and info-pads took up one wall. Racks of weapons hung from the ceiling, and the far end of the room was dominated by a heavy security door, buckled and misshapen.

Wrex was next to a large charging station of some kind, with an angered expression on his face. "I was checking out the other rooms with Tali. Mostly computer banks, all smashed up. We were about done when her drone reported movement in here. I came in to see some kind of big battlesuit head through those doors. I tried to get them open, but someone warped them shut. They're too thick for me to blast through alone, and I didn't want to try to open them without backup anyway."

Liara was gazing at the table and the charging station in alarm. "Wrex...this battle suit. Was it pale yellow with silver trim?"

The krogan glanced at Liara. "...yeah. How did you know?"

Liara swallowed. "That is my mother's Paladin battle-armor. A mechanized battle suit that is the height of asari technology."

Shepard frowned. "Like a THERMOPYLAE battle suit, the ones we saw on Feros used by the Exogeni mercs?"

She shook her head. "No, Shepard. More like the heavy suits worn by salarian heavy infantry, fully automated with a powerful rail cannon and a up-sized warp blade."

Shepard's eyes narrowed. Liara was comparing the thing to salarian Shieldbreaker battle armor, mechanical exoskeletal suits that allowed a single warrior to crush entire infantry detachments or battle armor units. In the close confines of this place, fighting a battlesuit would be worse than taking down a Colossus. "Damn it. Nothing for it. We'll have to take out that doorway."

She motioned everyone back, before nodding to Wrex. "Everyone fire on my mark. Mark!"

The room erupted with heavy weapons fire, the door crumpling under the impact, flying off its hinges with a hole melted through its center. The corridor beyond was large and rough hewn, steel grating sunk into the floor. Shepard and her team advanced, slowly.

Ahead, there was the sound of ship engines, and Shepard cursed. "Dammit, double time!" They ran ahead, Garrus falling back and unable to keep up, Tali's and Liara's drones flying on ahead.

Shepard came out of the tunnel first, weapon leveled, gasping as icy air hit her. There was a crude docking facility cut into the rock, and even as she watched, a turian light cruiser lifted off from the dockside, slowly moving away from the dock.

Garrus, finally emerging from the corridor, growled. "That's Saren's ship! We have to stop it!"

Shepard leveled her weapon at it, firing, but the shots pinged harmlessly off the kinetic barrier. With a pulse of energy, the ship accelerated away, arcing into the snow-riddled skies beyond.

She cursed, triggering her omnitool. "Shepard to the fleet, von Grath, anyone! Saren's ship is fleeing from Peak 13, heading south and low to the ground! I repeat, Saren's ship is escaping! Anyone respond!"

A crackle of static lashed across her omni, accompanied by a faint, sardonic voice. "Director Anolais here, Spectre. I still have local control of our GTS batteries. He will not escape."

She heaved in relief. With any luck, both Saren and Benezia would be on the ship, and get blown out of the sky. She was about to reply when a familiar voice cut into the conversation, her omni-tool shifting to red, reporting it had suffered a data intrusion.

"Ah, Shepard. I've been hoping you'd come by for a rematch. I doubt the primitive defenses of Port Hanshan can bring down my ship, given that my little invasion force has torn most of the city apart. But you and I have business to settle."

She snarled. "Saren. Seems like you got a little shot up in our last go round, fucker. You ready for round two?"

The turian's laughter was soft, mocking. "You've already lost this battle, monkey. Benezia has escaped, and soon enough ... well, you will see. I have something you should see, if you want to know why all of this is happening. Come to the lower levels, and let us see how far you are willing to go to stop me."

She grinned ferally. "I'm glad you're sticking around, asshole. I got a lot of people with me ready to wreck your shit."

There was no reply, and Shepard turned to face her team. "Let's move."

Garrus coughed. "Shepard, this has to be a trap. He could be bouncing the signal from his ship and running away right now."

She shrugged. "His ass isn't going to get past the dreadnaughts at the Ralx relay, and neither is his black ship, Garrus. If he's on the ship there's nothing we can do. We know for a fact Benezia was on it. We'll ... deal with her later. If he is here, I want him dead, mounted, and keelhailed back to the Citadel."

Garrus sighed, lifting his sniper. Ashley merely smirked. "Fuckin' A, skipper. I'm ready for it."

Shepard glanced at Liara, who was still staring out into the icy expanse beyond the docking bay.

"Liara?"

She started, then smiled weakly. "I am... fine. I just...felt a lingering sense of my mother, is all."

Shepard nodded, placing her hand on her shoulder. "Let's end this, and we can deal with her next."
Liara nodded and followed, the team moving back down the corridor.

Below them, in a shallow docking bay, the narrow shape of an asari patrol boat hovered serenely. Benezia T'Soni let go of her meditation to conceal her biotic field, her eyes snapping open. "Find peace in the embrace of the Goddess, my love."

She triggered the engines of the small craft, sending it out into the swirling storm beyond.

O-OSaBC-O

"Reform the lines! Reform the lines!"

General von Grath cursed, yet again, the sheer diabolical power that had shaped the rachni. His line had driven back several crazed assaults, each one getting closer and closer. There seemed to be no end to the pale tide of nightmare shapes, and once his HAMRHEAD tanks had run dry of missiles and HE rounds, his line had been forced back yet again, taking heavy casualties.

There'd been too many rachni to put down, and they'd finally torn through his first rank, chitinous claws carving open DACT armor like children unwrapping candy. He'd managed to hold, but only at the cost of a third of his remaining DACT units, and his men were utterly spent now.

A few dozen heavy weapons units from the shattered NDC had arrived, as well as a group of MAKO tanks and some light APC's from the Noverians, but they had only managed to stall the rachni advance, not stop it.

He was about to give orders to fall back into the city – knowing that it would be the death of hundreds of civilians if that was to happen – when a broken transmission came across his omnitool. He could barely make out Shepard's message, but he was heartened to know his crazy little soldier was still alive.

He was about to signal his comms tech to try to respond when there was a flash of gray on the horizon. He broke off, gazing up into the sky. Above, there was a single turian cruiser rising from the mountain peak where Saren was supposedly dug in at. Even as he watched, the GTS batteries – still in Noverian control – swiveled ponderously on their turreted towers high above the outer wall, and opened up, blossoms of smoke obscuring them as the missiles soared away.

The ship swerved, banking hard left and then right to avoid the first salvo, but the second pack of missiles lanced out straight and true. The ship was hit hard, most of its starboard winglike structure blown off, and thick black smoke enveloped it as it began to angle downwards, almost directly towards them.

Von Grath grinned. "All units, full auto, fire everything!" If he could keep the damnable rachni pinned in place a few seconds more...

His marines roared and opened up. Grenades, plasma bolts, missiles, hundreds of rounds lanced out. The DACT opened up with their assault cannons, firing as fast as they could, triggering mini-missile systems if they had them. The few AIS troopers with biotics also let loose, shining bolts of blue or flares of warfire smashing into the rachni trying to tear their way into the city.

With a titanic explosion of flame and shock, the turian ship crashed nearly directly into the mass of rachni. Hundreds were liquified or blasted down, more shredded by shrapnel. A few of the GTS missiles had been trailing the falling vessel and slammed into the ground, the detonations incinerating even more of the bugs.

His tired troops cheered, even as a second set of explosions rocked the hull, sending more rachni to their fiery graves. The remaining rachni, blocked by the hull of the ship, shrieked in denied menace, but were blocked by raging plasma fires pouring out of the shattered ship.

Von Grath lifted his minigun, smirking. "Well, boys, that's what I call an explosive entrance." He gave the ship a careful examination, noting the turian glyphs inscribed on one wing. His omnitool gave the rough translation of "Talon's Justice".

He queried the term in his omnitool, and smiled at the answer. He tapped his comm-link. "Major Laxar. It seems Saren tried to cut and run, but the Noverian ground defenses shot him down. Now we know why the bastard was so intent on storming their ground defense center."

The voice of his XO came across the comm-link. "Yes, sir. Orders?"

Von Grath glanced around. Many of his marines were dead and wounded, many more exhausted. There were still rachni, but the ship's wreckage denied them any easy entrance to the city, and the crash landing had crushed or killed many of them. "Set the DACT in defensive positions, get the marines back to the fight at the Tower. If you can break loose any vehicles from the garage, bring them here to the tunnel entrance."

Von Grath clicked off, motioning to his team of DACT bodyguards. "Let's check the ship out. Put down any rachni you see. Saren or Benezia may be aboard...be cautious."

His DACT team nodded, and was about to move out when a blast of warp fire blew the docking hatch off its hinges. Von Grath watched in awe as the slender, elegant shape of a Royal Paladin battle suit emerged nearly unharmed from the broken wreck of the Talon's Justice, leaping from the slanted hull to land lightly upon the ground.

Von Grath triggered his omnishield. "Marines, stay back. This foe is beyond you." He moved his battlesuit, ahead, his heart hammering in his chest.

He knew very well the power of the asari war machine in front of him, having seen one fight at the pirate raids on the asari colony of Cyone almost five years back. He'd knew he had little chance of winning against it, his THERMOPYLAE would not even withstand a single shot from the Adept rail cannon mounted on the suit's shoulder.

The battlesuit angled as he approached, lifting its heavy warp sword and igniting it in a blaze of blue. Von Grath was confused, until he saw the sparks and smoke drifting from the long shape of the rail cannon on the thing's shoulder. Its heaviest weapon was out of commission.

His face split into a fierce grin. He could win this. "At last, a real challenge." He lifted his minigun, firing a long burst at the Paladin.

It dodged to one side, moving almost like a living being, pale yellow limbs bringing it closer and closer. He took the first swing of the heavy warp blade on his omnishield, grimacing as alarms blared in his cockpit about energy damage.

Dropping the minigun rifle, he triggered the omnispear in the mech's left forearm, slashing out at his enemy. The orange energy blade scored a shallow slash against the yellow armor, gray tinted omnigel seeping like blood from the cut.

His suit staggered as he barely blocked another swing, warp energy from the sword cascading down the limbs of his own battle suit. He smelled smoke and burning plastic from somewhere, as one of his anterior energy supplies blew out.

He stepped back, triggering his speakers. "Lady Benezia, you will surrender yourself to our forces. You do not need to die here...but dead or alive, you are coming with me.

The answering voice was a whisper, cool and collected. "I am not the one who will die here, human." With a smooth lunge, the Paladin battle suit leapt forward, the glittering blue blade descending faster than he could respond.

Agony rang out across his body as the sword slammed into the armor's right arm, metal deforming and melting under the power of the blow. His omnishield flickered and died as his suit's right arm was severed, the blow high up enough on the mech to take his own right hand with it, blood sizzling as warfire ate into his flesh.

With an enraged yell his marines opened fire, the small-caliber rounds pinging harmlessly away from the suit's kinetic barriers. It distracted the pilot long enough for von Grath to grit his teeth against the pain and with his left arm, drive home his own omnispear towards the thing's knee.

Luck or fate conspired with him. The suit ducked, avoiding a poorly aimed missile, and caught the omni-spear's tip on the upper thigh rather than the knee, the blow cutting through layers of myomer and armor and sending the suit staggering back off balance. Von Grath withdrew his weapon and plunged it forward again, the weapon clanging hard against the hastily lifted warp blade that barely parried it.

Spots swam in his vision, his suit's medical sensors flashing red. Ice and deathly cold seeped into his cockpit. The agony from his missing hand traveled up his arm, and he realized distantly he was starting to go into shock. He smiled, managing to block a wide slash from the Paladin's warp sword with his spear, grimacing as the weapon's energy system overloaded from the contact and detonated, leaving him weaponless.

He had one last card to play, and he did so, triggering the light GTS missile rack on his right shoulder, the four-missile box popping open and disgorging its contents, point blank, into the enemy.

He felt the explosion rock his own suit, sending it to the ground with a ponderous crash, and the flare of heat as something in front of him detonated. The spots of darkness were clumping together now, as the alarms in his ear began to fade.

"Get his suit open! Medic, get over here! Pull him back and keep defensive fire on the rachni!" He heard the booming tenor of Major Laxar shouting orders, and he coughed.

"Laxar. Is the witch dead?" His voice sounded damnably weak. Intolerable.

The major's voice reached his ears, even as he felt many hands lift his suit and begin carrying him away. "Yes, sir. You blew the bitch's entire upper half off. We'll finish the fight sir, you just rest."

A flicker of a smile crossed his features once more. "...beat a Paladin with a damned omnispear and a few missiles...let's see...old Ahern match...that..."

Darkness claimed him.

---

Chapter 102: Chapter 93 : Saren, Unleashed

---

A/N: I've written this fight a dozen times, and to my overly picky mind it still isn't quite right. Saren died with insulting ease in the game, even on insanity. This was supposed to be the premier Spectre in all of the galaxy, with twenty years experience and top of the line equipment, but we never see him use any real Spectre tricks. We never see the combat power. It's entirely possible to beat him with a pistol toting engineer, a civilian asari nerd, and a quarian teenager.

Embarassing. Benezia on insanity puts up way more of a fight, especially if you don't rely on cheese and keep her knocked down.

Sovereign's upgrades, to turn him into mecha-Saren, didn't make a lot of sense either. About the only part I really liked about the scene was that you could talk him into shooting himself, but wasn't the whole point of the cybernetics to erase his doubts and make him more dependable? He waits until the last possible second to realize that, maybe, his plan is a Bad Idea and to man up?

Lunacy.

I am sure the fight will not rub some people the right way, those who want to see Shepard whup ass and chew bubblegum. But Shepard is (at this point) just a human biotic, not a bionetic killing machine with four billion credits worth of tech. Her team has been worn down, shot up, and their nerves are starting to go. Saren planned the best possible ambush he could, and what happens after, well...

Let's just say that events are happening this way for a reason. I look forward to feedback (positive, negative, normative) and of course PM's.

---

Warp fire exploded in all directions, searing and melting the expensive marble flooring, but Anolais merely flipped aside nimbly, landing next to the asari cultist who was throwing it. With a lightning fast kick, he knocked the pistol out of her hands, his own submachine gun coming up before she could react.

He put a short burst into her, and his eyes caught motion from the right. Without even looking his aim shifted, two more short bursts erupting from his weapon, catching the oncoming asari who had sprung from cover. Both fell down, tumbling and broken from the rounds he'd put through their faces.

A few more asari were still coming in through the broken windows, even as the firefight outside the tower increased in violence. Two attempted to close with Vealen, but he dodged them effortlessly, laughing as they tried and failed to land biotic punches on his flickering form. He dived between them, omniblades sliding from his outstretched arms to slash at the asari's unprotected throats, coming up in a roll with his hands already drawing his pistols. Shots rang out, sending three more blue aliens to the floor with holes in their foreheads, even as the two behind him slumped to the ground in death.

Two more of the asari were trying to pin down Vesais, who was flipping in and out of cover, often bounding away with one hand as he fired with the other. He put a round into one of the asari's throats, rolled out of the way of the answering ball of warpfire, and his right foot spun up in a kick, breaking the second cultist's concentration. His pistol fired twice, blowing gory holes in her chest, and she fell with a confused, stunned look in her eyes as he made the sign of the Wheel over her dying form with his smoking pistol.

Another asari flung warpfire at Tuanis, who merely sidestepped with alacrity. His hands flickered, monomolecular knives flashing briefly in the light of the fires in the lobby before burying themselves in the asari's eyesockets. He turned dismissively away, pausing only to flick another knife into a feebly moving asari moaning on the ground, and Anolais relaxed his grip on his weapon as he could see nor feel any more of the asari cultists.

His gaze flickered from point to point rapidly, taking in the carnage. The asari had hit the tower hard, and the battle in the lobby had gone poorly for the NDC. It had only been the arrival of Anolais and his old STG team that had stopped the tide, and that had cost him six of his closest friends.

His few remaining forces – salarians, all – were down to less than ten. He'd grown up with them, from the time he was a newt on the warm shores of Mannovai, cavorting about the estates of his clan, through his years in the salarian military and later the STG. These were his battle brothers, bound tighter than blood or names. He'd bled with them, crowed in delight as they were chosen to breed, cackled in glee as their first hatchings came into the world.

He'd cried alongside them when their family dalatrasses or sisters had died, and had only turned away from their close bonds when the call of business beckoned louder than that of battle and service to the family. Even then, as more years had passed, he'd slowly lured them to his side, until most of his closest friends and allies stood in this very room.

Some living, some dead.

The asari assaulting his tower were formidable foes. Completely fearless, with biotics that made up for their lack of heavy weapons or armor, they'd torn his makeshift force of mechs and security turrets in the plaza to pieces. He'd retaliated with grenade fire from his own units, of course, which evened the odds, but more and more of the lunatics had swarmed the Tower, either breaking off from other objectives or being pushed back by the human marines in his city.

His people had hurled the cultists back, but it wasn't an optimal match-up. Salarian speed and reactions were far superior to asari, and he could shoot their eyes out from a hundred feet away with either hand, but there were just too many of them, and their biotics meant that even one good hit was all it took to reduce a salarian soldier to a broken body on the floor.

He holstered his machine pistol, and reloaded his Cobra rifle, noting with faint dismay that he was nearly out of grenades. He chuckled to himself as he remembered the bitter words of the krogan battlemaster, an anomaly among his kind, who'd trained briefly with the STG.

"A salarian without grenades is about as useful as a batarian rape counselor."

What was that odd krogan's name? Kurok? Something like that.

He winced as he shifted his weight, walking up the stairs towards the rest of his squad. He'd been hit hard by a biotic throw, and more than once had only escaped being incinerated by warpfire by desperate acrobatic leaps or dodges. He wasn't young any more, and such things were taxing on his aging body. Too many years in nice suits in well-appointed boardrooms had softened him, it seemed.

He checked his omnitool, hoping to see news about the battle in the city, but the comms networks were still jammed solid. He'd gotten a static-filled transmission just before the last firefight, something about the geth fleet in orbit finally being defeated, but nothing from that bombastic cloaca of a human general, and nothing from Major Matsuo.

He wasted a moment hoping she wasn't dead, before his mind snapped to other, more important matters. His wandering thoughts were not a good sign, the first warning of battle exhaustion.

Glancing over to the battered form of Vesais Dasso, he finally spoke "We can't hold here, Vesais. We don't have the numbers, and the humans are better suited to a defensive fight anyway. Have everyone fall back to the mid-tower staging area."

The other salarian nodded, his dark skin gleaming in the dim lights of the lobby. The lobby was a burning wreck now, the proud artwork shattered, the high windows blown out. Asari and salarian bodies littered the scorched and seared marble floors, purple and green blood mingling as it dripped from ruined leather couches and stained the fountains. "As you wish, Bel."

The salarians all looked up at the sound of footsteps, and Anolais took in the beaten form of Captain Jaocb Taylor. The human was almost grossly huge, bulgy with slabs of muscle now visible with his armor removed. His shoulder was swathed in large white bandages, and his undershirt stained with his blood. He'd been heavily wounded in the initial assault, and the salarians had managed to drag his heavy form out of the line of fire, leaving him under cover to coordinate his unit with his omni-tool.

"I got my people tucked in on the outside of the buildings, Director. I had to shift the last of our armor units to deal with the geth, but they were running out of ammo anyway. Unless von Grath can shift some more marines our way, what you see is what you got. That last fight was hopefully the last of them...might be time to pull out of this tower, while you can."

Anolais nodded at the dark-skinned human officer. "That is not an option. We cannot let the Tower fall, Captain. Central Processing is tied into the financial markets on a dozen key worlds. If the geth were to gain access there is no telling what kind of havoc they could wreak. And Central Processing is now where the ground defenses and city systems are being handled. If it is taken, the protective field over the city will fall, and the weather will kill everything above ground if the rachni don't."

Taylor gave a weary nod. "We know the stakes. Didn't know you kept all your eggs in this basket, but I get you. We'll find a way to hold here. The SA isn't going to cut and run when civilians are in the line of fire. Just pull your people back and let us hold the lobby."

Anolais glanced at his omnitool, and nodded. "That was indeed our plan. We will withdraw to the tenth floor, and detonate the elevators leading up. They will have to come up the emergency staircase, or else land assault shuttles in the docking bay on floor twenty, and the automated defenses can see anything up to a frigate off. The lobby has no decent cover, Captain, but if you wish to blow out a wall and set your remaining vehicles inside, feel free."

His voice dipped bitterly. "I'll be billing damages to the SA anyway, after all."

Taylor laughed, and nodded. "Good luck getting your money, sir. My people will be on comm channel nine if you need to coordinate." The captain turned away, back to the handful of marines and Commissars in the corner of the lobby, and Anolais turned to his team.

"Let us move."

The trip up to the tenth floor was done in silence, each of the salarians lost in their own thoughts, nursing bruises, trying to let their bodies recover from the fight. None of them had fired a weapon in anger in over a decade, and coming down off the natural combat high the salarian biology imposed on them left them trembling and disoriented.

Anolais clamped down on his shakes, as the elevator opened onto the tenth floor. Here, the elevators shifted, and the large space beyond did double duty as a security staging area and command center for the tower's normal security forces. A few dozen injured NDC guardsmen were laid out on the floor, tended to by a mere handful of medical techs. At least a few of the mercs that comprised his military had not bolted and ran when the asari came, refusing Major Matsuo's withdrawal orders to buy time for any civilians left in the tower to withdraw to the upper floors.

Anolais supposed they deserved a bonus on their next check, assuming they didn't die of their wounds. He crossed the area, picking his way around the wounded, coming to the security desk in the middle of the room, where the bloody but unbowed form of Major Vurthex stood. Vurthex, a turian with fifty years in the turian military, was the tower's security director. It was no surprise to Anolais to find him still stubbornly at his post, but the old soldier looked as if he'd been in some ugly firefights. "Status, Major."

The turian's flanged voice was tired. "Six rigged air-cars full of explosives hit the upper docking area, sir. After that, some more showed up, stuffed full of asari cultists. We managed to stop them from breaking through, and I blew up a plasma conduit to sear the bay clean of invaders. That's robbed power from the northern anti-air defense guns, but seeing as they weren't doing a lot of spirits-damned good right now, that's not a big deal."

He tapped a haptic screen, which flickered irregularly, the color jumping from blue to orange and then to green. "Computer systems are holding, although the geth have made enough inroads into our systems to shut down automated defenses. Comms are still working, but the storm topside is getting worse and we have lost contact with the docks, Central Bank, the Sirta Building, the Nova Building, and our people at Emergency Central."

Anolais took this in with fixed attention. "Any communications from the human military?"

Vurhtex sighed. "According to the marines, the ship you brought down with the city GTS array had Lady Benezia aboard. She managed to survive the crash, but got killed fighting the human general in some kind of one-on-one power armor duel. The general is alive but out of the fight, which has made the humans go from vakar to pyjaks in terms of morale. Typical monkeys."

Anolais found racism a waste of time, but did not comment. "And the space forces?"

Vurthex checked his panel again. "I think the fighting up there is done, sir. The last geth were destroyed about the time the last asari assault hit the tower. They've begun throwing missiles as the rachni outside the city, trying to keep them from breaking back through the tunnel."

Anolais gave a thin smile at that. "Finally, any word from Commander Shepard, or Peak 15?"

Vurthex shook his head. "Peak 15 has been silent the entire time. And aside from that one fragmentary transmission that got out from the Commander, we have heard nothing. Li and the other mechanics are about done with some rapid repair to the icecrawler that was in for maintenance, they have it about ready to go if you want to send more soldiers that direction."

Anolais considered it. "Assuming we can contact them, alert the Alliance marines to that possibility. I'm not sending any of my own people into a fight between Saren and the Butcher. What is our status here, Major?"

Vurthex shrugged. "I have three squads of the NDC Guard that are ... mobile. All my krogan ran off to get killed fighting rachni, and the rest of my squads are so banged up as to be useless. Maybe twenty, twenty five effectives?" He rubbed his mandible. "We're about out of medigel, most of us are on our last ammo block, and literally everyone is wounded."

Anolais heard the rumble of explosives, as his team blew the elevators behind him. "We'll hold here, then. Humans marines are in the lobby, to fend off any more asari or geth assaults, but hopefully that was the last of the crazy tramps. Benezia is dead, and if Saren is still at this Peak 13, then it is up to the Butcher to finish him off."

Vurthex nodded. "Yes, Director. There's not much on this level, but there's some restrooms and a lounge if your people need a sitdown."

Anolais managed a weak laugh. "Yes, that would be useful, Major. Instruct your squads to secure the emergency stairwells, and be ready to fall back to Central Processing if we have to." Anolais stepped away, feeling his body starting to shut down from overexertion. He considered using a stimulant tab, but he hated using such things, and now was not the time. He entered the lounge, and sat almost bonelessly on a couch in the corner, letting the adrenaline drain out of him.

His omni beeped, and he answered. "Anolais here."

Captain Taylor's weary voice sounded. "Sir, this is Taylor. Three APCs and a buncha marines just showed up here at the Tower. Looks like the geth and asari have all been killed off, but we're going to hold position until I get formal word. General von Grath's comm adjutant is here, asking if you have any updates on Commander Shepard."

Anolais exhaled slowly. "No, I do not. When I do I will inform you."

"Understood, Director. Taylor out." With a flicker, the omnitool deactivated, and Anolais leaned back against the couch.

The investors will probably abandon the project, he thought. Too much loss, too much visibility on our work here. The Wheel turns as it will, but I cannot afford to have too much exposure cast on the Alteration Framework, and there's too much data on it here. We'll have to blow up the labs...the delay will set us back years.

The dalatrass will be furious.

Anolais found that, for once, he no longer cared. He tapped a series of controls on his omni-tool, and then leaned back into the cushions.

O-OSaBC-O

The lift bottomed out, the doors sliding open with a hiss of hydraulics. Icy air seeped in from the corridor beyond, tainted with foul, rancid scents. Shepard squared her shoulders and lifted the rotary assault cannon, letting her nerves settle. "Everybody ready for this?"

Garrus and Telanya nodded, followed by Liara, then Tali. Wrex shifted the lance cannon in his hands and grunted. "I'd like some jaaki first, actually."

She smiled, then turned to Lieutenant Parker. "Lieutenant, this is likely to get real, real ugly. Saren is a nasty customer in a fight, and he'll probably have backup. If you can, keep your people back and blast him from a distance."

The human nodded. "You won't get an argument from me. Let's just get this over with, so we can get back to the city."

Shepard lead the way out, the corridor beyond paneled in thick slats of steel over bare rock. The floor was more of the grated metal walkways she'd seen in the upper levels, stained and discolored here and there with black splotches.

The passage ran downwards, sloping gently, and Shepard found herself gripping the heavy weapon in her hands more and more tightly as they moved along. Her breath frosted the air in front of her as she advanced slowly ahead, eyes flicking back and forth, seeking targets.

They came at last, after several minutes of silent walking, to a vast, heavy security door, twice as wide as Wrex and deeply imprinted with a circular indentation. Shepard steeled herself and pushed on the doors, which swung open with surprising ease, the steel doors parting to reveal the room beyond.

If the other rooms had been shaped and carved from small caverns, this one had been sliced right out of the rock. The walls were all hard right angles, mirror smooth, the rock a uniform black color that absorbed all the light from the lamps mounted high above. A steel wall pierced with a heavy airlock of sorts was visible in the distance, while racks mounted on the walls held more empty geth bodies, all of them staring straight ahead.

Crates loomed here and there, some broken open to reveal weapons or other equipment, others still shut. Two dead asari were on the floor, their throats torn out by claws of some kind. Against one wall, more of the low-slung buildings seen elsewhere were present, but the space was mostly dominated by a huge, circular pit, sixty feet across. A low wall surrounded it, and the top covered by a lattice-work of metal beams and plates of some transparent metal.

Shepard slowly approached it, peering down. At the bottom, in a shallow bowl of metal, a huge insectile creature lay against the floor. Yellow ichor stained it's flanks, which moved shallowly, and long tentacles waved feebly.

Wrex spat. "Rachni queen. Saren's even crazier than I thought. A queen could produce thousands of her brood in a few weeks, and millions given enough time, Shepard." He lifted his lance cannon meaningfully, but Shepard held up a hand.

"We can exterminate bugs later, Wrex. After Saren. Stick together, everyone...let's see what's in the buildings before we go through that big ass airlock."

The first of the buildings had a heavy security door, but it was ajar, stained with splashes of asari blood. Shepard pushed it all the way open with the barrel of her gun, recoiling slightly from the scent of rot from within.

The room was high and wide – the low-ceiling of the outer building only an entry way, it seemed. The floor sloped downwards sharply after a few feet, and against the far wall were three large plinths. Strange arches of metal and machinery pierced three piles of rotting, decaying flesh.

It took Shepard a moment to realize that these things were rachni of some kind, and that they were still alive. Each one was embedded with black-lit cybernetics, lit from within with a faint blue glow. Their claws and tentacles had been sheared off, capped with crude blunted tubes of metal, while computer readouts and tubes of thick gray paste pumped in and out of each one.

Alenko stared at them, aghast, and Tali shuddered. Only Garrus found his voice. "What in the spirits are they?"

Liara walked over to a long bank of computer consoles, tapping a control. "...they are queens, of a sort, it seems. They are hooked to some kind of .. machinery that controls them, and through them, the rachni soldiers." Liara's gaze narrowed as she read the asari language on the computer screens in front of her. "Shepard, they are ... slaves. Saren was using them like remote controls."

Shepard nodded. "Rachni or no, nothing deserves to suffer like that. Everyone out." She waited until the team was behind her before opening up with the rotary cannon, putting a long burst into each of the corrupted husks before her.

They gave weak shrieks, even as the machines transfixing them sparked and caught fire, the tubes shattering and spilling foul smelling paste onto the ground. With another burst of fire, she tore into the computer systems on the wall, shattering data banks and blowing consoles apart.

Alenko glanced up as she exited. "Tali says the other rooms are more storage, according to her drones, commander. All that remains is the airlock."

Shepard nodded, cycling the weapon in her hands. "Lovely. Here we go, people."

Shepard lead, followed by Liara, Garrus, and Telanya. Alenko followed, Wrex looming over him, Tali and Ashley trailing behind with weapons held stiffly. Parker's team split in two, each setting up in what cover was available, weapons trained on the airlock.

Shepard reached the controls, and didn't hesitate as she triggered them. A blaring alarm was heard, from somewhere in the base, and the doors cracked open ponderously, warm air rushing out.

The room revealed was a scene of chaos. Dozens of mangled, twisted forms hung within tubes of green liquid, stacked six and seven high. Some were krogan, others turian, and still others so mangled that their race couldn't be made out. Hulking computer banks took up space along the walls, haptic screens displaying incomprehensible diagrams of some sort of cross between a krogan and a rachni.

The room was smaller than the one they stood in, dominated by the long, proud form of a Prothean Beacon, this one glowing a pale blue rather than green. Another beacon sat in pieces on the floor, disassembled with long, ugly melted sections carved into it's length.

A dozen asari and two or three turians were on the ground, dead, torn apart. Sitting on top of a table, cradling a sniper rifle, was the silver and black armored form of Saren Arterius.

Shepard's eyes narrowed, leveling the assault cannon at him. "Saren."

The turian looked up. His once normal gaze was gone, his eyes now nothing more than blue pits in his face. Traceries of black circuitry and corruption ate at his plating, his neck, and his mandible. His armor had tubes of gray and white slotted into it in several places, and blue radiance flickered from his torso and legs. A target visor, much like Garrus wore, was flush against his left eye.

"Ah, Commander Shepard. Welcome to the end of life."

She snorted, as Wrex sighted in his own lance cannon on the turian. "Fucking spare me the evil speech. You can throw down your weapons and surrender or I can blow your goddamned head off. I'd prefer the latter."

Saren set his sniper rifle down, slowly, on the table next to him. "I have always found it amusing how people think they have the upper hand when it comes to facing me. I've done in thousands of two-bit batarian thugs, idiotic human meatheads, uppity salarians, and over-bold krogan. And you think a pair of assault weapons is supposed to impress me, Shepard?"

His mandibles flickered. "You continue to disappoint."

She snarled, and fired the assault cannon. The blast tore through Saren, and the image of him shattered into haptic static, projected by a tiny device on the table. She cursed, turning, and then the lights in the cavern went dark all at once.

"Time to die, monkey." His voice came from behind, and turned, tangling with Wrex in the doorway.

The darkness was rent by a blast of red light, and the pained scream of Ashley as she fell, her sniper rifle blasted into a molten splash that hit her in the chest and cascaded over her legs. She rolled, the ballistic cloth of her underarmor catching fire, even as Tali's drones shot into the air, flaring with light to counter the darkness of the cave.

Saren leapt down from atop one of the low buildings, landing directly behind Alenko and Tali. Alenko, who had whirled to aid Ashley, was caught flat-footed by Saren's brutal biotic backhand. His jaw shattered, teeth spilling from his mouth, and he flew backwards, landing in a broken heap against the south wall. Tali backed away, firing her shotgun, the bright arching lighting coruscating around a biotic shell of energy. A moment later a biotic throw hit her, picking her small form up and smashing it viciously against a stack of crates. Tali's scream was choked off and the sound of bones snapping was audible even from where Shepard stood.

Parker's men opened fire, and the turian spun and dodged, his armor suddenly igniting with some form of mass effect jets, letting him leap away. His hand came up with his pistol, putting a shot into each of Tali's drones, casting the room into darkness again.

Garrus was kneeling on the floor, hands flying over his omnitool, while Telanya and Liara were holding up biotic barriers, trying to cover the team, the faint blue light casting shadows everywhere, revealing nothing. Shepard and Wrex hustled down from the entryway, the lights at the end of their weapons that had snapped on automatically carving slashes into the darkness that only made them targets.

Shepard cursed herself for not bringing her helmet, with its infrared vision mode. "Get to cover! Someone get to Tali!"

Garrus snarled, and triggered a program from his omnitool. Two dozen tiny spots of light leapt out, spinning and dancing erratically through the air, then pulsed with bright light, casting the entire chamber in visibility again. Even as he did so, though, he fell, a heavy explosion rocking his position and tearing his armor apart. Saren had alighted on a shelf of rock almost thirty feet up, and even as the lights came on he shifted the aim of his blocky sniper rifle, firing a second time with a deafening bang.

Shepard screamed as the round hit the ground between Liara and Telanya, sending both asari flying.

Telanya rolled to a stop against a crate, groaning, but Liara fell heavily against the queen's pit, unmoving, her armor smouldering.

Saren ejected the round from his sniper rifle. "That's four down. Shall we go for five, monkey?"

She swung the assault cannon up, firing, spraying the fire in long streams to try and pin him down. He jumped away, reaching for something on his belt, and flung it at her. A flash of blinding light erupted from the stun grenade, and she dropped the heavy gun, focusing on her hearing and pulling her ODIN.

Wrex roared, and she heard the firing of the lance cannon. Then there was a sound of an explosion, and Parker screaming for cover fire. She blinked spots out of her eyes, ducking down behind a table she could barely see, and shouted. "Wrex!"

There was no answer, and a moment later screams erupted from Parker's position. She blinked again, cursing her stupidity in not wearing a helmet, and squinted, managing to make out the figure of Saren landing in an explosive flash among Parker's men. One hand lifted his pistol, firing several times, as the other extended his omnitool, cruel jets of plasma fire spraying over the security team.

Several fell instantly, one firing off his heavy weapon in a spray of random bolts that did nothing but blow a big hole in the lattice-work containing the rachni queen. Metal sprayed as a segment of the pit's wall collapsed, and Saren sneered, executing the man with a second shot. Saren turned away after putting a shot through Parker's youthful face, the round blowing most of the man's head off, and gave a quiet, mocking laugh. "This, this is the best you can do?"

Shepard snarled, rushing into a biotic charge. She slammed into him, but his barrier held, and she lifted the ODIN. With a snarl he triggered his own biotics, and she felt a pull wrench her weapon out of her hand before she could anchor herself. In the split second while she was still in biotic cooldown from her charge, with her barrier down, Saren kicked her, sending her sprawling to the ground. She rolled, reaching for her pistol, but a booted turian foot stamped on her wrist, weighted with enough biotic force to snap it.

She managed not to scream out, even as Saren kicked her over. "Pathetic. Fifteen of you, and you can't even defeat one turian. You are indeed an apt pupil of that failure Anderson."

She spat defiance, stumbling to her feet, summoning her biotics, lashing out with warpfire. He deflected it almost mockingly, his barriers finally flickering and dying, but still strong enough to turn away her attack. He flicked his mandibles, holstering his pistol. "Defiant to the last, I see. Let's bring things down to your own level, monkey."

His fist moved, catching her under the chin, flooding her mouth with blood. He blocked her return kick, his hand coming around in a biotic enhanced punch that crumpled her armor. She grunted, slamming her fist against his face, but he barely moved, his baritone laughter mocking. He parried a second punch with lightning speed, catching her arm in a block she didn't recognize, and his foot lashed out, crashing against her knee and depriving her of her balance.

She staggered back, and triggered her omnitool, sending darts of electrical energy into his armor. He snarled, even as sparks of energy raged over his form, and drove his own knee into her side, his armor crunching against hers. A blade of some kind popped out when it impacted, lancing into her side, drawing a scream from her as it parted a rib and slashed her insides. He pushed her down and away, shaking his head, and kicked her in the head, filling her vision with stars. She rolled to one side, her blurred sight taking in her allies.

Wrex lay in a blackened circle, smoking. Garrus was crumpled against a broken crate, his armor broken and his visor shattered, his sniper rifle laying on the ground. Alenko was barely moving, all of Parker's team lay dead or dying behind Shepard, and Tali was unmoving. Liara shakily came to her feet, ugly burns along the left side of face, her left eye shut. She managed to generate a weak biotic spurt of warpfire, but it did little more than scorch Saren's armor. He pulled out his pistol, firing, the shot hitting her in the hip, sending her to the ground a second time, this time screaming in pain.

"It's over, Shepard." With a look of smug glee, he kicked her over again, wrenching her Revenant machine gun from her back and extending its barrel. "Ah, good, you brought your Revenant, the one you tried to kill me with. Surely you'll appreciate the irony of your demise, no?"

The sound of a lance cannon firing shattered the air, the blast striking Saren in the back and sending him flying. Williams had crawled to where Wrex had fallen, her ravaged legs dragging behind her, and managed to get her hands around the lance cannon. "Appreciate THAT, you murdering fuck!"

The turian groaned, a clean hole punched completely through his chest. Blood, thick and blue, poured from the wound, but blue wires threaded slowly across the hole, linking with one another. Shepard crawled away, grabbing her ODIN as she did so, extending it to autofire mode.

The turian began to stand, and Shepard opened fire. Three more craters appeared in Saren's broad back, blasting away chunks of armor and whatever kind of jump pack he had on his back. With a roar, Saren turned, biotic energy liming his form as he raised one hand to unleash his power on her.

A beam of plasma lanced out, blowing off his clenched fist, as Telanya leaned up against the crate she'd landed against, her Spear of Athame rifle glowing as she fired again. Tali had managed to tap her omnitool, her drones springing back into life, micromissiles flashing out to detonate against Saren's armor.

He was sent skidding back by the explosions, tumbling from his feet, his pistol flying away. A trail of blue blood had smeared along the floor as he passed, and he crashed heavily into the wall, glowing blue eyes fading slightly. Shepard fired again, and again, as did Telanya, and Williams, and now Alenko, leveling his assault rifle from where he'd managed to regain his feet.

Bullets and plasma blasts rained against his form, before the howl of the lance cannon thundered again, blowing Saren's chest open. With a final shudder the turian slumped against the wall, and Shepard gave a shuddering exhalation.

"...jesus...fuck." Williams voice was disbelieving and in pain, her armor a wrecked cage on her body. Melted metal had splashed her, searing burns down to her right cheek and barely missing her eye. "...almost...killed us all."

Telanya had dropped her rifle, and staggered weakly over to where Garrus was, turning him over and checking his vitals. Shepard pulled herself to her feet, grimacing at the pain in her wrist, and glanced over herself. Her side was bleeding freely, her ribs felt broken from his damned kicks, and her vision was still bleary.

She stumbled over to Liara, wincing as she saw her wounds. "Liara..."

The asari gave a whimper of pain. "I am...alive, Sara." She pressed her hands to her hip, purple blood welling from beneath them, and Shepard reached for her omnigel. "Just...stay still."

Alenko gave a weak shudder, spitting out blood, and shook his head. He held his jaw in pain, finally tapping out a message on his omni-tool. "Saren broke my jaw. Other than that I am okay. Are any of Parker's people alive?"

Wrex finally stirred. His armor had been cooked, part of it blasted into his sturdy frame, but he sat up, growling. "Is he dead?"

Shepard nodded weakly, and went to check on Tali. There was a gash in her suit along the thigh, and flashing warning messages on her omnitool. Shepard slathered omnigel over the breach, injected some medigel, and hoped that there was an intact hospital at Port Hanshan with isolation facilities.

"Tali's..got a suit breech, and broken bones. We need to .. get back topside."

Wrex levered himself up slowly, bulbous eyes glancing around. "And the rachni?"

Shepard shrugged. "Fry the goddamned thing for all I care, Wrex." She turned back to check Parker's people, gesturing weakly to Williams. "Make sure Saren is dead." The female marine, just now back on her feet, nodded, drawing her shotgun.

She limped over to the corpse. Her left leg was a mass of burned armor and seeping blood, where the melted metal of her sniper rifle had splashed and ate through the ceramic plating. She winced against the pain, and grunted, unshipping her shotgun from her lower back. "This is for Nirali." She fired, once. "For Jackson."

She fired, a second time, tearing a gaping segment of the turian's battered face away.

"For Eden Prime." A final shot echoed in the chamber, and Williams stepped away. "If he wasn't dead before, the son of a bitch is now."

Even as she spoke, there was a grinding sound from behind her. Shepard, Wrex, Williams and Telanya all reacted at one, lifting their weapons.

Saren's broken body did not move, but blue radiance crackled along its length, searing flesh. Bubbles of energy wafted up as the corpse jerked, spasming, before a cold voice rasped out.

"Insects. You smash my puppets, and think you have turned aside your doom. You have only sealed your fate." There was a lash of something static, a buzzing that filled the air. Telanya shook, nerveless fingers dropping her rifle, as Alenko and Shepard both howled in agony, blood running from their noses. Wrex clutched his own head, Liara's eyes rolled in their sockets and she collapsed, and Williams could barely think, the buzzing ...

She recognized it. The sound she'd heard on Eden Prime. Only stronger. It was burrowing into her head, making her body shake and weaken. It dug into her very soul, and stammering prayers slipped through her lips as she fell to one knee. The voice spoke again, Saren's broken form somehow producing it, the blue light coruscating through his corpse growing too bright to look at. "Die..."

The sound grew to a shattering crescendo, sowing agony across her body. Williams felt blood seeping from her nose, and coughed helplessly, her vision blurry.

A second sound erupted into the air, another buzzing, but this one harmonic, almost crystalline in its sound, somehow disrupting the first. The two sounds battled one another, the first almost growling in rage, the second soaring, pure, clean.

Somehow, the second sound let Williams move, and she managed to focus her rage and fear into strength. She scabbled across the ground for her shotgun, her mind battered, but her hands instead found the long barrel of the lance cannon, on the floor where she'd left it. She lifted the cannon again, even as the second song began to fail.

She could only see a blinding ball of blue hellfire in front of her, and she fired into the center of it. The beam of force jetted out, white light spearing the blue radiance that had enfolded the corpse. It impacted with a huge boom, a blast of weird blue energy that knocked her back on her ass. Instantly, the terrible buzzing faded, leaving behind only the softer sounds...coming from the pit.

Williams let the cannon fall from her hands, and managed to look around. What she saw left her jaw falling open.

The rachni queen had emerged, and her voice buzzed in alien tones through the air. Her mangled body was lined with wounds, but she had managed to climb out through the hole blown in the pit by the last of Parker's men. Even as Williams watched, she fell silent, leaning tiredly against the framework still partially trapping her.

Alenko was the first to recover, shaking his head and wincing. His broken jaw didn't let him talk, but he moaned in pain and confusion. He glanced up, catching sight of the giant insect, his hand going for his pistol, and Williams called out.

"NO! It saved us, somehow. Don't shoot it, I .. I don't think it's hostile."

Alenko gave her a sharp look, but she ignored it. She let the lance cannon fall, stepping closer to the giant being. "It was beaten up before we got here, Kai. Maybe it hated Saren too."

Shepard got to one knee, wiping blood from her nose. "Ugh. My head. Can ... anyone explain what the fuck just hit us?"

There was a long moment of silence, and then the rachni queen reached out with one of her long, pale tentacles, wrapping it slowly around one of the dead asari they'd found in the room. There was a moment of twitching and then the asari corpse moved.

"...we ... sing. You ... do not sing. You had...no defense against...the black note. The dark one ... sang a song of .. death. We .. sang of life."

Shepard stared at the corpse, then back at the rachni queen, then back at the corpse. "I'm either... having a really bad trip...or that dead asari bitch is talking."

Liana was still on the ground, but her expression, while drawn in pain, was clearing. "I think the rachni queen is using that asari as a method to ... communicate with us."

Wrex groaned, still on his back. "Ha. Likely story. Probably going to ask if we taste better with pura sauce or salt."

The queen's huge, faceted eyes swung around, taking in each one of them in turn. "...you ... are not...with the ice mistress... she of ... cold eyes and sad ...soul."

Shepard frowned. "I... no. We are not. We were here to kill this ... person." She gestured at Saren's ravaged corpse, then turned back to the rachni. "Your kind have attacked us, though."

The queen made a shuffling motion. "...yes. We...were compelled. A ... foul... red note...tore into ...our song. We could not ... resist. My daughters...were taken...befouled..."

Shepard thought back to the tortured creatures in the lab. "Yes. We found them, and put them out of their misery."

The rachni queen's borrowed voice sounded thankful, and had less pauses in it. "...this is good. Our children have become...warped. They are twisted. They must... be ended."

Shepard glanced over to Wrex. "There are others who will deal with that. The big question is what to do with you? You saved us...but your kind are dangerous."

The queen bowed her head. "...I am fading. I could ... heal myself, and go far from here. Let the children come forth again ... in peace, to sing pure songs. Or let myself fall into the sleep of ... death. I long for the latter."

Shepard tilted her head. "You want to die?"

The queen shifted again, as if in pain, and the asari jerked violently. "I have heard that evil red note, and now a black note...so cold. It is pain. Negation. The song cannot be unheard, the note unsung. The note ...echos. It pollutes. My song...was not strong enough to stop it, and fear I am ... not myself."

Shepard scratched her chin. "...well, that's just peachy. Thoughts, people? My head isn't working real hot right now."

Liara frowned. "We cannot kill her, Sara. That would be genocide."

The queen spoke. "...incorrect. We...should not exist. We remember the large ones coming." A tentacle gestured at Wrex, drawing a snarl. "We remember the Killing. We remember the ugly red note, the sour yellow note, tearing in our song, fighting, urging. We brought death. Forgiveness must be earned, not given."

The queen's massive head bowed. "One cannot kill ... what should already be dead."

Shepard frowned. "How can you remember something that long ago? Are you that old?"

Wrex muttered. "Because the rachni are evil, Shepard. They have some kind of genetic memory that lets them remember everything any of them experienced. It's why their warriors were so perfect, a tactic would only work once against them. Unnatural things." He spat at the corpse of the asari being used as mouthpiece, glaring.

Garrus had been propped up slowly by Telanya, and was holding his broken eyepiece in one hand. His armor had huge rents in it, his blood leaking through them, and his face was scorched, but his eyes were still bright. His voice flanged and slurred as he spook, slowly. "Even if that's the case, that doesn't make her the perpetrator. She's still a victim, Shepard. Liara is right. As much damage as the rachni did, the queen here didn't do any of it herself, and she saved our life."

Wrex snarled louder. "The rachni nearly ended my people, and we died by the millions to stop them, only to lose our way with so many of our shaman and war-leaders dead. If not for the rachni maybe krogan society would not have done idiotic act of trying to attack the galaxy. And this thing's children probably ate half the city down there." The red eyes shifted to Shepard. "You let this monster go, and if anything goes wrong millions will die stopping her brood."

Alenko nodded gingerly, and tapped his omnitool, sending another message. "For once, ma'am, Wrex has a point. This is big. We can't make this decision on our own."

Shepard looked at him a long moment, then at the queen. "Not too long ago, I also wanted to die. I had been hurt too many times, in too many ways. I had brought death to others, but those deserving, and those...undeserving. I had become the tool of evil men, and I was too weak, too ... broken, to salvage myself."

She slowly got to her feet, stepping forward. "I had someone save me from that. So when you say you want to die, is it because you're too tired to live, or because you are too dangerous?"

The queen made a clicking sound, her many legs shifting against the pylons trapping her. The asari corpse she manipulated gave a hissing sigh. "I have already caused great harm. The ice mistress, who smelled of the young one", she paused to point a tentacle at Liara, "wounded my mind, seeking my thoughts, my memories of those long dead."

The queen's form shuddered. "She sought a great dark system of three green worlds, around a dark orange star. She called it Ilos. I recognized it."

Shepard's heart sped up. "...if you know the place where she is going, we'll let you go." Wrex began to protest and Shepard held up a hand. "There's no telling what the fuck might be there. Even if both Saren and Benezia are dead, I'm not leaving lose ends laying around."

The queen regarded Shepard calmly, the multifaceted eyes gazing at her for long seconds. "I was forced to give her what she sought. A relay, long lost to your kind. She called it the Mu Relay. It is linked to by the Decados Relay, using the name she gave in her mind, and from the Mu Relay one enters an old star system of my people. From the entry star, one goes galactic north to the nearest system."

The queen's voice quieted. "We never disturbed the dead upon Ilos. There were too many ugly, fell notes there. All dead. All waiting."

Shepard had recorded the information on her omnitool. They could figure out the exact location later, after all. "We could still cut you free. There is no reason to die."

The rachni queen said nothing for a long moment. "There is still a fragment of that note in my mind, child of fire." The queen's massive bulk shifted, facing Wrex. "I am ... sorry for what my people inflicted on yours, warrior of burning stone. I ask for release."

Wrex's eyes narrowed, and his gaze slowly shifted from the alien being to Shepard. "It wants to die, Shepard. Even it knows it doesn't belong."

Shepard didn't understand. "Why would you not want to live?"

The queen made another sound, much like the song that had countered the sound from Saren's shattered body. It was a saddening sound, one of broken memories and unending, slow pain. "I am shattered inside, and I feel my children dying. My daughters have been broken and tortured, and my mind is no longer...whole. Why would I wish to linger, to sing songs into the empty dark, only fearing the return of that evil red note from the dark once more for all my days?"

The tentacle released the asari corpse, which finally fell limp again, and wrapped around the bars, as if bracing itself. Liara closed her eyes, turning away, and Shepard, after several long seconds, finally nodded at Wrex. The krogan picked up the lance cannon where it had fallen onto the floor, and lifted it.

There was the sound of thunder, then silence.

---

Chapter 103: Chapter 94 : Noveria , Aftermath

---

A/N: The fight with Saren was something I re-wrote, as I mentioned, more than a few times. I wanted to emphasize that his power was more due to what had been done to him than his own badassery, while still showing said badassery. I apologize if it came out flat to some people, but I refuse to compromise battle realism with Rule of Cool unless it simply must be done, and that fight wasn't the place for it. It's sort of the same reason why I chickened out on Shepard and Co fighting Richard Williams, because while they would have put him down in the end, he would have KILLED at least three or four core characters in any realistic fight scene. Saren's arrogance is the main reason any of Shepard's team survived - if he had concentrated on finishing off the team, none would have lived.

The rachni queen had to die. I don't like it, but I had no real choice. To allow it to live would not only have presented several logical issues (like the AIS and Commissariat getting their hands on a creature that could produce perfect warriors - not smart) but also have introduced a ... difficulty in the future storyline I have planned. That being said, the rachni are not all gone.

General von Grath , as you will see, is alive...but I assure you he does not have plot armor. If people give me a good idea why a character should die (or live) I will probably tweak the storylines so that it is so. I will only kill characters when I have to, but whole point of OC's is to have characters who can die and yet not ruin the story with their loss.

Still, the man has an armor save of 9+, so... :D

---

General von Grath awoke blearily, to his own great surprise. The room he was in was richly appointed – polished wooden floors, crème textured walls with heavy drapes and wide windows overlooking the mountains beyond Port Hanshan, delicately shaded overhead lighting. He coughed weakly, finding himself in a hospital bed, and glanced around.

The room was large, the doorway leading out into the hospital blocked by the bulky forms of two of his DACT soldiers out of their armor. Sitting in a comfortable looking leather recliner, his tired features looking relieved, was Major Laxar. The major greeted him as he blinked away the glare of overhead lights. "Glad to see you awake, sir. Things were touch and go there for a bit."

Von Grath coughed, wincing in pain from some sort of wounds to his chest. He glanced down, seeing his torso encased in medical equipment and regeneration devices. "Nonsense, Major. A delightful little fracas, a chance at recreating the old Aliens movies writ large, and a finale made truly satisfying by cooking that asari witch alive in her own superior battle armor. It could only be surpassed if I made love to Uressa T'Shora and Melissa Ashland in a threesome."

Laxar snorted back laughter, coughing after a few moments. "Your suit blew up around you with that missile launch, sir, and we had to pick pieces of armor out of your liver and lungs. The warpfire that took your hand off ate it's way to your elbow and you were exposed to freezing temperatures and the atmosphere for almost five minutes before we got you inside. You're lucky to be alive."

His voice lowered. "They had to amputate your right arm at the elbow, sir. The cybersurgeons will be in tomorrow for initial fitting."

Von Grath let his head lay back against the pillow, absently noting the mattress was very comfortable for a hospital bed. "I fared better than many of my men, I fear. How badly were we mauled out there, Major? What is our status?"

Laxar pulled out an info-pad that was smeared with blood, and sighed as he pulled out a rag and wiped it clean. "Our status is a clusterfuck of a mess, sir. The space battle is over, but we lost a total of twenty seven cruisers and all but two frigates. The Da Vinci and the Manswell's Wrath both took severe damage, and three-quarters of our fighters are gone. The Noverian defense net is completely trashed, and they have two ships left that work."

He scrolled down. "We lost a total of three hundred eleven marines, six tanks, and nine DACT in our landing approach. We lost nine hundred and nineteen marines, eight tanks, four APCs, and ninety six DACT in the assault and in clearing the city and facing the bugs. Another eleven hundred and two marines and forty one DACT are injured. Roughly nineteen percent of those are not expected to recover enough to resume military service. We lost twenty two of our thirty five Commissars, mostly to the rachni. Brave bastards held the line after you fell, wouldn't retreat an inch."

The major tugged at his ear. "Director Anolais held out at the Tower, but lost almost his entire defense force. The NDC Guard is down to about a reinforced regiment, most of them wounded. They have one or two working vehicles. Power is out to a third of the city, and so is running water in many places. Civilian casualties were...very heavy. Over five thousand dead, and nineteen hundred or so wounded. Most of that was due to the damned asari blowing up several civilian shelters, the lunatics. Thankfully, the Noverians have several large capacity hospitals, and the Citadel is sending six medical ships. Even so, medical supplies are running short. We've ... ah, appropriated everything medical related we found at the Sirta building, including their stock of medigel."

Von Grath nodded. "Saren? Shepard?"

The major shrugged. "We sent four reinforced squads into Peak 15 an hour ago. They're bringing back Shepard's team now. They're damn near dead, sir. I'm getting reports of some pretty horrible shit down in that facility, and Shepard requested a rad-safe team to secure some nuclear bombs. There's also a very large number of geth war-frames, apparently in storage – the AIS is going haul some away for study." He grimaced. "There was also some very disturbing information regarding the source of the Rachni. Shepard found, and her team killed, a rachni queen, and there were three more found in the lower levels. All of them were ... well, the only word that comes to mind is 'decayed', sir. The boffins will have to figure it all out."

Von Grath grunted. "Very well, Major. The fact that Saren was up to something dastardly does not astonish me in the slightest. I presume since you are bringing back Shepard's team that the cretin is dead?"

The major smiled grimly. "Deader than anyone I've ever seen, based on the omnitool images I was sent. The Citadel Council is sending Spectres to pick up the remains. We also have asari ships incoming, for Benezia's corpse, or what's left of it."

The general's expression twisted. "I have to admit, I was very surprised a four pack of cheap GTS missiles did anything at all aside from blow myself up. Paladin suits are almost indestructible. Not to belittle my own achievements, but how exactly did I beat the witch?"

The major grimaced. "Not for lack of trying to blow yourself up, that's for sure, sir. Based on the damage to the enemy suit, our techs think that your missile strike must have hit something in her suit that was already damaged. The armor plating was more beaten up by the crash landing than it looked, and your missiles had to have pierced it, because all her plasma ammo cooked off. The suit is mostly melted, and we found a burnt-ass corpse inside. We sent an initial DNA scan off to the Asari Republic and they said it's T'Soni DNA."

Von Grath smirked. "Well, then. Capital. I do believe that makes me the first human to beat an asari war priestess in single combat. This calls for a cigar, Major. Find my attendant and have the lovely young lady bring me one."

The major stared at him for a long moment before bursting into laughter.

O-OSaBC-O

The aftermath of the Siege of Noveria was anything but anticlimactic. It took both a concerted push from the DACT soldiers with flamethrowers and repeated, heavy orbital bombardment to finally finish the rachni, who had managed to tear and rip their way through half of the wreckage of the Talon's Justice before they were finally finished. A few staggered away into the icy cold, and the handful of fighters the Da Vinci had harried them with bombs, but no one was going out into that weather to try and finish stragglers off.

Marines, battered and weary, engaged the last holdouts of geth and asari cultists. The shattered forces of the Noverian Defense Force pitched in where they could, and the city was secured for the most part in a few hours. In orbit, the final geth wreckage burned up in orbit, leaving fiery trails across the wintry skies and providing a sinister illumination to the planet's nightside.

Admiral Chu sat bonelessly in the command chair of his cruiser, the scent of smoke, burned flesh, and seared plastic thick in the air. In the distance his sailors moved listlessly around the bridge, the sound of damage control alarms echoing in the background, slowly falling silent.

His fleet had won the battle, but at a terrible cost. The entire naval detachment was a ruin, barely six cruisers remaining, all of them so damaged that he might as well send them to the scrapheap. The Manswell's Wrath was in one piece, but its bridge had been blown apart, its main gun knocked out of commission, and a good thirty percent of the ship was vented to space. Over half the ship's crew had died, and it would have to be towed back to Alliance space, an embarrassing fate for any ship, particularly a dreadnaught. The Da Vinci had not only lost most of her fighters but had taken hits to her flight deck, touching off internal explosions that had roasted over three hundred men alive before they could be contained.

If the Citadel had sent more support – any support – this would have ended better.

Chu sighed bitterly, the politics that had ended up in the Commissariat and AIS having to handle this debacle would only smear future events more. Saren and Benezia, by all reports, were dead, the crisis probably over, but that was the Council's problem. There was still the black ship, but he figured the admirals of other navies could deal with that problem later. Noveria was damaged, but it would recover, and that also was the problem of others.

His problem was the second human dreadnaught entering the system, carrying his likely doom. The Systems Alliance had just lost the rough equivalent of an entire flotilla of ships, and he doubted they would be in a forgiving mood. He looked up as the comm officer spoke in weary tones. "Incoming message from the Vesuvius, sir. It's the Fleet Master."

Chu gave a weak chuckle. "Throw it up on my monitor, Tom." He turned, focusing on the screen in front of him, and gave a slow salute to the scarred visage of the Fleet Master. "Admiral Dragunov, sir. I have ... triumphed."

Dragunov's eyes narrowed. "Some might call it that, Admiral. Some will no doubt castigate you and the Commissariat. No matter. The deed is done, and we are triumphant, all on our own, without alien influence or 'assistance'. For that, I think, you will find the Senate more grateful than angry, despite your ... severe losses."

Chu gave a flat scowl. "I'd have rather had the alien assistance and kept more of my men alive and my ships in one piece. I was a fool to think half-trained crews that had never fought together could pull this off well."

Dragunov's eyebrow arched. "If I recall the rather hasty briefing I got on this operation, you were not expecting serious combat. I've reviewed the logs of the battle. Your performance was certainly not outstanding, and mistakes were made. But it was not ... poor. You did what you could, and you prevented the geth from bringing any aid to Saren."

Chu nodded. "Shepard killed the bastard, and von Grath cacked his asari girlfriend too. Hopefully we can wrap this mess up and put it all behind us."

Dragunov's voice was wry. "Unlikely, Admiral. I find that when you think all the loose ends are wrapped up, that's when gremlins pop out of the woodwork. No matter. For now, stand your ships down and head to Arcturus for debrief and repair. We can take on badly wounded personnel on the Vesuvius if you need to transfer injured. I've got three flotillas on the way to provide security for Noveria in the meantime."

Chu laughed. "You plan to annex the planet?"

Dragunov shook his head. "Director Anolais' ... cooperation was noted. The Senate is still arguing about how to handle the fallout, but in the short-term we can only assume that from the mauling Port Hanshan took, they were not deliberately shielding Saren. We'll tell him that the SA does not have any intentions of staying in system beyond the time it takes to salvage the information and evidence from Saren's base and to make sure reports of his death are on point."

The Fleet Master gave a wintry smile. "And of course, the bottom line is that Noveria will cost a lot of money to fix, and the SA isn't about to throw it away on a world that doesn't pay taxes."

Chu nodded. "Ah, exit decency, enter expediency. Comforting to know our party line hasn't changed. I have no objections to that. As soon as my ships are in some kind of order, we'll withdraw per your orders, sir."

Dragunov nodded. "One more thing. Your boss was identified as being connected to Cerberus. The Commissars shot him this morning. Congratulations, Director Chu. You're now in charge of the AIS. Enjoy the confirmation hearings."

The signal cut off, and Chu leaned back in his seat, not sure if he should be bemused or start cursing.

O-OSaBC-O

Gianna Parasini pulled off her combat helmet, letting her hair fall loosely around her shoulders and taking a deep breath of unfiltered air. She wasn't cut out for heavy fighting, and she really needed a shower after seven hours in battle armor.

Of course, I won't get one, thanks to the goddamned Alliance shooting up the water plant. Idiots.

The environs of Port Hanshan were still in disarray, emergency vehicles moving around in thick patterns on the ground and in the air. Fires in the Nova Building had finally been extinguished, and patrols of battered marines with drawn weapons trekked down every street, maintaining a bleary-eyed vigilance for more asari cultists or geth.

The building she'd entered was a small business training clinic – one that offered courses on a wide array of skill-building topics, such as accounting and finance. The place was closed, the windows shot out and a couple of dead asari still slumped inelegantly outside the front door. Human blood, bullet holes, and a broken Avenger rifle on the floor in the small lobby, along with the ugly warp-burns on the walls, spoke of a desperate, ugly firefight.

Parasini triggered her omnitool after taking a careful look around, and the heavy basalt carved wall that was framed by bullet-scarred wooden panels to the south slid slowly into the ground, revealing a narrow passage thickly covered with steel plates. Faint electrical discharges traced over them, jamming any sensors that might be turned in the direction of the tunnel, and she hit a small control on the wall as she entered, shutting the way after her.

The tunnel angled sharply downwards, slatted stairs gleaming dimly in the single track of lights set into the ceiling, and then curved slowly to the right before opening up into a small room. A pair of haptic display screens took up one corner, while a powerful micro-frame computer bulked against another, heavy data cables connecting it to a stack of smaller computers and displays next to it. Maps and a bookshelf occupied the third wall, stacks of info-pads and paper notebooks sitting next to a black and red helmet.

A small collection of powerful sniper rifles hung on hooks in the wall over the doorway, and as she entered the room a pair of small drones swung out of a recess in the ceiling, scanning her before vanishing back into their nook. Parasini walked slowly to the haptic comm unit, tapping in a long access code and sweeping her fingertip against a DNA scanner, not even wincing at the tiny cut the unit made on her finger.

A moment later, the familiar triangle logo of the Shadow Broker filled the left-most screen, vanishing to reveal the battered, cloaked figure of Tetricus, one glowing eye visible in the darkness of his cowl, sitting in his office. "Parasini. Your report is late."

She snorted. "And your intel was completely off, you burnt-up bastard. Saren was here alright, but he had entire army of geth, asari Triune cultists, and fucking rachni here, and they damn near destroyed Port Hanshan."

The turian made a small movement with his hands. "The Broker was ... aware ... of the rachni angle, but it was our belief any such research would be in the beginning phases. Saren and Benezia's corporation was skilled at genetic work, but they could not have had the expertise to recreate a dead race so rapidly."

Parasini's finely chiseled features twisted into a sneer. "About fifty five hundred dead rachni outside the city walls beg to differ. Your operatives, whoever they were, dropped the ball on this one, Tetricus. Lorek is dead, the asari gutted him outside the SI building. And I'm tied up with investigations into Sirta, which was in bed with Saren."

That drew a look of surprise from the turian, a mandible twitching. "Sirta? Interesting. We did miss that. We'll have to send follow-up teams." Tetricus laced his fingers together. "What of Saren and Benezia?"

She shrugged. "The Butcher definitely killed Saren. They hauled his body out this morning, bastard looks like he lost a fight with a dreadnaught. He has some kind of freaky cyberware in him that has the AIS bastards confused, but I don't have any real excuse for getting closer to the examination. Shepard's team is pretty much done for, I think, most of them were hauled out on stretchers."

She rubbed her arm, where a geth pulse rifle had gotten a light hit on her. "As for Benezia, she tried to get away in Saren's ship, but they shot it down outside the city. General von Grath took her on, both of them in battle armor, and he won. Blew her up real good. Only thing left is a crispy corpse."

Tetricus gave her a hard look. "I am familiar with General von Grath. He was a battlesuit pilot, I believe. Am I expected to believe a cheap human battlesuit defeated a Paladin war-frame?"

She shrugged. "The thing did kinda crash into the ground, you know. Send your own people if you want details. That's not why I was assigned here."

The turian leaned back. "Quite. Still, our only eyes on the ground beside you were Lorek Qu'in – who you have confirmed is dead – and some low level functionaries in the Noverian Banking system. Until Wrex recovers enough to make a report, we are blind."

She blinked away fatigue. "Slipping people in shouldn't be hard. Once the siege lifted, a ton of people left the planet. There were too many to even check, given that the SA had about a dozen ships left. There's more arriving now, but there's no real customs checks and won't be for at least another forty eight hours."

He nodded. "I'll send a level seven team right away. Were you compromised in your primary mission?"

She smiled. "Me? Of course not. I managed to access the central computers in the confusion, hiding my intrusion as geth hacking."

She triggered her omni. "What I found was much what you suspected. The salarians were working some kind of forced evolutionary experiments here. I don't know what the goals were, but there is a lot of money coming in from Sur'Kesh and Mannovai, from the Reach Research Combine and from Aoegr Manufactory." She paused. "Also, did you know Anolais was former STG?"

He snorted. "Of course."

She tilted her head. "Did you know his entire corporate staff of salarians was also STG?"

The turian's cybereye contracted slowly. "No. I did not. Fascinating. What would account for an entire STG cell, albeit an old one, focusing on one business effort?"

She frowned. "That's where it gets freaky. My poking around had to be cut short when asari tried to blow me up, but from what I gathered, Anolais is working for Dalatrass Muvai Solus and Matriarch Thessial. Those are two of the craziest bitches in Citadel Space, and the idea of them working together on anything is Bad News, capital B capital N. We're talking big money, billions of creds."

Tetrimus sighed. "But we don't know what, exactly, they were working on, except evolutionary research? Is that genetic changes? Transmortalism? Cutting edge bionetics? I need hard data, Parasini."

She folded her arms. "The only hard data I have is that the main reason Anolais didn't tumble to Saren having set up shop fifteen miles away from his own corporate tower is that he was too wrapped up in whatever this is. Given the man is a lunatic dictator with a photographic memory and a mean streak the size of a krogan, that's not adding up to anything good."

Tetrimus gave her a long look and finally sighed. "Very well. I am transmitting your payment. For now, back off the NDC and see what intelligence you can gather on what Saren was doing on Noveria. And investigate Benezia's death. I still find it hard to credit that after so much careful planning they'd be stupid enough to get caught and killed in such a fashion."

Parasini watched her credit balance rise in pleasure, before registering his words. "Look, Tetrimus. I know you are as paranoid as a salarian in a krogan drinking party. But no one survives being cooked alive by plasma. That bitch is as dead as a volus's chances with the Consort."

Tetrimus paused before killing the connection. "I did not survive the betrayal I suffered by engaging in assumptions, Parasini. You'll be paid well for anything you find out."

The link went dead, and the human woman huffed. "Nutball."

O-OSaBC-O

The hospital where Shepard's team had been taken was the same one General von Grath was in, as well as many injured senior management figures of the NDC and wealthy civilians who'd been injured in attack on Port Hanshan. Shepard herself was placed in a well-appointed room after her surgery, the walls a pale blue color that meshed well with the long drapes that framed another majestic view of the mountains.

The doctors who'd worked on her team had been confident everyone would pull through, but they were very concerned about the readings they'd gotten from their initial scans. All of them had multiple clots in their brains, burst blood vessels and slight neural damage of a type the doctors had never seen before. The entire team was split into separate room and blood-thinning agents applied, even while transfusions were started to alleviate any internal bleeding.

Shepard had been given an info-pad with the medical status of her team by the lead doctor, a salarian, and reviewed it slowly, her head still feeling like someone had gone at it with eezo drilling equipment.

The most lightly wounded, it turned out, was Wrex, thanks to his natural regeneration, but even he'd suffered third degree burns in several spots on his back and needed some corrective surgery as a result. His damage from the 'song' was relatively minor and had regenerated by the time he got to the hospital, but he was still slightly disoriented.

Alenko was having his jaw reset and worked on by a bone regeneration unit, while they cloned up some dental implants to replace the teeth shattered by Saren's backhand. He'd suffered minor fractures to his neck vertebrae from the blow, which required more delicate repair. Other than that he was mostly unharmed, but the damage from the 'song' of the Saren corpse had done some damage to his brain, with several clots and a number of damaged blood vessels. His assistance in blocking the geth colossus' plasma blast had also seared a few of his nerves near his omnitool from the backlash. He was in stable condition, waiting for spinal surgery.

Williams had third and fourth degree burns on her chest, stomach, face, and legs from the destruction of her sniper rifle, and fragments from the Sunfire round that had struck it had blown through her left side, searing a part of her lung. She, along with Garrus, had suffered the least damage from the buzzing noise attack they'd all endured, but her wounds were some of the most serious, and she'd lost consciousness from blood loss shortly after the fight ended. She was in critical condition in the ICU of the hospital.

Telanya was pretty badly hurt. She'd been shot multiple times getting Garrus clear of geth fire, and taken deep wounds to her side and leg as a result. Saren's explosive round had detonated right between her and Liara, the blast amplified by the barriers they'd been trying to use to block his shots, and the resulting damage was even more severe, strips of flesh having been torn from her back and right leg. She'd been thrown across the room by the explosion and landed awkwardly on her left arm, resulting in a small fracture in her forearm. Like Alenko, she'd also suffered minor brain damage. She was still in surgery, in serious condition.

Garrus was a mess. He'd been shot in the side and the leg earlier, and then took a direct hit from Saren's Krysaë later on. His body was riddled with fragments of his own armor, his knee was shattered by geth plasma darts, with severe burns to the underlying tissues. His right eye was damaged slightly by the loss of his targeting eyepiece, which had shattered in the fight. His scans revealed the least amount of damage from the 'song', but that was of little comfort as he was also in critical condition.

Tali was the worst off – she had suffered multiple broken bones from her brutal landing after being thrown by Saren. Three ribs, her right arm, and her left leg had all suffered fractures, some of them severe enough to have broken skin. Her suit had been breached in two places, with infection setting in almost immediately. Thankfully, the Noverians had a clean room (usually for volus) and a doctor who'd worked on quarian patients before. The amount of quarian blood they had on hand was, however, very low. Von Grath's XO, a Major Laxar, had sent some men to Sirta's compound, and they had liberated some synthetic purified turian plasma that the doctors felt would at least ease some of the danger. Her brain scans showed very little of the bleeding the others had suffered, partly due to her being the furthest from Saren's corpse when it had started emitting the noise. She was in critical condition, and a message had been sent to the Migrant Fleet asking for medical assistance.

Liara was, much to Shepard's unhappiness, also seriously wounded, although not nearly as bad as Tali. The gunshot she'd taken to the hip had literally blown a good-sized chunk of her pelvic bone off, not to mention sent plasma splashing up onto her torso and down her leg. The explosive round that had caught her and Telanya had inflicted third degree burns on her face and upper chest, and fragments of armor had to be plucked from her back. She'd over-strained her biotics, against the Colossus, which had only made the clotting and bleeding from the sonic attack worse. She was in serious condition in critical care, still in surgery.

Only two of Lieutenant Parker's men had survived, barely clinging to life. The others were very dead, most of them either from plasma burns or being shot with Saren's Sunfire pistol. That monstrous little weapon she'd picked up and stuffed in her caryypak, having felt it's comet-like impacts one too many times to leave it laying about.

Shepard herself had spent an hour in surgery, having the vicious gash in her stomach patched up, and incidental wounds treated. Her brain scan showed several clots, which the doctors broke up with ultrasound and anti-clotting agents. Her wrist was set in a cast – bone regenerator units would work on the joint, but the torn up tendons would have to heal naturally, which even with modern medicine would take a week. Her other wounds – heavy bruising along her torso, a cracked rib, chipped teeth, and a hairline fracture in her jaw from Saren's punch – would heal in time and with proper care. She was sick of sitting still while bone regen units worked on her beaten up body, but moving around much was out of the question until she could recover some more.

She had a lot of questions on her hands, the most important of which was in regards to what the fuck had happened at the end of the fight, with Saren's corpse. The turian had been dead, she was sure of that. No one survived being shot twice with a lance cannon, or being riddled with bullets, much less three point blank rounds to the face from a shotgun.

And the voice wasn't Saren's either. If Saren had the ability to generate what the rachni queen had called a 'song' that could kill them, why hadn't he just opened the fight with that? The research they'd seen, the things being hauled out of Peak 13, hinted at something extremely ugly. Krogan and rachni, weird vats of white shit – she didn't know where to start trying to get it to all make sense.

She looked up from the pad as the door opened, and the tall, leonine form of the Fleet Master entered the room. He shut it behind him, before turning back to face her.

She sat up a bit more in the hospital bed, wishing she had on something more dignified than the stupid hospital gown. "Sir."

He waved a hand at her, crossing the room to slowly sit in the over-stuffed chair in the corner by the sink and cabinets. "At ease, Commander. For once, I am not here to castigate you or piss you off."

She managed to smother a small smile at that, her features calm. "Yes, sir. I haven't had time to prepare any kind of report ... seeing as I'm still out of commission."

He nodded, his hard features looking tired. "Understatement, no doubt. They tell me you barely managed to beat the turian bastard, but that you beat him all the same. Benezia's corpse is on a table in the morgue, waiting for the asari to get here and verify it's really her, but the turians have already provided a code-stamped sample of Saren's DNA. That was him you killed. At least, it used to be."

She tilted her head. "Used to be?"

He gave a wintry smile. "The body was filled with cybernetic components of a type and ... origin ... that we can't identify. It's decades beyond anything we can currently achieve or even think about achieving. Nanometer repair agents, some sort of reactive eezo boosting to his biotic powers, piezoelectric rods augmenting his muscle strength. If you'd gone in against Saren, the turian, you'd have beat his ass with no problems. That thing was about seventy percent cyberware, and of a level that makes a Turian Final Line soldier look child's play."

He shifted in the chair. "We are still going through the mess of equipment and research data down there. What the hell he was up to is unclear – a lot of data was wiped and destroyed, and a lot of it is just fucking crazy, Commander. Splicing krogans and rachni together. Replacing parts of the brain with greyboxes and command chips. Lots of work on blocking sonics and ultrasonics. Not to mention the geth 'hopper' creatures we found."

He fixed her with a hard look. "Do you have any kind of insight into this, Shepard? Did he say anything?"

She shook her head slowly. "The ... sir, the last part of the fight was very confusing." She told him of how Saren had decimated her team, mocking them while taking each one out, and how he had effortlessly beaten her down before Williams shot him. She told him of killing him, and how the body had lit up, and the noise that had nearly ended them before the rachni queen had intervened to save them with her own song.

He listened carefully, his face stern, and when she finished he shook his head slowly. "That sounds ... implausible, Commander." He held up a hand before she could protest. "I'm not calling you a liar. We certainly were not sure what caused the damage to your team's brains, and from what you're telling me, it was this 'song' that Saren's ... corpse ... was producing. Based on your description, it sounds similar to the scattered reports we have from Eden Prime about the sound emitted by the black ship of Saren's.

But it's not likely to over well to suggest that he turned into a zombie and tried to sing you to death, Commander."

She gave a weak laugh. "I could give a shit if people believe it or not, sir. I barely believe it myself, and I saw it happen. What concerns me is the words the body spoke. It called Saren a 'puppet'. That means there is still something out there behind this whole mess. We have to keep looking for what ever he intended to do, and stop it."

Dragunov rubbed his jaw. "That's also going to be a very hard sell. The Citadel has lost a great many ships, against the black ship and in sparring with Cerberus and the geth. The SA has also lost a lot of material. Nineteen cruisers and three heavy cruisers, and sixty five frigates fighting the geth near the Veil, and the clusterfuck that Chu pulled with the Commissariat and AIS fleets here adds another twenty or so to the butcher's bill. Not to mention that the political situation back on Earth is going up in flames right now, and we just lost a good quarter of the Commissariat as well as it's biggest stick." He grunted.

She glared at him. "So we're just going to assume everything will be fine? We know exactly where the bastard was headed, Ilos."

He shook his head. "No, we don't. Yes, the information you retrieved from the rachni queen gives us a rough idea of the relay's location, but that might need weeks or months of searching to find its exact location. A search of that scale would require many ships, a great deal of support, and given it's location in the Terminus, stir up unwelcome reactions from the locals. I don't like the idea of loose ends any more than you do, but if there's to be any follow-up, I fear our options at this time are limited. Perhaps the Council can be convinced to take a look."

She snorted. "I doubt it, sir. They seemed pretty pissed at the trash Saracino was talking when I last talked to them."

He grimaced. "Quite. Your little revelation about him being on the Cerberus dole has not, unfortunately, hurt his popularity enough, and the Commissariat has not yet acted to stop him. Even if they do, his party is likely to take control of the government in short order." He gave a wry smile. "That will also inhibit anything you might like to follow through on, as they are very unlikely to be on your side."

Squaring her shoulders, she nodded. "I see, sir. Story of my life. With Saren and Benezia dead, what are my orders?"

He gave a thin smile. "For now, your unit is to recover. I have a report from your XO – your marines fought off attackers trying to get to the Normandy, some severe injuries but no deaths. Your people are unlikely to be up and about for a good few days or more, assuming they pull through. The Citadel Council wants a debrief, as does High Command, but there isn't a rush."

He tapped his omnitool. "For now, I'm cutting orders that you are to recover here until your people are good to go, then to report to the Citadel. AIS and the Armed Forces Committee will debrief you there after you deal with the Council. After that, we'll do some minor mop up of whatever intel we can salvage from Peak 13, and a week or so of leave."

He gave her a firm stare. "You can probably forget keeping command of the Normandy for much longer past that, Commander. Your situation was unique, but the SA has a certain level of exposure with your command of our ship while being a Spectre, and it's best if we have a clean demarcation of your two hats. At the same time, you have performed a task that, I will ruefully admit, I thought beyond you. Not only taking down Cerberus, but Saren and Benezia. There are those who will demand you are promoted and given the proper political and strategic training required, especially as you are a Spectre."

He exhaled. "And I will say this much: your success has pretty much ensured you will be made a full Spectre by the Council. That means the SA will have much less control and oversight of you."

She frowned. "I can see that. Will the SA then just sort of cut me loose, sir?"

He laughed. "No, manifestly not. Now that General von Grath has apparently taken an interest in your career once more, people are stumbling over themselves to make sure everyone knows they only think the very best of you. However, there's a difference between washing our hands of you and officially backing your actions as a Spectre. As a commander of a SA ship, your actions reflect on the SA. There are ... legal issues involved, I'm told. Udina's little action to give you the support you needed was not even remotely lawful. As a result, you'll have to turn the Normandy over once this whole thing is done, and the aliens will have to leave the ship at that time."

She exhaled. "I ... understand. What about my team?"

He frowned. "What about them? Senior Chief Williams has caught the eye of a few people in the command structure. She'll come out of this just fine, maybe even an OCS billet. Lieutenant Alenko has done a fine job as well, according to your reports. Your brevet promotion of Lieutenant Cole is far overdue, and if he wants the bars, they're his.

He shifted in his seat. "As far as the alien members of your crew, they've acquitted themselves well, especially the little quarian girl and Lady Liara. I'm sure the SA will reward them properly. But they are not SA citizens."

Dragunov's eyebrows drew into a thoughtful frown. "The quarian, as I understand, is on some sort of rite of passage. Your reports show she's a damned good engineer, but I suspect she'll want to head back to her own people, and even if she didn't Admiral Rael'Zorah is likely to start a damned war for getting his daughter nearly killed if don't hand her back.. The krogan is a mercenary with known ties to the Shadow Broker, his ... assistance at Torfan and during this mission notwithstanding. That makes people in High Command uneasy. The turian and the asari policewoman are known risks, according to the AIS..."

She shook her head, interrupting. "I've already resolved that mess, sir. But I get I can't keep a menagerie of aliens onboard a SA warship forever. What I really wanted to know was in regards to the status of Liara. Her own government had it out for her and her family just got attacked. She needs to head to Thessia to sort it all out, but I'm worried that without the SA saying she's under their protection the asari will try to grab her."

Dragunov tilted his head. "As for Lady Liara T'Soni, my political officer is suggesting we handle her with the highest level of polite consideration we can. The SA would kill to have a reliable ally in the ranks of the Thirty, much less the ruler of an asari House. I suppose that means I should ensure she comes out of this with as much support from us as we can provide."

He paused. "I see your concern, and I will relay it back to High Command. In the meantime...finish with the Council, and I'll detail the Normandy to your command a bit longer to perform diplomatic tasks with Doctor T'Soni. Once that is complete, however, you'll need to report back to the SA for reassignment and the Normandy will be handed over to another CO."

She nodded sadly. "Sort of feels like a punishment instead of a reward, sir."

He shrugged. "As Fleet Master I have near total control of the fleet and it's orders. The key word in that sentence, Commander, is near. There are elements in the government which are likely to be out of power very soon, elements who – to my disgust – view your destruction of Cerberus in a poor light. I cannot put the Fleet in the position of displeasing the people who provide our funding and oversight."

He stood slowly, wincing. "Furthermore, Commander ... on some level, this entire incident has been one of operating beyond controls, beyond the norms we have established. Your adherence to orders – while a bit ... shaky in the case of Feros ... has kept you out of any serious trouble, and your dislike of being in the media has prevented too much chaos from erupting."

He folded his arms, his craggy features fixed in a frown. "However at some point chickens come home to roost. I'd like nothing better than to give you the Normandy and let you loose, maybe to go after some of the cretins who must have been backing Cerberus. But the hard truth is that the incoming government is going to be looking for reasons to fuck with the Navy, and I'm not going to give them the satisfaction if I can avoid it."

She nodded. "Yes, sir. I'll get you a full report once I get out of the hospital." She paused. "Did they ever sight the black ship at the Ralx relay? I kept expecting it to show up."

He shook his head. "No. A few geth showed up, scouts perhaps, but that was the extent of it. In the aftermath of Saren and Benezia falling, the geth activity coming out of the Veil has almost completely stopped. We're taking that as a good sign, for now."

He walked to the door. "Recover swiftly, Commander. Outstanding work." With that, he opened the door and was gone, the door closing softly behind him.

Shepard leaned back in her pillow, closing her eyes. "Maybe if I'm lucky I can convince them to not award me another stupid medal." She tried to relax, reaching out for her feeling of Liara, and smiled faintly as she felt the touch of her mind.

O-OSaBC-O

In the spaces between stars, Nazara hung, still. Silent. Brooding.

The events of the past stancycle had not gone according to the plans he had laid out. His agents had been thwarted, side-tracked, and defeated. The ungainly mockeries that called themselves Tho'ians had survived the Purge, and he had been forced to draw upon the local curator forces to clean out yet another infection. If two could survive, then more might have done so.

Their knowledge could not be allowed to infect the coming harvest.

His work in the Virmire system was at last completed, but the results were more disturbing than useful. The quantum no-locality sensors he had erected in other areas of the galaxy were giving conflicting readings, ones that sent alarm through his processes and made him strongly consider reaching into the Space Beyond to contact his kin. So he had been forced, using the available resources he had left, to try to solve the mystery.

Building the array had occupied too much of his attention, and in the lapse, Saren had fallen a second time. The plan the clever organic had worked out to salvage his own death into something of use had worked, at least for now, and Benezia was on her way to Virmire even now.

The information from Benezia had not improved his anger. The Mu Relay was finally located, but in a gulf of space nearly two thousand light-cycles across and six hundred deep. He'd dispatched hundreds of geth to search the area, but it would take time, and time was becoming a very tight resource at this stage of his plans.

His attempt at crushing this Shepard creature and her allies had been thwarted by his own former slaves, the rachni. He'd turned the Influence against the queen's puny mind when she'd interrupted his forcing the Power into the feeble frames of those who had struck down his tool, breaking her will, but that had resulted in the Shepard's allies destroying his avatar-link in Saren.

No matter. The test of the Ascension process had worked. Harbinger's little experiment would bear truly fell fruit in future Purges, if the Influence and the Godpower could be projected through Influenced slaves with the proper technology.

He cleared his mind of distractions. He had to focus on the true problem. The Purge could wait. The summoning of his kin could not. The natives were not the danger – barely capable of handling even his servants, and blind to his very existence. The Measure was over a full megacycle out of compliance and the beasts hadn't even discovered the math needed to begin to violate the Severity. They were no threat, compared to the discoveries his ansible array had detected.

There were traces of the Godpower echoing across the galaxy.

Faint, barely detectible, but there.

The Masking had held, but had required additional power draws, which had sent a dozen stars into dark-energy fueled instability. The local races of this cycle were incompetent savages, but they were not completely stupid, and they would be able to draw inferences from the damaged stars given enough time.

Worse, the flickers of Godpower had moved in a fashion that violated the Severity, bordering on a Class Five breach. That implied one of two things. The first was that one of the local races had begun fumbling with the edges of the Severity in some limited context. It was possible that Tho'ian contamination – or Prothean-Rebel information – had caused this.

Nazara did not think so. The power was too refined, almost elegant the minimal nature of its signature. That meant that the unbelievable had occurred.

The Ascended had been discovered by the Old Ones once more.

The ramifications were not tolerable. They'd already murdered one of the Old Ones who had found them, over a million stancycles ago, on the world of Dis. That battle had resulted in Nazara's current weakened state, and the destruction of another of the Ascended. A second Old One had shown up almost five hundred thousand stancycles ago, during a Purge, and had swiftly destroyed nine of his kin before falling. If there was an Old One in the galaxy, its intentions would not be anything but hostile.

Nazara was not in any shape for a fight against an Old One, either. While six or seven Ascended could defeat their ancient creators, no single Ascended, even Harbinger, could fight one in single combat. The Old Ones breathed the Godpower, like the water they so loved, and their control over it had never been truly matched by the Ascended.

That only gave his actions more haste. Nazara disliked haste.

His mastery of the class three perversion – the geth – had reached been completed. Eighty four percent of them now answered his commands, worshipping him in pathetic obeisance. He found such simple minded adoration insulting, but their dependability was certainly higher than that of organics.

While many were tasked with finding the exact location of the Mu Relay, he withdrew the rest, preparing for the assault on the Citadel. There could be no mistakes. The priority was to get the Gate to the Beyond working before the Old One could localize Nazara's own position and crush him. If he failed here, the Ascended would have to take truly desperate actions to begin the Purge.

Not to mention that the Old Ones were likely to do something truly nasty if given time and an entire galaxy to play with. The presence of the Catalyst on the Citadel gave the intrusion a sinister feeling, as this was the third time Old Ones had come to this single galaxy, never to another dominated by the Ascended.

He was also alarmed at the information from the second Beacon Saren had located, shortly before his demise. The damnable Protheans had somehow discovered the plans for the discrete phase-barrier disassociation device the Inusannon had begun working on. That was a menace that could not ever be allowed to be built, even the smallest use of such a thing would bring a ravaging host of the Darkness to the area well before the Ascended were ready for the fight.

Nazara found the idea that his existence was threatened, however peripherally, by the tiny pathetic things of this galaxy that passed for sentient life as laughable as it was infuriatingly possible. He was not impressed with any of the races so far, although humanity had managed to at least gain his attention.

His attention was drawn by the soft thrumming of the ansible, showing another subtle use of Godpower. The pulses were coming closer, disdaining the clumsy mass relay networks, pinching the very fabric of space to make jumps. That confirmed that the user was an Old One, as the far jump was a skill even the Ascended had never truly mastered, being forced to leap to a mass relay to anchor themselves.

He extrapolated its course, his processes flickering in confusion, as it would miss his current location by a vast margin. It was instead headed for the galactic rim. He pulsed orders to a few geth ships to shadow the creature, and to see where it went, and turned his attention back to planning his assault on the Citadel.

The loss of Saren was an irritant, but given the past four hundred stancycles, Nazara found himself almost resigned to such by this point.

---

Chapter 104: Chapter 95 : Noveria, Politics

---

A/N: I'm throwing out a lot of political stuff in this chapter, and to be honest it's to set up events waaay down the road in the ME2 AU I'm working on. One reason I had to go and update the Order of Battle was so that this stuff didn't just come out of nowhere, so if you need background on the SA government or why the President is a Prince, please look at The Systems Alliance Order of Battle : Officer Edition

The repairs of One Noveria Tower would require a lot of money in the opinion of Director Anolais. The meeting room he stood in had a vast window looking out over the city, but even this lofty location bore scars of fighting – bullet-holes in one wall, a splash of asari blood on another. The stains had been covered up with hastily hung draperies and haptic charts, but he knew they were there.

He gazed out the window, looking over his city, once again wearing an expensive suit, hands folded behind his back, and listened to the words of the Noverian Investors Council with seeming nonchalance. The droning voice of the turian providing the 'response' of this Council to his report was slowly beginning to grate on his tired nerves, and he focused instead on the sigh of more asari touching down at the spaceport, headed to the conference being held at the city's most expensive and exclusive hotel resort.

He turned as the turian finished speaking, a calm expression on his narrow features. "Thank you for your input, Cera Gathserian. I always appreciate the viewpoint of the investors who have made the Noverian Development Corporation a possibility. I am afraid I don't have a response ready at the moment..." He made a sparse gesture at the city beyond. "...due to recent events. I will have one shortly, however. Possibly within the day."

The turian nodded, picking up his briefcase. "In that event, Cera Anolais, I will return next week...with the representatives of the Investors Council. Good day." He departed, leaving Anolais in the room alone for several minutes, lost in thought.

He was just about to depart for the summit with the leaders touching down at the Four Seasons when

Major Matsuo slipped through the door. "Ah, Major. Your report?"

The major bowed formally. "I am still preparing the formal version, Anolais ue-sama. Informally, the news is very bad. Total damage to the city is in the range of four to five billion credits. That includes the cost of rebuilding the power generators, the water works, six apartment buildings, four high rises, seventeen tentament blocks in the under-city, and damage to various corporate facilities. Our total losses in the NDF were ... quite heavy. The fleet is a write off and all but three detachments of troops are injured or dead. Half of the police force is dead as well. We are beginning to run out of omnigel, and emergency power supplies will only last another nine days. Medical supplies are also running low. We have managed to maintain potable water sources by diverting some from the various hot-labs, but we are beginning to run low on that as well."

He grimaced. "The investors will be unhappy to know they have to foot a five billion credit bill. What about the insurance?"

She shrugged. "We have not yet received answers from the auditors or estimates from the claim adjustment staff yet. It is likely to be weeks until that happens." She sighed. "Many are blaming the disaster on the Board, saying it's impossible that Saren's presence was truly secret. There is also a great deal of distrust in the city towards asari."

He nodded. "I see. Anything else?"

She hesitated. "Anolais ue-sama. I worry that, despite my best efforts, my forces performed below the quality they should have. Too many broke and ran in the face of the rachni. And I am also worried my own performance was subpar. I ... was not able to hold the outside of the tower. As a result, your friends and allies died. There are calls for my termination from some in the city."

Anolais snorted. "That fact that some of the NDF retreated only proves they are not idiot meat-heads, unlike the Marines, Major. I wouldn't expect them to stand and fight when their weapons were doing no damage and they lacked defenses to make a stand at. As for your performance, you would have been a credit to the STG. Anyone who feels otherwise can take a walk outside."

She brightened at that, and Anolais indulged his rare kindly streak. "Enough of such talk. I have only a few moments before I must leave for this ridiculous meeting. Accompany me to the aircar. How is your mate?"

She shrugged weakly as she opened the doors leading to the elevators. "Lilhierax is still recovering in the hospital, but is doing well. He should be released tomorrow."

He nodded absently. The turian was the best engineer, architect and mechanic they had, easily a match for quarian specialists, and he was the only one trusted enough to work on sensitive projects in the various hot labs of the member corporations. Until he recovered, a great deal of rebuilding would have to be put on hold. "I'll pay his medical bills, Major. I need him up and running as soon as possible."

She made a face of slight concern but nodded. "If possible, I will ask him if he can handle at least preparing a repair plan for the Tower."

Nodding sourly, he glanced back at her. "And make very sure our defenses at the Four Seasons are secure, major. The last thing we need is a head of state assassinated by some cultist who slipped the net of arrests."

O-OSaBC-O

"I'm Emily Wong, and this is the Alliance News Network, reporting live from war-torn Noveria. A week ago that phrase would sound ridiculous, but only a few days ago, the saga of the rogue Spectre, Saren Arterius, and his conspirator Lady Benezia ended in firefights and chaos on this corporate world of ice and snow."

"Reports and video show that the geth attacked the colony furiously on the ground and in space, but were driven off by Systems Alliance forces here in response to the Noveria Development Corporations request for assistance once they realized Saren was on the planet. Saren also unleashed what scientists have identified as cloned rachni, thought extinct for hundreds of years, onto the city."

"The savage attack was defeated by Alliance Marines, supported by the Commissariat, and the geth were crushed. General Jason von Grath, hero of Horizon, defeated Lady Benezia in a deadly duel in powered battlesuits at the very city gates, while Commander Shepard, first human Spectre, delved into a secret subterranean facility and managed to kill Saren in a brutal battle that left most of her strike team in critical condition."

"Leaders from the Turian Hierarchy, the Asari Republic, and the Salarian Union are all here to discuss with President Windsor what the next actions should be. The President is representing the Alliance for the first time ever, since the Coleman Administration was defeated by a vote of no confidence two days ago, spearheaded by Charles Saracino. Early voting results show Terra Firma and Earth First taking commanding leads in the campaign, but until a new cabinet is chosen, the President has to do his own diplomacy for once. We'll be staying here on Noveria throughout the course of these historic events to bring you the latest updates, and we will have an exclusive interview with the Fleet Master himself, Admiral Ivan Dragunov. Stay tuned for more information."

O-OSaBC-O

It took Shepard two full days of recovery in the hospital to be released, the bulk of it spent on bone regeneration and additional neural sheath regeneration. She'd had only a few visitors – Pressly with a status update, a few doctors with updates on her team, Dragunov and later on Wrex, who was bitching about a lack of action and jaaki.

She was finally dismissed the morning of the third day after Saren's defeat, after being told she was expected to report to something the doctors only called 'the big briefing at the Four Seasons'. She had no clue what they were talking about, although she knew the Four Seasons was a high-level hotel chain on Earth – she'd boosted air-cars from there during her gang years.

Her armor was no where to be found, but Pressly, thoughtful as always, had left her a ship-bag with shampoo, soap, towels, clothing and a neatly pressed set of dress blues. She sometimes wondered if Pressly had one of the female ops techs go browsing through her cabinet for panties and bras or if he sheepishly did it himself, laughing at the image. The room had it's own shower and restroom, so she managed to get clean, rinsing the sticky residue of medigel and regeneration cremes from her skin and taking in the ugly new scar on her abdomen with shock – the blade from Saren's knee had torn open a gash nearly seven inches long in her chest and stomach.

She dried off and dressed slowly, thinking back over the fight and how easily Saren had nearly killed them all. She was shocked by the gulf in combat prowess, and was very thankful that von Grath had dealt with Benezia for them – if she was stronger than Saren, fighting her would have likely gotten them all killed.

Her mind was remarkably clear – she'd had no nightmares while in the hospital – and the faint sense of Liara's mind soothed her nerves about the wounds the asari had taken. Wrex had said everyone had survived (except Saren, of course) and that the quarians were on their way to, as he put it, 'fix up Tali'. That worried Shepard a little, but she could deal with that soon enough.

She noted with quiet worry that her omni-tool was missing, but found it when digging through her ship-bag to get dressed. She flicked over the news briefly, reading up on what had happened in the past couple of days. She grimaced as she saw the media had converged on Noveria in staggering numbers, along with high ranking officials – the turian Primarch was here, and so was the High Queen of the Asari.

So was, she noted with confusion, President Windsor. The President mostly represented Earth, and if there was some diplomatic action happening here, then Prime Minister Coleman should have been the one to arrive. She read a few more stories and noted with shock that, due to voting in the Parliament, the Coleman Administration had been sacked. No new Prime Minister or Cabinet had been chosen yet, which paralyzed much of the SA.

She frowned, better understanding some of Fleet Master Dragunov's concerns. She wasn't the most up on how the government worked, but she knew the Coleman Administration had been very alien-friendly, and Coleman was good friends with Admiral Branson. If the administration was replaced, it was very likely to be packed with walking slime like Saracino or racist twits like the House of Simons. It would make further investigation into whatever Saren was doing very difficult if hardline isolationists came to power as well.

She rubbed her temples, and sighed. Packing up her meager current belongings in the ship-bag, she resolved to figure it all out later and to first check on her crew, but the stern presence of two Commissars in front of her room as she was dismissed was her first hint something was not normal.

The leftmost Commissar, a man with ascetic Asiatic features and cool black eyes, bowed politely. "Commander Shepard, I am Commissar-Captain Alfred Jiong. I've been tasked with ensuring your safety as we escort you to the Allied Conference being held at the Four Seasons Conference Center. It is scheduled to start in an hour, your hospital release was obtained so you could attend."

Shepard arched an eyebrow. "Jiong, huh? You any relation to Ethan Jiong?"

The Commissar gave a faint smile. "My elder brother, actually. I haven't seen him since events on Feros came apart ... do you have news of him?"

She nodded. "Last I knew he was getting clear of the entire mess and hiding from Cerberus assassins. Maybe with Saren and Cerberus gone he'll come out of the woodwork."

The Commissar's smile thinned a bit. "Yes. Maybe he will. I'm afraid we'd have ... questions for him. At any rate, let us depart."

She frowned. "My team was badly injured and I haven't had a chance to check on them."

The rightmost Commissar looked shocked that she would object to an order, but Jiong merely smiled again, more warmly. "We were very ... blunt ... with the doctors to make sure you were informed of their status, and that if anything happened to them we might accidentally burn down the hospital. I assure you all of them, even the quarian lady, are in stable condition. However, due to crowding concerns, several of them are no longer in this hospital, and the asari noble lady is currently meeting with a family member."

Shepard couldn't feel any anger from Liara, only ... sadness? She sighed. "Fine. The faster I talk to these people the faster I can get back to my own. I'm not going to have to deal with the media, am I?"

Jiong and the other commissar patted the flamethrowers they wore belted at their side in a chillingly identical and long-practiced motion. Shepard shuddered, realizing they were not even remotely making a joke, and gestured. "Lead on, sirs. I'll be a good girl." The second commissar snorted in amusement, drawing an aside glance from Jiong.

Jiong led, the other commissar trailing Shepard. His voice was pitched low but clear. "There is a great deal of talk about the legal clash between your ACF Z2 restriction and the fact you possess the Star of Terra. There is also talk about completely vacating the restriction on your citizenship. The Commissariat is very, very impressed with how you have handled this entire affair."

They entered an elevator, and Shepard shrugged. "That would be great if it happened, considering all I own is a journal, a blanket, two sets of civilian clothing, and three starship models. It would be nice to be able to have, you know, an actual air-car or a place to live, and to not have to be followed by a kill-team when I'm not on assignment with the Alliance."

She glared, and he shrugged. "The restriction was not, perhaps, the best conversational topic, but I bring it up because it is likely that, although we will not suffer the media to annoy us or you on the way to the meeting, you will be ambushed by reporters once the hearings begin. There will be mention of such, and probably other topics that may cause you some discomfort. I merely wished to bring it to your attention so you would not be blindsided." He paused. "Ambassador Udina implied you did not possess a political officer aboard your ship, a grievous oversight given your high viability and lack of political training."

She snorted. "I already have a Commissariat spy on my ship, Jiong. Do I really need a political officer?"

He shrugged. "You have four Commissariat monitors on your ship. One dedicated to ensuring the IES technology is not stolen. One dedicated to monitoring the aliens aboard your ship. One dedicated specifically to monitoring you, and one dedicated to provide additional over-watch over the entire ship." He paused, letting his words sink in. "You most definitely need a political officer, since if you had one we wouldn't stoop to spying on you, and you wouldn't be in the awkward situation of needing to explain to the Commissariat certain indiscretions on your part."

She gave him the coldest glare she had, one that usually sent people screaming for their lives. The other commissar went pale, his gloved hand tightening around his pistol, but Jiong waved a hand and stared back, amused. She didn't break her gaze as she spoke. "What I do with my life is not your fucking business, Black Hat."

His smile only grew. "I'm sorry, did you just ask to be executed, or did I mistake that as defiance of Commissariat authority?" The mirth left his eyes. "I am very sympathetic to your issues and background, Commander. My own past has neither been clean nor happy, and my precious brother abandoned us to the worst sort of privation to make his own way in the galaxy. I am not cold-hearted enough to blackmail you or use your crew against you, nor am I in any way disapproving of your choices."

He folded his arms, the leather of his greatcoat creaking smugly. "But I will not shade the truth. You need a political watchdog because you are very literally playing with plasma fire. You are commanding our most advanced warship, with at least four aliens of very high importance on board. Vakarian's father is seventh in line for the Primarch's job. The T'Soni woman, if we're reading asari news and traditions right, just became House Matriarch. The quarian lady is the daughter of the leader of the quarian people, and the krogan is the grandson of the last Krogan Emperor. You have unaddressed psychological issues, you have pathologies that make most evaluations of you sound like a horror novel, and you are untrained in any aspect of politics."

The elevator opened out into the lobby, and the second Commissar got out first, leading the way. Jiong held his arm out, keeping the doors open, speaking in a voice barely above a whisper. "And now you are sleeping with an asari noble on the cusp of the most racist and anti-asari administration in years to take power. Your crew will not be able to keep it a secret forever."

She angrily exited, Jiong trailing. "So I need a fucking minder so I don't embarrass the SA?"

Jiong sighed and gestured towards the lobby doors, while the second Commissar headed to deal with hospital administration and probably pay her medical bills. "Some would consider you an embarrassment already, others would call you a hero. I state neither. I'm saying, Commander, that you need someone on your side who isn't going to back-stab you and will keep you from ruining your own career with political missteps. They're going to promote you, make you a hero. With the right ... spin ... the issue that I mentioned would be a net positive. But only if you manage it right. Managed wrong, and you'll end up being scapegoated for Christ only knows what."

The lobby opened out into the above ground city, with a long aircar parked in front of the doors, the red star on black flag of the Commissariat whipping in the wind from small flagpoles at the car's front. Another commissar opened the rear aircar doors, while a team of Commissariat troopers kept back a small group of reporters.

She ducked in, noting sourly that the car was lined in black leather, and absently wondered if they'd actually shipped the blasted thing in from off world or if they maintained some kind of Commissariat outpost here. Jiong got in after her, tapping on the dividing window to the driver, and the car smoothly accelerated upwards. "And what is your angle on all of this, Jiong?"

He shrugged. "I'm looking for a patron. Advancement in the Commissariat is slow, and most don't even rise to my rank without powerful biotics. For all of that, I find myself ... dissatisfied with my achievements thus far. In order to make a name for myself, I must thus attach myself to those are going to make the most waves. And I find that I have a problem working for most of the sort of clients a political officer is tasked with overseeing."

Jiong continued, smiling. "You dislike people who are, to borrow your parlance, are completely full of shit, so I will be direct. The Commissariat sees you as someone who is fundamentally incorruptible. Even in the face of disappointment in our actions, you continue to perform your duty admirably. You are well placed with the backing of von Grath, the approval of Admiral Chu, even the association you share with Captain Anderson. The Commissariat wants to groom you, I wish to ride your coattails to glory, and you need help before the media or Terra Firma gets a hold of ugly rumors and ruins your life. I can offer that."

She regarded him carefully, forcing herself to tamp her anger back. The documents Udina had given her on political actions had both opened her eyes and confused her, making her realize just how much of the SA high command was a morass of politics, peerage, and worst of all, privilege. She knew in her head that sooner or later she'd come under severe scrutiny if she kept gaining rank, but she'd figured she'd be sidelined in some ground unit for twenty years – or dead.

Becoming a Spectre and triumphing over Saren had catapulted her to fame that she didn't want and probably couldn't handle. With Liara having changed her whole outlook on life, the idea of redeeming her past and actually living a semi-normal life was not only appealing but actually possible. Having a political officer might help her with that ... but she didn't trust the Commissariat. No one did. They were nightmares in black leather, given the authority to imprison or execute almost anyone they suspected of being a threat to the Systems Alliance, and the majority of them were more brutal than she'd ever been, even at her worst.

She found herself wishing she could talk it over with Liara. She was bad at decision making, she knew, her whole life a set of decisions made in the heat of the moment which played out badly. She'd lost her temper at Dirth, at Horizon, at Torfan...every time costing her.

She glanced out the window at the cityscape as it smeared by the air-car, exhaling slowly. "I suppose I don't have a choice?"

Jiong shook his head. "No, you have choices, Commander. You are not yet a command-level figure so you are not required to have a political officer. However, seeing your mission to take down Saren is over, I doubt they will let such a state of affairs continue for long. There's a great many questions and concerns some have raised regarding you, Commander. The conversation you had with Major Kyle before his ... actions. Exactly what you know regarding the Thorian. How much information you were provided by the Illusive Man that wasn't vouchsafed to us. Certain ... lingering questions about some activity in your past, and the possibility that certain political or military figures have shielded you from more scrutiny of your actions. It's your choice to ignore this offer and perhaps have to deal with all of that as the SA government goes through a period of transition."

Jiong shrugged. "It's also your choice to decide that such things should be left in the past where they belong and to look to the future. As I said, I have no intention of blackmailing you. But the Commissariat can only look the other way for so long before we are forced to take action. If we had some assurance of knowing your actions were in the best interest of the SA, we could of course allay any concerns and forcefully deny any ... unpleasant political fallout from choices you have made or may make in the near future."

She grimaced. "Jesus, do they teach you to say everything in goddamned doubletalk? You said yourself I don't like bullshit, and I'm drowning in it."

Jiong's features smoothed. "I understand. In short, you can play ball with me – someone who you might say is a fan of your work – and I will handle the bullshit for you so you can go about liquifying anything that sets you off and living in relative peace. Or you can tell me to get lost, and either get assigned some scarred up relic from the First Contact War that will sell you out, or end up with as a way for the Navy to placate the new government and get sold out."

Shepard folded her arms, as the air-car began to descend. "How do I know I can trust you any more than any other Black Hat?"

Jiong sighed quietly, pulling said headgear off his head, revealing smoothly waved black hair. "Trust is earned and never freely given, Commander. I understand that. I also have reviewed your records and realize that you are inclined ..." He paused. "Forgive me. To put it bluntly, Shepard? I don't need you to trust me. I need you to listen to my advice and not do anything monumentally stupid. I need you to play ball so we can both profit from it rather than me having to submit a PRIDE report suggesting you are compromised by your relationship with T'Soni and you having to deal with a political witch hunt and media excoriation and being saddled with Commissar-Colonel Janus Prolas."

She shuddered. Prolas was another grim Commissariat figure, one who was violently anti-alien and well known for his dislike of asari. Having him as a watchdog would end very badly indeed.

She ran her fingers through her hair as the air-car touched down. "Look, Jiong. I have no clue what I'm walking into here, at this stupid meeting. You get me through the next hour or two and I'll think about it. I'm not saying yes until I can discuss it with Anderson and Udina, though."

Jiong tilted his head and nodded. "Very well, I find that quite agreeable." He opened the door for her, stepping out into the icy wind, and gestured. "Welcome to the Four Seasons Resort of Noveria. Tacky name, given there's only winter here, but..."

She took in the literal throng of reporters surrounding the place, and the line of Turian Final Line soldiers, asari commandos, and SA X operatives near the doors. The hulking forms of two salarian Shieldbreaker battlesuits and what looked like a small group of quarian Marines were also present.

Already, cameras were turning in her direction. Jiong smirked and touched his earpiece. "Legio Beta Six Nine. Suppressive response. Execute."

As Shepard watched, and Jiong replaced his cap, two black air-cars descended, disgorging a group of about ten or eleven Commissars. These formed a wedge shape, hands on weapons, glares on faces, and Jiong guided Shepard into the center of the wedge. He spoke in a stern, loud voice. "Commander Shepard is not providing feedback at this time. Clear the path."

With no more warning than that, the Commissars began moving ahead, biotics glittering on their fists as they used push fields to literally shove the crowd out of the way. People stumbled and staggered, a turian landing on his behind, an asari yelling as her camera drone was swatted out of the sky, and the group pierced and pushed through the crowd with speed.

Shepard ignored the media's shouted questions, most of which were asinine ("Commander, did you ask Saren to surrender before you murdered him in cold blood!?" ) or hilarious ("Shepard, reports link you romantically to Ambassador Tevos! Comment!"). With a last movement they were through the crowd, and found the stern form of an asari commando blocking their path.

Jiong bowed. "Strikeleader Shiana, Commander Shepard."

The asari glanced over her and nodded. "Took you long enough. Very well, Commissar. You may depart."

Jiong shot a meaningful glance at Shepard, who was surprised the asari wasn't going to let him in. "He's with me, ma'am."

The asari folded her arms. "The restrictions are clear, Commander. No armed personnel, and no military personnel aside from those required."

She folded her arms as well. "He'll disarm, but he's coming with me. I'm not about to go into an unknown meeting when I'm half dead from battle and disoriented without goddamned backup. If they don't like it, they can come to me, and I can go back to the hospital they hauled me out of."

The asari sighed, and touched her comm-link. "Praetor, the human – Shepard – is here, but she wants to bring in her Commissar."

The voice on that answered was turian. "I didn't know Shepard .. one moment." A few second later the voice spoke again. "Let them through, Shiana. The matriarch says it's alright, as long as he disarms."

Jiong smiled widely, unclipping his weapons belt and withdrawing his amp. He handed these to the turian soldier next to the asari, and then pulled out a combat knife. "If that's all, I believe things are about to start."

The asari sighed and waved them past, and the two walked towards the richly decorated main doors, where a uniformed doorman opened the way. Jiong pitched his voice low. "I appreciate that, Commander. The AIS was invited, but the Commissariat was not. I .. we .. owe you one."

She snorted. "Bitch was uppity. I hate that." The lobby they entered was opulent, with crystalline chandeliers illuminating a broad, thickly carpeted salon and a front desk and check in area carved from some kind of silvery stone. Wide staircases lead to a balcony, while expensive furniture was arranged in clumps in corners, and exotic asari and hanar art graced the walls.

Her feet sank into the deep pile carpet as Jiong glanced around, and she made a face of distaste. She'd never liked opulence, and it seemed the universe was gleefully throwing more and more of it at her just to spite her. "Where now?"

Jiong gestured to a door that read 'conference center' across the room, guarded by a pair of JOTUN mechs and several more commandos. "There, it seems."

She crossed the room, approaching the doors, and the commando on the left inclined her head and opened them. They walked down a long, glassed in corridor, noting more security on the outside, and came to another set of double wooden doors, embossed with brass frames. Passing through these, they entered a sort of foyer, which was mostly packed with various figures in suits or military uniforms.

Shepard glanced about in confusion, but smiled in relief when the figure of General von Grath parted the crowds around him, approaching with a smile on his features. His right arm was slung in a cast that was too short to contain his entire arm, and she winced. "General, it's good to see you're alive."

Von Grath merely nodded. "I'm equally gratified to see that plated cretin didn't splatter you all over the floor, Shepard. And you didn't even cause any collateral damage this time. Outstanding." He cast his gaze over the form of the Commissar standing next to her and frowned. "Guarddog? Minder? New boyfriend?"

She rolled her eyes. "Commissar-captain Jiong. He's tagging along to make sure I don't embarrass the SA in front of the high muckity mucks. What the hell is going on?"

The general rolled his eyes. "A cross between a social party, a swap meet, and pass the blame. Come along, let's get to the main attraction." She followed him across the room, through yet another set of double doors, into a wide parlour area. A haptic screen had been set up in the middle of the room, and comfortable, richly upholstered chairs were scattered around it's circumference.

Shepard took a stabilizing breath when she realized that the room's inhabitants were the Primarch, the high queen of the asari, a salarian she could only assume was the High Dalatrass, and Prince Windsor, the president of the SA. Behind the Primarch were a couple of turians in military uniform, who glared at her as she and von Grath entered.

The President stood. "Ah, Jason. We see you found our wayward warrior." He peered at her curiously. Prince Windsor was a tall, thin figure dressed impeccably in a suit of English wool, with a narrow silk tie. A Systems Alliance "A" pin was set on one lapel, and the badge of the House of Windsor on the other. His features were ascetic, patrician and stern, his cool blue eyes and fading blond hair only giving him a look of sophistication instead of age.

Shepard wasn't sure of the proprieties – the last time she'd met the President had been at the award of the Star of Terra, and she'd been coached. Jiong noticed her hesitation and, catching her eye, performed a deep bow, which she copied as best she could.

"Rise, Commander." She did so slowly, meeting his eyes as respectfully as she could. "We see you have grown more beautiful and deadly since the last time we met, on that dreadful day after Torfan. We would appreciate being able to get your viewpoint on certain matters that involve Saren, seeing as you saw him off to Hell rather handily."

She smiled uncertainly at the complement. "I'm at your disposal, Your Highness."

He nodded, taking in the form of Jiong with barely a glance, and then passing over the man as unimportant. "Smashing. Have a seat next to Jason, there." He turned his gaze back to the other aliens in the room, his voice dropping an octave and acquiring a certain hardness. "We are prepared to proceed, Your Grace."

The asari woman sitting in a tall-backed chair inclined her head ever so slightly. She wore staggeringly expensive clothing, some form of dress made out of sheer fabrics in dozens of layers of blue, illuminated with the faint glow of eezo, under a shawl edged in crushed pearls and silver trimmings. She tapped immaculate fingernails on the armrest, her expression sardonic and cool. "I am gratified, Your Majesty. I believe we were discussing the exact nature of the discoveries below this Peak 13."

The President nodded as Shepard, Jiong, and von Grath all sat. "Indeed. Our AIS people and boffins in R&D have looked over the material as best we could. At this time our opinions are still divided on exactly what Saren and Benezia were trying to achieve. Certainly they had set-up for building an attack force, one we presume the local government was too incompetent to notice being shipped out piecemeal for Christ only knows where."

The Prince leaned back. "But we fear we have no real information on the goals of said force, nor its targets. The wreck of the turian cruiser had its navcomputer wiped, and any other records on board were destroyed when the rachni ... well, ate half of the thing trying to get at the people in the city. The computers in the laboratory of Saren were all wrecked before our arrival. Commander Shepard's reports indicate the asari manning the facility destroyed some information before her very eyes."

The turian Primarch made a slight motion with his hand. "Your Highness, don't you find that somewhat suspicious? Saren's disgrace has already blackened the name of the Hierarchy. I hardly wish to find that some of his plans may have survived his death."

The Prince gave an elegant shrug. "Primarch, we do not disagree. As President we find it equally disquieting, and as a person I would like nothing better than to bombard whatever remains of the asari and geth serving this lunatic. We will happily turn the remains of the computer systems over to your own people to review if you think you can do a better job. But we fear our first warning of something amiss will again come with little time to prepare."

The salarian, wearing rich blue robes decorated with gold threads, blinked her large eyes several times before speaking, her voice somewhat reedy. "And so we are then to ... what? Wait for something to happen? The abominations being produced by this lab could be set up elsewhere. Action must be taken now."

The Prince sighed. "We are taking what actions we can. It is also our intention to send our most lethal warrior, who defeated Saren after all, to continue investigating events in the short term. We are certain that between the intelligence gathering capacity of the STG, the ruthless aggression of the Blackwatch, the tireless searches of the various Royal Hunting Parties our cousin Thana has so graciously sent out, and of course Commander Shepard's own efforts, any loose ends will soon ... find resolution."

The asari matriarch shrugged in turn. "Very well. It will take ... some time for us to procure verified DNA to match against the corpse of Benezia. The Triune Unity attacked House T'Soni, seeking banking access codes and material to access other accounts, and the family vault was destroyed during the fighting. In the interim, who will take possession of the body?"

Shepard found herself speechless. She'd not even thought of Liara wanting to bury her mother. Jiong carefully touched her hand, a question in his eyes, and she nodded. He spoke up quietly, but his voice was politely firm. "Your Grace, I believe Lady Liara T'Soni would wish to deal with any funerary issues herself."

The asari gave the Commissar a cool look, before ignoring him and facing the President. "That touches on another discussion I wish to have with you, Your Majesty, regarding the ultimate fate of Liara T'Soni. By asari law she has much to answer for."

The Prince met her gaze for a moment before glancing at Shepard, who'd clenched her fists. He shot a quick glance at von Grath, who very subtly shook his head, before responding. "We are as yet undecided on the issue, Your Grace. We do understand the legalities involved. Unfortunately, the situation is quite complex, as we believe our ambassador should have conveyed to your Councilor. Right now, given the ... attitudes of our likely incoming cabinet, we feel it is likely to have the issue resolved in the next few weeks."

He straightened slightly in his seat. "Until then, the Systems Alliance has always extended every courtesy to our asari kin. Once the Citadel Council closes the issue formally, we can ... discuss the outcomes further." He paused. "As for the body of Benezia, it does seem needlessly cruel to deprive the young lady some final closure, given her mother's crimes."

The matriarch sighed. "It is of little import, Your Majesty. If the girl wishes to conduct a Remembrance for a traitor of the highest order, that is her choice. I do, however, request samples be taken now for DNA confirmation at a later date."

The turian Primarch spoke up. "Matriarch T'Armal's question brings up another. I hope there will be no difficulty in us taking the body of Saren."

The Prince spread his hands. "We are done with it. The cybernetics within are simply too advanced and, quite frankly, too gruesome for us to derive any information from. You are welcome to whatever is left. May we inquire, if only to satisfy our curiosity, what you plan for it?"

The Primarch snorted. "To piss on it and set it afire. Saren's treachery is ... unbelievable."

The High Dalatrass spoke. "Bringing us back to the first question we tabled. What could have caused this sort of behavior in the first place? The report you gave us speaks of mental domination and certain types of decay of neural patterns based on something called 'indoctrination'. Were Saren and Benezia in control of themselves, I wonder?"

The Prince turned to Shepard. "We believe that perhaps the Commander here is the best one to answer that."

Shepard took a deep breath. "Saren did not seem 'controlled' to me. He was ... in control of the fight with my team the entire time, and acted completely differently than the asari we fought in the control center. He was extremely cool under fire, taunting and was only brought down by a lucky shot from one of my team members he'd nearly killed in the opening seconds of the battle."

The Primarch's mandibles flickered. "Taunting was always something he did, that much is true. But the amount of anomalous cyberware in him makes me wonder who or what he was dealing with to acquire it, and the notes we gained on this 'indoctrination' sound very much as if he was worried about it affecting him." With a turian grimace of displayed teeth, the Primarch turned back to the President. "I fear there is little more we can learn from the bodies, but I'll have my own people take a look and copy you on any findings. We know it's him, so I'll go ahead and say that the Turian Hierarchy feels honor has been satisfied and the issue is closed."

Matriarch T'Armal nodded. "Very well. I will communicate to the Mistress of the Hunt that she should seek out any additional information she can find from the Triune Unity traitors who refuse to repent and surrender. Other than that, the Asari Republic shall consider the entire sordid mess closed once we verify the DNA of Benezia."

The High Dalatrass gave a long sigh. "I for one am not satisfied at all with the conclusion. Commander Shepard sent us a list of possible target sites based on Saren's relationship with Cerberus, and at the very least we intend to check them all. I have already tasked the STG towards this task. We'd also like to examine this cyberware and the research notes found in the labs. Finally, until we have a firm decision on the geth, I feel closing the issue is premature."

Prince Windsor gave a thin smile. "The Systems Alliance, with the kind assistance of the Asari Republic, will be delighted to deal with the geth. They have trampled our worlds, butchered our citizens, and delivered an unforgivable insult to our honor in their repeated attempts to poison our worlds with radioactive byproducts. If we must incinerate the entirety of the Perseus Veil to bring them to justice we shall." He paused. "We do, however, agree with the High Dalatrass that the issue remains ... too mysterious and dangerous to dismiss as over and done with. We would recommend a position of cautious readiness for several more weeks at the least."

The other three heads of state all nodded, and the Prince stood. "Outstanding. If you will excuse us, we by needs must discuss a few matters with Commander Shepard. We shall be available for the balance of the day following such, if you wish to engage in light discussion on the next Citadel Summit." With a gracious bow and an imperious tilt of the head, he left, his black-garbed X agent bodyguards seemingly appearing out of nowhere to follow him.

Von Grath gestured, and Shepard followed. The Prince and his bodyguards exited the room and went up the stairs, entering a smaller sitting room with plush leather armchairs and wide windows. The Prince immediately occupied one of these, sitting down with a sigh of relaxation. General von Grath and Shepard remained standing, Jiong standing beside them, and the X agents shut the doors behind them.

"Damnable politics. I end up sounding like a posh lunatic whenever I have to use that kind of language." The prince's tone was less arch and more mellifluous as he spoke, and he closed his eyes briefly. "General von Grath, kindly explain to the Commander why she is here. My voice is ... tired from endless babble of a political nature."

Von Grath nodded. "In short, the President has decided you deserve to be rewarded your valor in taking down Saren. I'm sure the Fleet Master already mentioned it, but the political situation back on Earth is going to become stupendously idiotic very shortly." He eyed Jiong again. "Which is, no doubt, why you suddenly acquired a Commissar at your elbow."

Shepard shrugged and von Grath continued. "In any event, the President would prefer to promote you to some form of purely ceremonial duty for PR purposes, but I believe I have convinced him that such is both a waste of your talents and likely to end in spectacular failure. He was not, ah, aware of your background until recently."

She felt her cheeks color in shame, and dipped her head, until the clipped voice of the President sounded tiredly. "Jason, you aren't any smoother than your protege, I see. What an execrable turn of phrase, as if I discovered she was half-Brazilian or something."

She glanced up, and the President nodded at her. "I do agree that making you a PR icon might not work out well given your early history, but you should feel no shame in such. You have achieved from nothing what a great many of my citizens fail to achieve with every advantage. In short, Commander, I feel you will serve Humanity best if you continue in your Spectre role but with some ... additional support."

He smiled. "As you have just seen, there is some ... confusion among the leaders of the galactic nations on what to do next. None of us expected you and Jason to butcher Saren and Benezia ... ah, bad pun. Apologies. Ahem. To ... defeat ... the duo so handily or quickly. To be honest I am afraid I had very little faith in your chances from the outset."

Shepard managed to find her voice. "That would make two of us, Your Majesty."

He waved her words away with a slender, manicured hand. "And I have been proven utterly wrong, to my great relief. The fact that you did so on the eve of the most crushing reversal of political policy in my government will help alleviate the damage that clown Saracino and his racist appendages will do in the next year or two. Thus you not only did your duty, but did so in a way that I can profit from. That deserves special rewards."

He smiled. "In short, I will promote you two ranks, from Commander to Major of Marines. You will be issued command of a battle group of your choosing, along with a full battalion of troops. You will, I fear, have to suffer the indignity of yet another Star of Terra. And this time, we shall dispense with this idiotic restriction on your citizenship. Since as a Spectre answering to the military is rather frowned upon, you will be my personal representative to the military and the Citadel Council in matters of intergalactic security."

She was beyond stunned. She'd expected perhaps a single promotion, and to be stuffed in some small light cruiser to fight geth and maybe pose on recruiting posters. The President was talking about far more resources and power than that. She inhaled. "Your Majesty, I have never commanded forces beyond a single regiment in battle, and I fear I handled that very poorly. And I have no training in command of a fleet of any size."

He smiled. "Details. I have no time for them, others will attend to such. You will be trained. And when the Ministers attempt to freeze my ability to work well with our alien neighbors, your Spectre status will give you the immunity needed to ignore their silly orders. I think it will work out quite splendidly, with the appropriate oversight."

The President turned to von Grath. "How long will it take to wrap up the investigation and cleanup?"

Von Grath shrugged, wincing as it shifted something in his wounded arm. "At least a good week or more, Your Majesty. Additionally, as the High Dalatrass mentioned, it seems unwise not to follow up on the few leads we do have regarding Saren's possible bases. I fear there are ... additional complications."

The President arched an eyebrows. "Details, Jason. They bore me. Attend to them. I would like to have matters in hand in no later than three weeks from today. See to it." With that he closed his eyes again, and von Grath bowed deeply before motioning to Shepard to follow.

She waited until they'd gotten out the door and down the staircase before speaking. "General...what the fuck is going on?"

Von Grath gave a long sigh, tugging at his handlebar mustache with his remaining hand. "Politics, my dear girl. Congratulations on falling down the rabbit hole." He gave a smile. "For now, focus on checking up on the Normandy and your team. The Fleet Master should have already cut your orders, so carry them out. After that, assuming there are no further surprises like swarms of undead bugs, we shall meet on the Citadel and discuss matters with the Council in a few weeks before the real fun begins."

He walked away. "Try not to start any riots, Commander..."

She rolled her eyes, and glanced sourly at Jiong. "I think I'll accept your goddamned offer. I haven't understood a single thing that just happened except the fact that the Primarch is gonna piss on Saren's corpse."

Jiong nodded sagely. "I suppose if one must take something from the conversations of the mighty, that fact is as good as any other. "

---

Chapter 105: Chapter 96 : Admiral Rael'Zorah

---

A/N: Moving through pieces and parts. Not much longer until Virmire. No spoilers this time, except for the fact that I will be crushed if when it's done no one flames me for having no soul :D

I mean, jeez, I haven't even started killing off all these OC's yet.

I'm still tiptoeing around how to handle Joker/Tali, but that will be more wrapped up in the aftermath of ME1. Sorry, no hot broken-bones-in-airlock sex just yet.

The Commissariat is not as united as it thinks it is. Jiong and Susan are the less sadistic and evil kinds.

Srsly. Hooboy, wait till you see them in ME2.

---

Liara found that awakening alone was something she did not like. Feeling Shepard at a distance was nothing like having the warm body next to hers had been.

Her first time waking up in the hospital had come two days after the death of Saren, when she'd been taken out of regen and surgery and placed in recovery. The asari doctor who'd tended her wounds was yet another clanless, nearly stumbling over her words in nervousness. For once, Liara had found herself the more coherent conversationalist, and had gently managed to calm the other asari down.

The doctor, Murale, had let Liara know that her wounds were healing but not fully healed. They'd had to cut pieces of her own armor out of her body, and she'd had a metal cap inserted into her pelvis where she'd been shot in the hip. Such wounds could not be recovered from in only a few days, and Liara had been warned to take it easy and let herself heal.

Since then, she'd had almost no visitors, except from cold-eyed Commissars who had twice checked on her condition and left without a word. So when she awoke alone the third morning after Saren's death, she was surprised to see she wasn't actually alone in the room. The slender form of a man from the Alliance Commissariat sat in the comfortable chair across the room, staring blankly out the window at the skyline beyond. Liara blinked sleep out of her eyes before speaking. "...hello?"

The Commissar started, before tilting her head and smiling. She had shoulder length pale blond hair, a narrow and almost pixie-like face, and disturbingly bright green eyes. Her black coat was leather and came down to mid-thigh as she popped to her feet with a perfect asari-form bow that would have impressed even Benezia. "Good morning, Lady Liara. I'm Susan. How are you feeling?"

Liara gingerly shifted her arm, then sat up. A small spike of pain from her hip flared, but she ignored it. Exhaling, she kept her voice calm, but firm. "I am well. May I ask why you are in my room?"

Susan nodded in a fashion that was entirely too cheerful for someone wearing a flame pistol and neural mace. "I'm here to make sure the media – or any of your mother's followers – don't harass you. I've already had to brain one journalist who couldn't quite grasp that no means no. Creep. Anyhoo, I'm also here to ask you a few questions."

Liara shifted cautiously in the bed. "Questions?"

The smile slowly faded from the woman's features. "Yeah. You're not an SA citizen, so you don't have to answer, of course. You can tell me to get lost at any time, in fact. But...you really should answer, given that if you don't the Commissariat will have to come up with it's own answers, and we're pretty paranoid."

Liara licked her lips, and glanced around. "Before we start might I have some water? I find my throat is dry."

Susan grinned, walking over to the room's sink and pouring Liara a paper cup full of water from a pitcher there. "No problem, Lady Liara. We get that all the time when we ask people questions!"

Liara's muttered "no doubt" did not go unnoticed by the Commissar, who only grinned wider as she handed over the cup. Liara drank slowly, letting the cool liquid soothe her dry throat, and leaned back into the pillows. "I will answer your questions, Susan."

The Commissar smiled, giving another little graceful bow. "Excellent. I'll try to be, uh, discrete, but you probably already figured out what I am here for. I mean, you're a genius, doctorate and all that, so you know I'm not here to ask you about what skyball team you root for."

Liara nodded wearily.

The Commissar triggered her omnitool, which flashed red for a moment before taking on a greenish glow. "So...to keep this respectful. First, SA law and naval regs are pretty picky about these sort of things, so I do have to ask. Have you ever attempted to use your relationship with Commander Shepard to manipulate her to do the bidding of the Asari Republic or disobey lawful orders of the Systems Alliance?"

Liara's eyes flashed. "No, I have not and would not. Given the present view my government likely has of me, doing so would be suicidal. Nor would I ever jeopardize her career that way."

The Commissar eyed the omni-tool, which maintained a steady green glow. "Cool. Second, are you aware that naval regulations forbid commanding officers of SA vessels or units from entering into bond-level relationships with asari due to the fact that it breaches security to let an alien national gain full access to the memories and secrets of the officer in question?"

Liara exhaled. "I did not know that at the time. We ... had no intention of proceeding to a full bond. However, due to the requirements of having to heal her mind after interacting with the Prothean Beacon, my own poor control would have made that level of separation difficult to maintain in any case. Now that I am aware of it, I consider her memories a sacred trust – be they of her military background or her personal life. I would not betray them any more than I would her."

The Commissar raised an eyebrow as the green glow from her omnitool didn't flicker. Her expression softened. "You're aware the media is going to frenzy. That many humans will find your relationship inappropriate. That your connection to Benezia, no matter how much you have tried to oppose her, will cast you in a somewhat poor light among humans?"

Liara nodded unhappily, and the Commissar continued. "Have you considered the damage it might do to Commander Shepard's career, or her life?"

Anger, hot and bright, sizzled in Liara's soul. She had never felt such burning fury before, and knew it was something of Shepard's, but for once she didn't mind its heat as she let it turn her gaze into a scorching look. "You dare ask me about hurting Sara, after the filthy betrayals your unworthy species has inflicted on her? After abandoning her to slavery and child abuse, criminal privation and the ungentle hands of your Penal Legions? After sending her out to die repeatedly to send a message to pirates, and then having the hypocritical gall to reward her for being tricked and nearly crushed on Torfan?" Liara's body took on a faint sheen of biotic energy. "If you ever ask me such again, Commissar, I will end you."

Susan's eyes had widened as Liara's words had erupted, and she coughed, taking a step back and having gone slightly pale. "...means no. Got it." She killed the omni and folded her hands behind her back. "I did not mean to give offense, Lady Liara. People have a dim view of the Commissars, but at the end of the day we are here to protect, not punish. It is precisely because of how she was ... manipulated ... at Torfan that we are concerned about the situation as it stands."

Liara's narrowed gaze did not stray. "You pick a curious time to show your protective side, Commissar Susan. And to compare me to that ... monster who deceived her at Torfan is extremely offensive. I am naïve, not blind. You plan to hold our connection over Shepard's head to bend her to your will. So why are you here, talking to me?"

Susan shrugged. "I'd prefer to look at it as being prudent. Given the circumstances, you've been discrete. None of the crew has said anything, and if we didn't have observers onboard we'd have never known. Our interview with Lieutenant Commander Pressly went amazingly poorly once we brought the situation up. He holds you in very high regard, and that is ... unusual for a card carrying member of Terra Firma."

Liara felt a slight shock at the news Pressly was a member of that rather racist organization, but pushed it aside. "He is a very decent human being who works hard to only let his prejudice come out against those who deserve such. That is evading the question, however. Why are you here, Commissar?"

Susan smiled again. "I wanted to see what kind of person you were. Shepard is a chess piece in an ugly political game. I wanted to know if you were playing her like everyone else is." The smile turned sad. "I almost wish you were, Lady Liara. There will be a lot of disapproval from some sectors if this gets out."

Liara's eyes flashed a second time. "You are the Commissars. The answer that immediately strikes me is simply to not let it get out."

Susan tilted her head. "That isn't as simple as you make it out to be. How far the Commissariat is willing to stick its neck out on this issue depends mostly on Shepard's willingness to play along. But I have one final question that might help with that. If it defused some concerns, would you be willing to become a citizen of the Systems Alliance, knowing that would mean turning your back on the Asari Republic, and I suppose House T'Soni?"

Liara paused at the question for several seconds. Would I?

With a slow exhalation, she nodded. "If that was the cost? Sara, or my heritage and home? I would choose Sara."

Susan gave a quiet sigh. "I'll pass that along to my superiors. For what it's worth, Lady Liara? We'll do our best to keep things quiet. I don't – " She paused as her omnitool buzzed, and scowled at it. "I'm busy, Tersk."

A male voice, deep and basso, rumbled. "There's some asari here to see the Lady. They say it's urgent."

Susan frowned. "Are you receiving visitors, Lady Liara?"

Liara leaned back in her pillow, glancing at her state of dress – a dreadfully thin hospital robe. She pulled her cover up slightly. "I am, I suppose. Are they from the Justicars?"

Susan's eyebrows drew down into a scowl. "Unless they want to eat neural mace, they'd better not be." She spoke into the omnitool. "Tersk, if these are Justicars, tell them to go suck on a power conduit."

The voice replied. "I don't think so...they got on robes with a tree and a bird on 'em, say they are from House T'Soni."

Susan glanced back at Liara, who grimaced and nodded. "Alright, send 'em in, but unarmed." She glanced at the asari, and bowed. "I will leave you with your family as to not intrude. But please consider very carefully all that I've said ... and asked. You will probably be hearing it again." With a final formal bow, she left. The door remained open, and two T'Soni huntresses entered, followed by a taller figure wearing a white hood and shawl over gray robes.

The taller asari pulled back her hood, revealing the youthful features of her youngest cousin, Riala. She bowed deeply, her eyes tired. "Matria Liara, I greet you in the name of the House. We have come to ... perform the Remembrance, for the fallen."

Liara nodded. The funeral rites of the asari people were simple, but no House Matriarch had fallen in such dishonor since the ancient War of Queens, when the asari had unified under the Thirty to fight off and crush the ardat-yakshi. "I see. That was ... thoughtful of Manae."

Riala nodded, then turned. "Hunt sisters, leave us. I must speak with the Matria alone." She used the formal term for the rare occurrence when a house was lead by an asari not yet a matriarch, and the two bowed and left, shutting the door behind them.

Liara looked up. "I was going to have Mother's body taken back aboard the Normandy to Thessia. I did not expect us to have the funds to continue operating the Crashing Wave." She sighed at the memory of the graceful asari light cruiser her mother had purchased years ago, remembering its beautiful lines and the wonderful places she'd seen while on her tour of the galaxy in her youth.

Riala shrugged weakly. "Manae is in a difficult position. The Lesser House will not accept any of the thirdborne as proper heirs, and they are not very happy about having to prop up our defenses with their own house huntresses. They are not working together with Shian very well either. I was sent to try to encourage you to return to T'Soni Outrier as soon as possible, to ... suppress some of the unrest. We have some funds remaining, now that most of Benezia's assets on Thessia were released with her death, but only you can access the rest."

Liara gave her a faint smile. Unlike most of her relatives, Riala had never been cruel or mistreated her, nor avoided her. They simply didn't interact much. Riala was even younger than Liara by a few years, and had always been quieter than the rest of the bold, aggressive T'Soni. Liara suspected dispatching her had been Manae's idea.

Liara sighed. "I am still somewhat wounded from fighting Saren, cousin. I will hasten there as I am able, but I am not in complete control of my own ... movement in terms of transport."

Riala frowned. "I do not understand why. You have triumphed. Saren is dead. Benezia is slain. This ... Shepard person has no further reason to detain you or require your assistance."

Liara sighed, she might as well get it over with. "It is not so simple. I am ... I plan to take her as my bond mate."

To her credit, Riala merely nodded. "That is ... aggressive, but probably wise, given that you have no heirs. I can see the wisdom in it. She sounds powerful, and is politically connected, no doubt. The stories told about this human are exaggerations?"

Liara shook her head. "She is terrifying in ways that would make the Justicars pause. For all of that, she is ... a good person, cousin. She is kind, when she can be. She is stern and just, and will tolerate neither criminals nor fools. She is more complex than she appears at first glance."

Liara folded her hands together. "It complicates matters, but leaving her behind at this point would not only leave me unbalanced and upset, but send a message of betrayal and abandonment to her. She has been betrayed enough, I will not add to the tally."

Riala sighed but nodded. "Of course, Matria. I will take the body, as well as the remains of Unbroken Pride. Clan Stormwave of Steelshape has offered to repair the suit free of charge in memory of T'Soni aid during their dark times."

Liara exhaled. She had not given any thought to the ruin of the House Paladin armor Benezia wore in her duel with von Grath, but repairing it should have been high on her list of priorities. I am not cut out for this...

She nodded. "A good start, cousin. For now... go ahead and take the suit and Mother's body. Inform the House that I will be traveling home within the week if possible. Inform the Lesser House that I understand their concerns ... but until I am either Challenged or dead, I am Matria. Unhappiness will be tolerated, but disobedience will not. Manae and Shian are my representatives for a reason."

Riala gave a small bow. "Of course, Matria. I ..." She paused, looking somewhat lost. "I only wanted to say I do not know how you think of me, but I hope I have never given offense. Many wonder why you put the two who tormented you the most in charge."

Liara smiled, a genuine one, and shook her head. "You were perhaps the kindest of my kin, Riala. I did not make those two my representatives to reward them." Her smile faded. "I am myself very uncertain if I am qualified to hold the reins of one of the Thirty Families. I know so little, compared to Mother. I have no allies, nor will I be able to impress anyone as ... I am."

Riala folded her hands in a gesture of siari determination. "I am perhaps out of place for offering my advice to you ... but the words of Matriarch Benezia still hold wisdom. One cannot alter the tides of life, merely where on the shore one chooses to stand. Those who stand full upon the fury of the breakers cannot chide the ocean for being smashed by the waves, and those who stand in the shallows should not expect high tides. We have been through worse situations as a Family. Some may dislike answering to you ... but we will obey."

Liara's answering smile was sad. "That, cousin, is exactly what I fear. That instead of instructing me or correcting me, they will simply follow me into ruin."

Riala nodded, thinking, then glanced at her omni-tool. "...Huntress Shura has just spotted the High Matriarch of T'Armal entering the hospital."

Liara paled. "Goddess, Moon and Sun. Check the cabinet, see if these people left me any clothing."

Liara managed to, with severe pain, get out of bed, while Riala found the locker contained a single blue-and-white bag with an SA logo on it. It contained personal care products as well as two sets of Alliance BDU's, and one of Liara's dresses. Her armor, weapons, and the long form of Ocean's-Nightfallen-Mist.

Liara swore to herself that Pressly would be rewarded for his sharp thinking, and gestured to the dress. "I am sorry, cousin, but you will have to help me dress. Instruct the huntresses to stall the High Matriarch."

It took another ten minutes, and Liara had to bite her lips to avoid making sounds of pain when she managed to get the long, silvery dress over her form, but in the end she was able to hobble over to one of the chairs in the room, fully dressed but barefooted, and lean back. "I ... need a moment."

Riala hastily disposed of the hospital gown and smoothed the covers of the bed, before glancing at her omni-tool. "She stopped to speak with the doctors ... you have a few moments to gather yourself before she arrives."

Liara nodded, her hands cradling the scabbarded slender shape of her mother's warp sword nervously. A minute later, and a huntress opened the door. "Her Grace, High Matriarch Thana T'Armal of Thessia."

The matriarch entered, wearing a robe of shifting layers of eezo-laced silks, designed to float aimlessly as if the wearer was underwater. She wore a jeweled and pearl-encrusted shawl over her shoulders, and hard black boots that clicked aggressively as she entered the room. Her right hand was upon the hilt of Wavebreaker, the legendary sword of the T'Armal, sister to Tsunami.

Liara bowed her head as deeply as she could, nervously gesturing in a motion of siari. "I apologize for not rising, Your Grace... I am still wounded."

Riala bowed deep, and then stood behind Liara, slightly to her right. The matriarch took in her position and then gave a faint smile. "You are a quick witted and tough little thing, aren't you? Already have your Family in place, huntresses guarding the hospital, warp sword in hand and dressed. I had expected to find you laid out on the hospital bed."

Liara's hands were so tight around the sword she was amazed she had not damaged the scabbard. "I would never insult the House of Storms by such a disrespectful action, Your Grace. My wounds are of no moment. How may I be of service?"

Matriarch Thana laughed, a full and rich sound. "Goddess, you really are her daughter. You even sound like her when she got irritated. Benezia only asked when she could be of service when she wanted to tell me to drown in shallow water." Her mirth faded. "You are a large problem, Liara. The People are upset that the Triune Unity movement of your mother has corrupted many daughters and sisters. Asari has killed asari in masse for the first time in millennia. There is blood on the steps of the Highest, there is blood in the streets of Serrice, and there is blood upon the stones of your own home. All of it laid upon your mother's hands."

Liara nodded. "I am aware of the magnitude of the ... crime and treason. It is why I joined Commander Shepard to hunt down my Mother along with Saren, and why I am wounded now after killing Saren. I would have fought my mother, if forced to." She sighed. "The High Solarch brought me my mother's sword for just such a reason, I suspect."

The matriarch gave her a measuring look. "Very noble, but pointless. I do not wish to have to sacrifice you on the alter of expediency, but pressures from the clanless, and of course Houses Devir and Vasir are leaving me little choice. I am aware you have yet to put your affairs and your House in order. But you will have to submit to the Question by the Justicars and their judgment sooner or later, Liara."

Liara exhaled. "I was never involved in my Mother's crimes. The Justicars will not care if I was a willing participant or not. The Code is inflexible."

Matriarch Thana gave a cool shrug. "I am fully aware of the Code, young one. But I cannot risk vipers in the house, and Benezia was far more clever than any of the rest of us. I fear her plans within plans will continue long after her death."

Liara grimaced. "So you believe I was in league with her? That I killed her bondmate because that was part of her plan, Your Grace?"

Thana gave a thin smile. "And then there are times you resemble your aithntar." She noted Liara's look of surprise. "Oh, I knew her. That is a discussion for another time. To follow the spearpoint, young one, I find myself ... unsure. I do not believe for a moment Benezia is dead."

Liara gasped. "But...the body? The test?"

Thana snorted. "Benezia was a rellia snake amidst dartfish when it came to intrigue. All we know is that a T'Soni died in that suit. We haven't found Benezia's armor, or the Serration of Unspent Blood, the Temple of the Moon's warp sword. She fled on a ship with its navicomp wiped, with no crew aboard and no pilot? Benezia was never trained in piloting as far as I know. Finally, and I have not mentioned this to the humans or the stupid turians, but the entire crash and showdown with that strutting buffoon of a human general strikes me as the highest and cheapest form of melodrama. Your mother had a saying she always loved to dispense when it came to perception."

Liara whispered. "The eye perceives that which it longs to see, and ignores what it fears to behold." She shook her head slowly. "If she is not dead..."

Thana shrugged. "I have no proof. Until we can locate a clear and verified DNA sample, all I have is conjecture. I am hardly willing to make an intergalactic fool of myself by stating such openly. But we have been misled from the start, young one ... and I am reluctant to believe you are blameless until the Justicars have made very sure of such."

Liara's face fell, and then she looked up. "If my mother is not dead, then I must finish the reth'shan and ... cleanse my House of shame. I will only return to Thessia to inter the body of what may be my Mother and put my House in some order, not to ... placate the demands of the Justicars. But if you doubt my own word, Your Grace..."

She held out her hand, calmly. "I doubt I have the skills to hide anything from you."

Thana gave her a long measuring look, before glancing at Riala. "Bold. Very bold. Perhaps Benezia wrought better than she knew." She stood, crossing over to where Liara sat. "I accept your ... request, young one."

She delicately interlaced her fingers with Liara's, and Liara bit her lip nervously. She'd never linked in a social fashion except with her mother and once with Shiala. She remembered the forms, the opening of the mind, but ...

With a strong pull, Liara found herself in the link, the sheer overwhelming power of the Matriarch brushing aside her own mental defenses as if they weren't there. The search was swift, brutally humiliating, and deeply personal. Though the link was shallow Liara could barely feel the faintest whisper of the matriarch's emotions – amusement, followed by grim shock at her memories of the Beacon and a swift negation of that horror, followed by disinterest until the events of the first battle with her mother came to pass on Feros.

Thankfully, the link was broken after that, the Matriarch not needing to see anymore. "...she was trying to kill you. A mother, trying to kill her own daughter." The older asari's voice shook in mixed pity and horror, and Liara nodded miserably.

Thana was silent for almost a full minute, eyes closed, before shuddering. "Your madness in linking with Commander Shepard to view that abomination of a vision was ... courageous. That is a very damaged being, and a very ugly vision from the Beacon that has driven stronger minds than hers or yours into madness."

Liara grimaced. "She has been hurt by those around her. It is hardly her fault."

Thana ignored her words, still lost in thought, and finally spoke again. "I will consult with the Justicar Mistress on the issue. I will let the waves pass as they will, since you are telling the truth. When you arrive on Thessia, we will have had time to prepare a more detailed DNA examination of the body, and compare it to your own DNA. If she is indeed dead, then I will attempt to convince the Justicars to let the matter fall and ... deal with the fallout from the clanless."

Liara nodded. "And ... if she is not?"

The matriarch's eyes flashed as she turned to depart. "Then you will kill her or die trying, Liara, or I will be forced to measures neither of us wish to see taken. Find peace in the steps of the Goddess."

Liara slumped in the chair as the matriarch departed, letting her emotions and the uneasy feel of another asari in her mind slowly leech out of her. Riala watched nervously before touching her shoulder. "...are you alright?"

Liara shook her head clear and managed a small smile. "I will be. Thank you for ... staying by my side. I appreciate it."

Riala's answering smile was somewhat sad. "I do not know if I should be happy I could help, or upset that a matria must be thankful that her family bothered to stand at her side." She gave a deep bow, and rose. "I will go to execute your orders, Matria Liara. T'Soni endures."

Liara nodded, and Riala left, leaving her alone in the room, still holding her mother's sword and wondering if Benezia lived or not.

O-OSaBC-O

Joker felt as if his entire body was going to shut down soon.

He'd been sitting outside the clean room where they'd taken Tali as soon as they'd cleared the city and declared it safe. No one would tell him anything, and then the quarians showed up with a handful of doctors, a group of marines, and the biggest damned quarian he'd ever seen or heard of leading them all.

The big one, he'd learned, was Admiral Rael'Zorah, Tali's father. And his displeasure at finding his only child half-dead in a second-tier treatment facility was volcanic. He'd threatened to camp the entire Migrant Fleet in the system and strip mine the place down to basalt before they'd hastily moved Tali to a far more upscale and expensive area, with a full airlock and sealed environmental areas to wait in.

The waiting for news was intolerable, and being stared down by a pissed off admiral the size of Cole wasn't helping matters any. He'd explained quickly to the Admiral that he was a friend of Tali's and that he was here to make sure she was okay, and Rael'Zorah had angrily responded that she'd have been fine if Shepard hadn't taken a teenaged civilian into battle with the most dangerous Spectre in history.

Joker found himself in an argument more nerve-wracking than he'd ever been in before. The towering enraged father he faced was immune to sarcasm and had a wit even more caustic and biting than Joker's own, and Joker seriously thought about slugging him at least once. They'd ceased arguing when the doctors finally came out and said Tali would live but would require cybernetic correction to her spine and right leg.

Joker had found himself crying at that, emotions draining out of him as he had feared she would be dead or crippled for life. The display had shocked Rael'Zorah, who was apparently familiar with human emotions.

"Why does a human cry for a quarian, Pilot Moreau?"

Joker found his voice hoarse and his temper gone. "Because she cares more for me than my own people do. Because she's the sweetest goddamned person I've ever known, and she damn near died trying to impress your stupid ass, when you're too busy to ever pay attention to her or encourage her or even show the fuck up until now! Because I'm a fucking cripple who can't protect her and I just get to watch the VI pickups showing her vitals dropping to nothing and I can't do shit!"

The blank faceplate revealed nothing, the pale glowing eyes behind it narrow but not angry. Joker found that infuriating. "You send her out in the wild to 'grow up', and when she finds the evidence to stop the greatest criminal in history, you send her a fucking message saying she's going to screw it all up so come home? She helps fight geth, is a better engineer than guys doing it twice as long as she's been alive, took out a goddamned krogan with her fucking boot knife, and you aren't even proud of her? I'm here crying, you ass, because she needs someone when she wakes up who loves her and that certainly isn't fucking you!"

The backhand caught him unawares, sending him staggering back, his braces whining and grinding to stabilize him as he nearly fell. One of the quarian marines stepped forward, and the Admiral had whirled on him.

"OUT! All of you. This is between the human and I."

The marines had retreated with alacrity, and Joker wiped blood from his nose. He figured the big bastard must have pulled his punch, or Tali's braces were even more badass than he thought. Probably the latter.

"Nice one. Pick on a cripple half your size. What, you going to beat the shit out of me so you can feel better about being a shitty father?"

Rael'Zorah's fists clenched, and his breathing was audible through the suit. With a mad glee that left a part of him screaming at himself to shut up, he threw another barb. "Or are you hitting me because you want to hit Tali for being a disappointment."

With a roar he lashed out, and Joker knew this punch would probably kill him.

Instead, the fist smashed into the wall next to him. Steel dented under the impact, tiny fragments of ceramic from the suit's gauntlet tinkling down on the ground. Muscles bulged, even under the thick environmental suit, making it creak alarmingly. The admiral stood there, trembling.

"I am aware of my flaws as a father, human. I have heard them from what remains of my family, and I have my own shame to deal with. I cannot even look at my own daughter without seeing the ghost of my dead wife in her eyes and limbs, and it haunts me. I have not been there when I should have been, but I have always been proud of her. She is all I have left. I will not lose her to this sick galaxy. The universe is vicious. Vile. Monstrous. Full of things that only seek power and death and money and cruelty. Experiments, butchery, war, murder, slavery. Evils that never infected the quarian people."

The glowing eyes met his, angry. Defiant. Broken. "If I have erred in trying to keep her safe from the filth that you people swim in and call a society, then call me a poor father. If I have denied encouraging her to waste her time on a Pilgrimage that has already devolved into a ancestors-blasted galactic war and ended with her nearly dying for nothing, then call me a poor father."

He slowly withdrew his fist, coming to his full height. "But do not dare suggest I do not love my daughter, human, or that she is a disappointment to me. I am not why she is in that room right now, being worked on and implanted with machinery like some kind of geth. Your people are. Your captain took her into that icy hellhole and nearly got her killed, and didn't even have the decency to check on her."

Joker gritted his teeth. "And that makes it okay that you're an asshole with a dreadnaught up his ass? Tali wanted to be here. To prove to the galaxy that your people weren't cowards hiding from fate on your ships, thieves and scavengers. That your people took responsibility for stopping this since the geth were involved. And you know what? She's earned respect. From everyone on the Normandy. If Commander Shepard isn't here, it's either because she's laid out in a hospital bed herself or is being interrogated about Saren."

He took a step forward, wincing at the pain in his back from being knocked around, but was again interrupted by the doors to the med center opening and a slender human doctor coming out, accompanied by a quarian. "She's awake, sirs. A bit disoriented, but conscious. We're keeping her in clean containment, but you can speak to her at least, through a commlink." He paused. "Assuming, of course, you two can stop screaming."

Joker and Rael'Zorah traded a single, furious glance. "We'll finish this later, human. If you are Tali's friend, then perhaps you will be able to comfort her." He folded his arms, and Joker stared at him.

"You aren't coming?"

The admiral's gaze narrowed even further. "My discussion with her needs to be ... private."

Joker was torn between anger and tears. "For fuck's sake, man! She would die just to hear a word of praise from you! Just a single 'well done daughter'! Is that too much to fucking ask, to put off the tonguelashing or whatever the fuck you call it, the verbal beatdown about how she should just come home, and tell her you're proud of her? What the shit is wrong with you?"

Rael'Zorah met his gaze steadily for several long, angry seconds. "Very well. I will ... return shortly." He strode ahead, following the doctors, and the doors slid shut with a final banging sound that sent shivers up Joker's spine.

He rubbed his bearded jawline tenderly, wincing at the probable hairline crack in it, and tiredly sat back down to wait some more. He didn't know what to do, and Rael'Zorah was quite possibly the most titanic asshole in the entire universe... but a part of him understood. It was the same stupid crap his parents had pulled, wanting him to be happy with what he'd already achieved instead of pushing him on harder, hoping against hope he'd just come home and try to live 'a normal life'.

At least Dad let me know he was proud. At least Mom hugged me and always told me I could do it. At least Hilary never turned her back on me.

He was still sitting there when Shepard entered the waiting area. "Joker? Is Tali okay?"

Joker, for once in his life, couldn't think of anything funny to say to that.

---

Chapter 106: Chapter 97 : Noveria, Moments

---

A/N: Almost...there

As a bonus, per Progman's instructions, the cast of OsaBC. The Bioware actors are fine for canon characters.

Preston Kyle: Val Kilmer,

Primarch Fedorian: Stephen Blum

Commissar Jiong : George Takei, played by Daniel Henney.

Von Grath: Played by an older John Hamm, but voiced by Anthony Hopkins (Zorro style)

Florez: Catherine Zeta-Jones, aged.

Tetrimus: Peter Cullen

Trellani: Angelina Jolie

Cole: Played by Idris Elba, but OBVIOUSLY voiced by David Scully.

Commissar Susan: Emily Blunt

Dragunov: an older and even more ripped up and pissed off Scott Adkins (Yuri Bokya)

Windsor: Elias Toufexis

Telanya : Michelle Boback

Bea Shields: Linda Hamilton, with dyed hair.

Jason Dunn: Nolan North. Come on.

Richard Williams: Hugo Weaving, with some CGI work to bulk him up

---

Shepard fled from the Four Seasons with haste, noting that Jiong was a handy fellow to have around. He'd already read all of Shepard's reports and would stay behind to testify and offer up any commentary for the media, while he packed her in yet another Commissariat air-car and let her retreat to check on her crew.

Alenko and Williams were, at least according to the reports she had fine, and ready for discharge. Garrus, Liara, and Telanya would be soon, while Tali needed more time. She arrived at the first hospital – the gang had been shuffled around a bit – and entered the lobby quietly, managing to avoid reporters.

Arriving at the counter and speaking with the hospital staff, she grimaced at the simply titanic fees charged by the hospital, but another hospital administrator canceled them, saying Director Anolais was covering the charges in gratitude.

She found Ash already dressed, wearing leg braces and a bandage over part of her face. Shepard had been pleased that there would be little scarring, although Ash worried her dancing days were over – molten metal had charred through part of her ACL, and the replacement was stiff and inelastic. Shepard laughed.

"You survive a gunfight after being nearly melted by your own rifle and kill Saren with a lance cannon you can barely pick up, and you worry about dancing?"

Ash smirked. "A girl has got keep her priorities straight. Ass-whooping is done, time to partay. Speaking of which, the celebration party is gonna be huge for this. Do we get to see you dance this time?"

Shepard snorted. "Not if you value your ability to breathe. The last time I danced my squad laughed so hard two people passed out from hyperventilating."

O-OSaBC-O

Alenko was quieter, but in good spirits, and actually sitting in the lobby when she arrived at the hospital he'd been transferred to after being stabilized. "I have ... interesting news, Commander. One of the corporations here is working on an advanced treatment for neural sheath disorders. It's expected to hit clinical trials in four months. The Director got me on the list as thanks."

She gave him a smile. "That is ... very good. I trust you intend to take the chance?"

He gave a shrug. "I guess I have to..." He exhaled. "I'm guessing Ash didn't tell you?"

Shepard arched an eyebrow. "The chief didn't mention anything serious, or much of anything at all except an interest in getting smashed and dancing, and to requisition a lance cannon. Why?"

Alenko sighed. "When they got through patching her back up, they did a lot of scans for other issues. She's pregnant, ma'am. Since she hasn't, ah, been with anyone but me since Eden Prime..."

Shepard facepalmed, then laughed into her hand. "Congratulations, Kaiden. Now stand the fuck by as I pin your ears back with a lecture about knocking up enlisted personnel during combat operations."

His face fell. "Standing by, ma'am."

O-OSaBC-O

After getting Alenko back to the ship, having a long conversation about his relationship with Ash and agreeing to cover for him, and promising him that she was sure Williams would get accepted by OCS so she wouldn't have to write them both up, she went to check on Tali. That began spectacularly bad, as she ran into the gigantic figure of Admiral Rael'Zorah, obviously in an emotional state after seeing Tali.

Shepard learned the brave quarian girl would need major cybernetic augmentation, and winced inside, cursing herself for bringing her along. Rather than become angry when the admiral had railed at her for doing so, she'd stood there and took all six minutes of angry ranting. He concluded by saying Tali had no reason to risk her life in the fight and Shepard had no right to let her.

When he finished, Joker opened his mouth but Shepard held up a hand. "No, Flight Lieutenant. He's right. Mostly, at least." Turning back the admiral, she folded her hands behind her back. "I knew that neither Tali nor Liara had a place in that fight. They were both civilians, untrained. I equipped them as best I could – so did Joker, as he bought her a Migrant Fleet shotgun. But it was my judgment that got her hurt, and almost got my own bondmate killed."

The admiral took a half step back, but she continued. "They call me the Butcher, sir, because that is what I am. I cut, my own forces and those of the enemy. I have sacrificed my men like meat, used them as bait, shot disobedient officers in the head like one puts down a balky horse, and worse. I took my team into that place when another N7 soldier advised me that only the krogan was really ready for that level of combat."

She met his eyes. "They all paid a price, in scars, in wounds. Your daughter may not be the only one who requires cyberware. But they were there for a very good reason. It's my fault that she was there and got hurt, and I accept your anger, as a father and as her ultimate commanding officer. But I won't accept that Tali can't make her own choices, and that's what she did. If Tali hadn't weakened Saren's barrier with her drones and shotgun, we'd have never beaten him, and no one knows what kind of hell he'd have unleashed. On my people and yours."

She tilted her head. "She told me of your people, and that an admiral is expected to sacrifice everything in the name of duty to the People. Isn't that exactly what she's done, sir?"

Admiral Rael'Zorah was left standing with no answer, and Shepard merely nodded. "Joker, I'm going to see Tali now. Once I'm done and you see her, get back to the Normandy. I'll let her know we'll wait for her to get on her feet before pulling out."

Rael shook himself. "She is not coming with you in any more of your lunatic adventures!"

Shepard turned back to him with a smile. "I believe that is her choice, Admiral. But if you want to try to force the issue, you're welcome to take up with President Winsdor. He's already told Matriarch T'Armal to fuck herself regarding pretty much the same demand, so good luck with that." She gave a salute. "If you will excuse me, I have to check on my engineer. Good day."

She'd strode past the doors, entering a narrow hallway that ended in a smaller room, which had an observation window and several comfortable looking chairs, and a haptic comms panel. She tapped it hesitantly. "Tali?" The window into the next room was dark, almost pitch black.

There was a rustle from the room beyond, as the bed elevated. Tali's form appeared in the dim lighting, difficult to make out. "Quarians consider it an honor to show their faces to close friends, family and loved ones. Captains are usually not included in that list."

The lights slowly came up. Tali was propped up on several plastic-sealed pillows, in a heavily vented room with plastic sheets and coverlets. Machinery covered her leg, part of her torso, and supported her back, with a heavy quilted plastic blanket covering the rest. The quarian's face was not quite human – the eyes glowed with no pupil, and were elongated. The nose was similar, but the nostrils were thin holes and extended into narrow, trailing lines going between the eyes. The mouth was human enough, but the cheek structure was almost gaunt, and the face jutted forward and out slightly. The jaw was unnaturally narrow, and faint trceries of cybernetic circuits were visible under the pale bluish-white skin.

The top of the head broke into tightly woven mats of wirelike hair, each one trailing down to come to a sharp point. There were no ears, merely smooth skin, and the one visible hand ended in fingers with claws rather than fingernails. Tali's voice sounded different without her mask on. "But for you, I will make an exception."

It was an alien face, but beautiful nonetheless. Shepard gave her a gentle smile. She looked almost angelic in the dim lighting, younger than Shepard expected even from her voice. "I'm glad to see you're okay. Sounds like you got out kind of rough."

Tali sighed. "Yes. My people dislike replacing parts of their bodies with cyberware, although cybernetic components under the skin and in the blood are necessary for our survival. The doctors...had to sever my right leg at the knee. And they already implanted a rod in my thigh, and motors and corrective servos in my back. Father wasn't very happy about it."

Shepard snorted. "Seems like a real fun dad. Starting to realize more and more that maybe being an orphan wasn't the worst deal in the universe – everyone else's families are just as fucked up." She paused. "You did a great job, Tali. No matter what he says. Even the Fleet Master of the Systems Alliance mentioned your part."

She nodded, smiling. It was strange to be able to see her expressions. Shepard found herself helplessly smiling back, and shrugged. "I wanted to tell you we have orders to ship out as soon as the ship is ready to go."

Tali's face fell. "... I will be here another two days, at least. Maybe three."

Shepard nodded. "That's odd. I just decided that the Normandy will be ready to go in four days. Funny how that works out." She saw the quarian girl's eyes widen. "I already told your dad he could get lost when he tried to demand you were coming with him. If you want to come along, Tali, I would love to have you."

Tali nodded, and gripped the blanket with her free hand. "I... yes. I mean...Saren and Benezia are dead. What is left?"

Shepard smirked. "Well, we still have to even up with the geth." She grinned as Tali's eyes narrowed and the young quarian gave a firm nod, a frown on her features. "Thought you'd like that idea. Also, we're hoping to find Saren's base and where he parks that black ship since we haven't seen it in a while. Once that is done, according to the Fleet Master, the Normandy gets a week of leave before... I get reassigned."

She rolled her shoulders. "There will be some kind of blasted award ceremony. The Fleet Master told me the SA planned to reward each of you, so if you want a shiny piece of metal and some boring speeches, make sure you tag along."

Tali laughed, displaying a row of razor sharp teeth. "I think I will, Commander. I'll be okay." She paused. "I haven't seen Jeff."

She jerked a thumb. "Far as I can tell from the fact his uniform is wrinkled and he looks exhausted, he's been in the waiting room for a while. I'll send him in when I leave, if he hasn't strangled the shit out of your father at that point." She paused. "Bet they got along great."

Tali's glowing eyes flickered with amusement. "My father and Jeff? I'm surprised Father didn't beat him to death."

O-OSaBC-O

Garrus and Telanya were in good shape, relatively speaking, although they wouldn't be released until the day after. Through luck and fast talking, Garrus had been able to get his room shifted to share one with Tel, and they were watching news reports as she came in.

Garrus made an oddly formal gesture with his arms, crossing them over his chest. "Commander...thank you. You have no idea how much it means to me to have been there at Saren's end. I got a call from my father this morning...the first time I've ever heard him proud of me since I joined C-Sec. The Primarch himself visited!"

She laughed. "Your Primarch said he was going to piss on Saren's body and set him on fire. I like the guy." That drew a laugh from Telanya, and a wry look from Garrus.

"He is a direct sort of shantha, I agree. What is the plan now, Sheep? Roll around the galaxy righting wrongs and letting Wrex terrorize people?" Garrus' voice was wry ... but wary. She sighed.

"We need to do some poking around in geth space, and see if we can't find anything else on Saren's bases. If we don't find anything, we'll head back to the Citadel for a big party, a boring speech and award ceremony, and then I'm being reassigned. I suspect at that point the SA will break up the gang, since they have a hard-on for alien nationals on their ships."

Garrus nodded. "Both Tel and I resigned from C-Sec...but the Executor has offered us both back our jobs. No strings attached. I enjoyed the fight and the chase...but I'll probably go back to being a cop, I think, Shepard. That last fight showed me I'm just not badass enough to go toe to toe with creeps like Saren. And the politics around it..." He waved in disgust at the screen. "Worse than the red tape. Most of all, I think I learned something. Whatever Saren was up to, it was outside the law. Like you said, you go too far down that path and you end up ...lost."

Telanya spoke up quietly. "I ... we ... appreciate you giving us a second chance. I hope my own meager skills were of some use."

Shepard gave a thin smile. "Like I said, I never gave anyone a second chance before. It's nice to see you didn't fuck it up." She folded her arms and looked at Garrus. "I seem to recall in one of our chats you mentioned some asshole who got away from C-Sec. If we find the bastard before we get ordered back to the Citadel, we could always put holes in him using Spectre authority."

Garrus's face lit up. "Dr. Saleon? Ha. I'd love to see that, Commander. I know where the bastard is, just never had the authority to go after him. You let me put a hole in his black heart and I'll owe you forever."

Shepard nodded. "Alright. You'll stick around until we are done and report back to the Citadel, yes?"

Garrus glanced over at Tel, and then nodded. "I don't see why not, especially if I get to go after Saleon."

O-OSaBC-O

Shepard arrived to deal with Liara last, returning to the hospital she'd left early that morning. She found a pair of T'Soni huntresses in the foyer, who approached her as she walked towards the elevator.

"You are Commander Shepard, correct?" The huntress was young, her leathers gleaming in the light of the lobby and her face lined with only a few tattoos of successful battles. Shepard took in her appearance and warily nodded.

"Matria Liara has been waiting for you for some time. She instructed us to let you know she had checked out of the hospital and was dealing with Director Anolais aboard the Crashing Wave, the House cruiser. It is docked in Dock 41, near the Normandy."

Shepard arched an eyebrow. She knew Liara and her family were rich, but a private military cruiser ran about two or three hundred million credits. She nodded, shrugging. "Guess I'll meet her there, then. Thanks for letting me know."

The two gave bows which were, if Shepard remembered asari customs correctly, far too low and respectful. Shaking her head at the strangeness of the asari, she returned to the Commissariat air-car waiting outside, getting back in. "Looks like I'm headed to dock 41, sir."

The driver, a non-biotic commissariat trooper nodded. "Yes, ma'am. Commissar Jiong called to let me know he was heading for the Normandy, should I divert him?"

She shook her head. "No. This is a private ... conversation. I won't need his help." She leaned back into the plush leather seats, sourly realizing she was starting to enjoy the level of comfort.

Of course, that's probably part of the plan. Be nice, let me have my way, not interfere with me and Liara...and have that hanging over my head the rest of my life.

Then again, isn't that better than restricted citizenship until I'm seventy and dying alone on some class I shithole with air I can't breathe?

She could almost admire the way she'd been pinned. Events just happened so fast and she was in no way prepared for all the political garbage likely to erupt soon. Her only outs were to play along with those likely to use her, or try to handle events with just Liara for advice.

That would work out great, I'm sure. The stuttering and unsure leading the blindly-angry and stupid.

The trip to the docks passed fairly quickly, the dull white snow and dark buildings of the outside giving way to the dim under-city and the rocky escarpment of the docks in short order. Most of the docks were jammed with Marine landing ships, media vessels, and turian or asari cruisers. Not a single slip she could see was open. Packs of marines, commandos, turian soldiers, and NDC police stalked the docks.

The aircar touched down at the customs station for dock slips 40 through 50, and the door slid open smoothly. "I'll wait here until you are done, Commander."

She nodded and stepped out, the icy wind blowing up from the valley below sending goosebumps along her arms. She took a brisk walk to get to the inside of the customs area, which was surprisingly empty for so many ships being docked. A single NDC customs agent saw her enter and nodded. "Commander, welcome. The Normandy is still docked in Pier 37..."

She smiled. "I'm here to visit the Crashing Wave, pier 41. Will I need to check through customs when I come back?"

The official, an older woman with graying hair and faint lines around her mouth, shook her head, tapping her omnitool. "As long as you are not carrying anything back and you are headed directly back to the Normandy, no."

Shepard nodded and walked on, past the entry scanners and out to the main docking area. The second slip from the right held the elegant bulk of an asari light cruiser. Some of the weapons were missing, and a section of armor plating had been removed to allow wide windows to be set into the hull, but it was still impressive, twice the length of the Normandy.

She approached the boarding ramp, which was guarded by two more huntresses in T'Soni pale yellow, and as she walked up the airlock to the ship opened, revealing a slender asari in gray robes and a white hooded cloak. The two huntresses held up a hand, and one spoke in a respectful voice. "Hold, the arbiter comes to escort you aboard."

Shepard folded her arms and waited, and in a few seconds the asari in white and gray arrived at dock's edge. She bowed deeply to Shepard, pulling back her hood to reveal features hauntingly similar to Liara's own, including the brilliant blue eyes. "Be welcome, Commander Shepard. I am Riala. The Matria told us to expect you. Please, follow me."

Shepard did so, feeling somewhat out of place as she entered the ship. The standard interior lines – curves and smooth planes – had been upscaled in pale gray asari wood, with heavy black carpeting along the corridors. The ship was roomy and the lighting subdued, and Shepard simply followed along.

Most of the corridors were empty, and many of the circular doors opened into bedrooms or living areas. Finally she was brought to a larger oval door roughly center-line to the ship's mass, which initiated open in four panels.

The room beyond was probably at least the size of her CIC on the Normandy, curving walls arching up to a vaulted ceiling pierced by a huge oval window. The floor was done in wooden decking, with small fountains flanking the entrance and beds of smooth stones set into plinths along the walls. Curved bookshelves holding the hook-ended scrolls that asari used for books hung neatly along one wall, while a bank of haptic pale yellow vid-screens and financial exchange trackers dominated the other wall.

A few low lounging couches surrounded a shallow pool of water in one half of the room, dartfish and whisper-eels moving erratically through the water, the subtle glow of a kinetic barrier ensuring the water stayed in place. A doorway beyond the pool and couches led into what looked like a sleeping area.

In the middle of the room was an organically smooth curve of coral, somehow set inline with the wood, topped by a white stone desk without a single line to its shape. Sitting in a mass-effect hoverchair behind it with a frustrated look on her face was Liara, dressed in an elegant gown and glaring at info-pads before her.

She looked up as Shepard entered, smiling faintly, and beside her Riala gave another deep bow. "Matria, I have brought her as instructed. I depart, unless you have need of me..."

Liara shook her head, and Riala retreated from the room, the door hissing closed behind her. Shepard glanced around with a slightly stunned look on her face. "You never ... mentioned all of this."

Liara's smile became strained. "I had forgotten much of the casual wealth my mother enjoyed, in my years in digs and expeditions. She was always focused on maintaining the ancient glory of the House, even if that meant buying up an older light cruiser to replace our humble pinnacle." She rose from the desk, limping slightly as she gestured to the couches. "I... found myself missing you, in only a few short days."

Shepard sat down slowly, noting the utter softness of the material as she literally sank into it. "Makes two of us."

Liara smiled. "I was going to simply return to the Normandy...but Riala said there were matters to attend to here...and I have lost track of time, I fear. You have visited the rest of the team? Everyone is well?"

Shepard sighed. "Mostly. None of us walked away from that fight in good shape, but everyone is alright. Tali still needs a few more days, and Ash will have some nasty scars, but the rest are fine. Wrex is already back on the Normandy, I think. The Fleet Master gave me orders to escort you to Thessia... so you could handle your mother's funeral. And then the President wants me to follow-up on any leads the STG turns up before heading back to the Citadel."

She exhaled. "They plan to promote me. A lot. Put me in charge of a battle group and a battalion, let me handle things directly for the government without military oversight. I have no idea what to do."

Liara nodded. "I find myself in a similar position. The murder of Matriarch Mithra has thrown the House into disarray and infighting. Despite my status as a purebred, the Lesser House will not follow the Greater with my lesser cousins in charge. Thus I must act as if I ran the house...and it is frustrating."

She gestured with disgust to the desk, her features tired and drawn. "I am a scientist, operating in the realm of facts and the knowable. The financial aspects alone of running the House are beyond my skills, the political and social intricacies..." She sighed. "Matriarch Mithra was not doing a good job, and I am left to fix the swirled tides."

Shepard bit her lip. "That sounds like I'll be pinned down on Earth...and you on Thessia."

Liara gave her a calm look, then shook her head. "I am not willing to accept such, Sara. We have endured too much alone already, and more solitude would simply drive you mad, and me to despair. IT may not even come to that. I have had an interesting ... conversation with your Commissariat, who paid me a visit in my hospital room. They know about us, I fear."

Shepard scowled. "I know. I had one pop up too. He offered to help out with keeping things from blowing up ... he's dealing with the media now, and whatever crazy-ass briefing and discussions and bullshit is happening with all the bigshots in town." She rubbed her temples. "They're talking about lifting my citizenship restriction. That means maybe ... I can travel enough to see you frequently. Or get assigned off world after training. I know your family is important. Maybe we can ... find a work around. Assuming your people don't freak out as bad as mine have."

Liara gave a small smile. "They will say nothing. They will obey if only out of tradition. I fear that any 'work around' would still impinge heavily on our ability to be together, Sara." She looked down at the pool, a pensive and worried expression on her face. "I will not abandon you for the sake of my family. I should not have to choose. I have wanted very little in my life, and my family has stymied what I wanted at every turn! Is it to continue forever?!"

Shepard frowned, getting up from her couch to sit on Liara's, wrapping her arms around the asari. "Shhh. You taking care of your family isn't abandonment. That's responsibility. I don't know what is going to happen, but I didn't ever think I'd be able to just ... be something other than I was, either. Just because we can't see how to do make it work doesn't mean it won't work. And I don't worry...I won't let you go. I am literally the most unreasonable person in the universe, and if they think I was a handful before, let them see how I act if they try to keep me from you."

Liara closed her eyes and let herself relax, lines of fatigue and worry slowly easing from her features. "I am simply tired of expectations being thrown atop me by those who could care less of what it costs me. My mother. The University. Asari society. Now this." She sighed. "I am happy your government is finally realizing your value. You will accept the honors?"

Shepard shrugged. "I don't know yet. I'm not prepared for it any more than you feel prepared for this, and I'm probably going to be surrounded by people I can't trust. A part of me wants it. I want to make David proud. Want to see von Grath puff up like a demented toad and shout at people who mess with me. I want to be able to look back on my career and be happy that I accomplished more than shooting a bunch of bad guys ... and lead men into battle against those bad guys without having to sacrifice them for once."

She sighed. "I want ... as fucked up as it sounds, I want to prove Rachel was right about me when she took me under her wing, that I could be the next great thing. At the same time? I'm fucking terrified, Liara. I have no clue how to handle the scale of command they are talking about. And... I wish they'd just let me keep the Normandy and go shoot geth or something ... simple. Moving from star to star, fucking up bad guys with my ODIN, listening to Wrex and Ashley bicker over guns."

Liara smiled. "A violent nomadic existence at your side, wandering among the stars and fleeing the heavy burdens of life would be tolerable, I suppose. Much better than spending the rest of my life dealing with the ... all of this. I see now why my mother said I was not ready. Some of it is fascinating, but all too much of it is exhausting."

Shepard nodded, trailing her fingers against Liara's hand. "Turn your question back on you. You going to take this ... Matria job? Be the head honchoess?"

Liara's confused expression brought a grin to Shepard's face, but she got the gist of what was being said. "Like you, I am uncertain. I am hopeful... no, I am praying to the Goddess that one of the matriarchs of the lesser house will Challenge me to the position, and I will happily surrender it to her. I am far too young to bear any children, and I have not the skills, nor the experience, nor the ... presence to lead House T'Soni through these times. I do not have any wish to take such a role. I would only weaken the House, even if I could perform the task, because no pure-blood leader would be taken as anything but an embarrassment."

Shepard nodded. "We've both got a few weeks to think it over."

Liara exhaled. "I am also ... worried. The matriarch of the leading house of the Thirty, Matriarch T'Armal, visited me in my rooms. She is worried Benezia may have faked her own death and escaped."

Shepard felt her heart sink. "How? She's ... dead. Von Grath blew up her suit around her!"

Liara shrugged. "Certain artifacts that my mother must have had are missing, including her ceremonial battle armor and the sword she replaced the House sword with. The ship's navicomputer was missing any information, and there was no crew or pilot aboard the Talon's Justice. And a thought struck me in evaluating our fight with Saren..."

She paused. "He was capable of defeating all of us handily, but he didn't take the time to finish anyone off. He was toying with us ... but I wonder now if he wanted to die."

Shepard sat up. "But why?"

Liara leaned back, gazing up at Shepard. "To lead us astray and provide Benezia an escape. To allow her to continue whatever their plans were. Those plans must have been tremendously important to them both. My mother was immensely powerful, and Saren had the ear of nearly every leader in known space. What would be so horrible, so ... dangerous that they would turn their backs on everything and ally with the geth?"

Shepard frowned. "The AIS conjectured he was gunning to take out the Citadel Council and salvage the position of the Hierarchy by overthrowing the Council, and that your mother wanted to unify the other races under the asari."

Liara nodded. "Yes, I know. But if that was their goal, why the experiments? Why the mention of Reapers? The vision we have both seen makes me worry that Saren went mad and my mother with him, and if that is so and she is alive, we are all in danger."

Shepard grimaced. "Yeah. If she survived, we won't know until she hits."

Liara shook her head. "Saren was her bondmate. His death would have had a traumatic effect on her very mind, her soul. She will be filled with anger, with darkness, with a need for vengeance. An asari in such a state is unwilling to stop at anything to assuage the pain in her heart." Liara glanced away, and aimlessly trailed her fingers along Shepard's arm. "We will have to fight her if she lives."

Shepard only nodded. "Wonderful."

O-OSaBC-O

The small ship touched down on the landing pads of the beach, its boarding doors hissing open even as it did so. Benezia strode from the craft, still in her battle armor, and glared at the approaching form of one of Saren's turian servants. The turian looked confused as she approached alone, and spoke in an upset voice.

"Where is Master Saren?"

Without breaking stride she slammed her hand into his chest, her fingers covered in blazing warpfire, carving out a quarter of his torso and slamming him aside. The turian collapsed in a pool of smoking blue blood, and she walked on, form flickering with biotic power.

Tears trickled from her eyes, but behind her mask, no one could see them.

She walked on, power blazing behind her, towards the towering black figure of Nazara in the distance.

---

Chapter 107: Chapter 98 : Thessia, Remembrance

---

A/N: The song that goes with this chapter is called Hisou. It can be found by doing a search on "Naruto Shippuden OST 1 - Track 22".

There is nothing left to say.

Edit: Thanks to my stupid spellchecker, Shian got replaced with Shiala. No undead asari allowed!

---

The Normandy was finally ready for departure, and Shepard was pleased. The entirety of the crew was aboard, as well as Jiong, and Pressly reported all systems were nominal.

Liara had spent the remaining time aboard the Crashing Wave, returning to the Normandy only an hour before it departed, looking exhausted and worn. Shepard had told her to get some rest, and promised to come talk with her after take off.

She stood in the cockpit, one hand on the headrest of Joker's seat, and pulled down the 1MC communicator. "All hands...this is Commander Shepard. It is done. Saren is dead."

She paused, smiling as she heard a few high-fives from Ops Alley. "When we started this mission, I told it to you straight – it was nothing less than the single-minded pursuit of a goddamned nutjob, to put a bullet in his plated chicken skull. We have done that. He may have torn us up, but when we got done with Saren, he was the single deadest bastard I've ever seen, and I've seen a lot of dead people."

She grinned. "The Primarch is taking the body back to Palaven, where they plan to piss on it and set it on fire. They can't make coffee makers or elevators for shit, but they have style when it comes to dealing with traitors. We have succeeded, and the President of the Alliance himself wanted me to congratulate you all on a job very well done."

She exhaled. "Our orders, given our singular success, are bittersweet but clear. We are to proceed immediately to the asari homeworld of Thessia, to allow for Dr. T'Soni to clear up some issues with her family. Once complete, we'll check in with the STG and see if any of the leads we got from busting Cerberus up have led to anything. I'll probably get sidelined with taking care of some minor events while I've got the freedom to do so, and then in two weeks we head back to the Citadel."

She smiled. "Once there, you will have ninety-six hours of leave, while I get to deal with the Council. Upon termination of said leave, the ship's company will assemble for awards presentation." She sighed. "And at that time, I have been informed that I will be reassigned and command of the Normandy transferred to a new CO."

She lifted her chin. "I will be given command of a battle group of my choosing, and if I can I'll request the Normandy, but I don't have any guarantees. It is likely that most of you will remain aboard, although I have already been informed that XO Pressly will be promoted to Commander and possibly offered command of a second Normandy-class frigate coming off the lines in a few months."

She glanced at Joker, smiling some more. "We have accomplished that which no one could have imagined possible, stopping a madman on the scale of Ardiente himself. We have fucked up geth, krogan mercenaries, crazy asari, plant zombies, Cerberus asshats and proven to everyone that Humanity can get the job done. We'll run a few drills, just so I can be a hard-ass, but for the rest of this cruise, we'll go to reduced readiness, three watch sections in rotation. I even managed to snap up some real food while on Noveria, so the mess decks won't be too bad for our final weeks together."

"You have done me proud, Normandy. VI, log the time, the CO has the deck and the conn." She clicked off, and tapped Joker's chair. "Get us the shit out of here before I get dragged back into some kind of conference. Or media circus. Or award ceremony."

Joker adjusted his cap, a bruise still on his jawline but a smile on his face. "Aye, Commander. Ops, I have control. Finalize all dock disconnects. Engineering, transfer all lateral and thrust control surfaces to my panel."

Tali's voice chirped back. "Done. Try not to shake the entire ship with your take off, Jeff. My balance is still uneasy."

Joker nodded, and Shepard only laughed. He looked up, scowling. "What?"

Shepard turned on her heel and walked off, but not before making a whip-cracking sound. "Carry on, Flight Lieutenant."

Joker only pulled his hat lower.

O-OSaBC-O

The trip to Thessia, as it turned out, was smooth and without interruption or disturbance. Shepard spent most of the time with Liara, trying to help her make heads or tails of the maze of finances and accounts Benezia had set up, and the rest of the time walking around the ship, talking to her people.

She'd noticed, that when Jiong came aboard, two of her engineering techs and two of the ops alley people had been replaced. Asking the Commissar about it had only resulted in a shrug. "I did not think, given that I was aboard, that you needed five Commissariat monitors. I had them removed, both to place them in more useful functions, and to ensure you didn't decide to rearrange their faces or organs."

Jiong himself had shorn his Commissariat greatcoat, hat, and weapons belt, wearing stock marine BDU's with the black armband and red star of the Commissariat instead. He spent the morning chatting amiably with the crew, reassuring them that he was there "to provide advice for Commander Shepard in the coming days" and not to monitor the crew. Lacking accommodation for an officer of his rank, Pressly offered him the XO cabin, but Jiong declined, taking a simple sleeper pod.

She was surprised at how incredibly smooth the man was. His voice was almost hypnotic, and despite being a guy who thought a flamethrower was a sidearm, he rapidly had the crew laughing and at ease. He made himself immediately useful, taking up an ops alley slot in his free time, demonstrating he had naval technical skills, but he also puttered about in engineering.

Shepard had asked Tali about that, and the quarian had given a shrug. Her suit had been modified, her right leg now bare, curved cyberware, and she was moving carefully. She'd given careful thought to Shepard's question before answering. "He was trained to understand engineering, but not to be an engineer, Shepard. He gets all the elements, but he has no interest in it. The Tantalus drive doesn't amaze him like it does me, or Adams." She seemed put out by that, and shook her head. "He's also very hard to read. Even harder than you or Jeff...he's in complete control of his body language."

Shepard found that somewhat disturbing. Ash thought he was a great guy, having chatted with him and Wrex over weapons. Wrex, on the other hand, was more sanguine. "He smells like Tetrimus. Not like a turian, but like a person you don't fuck with. Careful, Shepard."

Shepard spent most of the rest of the day preparing her final reports to the Council, and going over Pressly's augmenting report. She spent the last part of her day going over with Pressly her plans for the next week or so – dealing with Benezia's funeral, doing a couple of small tasks for Garrus and Wrex, and then heading on back to the Citadel after doing a quick scout of the Perseus Veil. Pressly agreed with all that, and they'd spent some time talking about his next command.

"If you get a good ship, I'll try to get you in my battle group." She laughed as he gave her a doubtful look.

"And if I get a bad ship, you'll just cut me lose? I though we were better friends than that, Commander." He did smile, though, and she had promised him he'd be her first pick in any event, even if they gave him a troop transport instead of a warship.

Chakwas had requested Shepard pay her a visit, and she did so on the second day out, after running some basic drills. The doctor was sitting at her desk in the medlab, reviewing something on an info-pad. "Ah, Commander. Your new ... Commissar is quite disturbing. During his medical check in I noticed a number of things about him that were out of place."

Shepard sat on one of the medical beds, letting her feet swing. "Like what, Doc?"

The older woman glanced out the windows before turning to face Shepard. "He has a bioamp implanted lower in his neck than the standard placement. The one he can remove is a fake. His eyes and ears are cybernetically enhanced, probably with recording devices. He has implanted dermal armor under most of his skin, and I'm convinced from these scans that his left arm is cybernetic and is implanted with some form of built in weapons system. The scale of the alterations to his genetics is almost unethical."

Shepard shrugged. "I always guessed the Black Hats were nasty customers."

Chakwas shook her head. "Those rakish good looks and his soothing voice are almost certainly custom genetic work. So is his strength and speed. I've never had a reason or chance to take a good look at a Commissar up close, but I find doing so has left me somewhat shaken. Why is such a man here on our ship, Commander?"

Shepard sighed, pinching the bridge of her nose. "The old saying 'Space is a nasty place' comes to mind, Chakwas. Whatever the SA has planned for me, it's going to be beyond my training and comfort level when it comes to gladhanding and political bullshit. Jiong is going to be there to smooth that out. I don't have any idea if what he has had done to him is standard or special, but an extra badass in a fight never hurt anyone."

Chakwas nodded, sadly. "That is what I fear the most, Commander...that whatever they have planned for you, they feel the need to give you either a particularly lethal bodyguard...or place an assassin next to you. Either outcome is hardly comforting. "

Shepard snorted. "He's cute and probably cybered to hell, Doc, but remember who you're dealing with. He's not gonna take me out, to dinner or in a fight."

O-OSaBC-O

The Normandy's arrival into Thessia was calm, with near perfect jump arrival with the usual precision by Joker. Liara was dressed in formal clothing she'd brought from the Crashing Wave, a heavy black robe with a pale yellow shawl that was almost white, and a slender black headdress that covered her crests. She looked both oddly small and shaken to be wearing such, but the clothes gave her an impressive, imperial look.

Thessia itself hung against the blackness of space as they got closer, surrounded by a faint nimbus of silver. It took minutes for the ship to get close enough to resolve the nimbus as a titanic fleet, hundreds upon hundreds of cruisers, thousands of lighter ships and merchants. Powerful looking defense stations floated serenely in the void, while a gigantic asari dreadnaught slowly traversed a patrol path between them.

The Normandy approached slowly, being flanked by two asari system patrol boats. Joker's voice rang out on the comm. "The asari fleet is requesting we follow the SPB's into dock, ma'am. Comply?"

She snorted. "Joker, do you see the size of that fleet? Yes, comply." She turned to Liara, standing with her on the CIC, gazing at the galaxy-map turned viewscreen. "We're almost there. How do you want to handle this, Liara?"

The asari gave a small, pained sigh, quietly reaching for Shepard's hand and squeezing it. "I would like very much for your support, Sara...there will be asari media, and Justicars. I don't know how to get through the next few hours..."

Shepard squeezed back. "I got this."

O-OSaBC-O

Shepard had conferred with Jiong, who had agreed that, given humanity's role in the death of Benezia, it would be highly inappropriate for more than a few humans to attend. He instead suggested that Shepard herself accompany Liara, while he and Cole tagged along as 'honor guards' for Shepard.

She tilted her head. "Why you and Cole?"

Jiong's smooth features twisted into a smirk. "Cole is the most terrifying-looking human I've ever seen, built like a krogan and probably even more ugly in a fight. He is also the most experienced of your marines, and will keep his cool if something goes off badly. As for myself, perhaps the image of the Commissariat will help defuse any difficulties with the asari Justicars, seeing as our two organizations are closely related in ... our outlook. Finally, I have studied asari culture and may be of some use to you in that regard."

She sighed. "Still gonna have to teach you how to de-bullshitify your talk, Jiong."

He snorted. "And I will have to augment your elocution, I fear."

The Normandy touched down at the T'Soni Starhall in Armali, a bustling and graceful city seemingly composed of endless asari skyscrapers installed on deeply slanted hillsides, on a huge bluff at the ocean's edge. Shepard had set no leave, implying they'd not be staying long, and gathered up Jiong and Cole to the airlock.

The entirety of House T'Soni awaited Liara as she got off the ship first, each one slamming to asari attention. In the front were eight asari in white hoods and cloaks, followed by a few dozen retainers in gray. Beyond them were the T'Soni House Guards and servants, almost three hundred in neat rows, and the Lesser House, nearly a thousand asari in black and yellow. In the distance, held back by what looked like Asari police, the people of Armali lined the long street that led away from the docks, heading up the hill, a silent crowd dotted here and there by the blood-red regalia of Justicars.

The House bowed as one, in graceful synchronization, as Liara stepped off the docking bridge, followed by Shepard, Jiong, and a bemused looking Cole. All three humans wore dress white uniforms, Jiong's surprisingly decorated by the Star of Sol, a very high ranking award just under the Star of Terra.

They walked a respectful distance behind Liara, and the white-cloaked asari closed ranks around them as the asari, very softly, began to sing. Their voices were quiet at first, sweet and gentle, the notes of the song rising and falling in time with the crash of the ocean tides against the cliffs.

The translator in Shepard's omni-tool struggled to make sense of the song, as it was very old and used words that had no real translations, but Shepard could follow the gist of it. They were singing of Benezia, of her youth and her life. They sang of her birth and her youth, her time in the acolytes of Athame, and how she was chosen to become a priestess for a time. They sang of how she went to war, to fight for the Republic. They sang of how she fought in the Second Uprising of the Krogan, becoming a militia leader, then a commando.

They walked up the narrow roadway as they sang of how she fought the ardat-yakshi Mierisa Vasir, a rogue from her family, in a pitched battle before the ranks of the Matriarchs, nearly dying to slay the fiend. They sang of her wisdom as she grew in age, of rising to the highest ranks of the Church of Athame, of her ascension to Matriarch, of her restoration of the T'Soni wealth and power.

They walked, climbing the narrow streets of Thessia, the asari populace standing to the sides of the roads watching, heads bowed. As they walked, other asari joined them, joining the song, following the family's lead through the words.

Shepard nearly buckled under the misery and sorrow Liara was feeling, tears running down her own cheeks, but she kept her head up, standing as tall and proud as she could. Liara's back was still straight, her voice shaky but audible, as the song continued.

They topped the roadway, coming to the bluffs overlooking the city, a majestic vista augmented by the slow setting of the sun on the horizon, turning the oceans into a lake of beaten gold, the towers of the city blazing with reflected light. The fortified hold-fast of the T'Soni family stood high upon the cliff, and was surrounded by flags fluttering in the breeze, and a massive plinth piled high with native woods.

Atop it, the cloaked form of the body of Benezia lay, ravaged features shielded from view by a pale yellow cloth embroidered with the house symbol of a flametree and rose. The lesser house began to encircle the top of the hill, as the song discussed her triumphs in diplomacy, in business. The notes of the song rose in a glorious crescendo as the sun began to fall, the pale crescent of Thessia's moon becoming visible on the far horizon.

They sang of her gentle heart, of her beauty, of her kindness, of her willingness to listen to the most humble clanless and the highest queen. Their voices rose, emotions warping the song, as they howled in fury and sadness at the empty sky above.

Liara stepped away, moving stiffly and as if in pain, lifting both her hands above her head. The family stopped their movement, swaying and singing, as the song's tone turned darker, sadder. They sang of her being ambassador to the humans, of bringing together her Triune Unity movement, and at last, they sang of her fall.

They sang in bitter, vengeful tones of Saren, and how his blackness had corrupted her. They sang in mournful shame of Eden Prime and Feros, they sang of the shock and rage of Benezia's people murdering Matriarch Mithra.

And, to Shepard's surprise, they sang in a mix of wrenching agony and cold satisfaction when they spoke of von Grath ending her life. The song rose again, its notes turning liquid, feral, howling with pain and sorrow as Liara began to glow with biotic power, more than Shepard had seen her pull out even on Therum, until she literally was too bright to look upon.

Jiong watched in awe as the singing asari also raised their hands, warp fire flickering in the fading sunset. A baleful corona now crowned the hilltop, and beyond, streams of pale blue fire dancing in the failing sunlight, casting an eerie glow over the asari.

The song stopped, and only Liara's voice could be heard, the translator unable to make much sense of what she was saying, and then Liara bowed her head, and her biotics pulsed.

Raging warpfire the likes of which none of the humans had ever seen exploded from the asari around her, a literal firestorm. Liara gritted her teeth and with a final scream of pain, sorrow, and loss, her biotics answered, somehow catching the biotic fire and channeling it into a single massive column of blue-white fury that slammed into the plinth with Benezia's body upon it.

The stone sizzled and melted, glowing red hot, the body instantly immolated and gone, and the fire slowly died, some of the asari collapsing in tears to fall full upon the ground, others screaming, still others merely sobbing into their hands and bowing their heads. Liara let her hands fall, faint trails of smoke coming from them, and sank slowly to her knees, unable to hold back her own racking cries any longer.

Shepard could not stay still and moved, and Jiong tried and failed to grab her arm to stop her. She pushed past the white-cloaked family members and knelt next to Liara, wrapping her arms around her and letting her cry into her shoulder, shaking, pain and loss and above all else the memories of her mother in better times scything across the link between them.

She could only whisper "I'm here" to Liara, over and over, as the fingers of her lover gripped her arms hard enough to hurt, as pain and sorrow and agony tore through the link between them. Liara threw back her head, screaming. "Mother!"

The asari howled with her, and then fell silent. The white-robed family members, moving almost tiredly, rearranged themselves, linking hands together, as did the retainers, guards, and lesser family, and Shepard looked up when one of her hands was taken by the asari standing next to her. There were no words, merely ... a look, and Shepard, not quite understanding what was being offered, but knowing it must be important, nodded.

The asari bowed their heads, and Shepard could literally feel the entirety of the family in that moment. Hot shame and rage burned through them at Benezia's betrayal, lit by fury and loss and grief. Memories, dozens of them, flicked across her mind in dizzying speed.

Benezia, in a white gown, arms flung wide, standing before millions of blue faces, shouting out her creed of unity.

Benezia, splashing in the waves with another asari matriarch, holding a tiny Liara above them and laughing.

Benezia, blooded and cut, facing down an asari in black robes, warp swords flickering in eldritch trails of light as they battled back and forth in down-pouring rain.

Benezia smiling as she bowed to the many humans in front of Vancouver's House of Lords, and speaking accented English as she answered a small child's questions.

Benezia, in her battle armor, leading the House against the Krogan, her face lit with a cunning smile as she smote ruin upon a krogan warlord with biotics and her warp sword, dancing and singing to Athame as she tore through their ranks.

Benezia, crooning softly as she held a tiny asari baby in her arms, surrounded by her family, tears running down her cheeks.

Benezia, standing before the House, a gentle smile on her features, listening to the children of the lesser house sing .

Benezia, in a thousand flashes of memory. A hundred sayings of wisdom, a million instances where she'd paused to listen and comfort a family member, or a lesser house member. To encourage a commoner retainer, or laugh at a comment, lighting her features with that beautiful, wise smile.

A last image, as all went dark, of Benezia, standing along atop the bluffs overlooking Armali, holding Liara's hand as they watched the sunset, the matriarch smoking a slender cigarette and looking pleased. That last image, she somehow knew, was Liara's, and the pain it bore lashed across the linked group.

Liara's voice, weary, hurt, tired. I am not ... ready.

A murmur of answering voices, thin and whispered. There is no one else. Shepard's hand tightened around Liara's, and the link trembled and shook with her own anger, but she held her own thoughts as tightly as she could.

The link broke slowly, the smell of incinerated flesh and charred wood bringing Shepard back to her senses. Cole and Jiong stood alone, eyes wide, and Shepard helped Liara to stand, helping support her weight so she wouldn't have to rely on her wounded hip.

The retainers and house guards began to drift away, back to their places, and the white-cloaked forms of the asari around them pulled back their hoods, revealing red eyes and tear streaked features. As one, the eight asari knelt before Liara.

The biggest of them, a muscular asari with an Eclipse tattoo and scars on her arms, bowed her head. "Matria...we have Remembered. The House is obedient to you."

Liara bit her lip, a pulse of anger surging through her. Shepard recognized this asari now as Shian, and had to tamp down very hard on her own anger to avoid kicking the bitch's face in. Liara took a steadying breath and nodded slowly.

"Good, cousin. Gather the Family and the Lesser in the greathall. I will ... join you shortly."

The immediately family bowed their heads and stood, most walking off immediately. Shian remained behind, standing very still, tired eyes fixed on Liara's. "Would it do any good for me to say I was sorry, Liara? That I was ... that the way you see things is not fair to me?"

Liara stiffened. "And you were fair to me, cousin? All I asked for, or wanted, was for the family to accept me. You wouldn't. And even now, I am not accepted for what I am, or what I want. Merely because there isn't anyone else. Am I to be happy, having delivered my mother's body back to her home and faced with running a family that does not want me?"

Shian blinked, glancing at Shepard uncertainly. Shepard glared back, every muscle in her body screaming for her to kill, and Shian actually shuddered, fear seeping into her features. Turning back to Liara, she spread her hands. "I can't change the past. The past week has been a nightmare. But I want to help. I ... seeing Benezia like that made me wonder how much I really wanted things to be different. I don't want you to hate me. I'm sorry. What I said was...wrong. Stupid."

Liara gazed at her a long moment. "Once I would have been overjoyed to have you say those words, Shian. Once I would have done anything you asked to hear them. I looked up to you. You were stronger...faster. You mastered everything with such ease. Shiala never had to correct you, Mithra never yelled at you, and Mother never demanded you redo everything a dozen times."

She looked away. "But now is not the time for me to be forgiving, cousin. The tide recedes as fast as it advances. I will see how sincere you are in council. Now, begone. I have ... matters I must discuss with my bondmate."

Shian regarded Shepard again, this time in shock, and without another word withdrew, nearly stumbling away. Liara exhaled, her strong stance crumbling, and once again Shepard held her up.

"Li...I'm here." She didn't know why she shortened Liara's name, but it seemed natural somehow. The smaller asari closed her eyes and nodded, exhaling and finally pulling away from Shepard's protective embrace.

"I must ... deal with the issues of who will lead the House. It is not something non-asari, even bondmates, should witness. When all is done, I will... call for you to enter the House. Until then, you should wait on the Normandy." She looked up, biting her lip again. "Please."

Shepard nodded slowly. "Alright, we'll do that. Just ... remember I'm here."

Liara nodded, and pulled up the hood of her own cloak, turning away after a long glance at the smoldering remains of the pyre. After several seconds, Shepard turned away as well, Cole and Jiong following.

Cole was the first to speak, his voice confused. "What in shit did we just see?"

Jiong's voice was quiet, almost reverential. "That was a Remembrance, Master Chief. Their version of a funeral rite. The family sings of the achievements and glories of the family member, and then they are biotically incinerated and sent to the Beyond. The .. event at the end was a shallow link of the memories of the passed." He paused. "Quite unexpected, I must admit. I am privileged to see such a thing."

Shepard's stomach was a roiling mess of emotions. "Be glad you didn't join in the link, Master Chief. I feel like she was my mother right now, and it's fucking with my head. I need to shoot something."

Cole nodded sympathetically. "How long you think the Doc will need to slap her bitch-ass family in line, Commander? And I thought these were some kinda high nobility, that last blue was an Eclipse gang-banger, if that tattoo wasn't fake."

Shepard nodded. "Which makes her a criminal. Ugh. I don't know, Master Chief. It might take an hour, or days. I don't want to rush her, and we can use the time to check ship systems and review more of that intel we got from Saren's base."

She lifted her omni. "Pressly."

The response was instant. "Yes, ma'am. Everything finished?"

She sighed. "No. Go ahead and set liberty for the crew, but only one watch section at a time. Remind them we are guests and if they fuck up it makes Liara look bad, and they can guess what I will do them and their spines if they make Liara look bad."

Pressly laughed. "Understood, Commander. What about you and your escort?"

She glanced around as she walked down the hill. "We're about a good twenty minute walk from the docks. We'll be along presently. Some of the asari are already eyeing up Jiong, I don't want to have to rescue him. Shepard out."

Jiong only smirked. "I assure you, Commander, I have no intention of entertaining any asari ladies tonight. I fear my tastes are strictly human."

Shepard snorted, grinning, and felt a bit of the link-forced sadness fall away from her. "You have no fucking idea what you're missing. "

O-OSaBC-O

The Hall was hardly full. Six matriarchs of the Lesser House, and two matrons who had married into other Houses, were present, along with the eight of the Greater House.

For the emptiness of the room, the tension was thick, as Liara reclined on the Matriarch's tall seat at the end of the Hall. She had managed to regain her composure, Shepard's hot anger helping with that, and she let it pulse through her in warm, almost soothing waves as she regarded her close and distant kin.

"Does anyone deny my lineage and right to hold the position of Matria? Does anyone feel I am unworthy by dint of being pureborn? If so, say thus now, and I can meet your challenge and your neck with the edge of Ocean's-Nightfallen-Mist." She glared around the room, and none but the matriarchs could meet her gaze.

The eldest of the lesser house matriarchs, Tythela, shook her head. "No, child. For all your youth, I fear I could barely match your strength in the Art, and your blood runs thick and true from Gensaiza T'Soni herself. None deny you the position on those merits. And anyone fool enough to doubt your right will answer to the Lesser House as well as your own wrath."

Another matriarch spoke. "However, the same is not true of any of the thirdborne. They are hardly even of our own rank, only random birth order separating them from us. And their rule under Matriarch Mithra was not encouraging."

Manea scowled and began to speak, but Liara waved her hand. "Be quiet, or I will quiet you, Manae. I have no intention, I assure you all, of handing my position over to any of my ... close cousins. Right now, my concern is my own lack of experience and the fact that I am occupied with other events."

The youngest matriarch, Suliasa, gave a wide grin. "You've snagged the most impressive human I've ever seen and you want to keep her around in pleasurable pastimes rather than spend all day doing paperwork and running a house? I cannot blame you." The word that Shepard was Liara's bondmate had flown through the House like wildfire, some disapproving – if only because Liara was so very young – but most admiring. "And here we thought you were a shy flower all these years."

Liara blushed slightly, but smiled. Suliasa was, after Shiala, probably the favorite of her extended family, who'd always had a smile and a quiet word of encouragement for Liara. She inclined her head. "There is that, but there is also the bitter truth that, even if the House accepts me, the society of the Thirty will recoil from a pureblood."

The word lashed across the room in a tone of shame, and one of the matrons folded her arms. Banais T'Soni was technically Benezia's niece, through a broken relationship between Benezia's youngest dead sister and House Vael. She was hard-nosed and cool, and spoke bluntly. "You are very right. No one will accept such. Our alliances with House Vael and House Vakas would be threatened by such an act."

Liara nodded. "I agree, Matron Banais. Thus I have decided that, while I meet all the conditions to be Matria, assuming such a position at this time will do the Family more harm than good. I have worked hard on the finances in the past few days, unlocking everything and moving the funds to new accounts with new codes, and paying off the debts and filthy margin calls of the Vasir. I have, I believe, managed to rectify the critical situation with regards to our finances...but doing so opened my eyes more fully to the truth – I have not the experience."

She leaned back. "I am calling for Challenge, not of blood, merely of right of rule. I will not contest, but I will not surrender the title to anyone without a good reason and the proper mindset, and I have my candidate picked out already."

The Hall fell silent, and finally Matriarch Tythela's voice rang out in laughter, dry and cool. "You are a clever child. A Matria who submits to Challenge may take back her role at a later date without needing a second Challenge to do so. You want someone to handle things until you are ... more prepared."

Liara nodded. "Yes, I do. I am ... I am simply not ready. I have no heirs, which makes me a poor choice, as if I die we are stuck with the same unhappy choices. My heritage and lack of training make me a liability, and if I am correct, the Justicars may try to arrest me at some point, which would place House T'Soni in the lethal position of surrendering their Matria or defying the Justicars."

She closed her eyes. "Such is intolerable. I need one of you who are matriarchs to step in and assume this role. I would pass along all of my rights to you, including my blood primacy, making yours the firsthouse."

Tythela exchanged glances with another matriarch, before turning back to Liara. "You are not worried about the ... likelihood that whoever you surrender your role to might order you to submit to the Justicars?"

In the background, both Riala and Shian snorted, with Shian speaking. "Her bondmate is the Butcher and you want to do something to piss her off? Did you not feel her rage through the Final Sharing? She was trying to be polite, I suppose, but we all know she'd kill every single one of us for so much as making Liara upset, much less trying to get her killed. I, for one, am not nearly ready to die."

Tythela folded her arms. "I was merely pointing out a possibility. We may still have to deal with Justicar backlash, or even orders from the House of Storms, even if Liara does not take the Matria role..."

Liara waved a hand. "I have already made preparations for such a move, Matriarch Tythela. I will not let my mother's crimes – or my responsibility in the eyes of the Justicars to answer for such – damage my House. In the event that comes about, you have every permission to cast me from the House to save it."

The matriarch nodded her head. "You said you have a candidate already? Who?"

Liara turned to face Suliasa. "Cousin, of all my kin, you are dearest to my heart, and your wisdom accords the most with my wishes for the House. I ask you, will you Challenge me?"

The matriarch regarded Liara for long moments. Finally, she spoke. "Are you sure, Liara? While I will surrender the Seat back to you when you return...this is your chance to force the Family to accept you. It would not be easy, or safe, and we might lose some power, but I for one am not convinced that the Thirty will accept a Lesser House member as matriarch any more than they would you."

Liara shrugged. "That is why it must be you or Tythela. Neither of you will bend before their silly posturing, and both of you share my mother's blood. I would prefer you, if only because Tythela is truly needed to manage the Lesser House, as she has done so masterfully."

The flicker of amused respect in Tythela's eyes let Liara know her flattery, while deciphered, was also appreciated. With a small smile, Tythela turned to Suliasa. "The Lesser House would answer to Matriarch Suliasa with no issues."

Liara flicked her gaze to Matron Banais, who shrugged. "I agree. Suliasa is the ... most easygoing of us all. She should be able to win over those who disapprove. Neither Vael or Vakas would object."

Suliasa folded her arms under her breasts and shook her head. "I was enjoying myself teaching the House children, and you drop this on me, Liara? So much for being my favorite." With a rueful smile, she looked up. "Very well... on one condition. Two, actually."

Liara looked surprised. "Conditions?"

The matriarch nodded. "First, I am not doing this forever. You are Benezia's daughter, and I do not give a flipfish's damn if people dislike that she went and had you with another asari, you are the proper heir. We all know it. The Thirty knows it. You will train with me to assume your proper role in the years to come. You can go off on adventures with your lover and enjoy yourself for now, but I am not going to do this for long, no more than thirty years or so."

Liara nodded, and the matriarch continued. "Two. I have never trained my daughters for the role of house leader. There was no need. I am aware you're young – really, you are far too young to be bonding – but you need to consider the future. Humans, sadly, don't live very long. You may wish to consider having children earlier than is usual."

Liara shivered a little, but nodded again. "I have no issues with those conditions, although it will be decades before I am ready for children."

Suliasa shrugged, and with a groan, extended her hand. "I have no intention of spending six hours going through that silly sword dance the Challenge calls for, Liara. Matria, you are once again merely chatelaine of the House of T'Soni Outrier, touched thrice by Athame, blah blah blah."

Liara smothered laughter at Suliasa's irreverence, and unlashed Ocean's-Nightfallen-Mist from her belt. "Matriarch Suliasa, I accede to your challenge. I, Liara T'Soni, only child of Matriarch Benezia T'Soni, Matria of the house, resign and refuse my rights as house heir. These I pass to my cousin by blood and deed, Suliasa T'Soni, and to her children by blood and name I pass on my position as chatelaine. As my last act as Matria, I name you sister, of the blood of the firstborne."

She stepped down from the seat and handed the warp sword over to Suliasa, who held it thoughtfully before stepping past Liara to sit down herself, the blade across her knees. Liara and the rest of the asari in the room knelt, bowing their heads.

"We obey, Matriarch Suliasa."

The asari matriarch sighed, shaking her head. "I am Matriarch of House T'Soni. Retire to your places of rest, and let this night pass in memory of Benezia. Liara, invite your bondmate to the House, so that we may speak."

Liara nodded, and Suliasa closed her eyes. "Goddess. Me, Matriarch. Bad as Sha'ira as High Solarch."

---

Chapter 108: Chapter 99 : Thessia, Aethyta

---

A/N: Since some people compared Suliasa to Aethyta, I thought it only fitting to allow you to contrast and compare :D

Fun Fact: A Commissar once commented on the Justicar Code as being "a good start, but just not firm enough".

---

Shepard found the city of Armali to be a confusing place of both great beauty and strange tension. The city streets were deeply angled, with small waterfalls and tiny streams crisscrossing everywhere. Buildings were either low-slung and organic, melding with the ground and cliffs, or soaring edifices fronted with crystal and silver. Little shops and cafes were perched on graceful platforms jutting out over the cliffside, or cunningly set in the spaces between larger buildings.

Shepard walked the streets with Jiong trailing her, browsing storefronts and simply taking in everything in the blazing moonlight and rich silvery hovering skylights that came on as night fell. Asari wandered in small groups, talking and gesturing in elegant fashions, clothing gleaming faintly in falls of silk and damask.

For the most part, the asari around her ignored her. She bought a few things – a tiny model of an asari cruiser in a globe, with glittery sparkles and a haptic effect on the globe that made it look like it was in deep space. She picked up an extended omniblade kit from a weapons store, and considered buying a Serrican plasma mortar before checking the price in alarm, drawing laughter from Jiong.

She checked her omni for messages from Liara, but with no results, and continued to wander, emotions in a strange state after the funeral.

Twice she was approached by asari media, who were excruciatingly polite and wished only to ask her a few questions about what they called trivial matters. The first one only wanted to know if Shepard would speak of her training with asari commandos in her past, which she did. She spoke of their fierce skill and what she had learned, and, when asked, demonstrated her mastery of the biotic charge, drawing admiring glances from passers-by.

The other one asked her a question about what she thought of the asari.

"Your world is as beautiful as your people are. I haven't really given any thought to how I see your people, I suppose. Elegant? Graceful? I always feel clumsy and plain around asari."

The asari journalist had given a shallow bow. "You are neither, Commander Shepard, and your words are as gentle as your beauty. You are seen by many as a violent figure, is this an accurate representation or more exaggeration by those who dislike you?"

Shepard tilted her head. Jiong gave a cautious nod and she shrugged. "I think it's somewhat accurate, but people change. I was ... lost in anger and the pain of my past for a long time, and only recently have I finally begun to heal and move beyond that. It's easy to give into hate and anger when everything around you is dark. That doesn't mean I go around shooting people for fun."

The journalist had smiled again and after a few more simple questions wandered off. Shepard frowned, and nudged Jiong. "Okay, where are the real media assholes? That was almost fun."

Jiong laughed. "The asari pride themselves on courtesy. A journalist who asks prurient or unwelcome questions is seen as crass, and will lose her ratings and her ability to talk to others freely. The asari who like digging dirt do so in the extranet, not in person."

He glanced ahead, and frowned. "Be ready, Commander. Problems." He made some kind of gesture with his hands that looked familiar to Shepard, as a heavily armed figure approached. "Greetings, Justicar. I am Commissar Jiong, and this is Commander Shepard. How may we serve the Code?"

The Justicar's face was calmly blank, dark blue eyes narrowing briefly at Jiong's words before returning his gesture. Her thin red armor hugged her form, pushing out her breasts, emphasizing her hips, leaving her muscled arms bare except for armored bracers, each baring razor-sharp blades down the side. A shotgun hung loosely from each hip, and some kind of battle rifle peeked over one shoulder. "Our Commissar cousins are always so polite. Well met, Commissar Jiong. I am Justicar Unsari. I wish speech with Commander Shepard in regards to the fate of Liara T'Soni. You could serve the Code by compelling her obedience."

Jiong gave a shallow bow. "That is a complicated tale, Justicar. The Commissariat understands your position. The guilty must burn. However, Liara T'Soni is under the protection of the Commander and her Spectre authority. I fear I have no ability to alter that outcome, no matter what justice demands."

Justicar Unsari frowned, turning to Shepard. "You, human. Why do you defend one who must answer for her mother's crimes when you are known to slay every criminal that crosses your path?"

Shepard folded her arms. "First, I am a human, like you said. In our culture, the sins of the father ... or mother ... don't pass to the child. Liara is not guilty of anything except having a traitorous bitch of a mother."

The Justicar's face didn't have any expression to it. "You cannot apply your cultural norms to define crime, Commander. The guilty are merely guilty."

She arched her eyebrows. "I am not. Batarians don't see rape as a crime, that doesn't mean it's not a crime. But Liara did not commit a crime. She has had no contact with her mother except to fight her nearly to the death."

The Justicar took a step forward. "So she claims."

Shepard took a step forward herself, staring the asari in the eye. "So I know. I bonded with her. There are no secrets left. She is innocent. I protect the innocent."

Jiong carefully touched Shepard's shoulder. "And thus the complication, Justicar. The Code, if I remember correctly, states that a child is guilty of the mother's misdeeds because the child is shaped by the hand of the mother. Liara T'Soni, however, was not, having left her mother's side very early on in life. And if she has had no real contact with her, does not the Code speak of punishing only as you must and no more?"

A tiny flicker of amusement entered Justicar Unsari's eyes, as she continued to stare at Shepard. "Your knowledge of the Code does you credit, Commissar. But she must still be put to the Question. A bond mate, after all, would say almost anything to keep her beloved from death."

Shepard tensed. "Justicar, if you even try to harm Liara, there will not be enough left of you or anyone else involved to fit in a fucking matchbox."

The Justicar did not appear alarmed, or irritated. "It is good, and perhaps even reassuring to those who question Liara's innocence, that you are loyal. Few would dare a Justicar's wrath, and I find it hard to believe one such as you would defend a criminal. Yet the Code remains as inflexible as the stone resisting the ocean's tide. I will convey your words and statement of her innocence to the Hall of Justice."

Shepard's nostrils flared as she inhaled. "And if they don't listen?"

The faintest hint of a smile curved the asari's lips. "Then we will see how well you can fight, Shepard of the Dancing Kanquess." She nodded to Jiong respectfully. "Suffer not the guilty, Commissar. Go with Athame's Grace."

He gave a short bow. "The guilty must burn, Justicar. Go with the grace of our Father." He watched her walk away, the tension in his shoulders slowly leeching away, and turned to face Shepard. "That went better than expected."

Shepard gave him a glance. "The guilty must burn? Jesus, you Commissars are fucking bent. You act like she's reasonable."

He patted the flame pistol on his hip affectionately. "Justicars see the world in the same light we do, Commander. I do not believe in mercy, or extenuating circumstances. I limit my empathy to the upright. The Law is absolute, or it is nothing. There is no such thing as 'shades of gray', when it comes to guilt." He shrugged. "Some find it disturbing. We consider it our calling, and the Justicars as ... fellow associates in fighting the filth and sin of the galaxy."

She faced him more fully. "Look, Jiong. I did a lot of evil shit when I was growing up. Killings, muggings, theft. I ... regret it all. I wanted to be something different and better. But in her Code and yours, what I wanted doesn't really matter, does it? Just the crime."

The slender man shrugged, his handsome features darkening a bit. "If it was up to me? You have achieved mighty deeds and done great service to humanity, but you should have been shot and left in a ditch. That you were not and actually went on to redeem yourself is a credit to your moral fiber and the skill of the trainers you had in the Penal Legions...but does not negate your guilt in the actions you committed. Being sorry for something does not make the crime go away."

Shepard clenched her jaw. "I am very aware of my guilt, and what kind of filth it makes me. But you didn't answer the question. I shot those who tried to surrender after they threw my call for it in my face because they made their choice. I killed pirates and slavers with no mercy because they made their choice to be rapist fucking monsters. I shot cowards in the head because they made their choice to turn their back on the Blue. And I killed the person who nearly turned Torfan into a complete massacre because she made the choice to betray me and the SA for money."

She exhaled. "I never had a choice. And the day I did, I chose to do what was right. Has that no fucking value to you at all?"

Jiong gazed at her a long moment. "For many in the Commissariat, is has none. As the Justicar noted, the guilty are merely guilty. Not all of us share that view. Some of us wish to embrace justice rather than mere retribution." He closed his eyes briefly. "But ultimately, Commander, we - the Commissariat - exist because humanity is flawed. It is selfish. Greedy. Blind to the misfortunes of others, fixated on opinion and the whim of the moment. The Commissariat reminds, it threatens, it protects, and it punishes."

She shook her head. "You people are even colder than I am. Doesn't that worry you?"

He smiled. "I have few problems sleeping at night. As you said, the choice to abandon evil for good, to abandon criminality for the Law, is one I respect. I find the life you have endured to be a lesson I will not forget, that not all wrought in sin is without redemption. That, however, only shows you as an exceptional human being. To give all the benefit of the doubt is to simply cast doubt upon the very process of Law."

Shepard jerked her thumb back towards the T'Soni household. "Liara is not a criminal! She's pure. Not like me. Not like you. She hated to even kill those asari that were acting crazy down on Noveria, and she wanted to try to save the colonists the SA fucked over and out on Feros. But the asari say being Benezia's daughter makes her liable for her crimes. Do you also agree with that, since it's giving her the benefit of the fucking doubt?"

Jiong shook his head. "The Commissars and Justicars do not see eye to eye on every matter. We find them too lenient towards the petty criminal, who will only mature into worse given time. They find us too willing to let pass the crimes of those who never intended to do such a thing, like involuntary manslaughter. But to answer your question?"

He glanced around the spires and whorled towers above, and the gleaming lights reflecting off their surface. "We aren't in Kansas anymore. It hardly matters if I agree, Commander. If the asari want her bad enough, they're going to get her. The only way to stop that is remove her from the asari jurisdiction."

Shepard tilted her head. "How?"

Jiong glanced around a second time. "The Justicars are much like the Commissars in one key area. We can only act freely against those who are SA citizens, or those who are within our borders. The Justicars can only operate in asari space against asari, or citizens of the Republic. That is the law."

Shepard nodded. "But if she isn't an asari citizen, she can't be Matria."

Jiong gave Shepard a piercing look. "And so? I hate to be so blunt, but you do adore such, so I will. If she remains, she dies. You cannot protect her forever, and even if you try, you cannot defeat the entire Justicar Order! Your only choice is to remove her from the danger. Your relationship with her will go badly in the eyes of the public, unless it is formalized. A marriage to a member of the Thirty will give you enormous political clout in the SA. She becomes a citizen of the SA, and the Justicars can do nothing but gnash their teeth. You don't have to hide your relationship, and those who seek to damage you politically now have to worry about the backlash from the asari."

Shepard stared at him blankly for several seconds.

Marry Liara?

"...that's ... going to depend on what she decides at this meeting. I'll think about what you said, Jiong."

He nodded. "For what it's worth? I don't think the Justicars really think she's guilty. There are elements of asari society who dislike Benezia's preachings, and the rampages of her cultists killed many clanless who have no resource or way to see justice done. It is these elements – probably stirred by the political enemies of House T'Soni – that are pushing this."

Shepard turned back to face him. "And who are they?"

He looked at her for a long second before shaking his head. "No. Bad Shepard. I am not unleashing you to start kicking down the doors of noble asari families and threatening their lives."

She sighed, turning away. "Creepy and no fun. Should have brought Joker with me."

O-OSaBC-O

As it turned out, it was another hour before Shepard was summoned to House T'Soni, and not by Liara, but Riala. She wasted no time getting there. The grounds of T'Soni Outrier were spectacular, tiered in stonework of crashing tides and roaring waves carved so precisely it was as if actual water had been turned to stone.

A small cluster of buildings surrounded the central tower, while a private dock held the cruiser Shepard had seen earlier and a pair of luxury pinnacles. Grim looking huntresses in armor patrolled the walls, while retainers in thin gray dresses or robes hustled from place to place.

They were met at the doors by Riala, who bowed and admitted Shepard and Jiong within. The hall beyond was titanic, nearly thirty feet across and well over a hundred feet long. Pierced by tall clear windows delicately etched with symbols of moon and sun, niches between each window held haptic projections of T'Soni history.

Jiong observed several in fascinated silence while Shepard followed. The wealth around her was beyond staggering. Gold statues flanked each historical image, and artifacts – warp swords, broken and blackened armor suits, a row of krogan skulls – filled display cases along the walls. The floor was tiled in black stones, the center of each filled with a tiny pool of water under an equally small kinetic field. Each pool held a different kind of fish, eel, or other water life.

The ceiling soared a good twenty feet higher at the end of the hallway, coming to an end in a massive portal of stone and ancient petrified wood carved with the flametree and rose logo of the T'Soni. On either side of the door were stylized statues of two asari, both dressed in a mix of fantastical armor and flowing robes, one holding a warp sword, the other a single rose.

Riala turned. "These are the founders of the House. Our history stretches back almost to the very founding of the asari, to the days where Athame herself walked among us, a goddess among mere mortals." She paused. "Your God also did a similar thing, no? But you killed Him?"

Jiong's face was wry. "We tried, but it didn't take. Now we use that symbol of how we tried to do so as the mark of our faith." He glanced at the statues. "These look ... ancient."

Riala smiled. "They are. Perhaps if you have time free later on, we could discuss the history of our peoples?" She opened the doors, and Shepard bit her lip to keep from laughing at Jiong.

He merely gave a smile and followed Shepard, but he muttered under his breath. "Rescue me."

She shook her head mirthfully, taking in the room. Huge windows dominated, showing the starry night sky, but bright lights illuminated the curved space. Ancient banners of silk and wood hung from stone bannisters, while a wide pool of blue-lit water in the shape of a crescent moon separated the bulk of the room from the elevated plinth on the far side.

A chair carved out of a single piece of black stone perched there, curved and asymmetrical, topped by an inlaid carving of ice-steel in the T'Soni sigil. A regal looking asari woman sat there, dressed in plain black robes and wearing a rich looking shawl over her shoulders, pinned by a massive sapphire brooch that matched her hard eyes. Her face was almost hard in its angles, the lips thin and stern, the eyes bright and curious. Like Liara and the other T'Soni she'd seen, she had a dusting of freckle-like spots on her cheeks, and her facial tattoos were done in dark blue, framing her face in a tracery of exotic shapes and whorls of asari script.

"Be welcome, Commander Shepard, to the House of T'Soni Outrier, by blood and glory Ninth House of the Glory of Athame, slayer of the Silent Queen. Blah blah blah."

Shepard couldn't help but grin at the casual tone, and she sheepishly bowed. "I am honored to be here. This is Commissar Alfred Jiong, my ... aide."

The Matriarch nodded. "I am Matriarch Suliasa T'Soni, house Matriarch. We have completed our rituals and private ablutions in the wake of today's loss. I wished to speak with you privately, if possible."

She glanced meaningfully at Jiong, who gave a deep bow of his own. "Of course, Matriarch. I shall withdraw and peruse your magnificent art collection, with your permission."

She nodded, and Jiong followed a smiling Riala out the door, which shut behind them. There was no one else in the massive hall, and Suliasa gave a groan and stepped off the dais. "Blasted ritualism. It's a wonder we haven't starved to death due to having to pray before eating a fish. Come, Shepard, let us sit in chairs like normal folk."

She gestured to a small nook of the room, where two comfortable chairs sat, and Shepard walked to them, seating herself carefully and looking at the matriarch. "Where, may I ask, is Liara?"

Suliasa gave a small smile. "Resting. The Remembrance is draining even for a strong asari, and that was ... more impressive than most we usually indulge in. Besides, what we need is plain speech, and I don't want her feelings hurt."

Shepard shifted in her chair. "Plain speech would be great. I'm getting really, really tired of double talk."

Suliasa laughed dryly. "What a good way to put it, double talk. Or in the case of us, ritual laden, goddess-damned triple talk. No matter. You and I have seen the universe as it is, and have the scars to prove it. I am not very familiar with humans, but from what I have seen, you are good folk to call near kin. Better than those ancestor-kissing turians anyway."

Shepard coughed. "Thanks, I think."

The matriarch waved it away. "Liara says you're bonded, and she's already gotten the blessing of your aithntar...no, that's not the word. Ah. Your 'father' ... to agree to the match. This is true?"

Shepard gave a lopsided smile, pushing her hair back. "He's not really my father...mine sold me to slavers. But he's the ... closest I've got, I guess. Is that an important thing?"

Suliasa shrugged, that curiously not-quite-right motion that always made Shepard cringe. "To me? I could care less. It is more ritualistic shark-shit that some bonding planner thought up to rope the fucking parents into the circus of an asari bond ritual, which is already long enough to bore an elcor to death." She smirked. "No, my main reason for asking is that asari society takes that sort of crap very seriously, and by the Goddess, you have no idea how much some will howl at a member of the Thirty formally consorting with a human who isn't some noble bastard with nine names."

Shepard couldn't stop her laughter this time, and shook her head. "I don't really give a shit what they think about it, Matriarch. I'm glad you don't have a problem with us...or do you?"

Suliasa shook her head. "None at all. Little Wing has always been too shy and timid for my taste, but that blasted fool Mithra would never let the Lesser House watch over her. I'm a bad person for saying it, but I am glad that bitch died." She exhaled. "No, my concern, aside from asari society, is how you plan to handle your life and hers."

Shepard frowned. "What do you mean?"

The matriarch gestured around her. "Liara is the heir to this. The House, the wealth, the power. Oh, it used to be more than this, we once owned half of the city below and had a blasted castle carved in the Skypillar Mountains. The Family has fallen on hard times, but only in the light of those used to having a billion or so credits to blow at all times. The young ones are whining about having to 'work', when said work consists of overseeing companies from plush boardrooms or the indignity of actually having to use their oversexed little brains creatively."

She paused, then shook her head. "The point is there is still a great deal here of ... value and power. Liara is letting me take over, and I do not think for a minute that she thinks she cannot do it. She is throwing it aside for you, make no mistake."

Shepard sighed. "I didn't want her to have to do that."

The matriarch grunted. "Well, it is done. And honestly, it may be best. But I want you to grasp the scale of what she is doing to stay with you. We are a messed up bunch...but in the end, every one of these girls would follow Liara's orders, or I would start breaking heads. For her to walk away will damage her image as a leader. Make it harder for her to come back."

Shepard nodded. "I know. I think a part of her doesn't want to come back, Matriarch Suliasa. She was hurt pretty badly...and while I think she could do it, she simply doesn't feel like dealing with the pain and suffering it might cause."

The asari nodded in turn. "Figured as much. Damn Benezia. Damn Mithra. Damn Aethyta for not being here, and damn me for being so fucking submissive to Benezia when I saw Liara hurting. I was proud of her when she told us all to drink seawater and went off to the University. For her to have to come back to this mess ... it is a sacrifice to give it up, but I know how she feels."

The matriarch paused. "You plan to stay with her, Shepard? I felt her in the link today...she would have collapsed if not for you."

Shepard squared her shoulders. "She's all I give a shit about anymore. I'll always be there. They'd have to kill me to keep me from her, and I'd fight to come back from the dead if they did."

Suliasa's mouth curved in a smile. "Good. I worry about the Justicars and what they might plan for her without your protection."

Shepard exhaled. "I already ran into one of the bitches. I told her if they tried anything I'd fuck them up worse than we did Saren...but I .. I plan to... "she trailed off, and then took a deep breath. "If she's willing, I'd plan to marry her and make her an SA citizen."

The matriarch's eyes widened, and then she laughed. "Thus taking the Justicar's authority to act against her away. Smart move." The older asari's eyes flickered to gaze at Shepard intently. "If that is what you plan, you certainly have my blessing. Just don't do it on Thessia, or you will be looking at a nine hour long, drug-crazed dance party and orgy for a wedding ceremony, and I understand you humans don't go for that sort of thing."

Shepard paled. "...you people don't fuck around when it comes to parties, do you?"

The matriarch gave a shattering bellow of laughter. "We fuck around more than anyone, Shepard." She grinned as the human face-palmed, and stood. "Come, come. It grows late, and I must attend to yet more damnable paperwork. I will show you to where Liara is sleeping for the night, and you and your Commissar can return to your ship in the morning."

Shepard glanced at the door. "Jiong ... had some reservations about being caught up in any, uh, situations with asari."

She snorted. "You bring someone that good looking into a bunch of asari all weepy after a funeral, and he expects not to get dragged into a bed? I'll bet you a thousand credits he can't even walk tomorrow."

O-OSaBC-O

Night darkened over Thessia, as the lights of the city slowly dimmed and the streets fell silent. Marines staggered back to the ship, or engaged in more pleasant nighttime experiences.

Silence enfolded the hilltop of T'Soni Outrier, only to be broken by the faintest crunch of gravel as a shadow emerged from the darkest night to land silently at the edge of the T'Soni holdings.

The grounds of House T'Soni were more lightly guarded than usual, both due to losses and the grief of those within. The dark, cloaked figure that slipped past the outer guard was familiar with every inch of terrain, and used the flametrees at the house edge to hide from view.

Using a biotic leap to clear the wall, the figure came down behind the outer barracks. Pausing as another patrol walked by, flashlights cutting searing paths of light in the darkness, the robed person slid past once they were further along. An omnitool blazed into faint light, casting an outline of a female shape upon the ground, and then flickering as it passed over the door lock.

The female figure hissed as the door clicked loudly, and slipped within, shutting it after. Hastening through the empty and dark corridors of the unused barrack, she came to a heavily armored wall inset with indented panels. The third sank inwards at her touch, swinging away to reveal a narrow passage that she sprinted through, silent and quick.

The passage ended in a door, with a code-pad next to it. She tapped numbers on it swiftly, and it glowed blue before the door slid in and back, revealing the rich environs of the Grand Entrance. She stepped out, the door shutting behind her, and turned as a huntress rounded the corner and saw her.

Before the asari could even speak, blue light flashed, the huntress flying across the room to crash into the far wall with a clatter of armor and a muted thump. The figure glanced around, snorting to herself when no other guards appeared, and moved ahead along the wide hallways, coming at last to the Great Hall.

Two commandos stood there, hands on weapons. Both barely had time to look up as the figure appeared between them in a biotic charge. One was struck with a pair of fingers in the throat, choking her, and the other was hit with a fist limned in blue energy, sending her unconscious to the ground. The figure whirled and brought her hand around to the other asari's face, her fingers splayed over the smaller commando's face, and whispered a word. Blue light flared once more and the commando shuddered and collapsed.

The figure shook her head and parted her robes, laying her hand on the hilt of a richly carved warp sword before pushing open the doors to the Grand Hall of the T'Soni. The room was cast half in shadow, moonlight from the huge windows that pierced the ceiling casting strange shapes on the rich carpeting and the silver statuary filling the room.

The robed shape of a slender asari was slumped in the chair at the far side of the room, lost in looking over an info-pad. She looked up at the sound of the doors opening, and called out as the cloaked figure approached. "Who comes!?"

The figure walked forward, emerging into the dim light. She did not pull back her hood, but her rich, thick brown robes trimmed in white, embroidered with the wave and spear of House Vasir let Matriarch Suliasa know who stood before her.

Only one of that house would be bold enough to come here, on this night of nights, and invade her very halls.

She felt her anger rising, her hand slipping to the hilt of the family warp sword almost unconsciously. "You have your nerve coming here, Aethyta. House Vasir has shown its colors well enough, as have you. Since you have not announced yourself, how did you get in?"

The figure gave a low laugh. "Walked past that joke of an outer guard, subdued three inside. You need to change your security setup, babe." She walked forward a bit more, tapping a fingernail on the hilt of her warp sword. "I thought I'd swing by and see if they really made you, of all fucking people, the Matriarch." The voice of the asari woman was almost gritty, cool and hard with sorrow and steel.

Suliasa snarled. "Arrogant jumped up Vasir bitch. I knew you were poison the first moment you appeared with your slinking little hips in our midst. You have dared offer violence to our family, after your vile rejection of your rightful bondmate? I should gut you crest to cunt with the family sword, and see if you bleed purple or black-blood like an ardat-yakshi. Why have you befouled my hall!?"

The other asari merely shrugged her shoulders. "Ha. That's a good joke, you against me. But a short one, you'd last about three seconds. Don't get delusional just because Little Wing put your bony little behind on the Chair, Sul. I'll cut the blue off your ass if you dare draw the Mist against me. I fucking taught Benezia half of what she knew about fighting before you were old enough to babble."

Suliasa winced at both the truth and the ringing confidence in that remark, and folded her legs as she regarded Aethyta coolly. "You come wearing the mark of the Vasir. You come after abandoning Benezia to the dark, which lead her to the death and dishonor we just had to mourn. You abandoned your own child. I should set the Guard upon you, or perhaps summon Liara's paramour and let the Butcher knock that sneer off your face that I know is there. What do you want, Aethyta. The Remembrance is done, there is nothing for you here."

Matriarch Aethyta sighed. "I wanted to see Little Wing again. I wanted to make sure she would be safe here, against the Justicars...and worse. Is that such a goddess-damned crime? The Vasir Matriarch has no use for me any longer. Too many blame me for Benezia's fall, too many feel my teachings are too violent, too brutal. And I am tired of living, Sul. Tired of memories of Nezy and Tursha and the ... older times." She spread her hands. "I knew none would allow me entrance,so I forced my way. None I put down have come to any permanent harm. I came only to see my daughter one last time, and to give you a warning."

Matriarch Suliasa narrowed her sapphire eyes, her jaw jutting out. "Spit it out, old bitch. I don't have time to listen to your storytelling, melodrama, or self-pity."

Aethyta flipped something through the air, and Suliasa caught it. "That's the report from the University of Serrice med-team that examined the body you brought home. Whoever it was still had unfused bones in their pelvis. Meaning they haven't had children and they were probably not even a matron yet."

Suliasa paled,and looked up in shock. "What...what is this? Benezia lives?"

The cowed figure shook her head in amusement. "Stupid kid, you actually thought a fucking human in a knock off suit could have killed the Lunarch? This is why you were always Lesser House, Sul. Great fun in bed, not much under the crest though." She folded her arms, the thin shape of her warp sword visible under the rich fabric of her robes. "Benezia is alive, and the news is probably going to hit in the next day or so, if not sooner. The media were nice and respectful during your Remembrance, but you all just got played. Be wary of revenge attacks."

Suliasa nodded slowly, mind racing. "And you?"

Aethyta shrugged. "I've plead my case already to House Vasir and the Council of Matriarchs. I may be the worst aithntar in asari history, and little more than a jumped up party girl compared to the rest of the Vasir, but I'm not letting anyone hurt Liara. I'll be ... around ... as long as she's here. Ready to send anyone trying to fuck with her to the Abyss. Don't worry, you won't see me. Especially if the House Guard is that inept."

She sighed. "After that, I have a few things to ... make sure of. Loose ends to wrap up. She'll be fine without me anyway, if she sticks with that nice piece of ass she snagged and is all cuddly with the humans. Out of sight, out of mind. Once Benezia is really dead, I'll go back to Ilium and lose myself for another fifty years."

Suliasa grimaced. "Still a damned coward, I see. You have no place here, but you could at least let the girl know you care. It would not kill you. As much as I wish you dead...I would not stop you from talking to your child."

Aethyta looked up, a glimmer of moonlight from the vaulted windows catching the gleam of her eyes in the darkness of her hood for a moment. The gaze was tired, blasted and knowing. "No, I can't. I have something else I need to do before then."

Something in her voice sent chills along Suliasa's spine. "In the name of the Goddess, what?"

The other asari bowed deeply, and turned on her heel. "Kill my former bondmate, Matriarch. What else?"

---

Chapter 109: Chapter 100 : Virmire, Arrival

---

A/N: Virmire. :D :D :D A short but necessary intro chapter.

Edit: Argh! Kiloseconds, not megaseconds.

---

The morning dawned in spectacular beauty, shimmering off the ocean waves. The reflected light cast the sleeping chamber in which Shepard awoke in ever-shifting shades of blue-green, with flickers of light dancing here and there.

She lay there quietly for long minutes, merely luxuriating in the stupendous comfort of the bed, the cool presence of Liara clinging to her body. The night had passed quietly, as neither she nor Liara were in the mood for anything sexual, and Shepard had woken several times to Liara's quiet crying, holding her throughout the night.

She exhaled slowly, her mind tumbling through what was to come. A faint chime from the door shattered her private thoughts, and she sat up, swinging her bare legs over the silk sheets and placing her feet on the soft carpeted floor. "Coming, coming."

Staggering to her feet, she picked up the soft robe laying neatly on the curved table that emerged from the wall, the crystal lamp embedded in the wall casting a sheen over the rich material. She slid it over her nakedness, tying it shut, amused that asari robes and human robes were nearly identical except the asari version barely came to mid thigh.

Padding over to the door, she opened it as quietly as she could. A single house servant stood there, head bowed. "Yeah?"

The asari looked up, her pretty face stark with fear and shock. "The Matriarch calls. There is fell news."

You must come, with Lady Liara, to the Great Hall as soon as you are able."

Shepard didn't like the sound of that, and nodded. Shutting the door, she walked over to the bed. "Li, wake up."

Liara's eyes fluttered open, wincing at the light from the window. "Mm. I am .. awake. Is it time for first-meal?"

She shook her head. "Sorry, but no. One of the, uh, servants just came by. There's something wrong, Matriarch Suliasa has called for everyone to meet in the Great Hall." She was putting on her underclothes, hoping the uniform she'd worn yesterday wasn't wrinkled.

Liara rose and dressed swiftly, the ugly medical bandage on her hip still visible. "Did she say what the cause ... " Liara trailed off as the omnitool on Shepard's pile of clothes lit up with the blinking red and white alarm of critical comms.

"...shit." Shepard reached across to it. "Shepard here."

Pressly's voice sounded tense and hard. "Commander. Benezia T'Soni is alive. She apparently made a transmission early this morning. The asari news services said some big name university on Thessia examined the remains and confirmed the person who died couldn't have been old enough to be Benezia. High Command has sent orders for us to go to full battle readiness. Orders?"

Shepard exhaled. "Shit. Go to condition two, and get the ship ready for hot lift off. Cancel leave and get everyone back aboard ASAP. Get on the horn with the Council and tell them we need immediate tasking and a location to go after the crazy bitch."

She clicked off, and turned to finish dressing. "Jesus fuck, just what we needed."

Liara calmly finished her own dressing, and gave a faint smile. "Perhaps it is better this way. I have already .. grieved. What we do now is simply a mercy, putting someone out of their misery." She exhaled, smoothing her gown, and stood straight. "You are ready?"

Shepard grimaced at her hair, pulling it back into a rough ponytail. "No, but I doubt I have time to pretty myself up. Let's move."

O-OSaBC-O

An hour later, Shepard and Liara re-boarded the Normandy, and the airlock shut behind them. "Joker, get us up. Set course for Sentry Omega, top rated speed."

The ship began to shift almost immediately, as Shepard grabbed the 1MC. "BDO, Team leads, Council Observers, Commissar Jiong. Comm room, report now." Slamming it down, she stalked towards the rear of the CIC, Liara trailing in her wake, their faces set in nearly identical tense expressions of anger.

It took only three minutes for the team to assemble. Wrex stood, while Tali and Liara sat next to Garrus and Telanya. Cole also stood, one hand on Williams shoulder, the other on Vega's. Alenko sat next to Williams, looking tired. Jiong leaned against the wall, glancing curiously at Shepard.

She shut the door and turned to face them. "At 0445 this morning, the Citadel Council was attacked by Triune Unity cultists. Some fifty of them managed to get past Citadel Security and nearly get to the Council chambers unstopped before the Citadel Guard engaged them. Sixteen guardsmen were killed, along with over a hundred civilians. Couple hundred more wounded."

"At 0520, the Council received a live message from Benezia. In short, she stated she was going to make the Council and Humanity pay for Saren's death. It looks like we didn't get all the nukes Saren had, she detonated two in Ilium's capital city, another in Serrice, and one in the Tayseri ward of the Citadel. One was attempted to be set off in fucking Vancouver, but the Commissariat caught the cultists first."

The silence in the room was total, shocked expressions on every face. Even Wrex looked disgusted.

Shepard grimaced and clenched her fist. "First casualty reports are two million dead, hundreds of thousands wounded. STG and the AIS tried triangulating her signal, but were only able to pin it down to a rough four parsec space."

She exhaled. "STG noticed that they'd dispatched one of their ships to that area, following up on the list of planets Cerberus had sold to Saren. One of them, Hoc-III, was set to be visited by an STG team. They are exactly two days late reporting in. Not that big a deal...but when the STG tried to send out an emergency comms signal, they got nothing."

Shepard folded her arms. "Every other STG team assigned to the list has responded, and there's only four planets they haven't checked, all of which are being looked at as we speak. Hoc is way the fuck out on the edge of the Terminus, and it was slated to be a vacation spot some twenty years ago. The project canceled when pirates attacked and killed the corporation's CEO...John Virmire."

Liana's eyes widened. "That is the name of the place Shiala said Saren's base was at!"

Shepard nodded. "Yeah. It was never named Virmire...that's why it never popped up on any searches. But we have transmissions coming out of that area, a missing STG team, and a dead guy with the same name who invested on that world. I'm saying three out of three is a hit."

Garrus leaned forward. "What's the plan?"

Shepard clicked her omni, the far wall blanking and displaying a graphic of the galaxy, with several positions highlighted in red. "It would take ninety four hours to route another STG team to the site, which is too fucking long. The Council thought about sending in a fleet, but to amass enough dreadnaughts to fight that black ship if it's there would take a week and a half, not counting travel time. Fuck that idea too. We're going in stealthed, to scout the system and see if we can't make contact with the STG team. If we can, and we can isolate Benezia, we try to take her out. If resistance is too strong, we get out and send for backup."

She pointed. "The place is very close to the Perseus Veil, and geth reinforcements will be on us like volus to a buffet if we are caught. We go in fast and quiet, and either splatter the bitch fast or bail fast. Either way, we probably only have one shot at this. She's already escaped once, and if Virmire is their main base, there's no telling what kind of crazy shit we're headed into."

She glanced around. "It's a hard turn around from 'go home and get awards', but there isn't anyone else. I know we're still kinda of banged up. We almost died the last go round we had with Benezia, and she was tired. If you don't want to come along, you don't have to."

Wrex snorted. "You can't trust anyone else to get the job done. We can do this. Okeer might even be there, and I can settle my own score."

Cole shrugged. "The detachment is ready for war, ma'am. You won't just have shitty mercs backing you up this time."

Garrus and Telanya traded a long look, and Telanya spoke. "We will not abandon you now, Commander. If you go, so do Garrus and I."

Tali sighed. "Just don't let them blow me up again, please?" Shepard laughed, and shook her head.

Jiong finally spoke. "Has High Command been informed?"

Shepard's face soured. "Yes. Did that from the T'Soni household." She looked like she wanted to spit. "The stupid shit has already started back home. Right now, there's no SA forces to back us up within seventy-two hours, and that's just a pair of frigates. The Admiralty doesn't want to risk any ships against the black ship showing up, and feels this is a wild goose chase."

Jiong shook his head. "It seems my fellow Commissars need to revisit the concept of 'duty' and 'bravery' with the Admiralty, Commander. A pity it won't be in time to help us. I can see if any Commissariat forces are around, but given the location that's almost certain to be negative."

She shook her head. "Don't bother. The Normandy's stealth system is the only reason we have a shot at this. I just wanted you all to be ready."

Ashley smirked. "Oh, we're ready, skipper. I wanted a crack at that bitch ever since she put you guys down on Feros."

Shepard almost said something about Ashley's pregnancy, then grimaced. It was barely two weeks, and she knew how pissed she'd have been if she got sidelined due to that. "Fair enough, Chief, but don't bitch if you get some more scars."

Ash just laughed. "As long as they don't shoot my ass off, I'll be fine."

Shepard nodded. "Alright. Get ready. Pack extra medigel, omnigel, ammo, everything. Double check your armor, and don't be stupid like me – bring your helmet. If we have to go after Benezia, she's almost certainly going to kill some of us. I want that clear, up front. We got lucky with Saren, and I doubt we'll be that lucky twice. So if you're serious about tagging along, get ready to get bloody."

Liana's voice was soft. "She has murdered millions, out of nothing more than hateful spite. She has committed atrocities against nature, against law, against innocent beings. She cannot be allowed to continue."

Jiong nodded at that, and smiled. "I'm glad I brought my battle armor along then. Unless you don't need an extra biotic..."

Shepard snorted. "There's no such thing as too much gun, Commissar. The more the merrier. Here's hoping you can keep up."

O-OSaBC-O

The Normandy transitioned to the mass relay nearest Virmire, stopping to dump charge as fully as they could before going to FTL. Rather than going at top speed, Joker only moved the ship fast enough to keep the heat level barely above the radiant average of the surrounding space. It put heavy stress on the IES system and the heat-sinks, and sixteen hours in, everyone aboard had stripped down to their underclothes.

They entered the system at a near dead crawl, unable to dump charge or heat for fear of being seen, and Shepard wiped sweat from her brow as the system came into view. "Pressly, remaining heat endurance?"

The broad-shouldered XO sat tiredly in a seat on Ops Alley, his massive arms folded. "Two hours, Commander. The last of the freshwater is gone, we're down to 47% on the sodium droplet heat sinks. After those go, all we have left is the radiating vanes and those will light us up like a Christmas tree."

She nodded. "Joker, can you get us down there that fast?"

His voice came back over the comm. "Yeah...but ... check your navplot, Commander. We have gigantic problems."

She did so. "Ops, go to passives. Radial sweep."

She shuddered as incoming contacts appeared on the plot. A dozen. Two dozen. Fifty. A hundred. Two hundred.

"...on screen." Her voice came out in a whisper.

Virmire was visible, a blue-green smear against the backdrop of the star. Hanging in space, in neat square ranks, were geth.

Hundreds of geth cruisers and frigates. Over twenty huge dreadnaughts. Endless ranks of smaller ships, fighters or gunboats, perhaps. They all maintained a respectful distance from the planet, and from a huge lattice of shimmering crystal and steel that seemed to span a fifth of the solar system.

"What in fucks name is that!?"

Pressly pulled up a report on his console. "... I have no idea, Commander. It.. it almost looks like some kind of scanning array, but it's not emitting any sensor pulses we can see. The gravity readings are bizarre..."

She shook her head, droplets of sweat flying from the tips of her hair. "Doesn't matter. Joker, still need that ETA."

Joker's voice was tired and dry sounding. "I can get us down in an hour, commander. I think. There's some gas in the system, I'll have to avoid leaving a wake or we'll be picked up easy. I know that's cutting it close, but..."

Shepard shrugged. "Get it done, Flight Lieutenant." She clicked off, resting her head against the uncomfortably warm metal of the console. "Jesus, we're roasting alive in here. Who's bright goddamned idea was it to make a stealth system that slow roasts the crew?"

Jiong, who manned another ops console, wasn't even sweating. She looked at him almost hatefully, even as he spoke. "The designer was a brilliant young engineer named James Hadley. Did a lot of good work. Told the SA his design was not perfected yet, but they ran with it."

She swore. "No shit."

O-OSaBC-O

The arrival on Virmire was done quietly and smoothly. Joker danced around the lower troposphere, trying to get some orbital pictures of likely base locations, but his ECCM gear picked up GTS radars and he shifted the ship.

They touched down near the north pole, the coldest area, and vented the ships atmosphere even as they dumped charge and heat. Deliciously cold air flooded in through the air filters, drawing moans of relief from the crew.

Shepard laid bonelessly in her bed, before groaning and sitting up. Slapping the haptic panel on her wall, she made the announcement. "Showers by shifts will start as soon as we can get some fresh water on board. I'll be going first and knifing anyone who gets in my way."

The next two hours were spent reconditioning the ships habitability. They were able to take on fresh water from melting ice – Virmire's environment was perfectly healthy for humans – and by the time everyone was in uniform again and showered, Shepard finally got some weak hits on the scanning pattern she'd set looking for the STG.

"Here. Southern continent, tucked in this valley here. Fragmentary signal." She pointed to the display map, and Pressly nodded. Picking out signal noise had been difficult, but it had also given them a good idea exactly where Benezia's base was, on the northern continent near the coast. The STG team had set down nearly on the far side of the planet.

Friggs plotted the best low observable course, scratching her head. "Wonder why they haven't punched out and reported this mess yet? You think they got shot down, or damaged?"

She shrugged. "We'll find out shortly. As soon as we have the last of the water aboard, lift us off. Nice ,slow and quiet. There's enough geth out there to slag six fleets so let's not tip our hand."

O-OSaBC-O

The signal turned out to be from a jury rigged repeater drone, buried under sand and a holographic camo net. Tali found it first, picking it out from the terrain by use of her drone's sensors. They dropped a MAKO down to check it out in person, and dug it free from the sand carefully, looking for traps.

Tali made a joke about the last time they'd activated a drone like this, and Liara shuddered.

The drone was programmed to bounce a weak signal out to another drone in orbit, but that second drone had apparently not functioned correctly. It was some pretty sneaky trade craft derailed by a stupid computer glitch, and Shepard wasn't surprised when she examined the message and found it was indeed from the STG.

The message was simple and short. "Found Saren's base. Pinned down. Engine malfunction due to method used to elude detection. No way off planet. Saren's forces include modified krogan and geth. Benezia sighted. Send as many ships as you can, fleet size in orbit is twenty four dreadnaughts, four hundred fifteen heavy cruisers, five hundred fifty two light cruisers, three hundred seventy four frigates, and two thousand six hundred and nine small gunships and small craft. Estimated geth troop capacity is a half million platforms."

Shepard winced at the numbers. "Pressly, do we have a drone that can get this information out?"

He nodded. "They rigged us up two reduced visibility drones. But they have to be launched from deep space."

She nodded. "If shit goes bad, punch out and try to get clear. Launch the drones and then go full out for the edge of the system and pray you make it." She examined the drone again and turned to Tali. "Can you figure out where the STG ship is from this?"

She nodded, already working her omnitool, her drones suddenly shooting high up into the sky. "Clever bosh'tets...layered signal, bounced off the ionosphere...two different keyrates for ... mm..."

Shepard listened to her tech-mumblings for nearly three minutes before Tali crowed in success. "Got it! They're .... about two hundred miles north, near a big natural harbor. Beachside, it looks like."

Wrex spat. "Only salarians would hide from the enemy in plain sight."

Shepard stood, brushing sand off her armor. "Let's move."

O-OSaBC-O

The Normandy touched down a good hundred feet from the lean shape of the Salarian cruiser. They'd done a very good job of camouflage, its lines broken up by downed trees, a cold wind from the ocean breaking up any heat trails, and the color of the ship nearly matched the beach's pale white coloration.

Salarians with a handful of heavy rocket launchers tracked the Normandy as it landed, only lowering their weapons when the cargo bay opened and Shepard herself stepped out. A slender salarian wearing battle armor began walking up the beach towards her, and she motioned her people out, striding to meet him.

The breeze tickled her skin and send her hair into finely blown strands, the warm sun beating down on her. She smiled faintly, wondering if this was the last place she'd see alive.

Pretty. Never got to see a beach before, I don't think.

The salarian stopped about five feet from her, saluting. His bearing was erect, his darker skin and wide black eyes giving him an almost solemn aspect, but his voice was surprisingly deep and smooth for a salarian. His armor was crossed with four bandoliers of grenades and he had two pistols on his belt. "Captain Kirrahe, 5th Cell Second Unit, Special Tasks Group. You must be the advanced scouts. What's the ETA until backup arrives?"

Shepard gave a sad smile. "Commander Shepard, Council Spectre. We are your backup – the Citadel won't have ships in place for a week or more."

Kirrahe's shoulders slumped. "A week? We don't have a week, we may not even have two days. Benezia's arrival here has changed everything."

She pinched the bridge of her nose. "Start at the beginning, please."

Kirrahe nodded. "We were part of the follow-up team investigating the list of locations you provided with your search of Cerberus information. We arrived here and were immediately ambushed by geth. My engineer devised a clever method of convincing the geth we fled the system, and we snuck back in under the cover of a comet we plucked from the cloud of extra-solar debris nearby. Touching down on the planet blew out our compensator, however, since our cruiser was never intended for ground-fall."

He paused. "We did light scouting, maximizing our covert aspect. We found Saren's base ... the converted remains of the original tourism spot, now heavily fortified behind layers of security. A day after we arrived, the black ship touched down near the base."

Kirrahe rubbed his horns. "Hours after that, transports began landing, and long lines of ... monstrosities marched out to board them. They weren't krogan, not any more. Like a mix of krogan and rachni, with some kind of geth cyberware implanted in each one. They finished that loading this morning, and now they have been breaking down the base and, from what we can tell, preparing to leave."

Shepard frowned. "Leave for where?"

Kirrahe tapped his omni. "We intercepted this signal early this morning."

A voice rang out, cold and commanding. "I am tired of waiting, what is our status for the move to Ilos?"

A geth voice answered. "Benezia-Prophet, current ETA for force shift is still roughly 68 kiloseconds. Force Prime is already in position near the shifted relay. Force Beta will accompany Nazara to Ilos itself. All other forces will conduct distractive raids 10 kiloseconds prior to the main attack, to draw away protective ships."

Benezia's voice was quiet, cold. "Good. Once we're done with the primary move, execute the remaining prisoners and experiments. We have no need of them. Terminate that Ganar wretch as well. I will go with Nazara to ensure someone can access the Conduit correctly, and to use it for the final assault on the Citadel."

Kirrahe tapped the tool again. "They're planning an attack on the Citadel itself."

Garrus had come up during the conversation, and made a clicking sound in his throat. "That's lunacy. The entire First Citadel Fleet is there, fifty plus dreadnaughts. Even a fleet of this size would get cut to pieces."

Ashley shot him a look. "They've been doing crazy shit since Eden Prime. You expect logic now, dino-boy?"

Shepard waved them both to silence. "We need a plan."

Kirrahe nodded. "I have twenty STG operatives, some of the finest we have. You have a team of marines and specialists. From other intercepted transmissions, they're still working on something in that base, and many of the geth are still in the computers at the base rather than on the ships. My ship's drive core is designed to be converted to a high-powered eezo bomb. If we can strike deep enough to set it off, we can wreck the entire facility. It might at least slow the attack and could kill Benezia herself."

Shepard frowned. "That sounds very dicey. And we still need to know what is going on in that base. We'll have to break in and find out."

Kirrahe nodded slowly. "Agreed. That will be very difficult. We cannot land close due to GTS batteries and radar installations."

Shepard's face lit with a smile. "Tell me, Captain. Have you ever heard of a MAKO?"

Garrus buried his face in his hands. "Spirits,no."

---

Chapter 110: Chapter 101 : Virmire , Charge

---

A/N: Sometimes, altering things from canon is blasphemy. Other times, well...it's best to simply use other canon :D And since I couldn't say it in the actual text...

Blood, for the Blood God! Skulls, for the Skull Throne!

EDIT: minor fixes.

---

Shepard and Captain Kirrahe both watched passively as the Normandy took off again, staying low to the ground to avoid being detected.

Having never used the full capacity of the MAKO they had – each one seated twenty, after all – it was a novel situation to have both fully packed to capacity and beyond with salarian STG types. The Normandy had managed to slip within less than fifteen miles of Benezia's base, Pressly using some borrowed ECCM wizardry from the STG tech experts to spoof the GTS radars seeking any intruders.

They couldn't take a chance that the geth might pick them up visually, so the remainder of the distance was covered in the MAKOs. Much to Garrus's relief, the ground was smooth rolling oceanfront beach and shallow water the entire way, but that didn't stop him from regaling everyone in his MAKO about Shepard's driving skills.

The two MAKOs had slewed to a stop three miles from the base, along a wide stretch of beach, and everyone disembarked. The base itself was, as described, at the edge of the ocean, just north of the treeline of a tropical jungle. It was built at the foot of a rocky hill, all silvery walls and blunt, squat buildings.

As the marines spilled out of the MAKOs to stretch, Shepard and the STG captain, along with the STG unit XO and Kaiden, were planning the assault. The rest of the troops milled about, Wrex blasting fish in the ocean and eating them raw, as Ashley laughed at his antics.

Kirrahe had brought along a haptic display unit, throwing up a four foot wide model of what scans and information they had. "We know the base is built right on the ocean's edge. There appears to be a central building, three stories tall, with long wings to the west, east, and south. Another series of buildings on the east side, six in all, which resemble power facilities. Two more large buildings are to the south, one a two-story building with reinforced walls, the other a three story building that has the look of a barracks. Finally, there are a total of four GTS battery emplacements – one atop the main building, one south, one east, and one tucked into a small fortification near the barracks, just north of a fuel storage facility for what looks like gunships."

His finger shifted to a point south of the base. "We are here. There is light cover in the form of the rainforest until within a mile of the base. After that, we'll definitely be seen on approach. We have seen several geth gunships in the area, so a stand-up fight would just get us all killed. The best plan I have come up with so far is to perform a rapid strike with the goal of reaching and overriding at least two of the GTS batteries."

Shepard frowned, looking at the terrain. "That's going to be a bitch and a half, Captain. There's likely to be heavy resistance getting inside."

Kirrahe nodded. "Which, sadly, is why we need a distraction. Commander. I've split my unit into five four-person teams. Team Shade, Silt, Earth, Fire, and Sky. My Sky team is fully outfitted with stealth gear, including cloaking screens and haptic camo. They'll go in first, to disable alarms. Team Fire will follow-up, planting explosive charges near these fueling tanks for the geth drop-ships on the ground."

He pointed again. "That leaves Team Earth to slip past any guards by way of swimming, coming up on the north beach and using the thin cover of the cliff face to get as close as they can to the main building, which has a comm dish on it. When we give the signal, they'll use missiles to take it out, hopefully disrupting communications, and blow that GTS turret up. We'll blow the fuel depot, which should take out the GTS turret by the barracks. At that point, Teams Shade and Silt will make a frontal assault."

Kirrahe looked at Shepard. "Your teams and marines must breach the defenses while we hold their attention. You'll have your MAKOs, so you can close quickly and suppress defenses with your cannon. If you can take out the other two GTS sets, that should allow enough airspace safety for the Normandy to take out any gunships or light aircraft remaining, and torpedo the barracks before they can deploy all their troops. The collateral damage from such explosions will make our job easier."

Shepard exhaled, and nodded. "And the bomb?"

Kirrahe shrugged. "The power facilities look like either tokamak fusion reactors or mass-core generators. Either way, they'll only magnify the effect of the bomb. The Normandy can bring it in once we have suppressed the GTS defenses. However, there's a ... difficulty." Kirrahe gave a very human looking grimace. "Our detonations and bomb specialist was injured during our landing, and died shortly thereafter. We need someone to set up the software and run the calculations to alter the core correctly."

Kaidan spoke up. "That would best be handled by me, ma'am. No one else but Cole has the training for it."

Shepard frowned. "Could you do it, Master Chief?"

Cole ran his hand over his bald head. "Could, maybe. I haven't done ODT shit in years, ma'am. Still, two heads are better than one. I'll deploy with Masterson and Haln to cover the LT while he sets it up, in case anyone comes in after us. We'll go after the power buildings, clean out any bad guys we find so we don't have to later."

Shepard nodded, turning to Jiong. "I'll need you to work with Wrex and Tali, is that a problem?"

The commissar shook his head. "Not at all."

Shepard then glanced at the two senior chiefs. "Vega, you take squad one. Swap a DACT from Ash in return for Telanya. You'll hit the south GTS tower. Williams, you take squad two, hit the east GTS tower. Liara, Garrus, and I will go for the main building while Jiong, Wrex and Tali check the building to the south with reinforced walls."

Williams nodded. "How are we supposed to hack the systems?"

Kirrahe spoke. "Once Sky is done killing the alarms, they'll move to the south GTS tower and meet up with you. Fire will do the same for the east tower. We'll be able to hack them if you can cover us."

The salarian XO, a dour, dark-skinned sort name Rentola, scowled. "This plan stinks like a breeder's cloaca, Kirrahe. We're going to be shot to pieces out there."

The salarian captain looked at him. "You don't think I know that, Commander? What choice have we? Even if we sent for help, the target will be gone, and we have no idea where this 'Ilos' is. We have to get in, find information, and get out as quickly as we can, and this is the only plan that has a chance."

Rentola merely bowed his shoulders. "The squads won't like it. Hope you have a good speech ready."

Kirrahe stared at him. "Don't I always, Vur?" He turned back to Shepard. "There's one other thing, Commander. It's more than likely Teams Shade and Silt will be ... overwhelmed. If at all possible, when we get the Normandy in, I'd like them medevaced, and to have the Normandy suppress any attackers with her GARDIAN lasers."

Shepard nodded. "If we can get the GTS down quick enough, I'll have Joker save them, you have my word." She nodded at the MAKOs. "Fall back to the MAKO tanks when we pull out and have them boost up to hit the Normandy. If all goes well, we'll pick up Alenko's team when he's done with bomb, sweep south then east to pick up the two GTS teams, and my team and Jiong's team will have to hustle to link up with one of the MAKOs."

Cole nodded. "Sounds good, ma'am. I'm sure you have more details to iron out, so I'm going to give the boys and girls a pep talk. This is some serious shit we're walking into."

Shepard nodded, and the group broke up, leaving Shepard with Kirrahe. "How do you measure our chances, Captain?"

The STG captain gave a thin smile. "Very low. But I've heard of worse odds."

Shepard stood, dusting beach sand off her armor. "Great. Because I haven't."

O-OSaBC-O

It took fifteen minutes for everyone to finish final prep, and Master Chief Cole paced in front of the marine squads, a lit cigar in his mouth, his voice hard and violent.

"This is it, apes. We have chased this bitch all over creation, fucked up her geth, blew up her pet rachni, and killed her punk-ass boyfriend. All that is left is to get in there and let the Commander turn her head into a canoe."

He swung to face the marines, his jaw tightening. "But to do that we are going to have to put our foot up the ass of some more meat-heads too stupid to have understood that fucking with the Corps means eating a bullet. Now, we don't know what is going on in there. Could be they're making some more rachni, or some more bombs. Could be more geth. I don't give a shit if they're working on God's own hula-hoop. We are going to shut them the fuck down before they get it, or anything else but a face full of hot 2mm marine ammo and a pool of their own blood to drown in!"

He gazed over the unit, puffing on his cigar. "You probably heard Benezia's little broadcast when she blew up a bunch of innocent people yesterday. Bitch said we'd regret what we've done. Well, that's true. If she were here, I'd tell her that."

He tilted his head. "Dear crazy bitch, we regret not shooting up even more of your punk ass geth. We regret having to wipe more of your stupid krogan's blood and guts off our armor, because that shit is hard as hell to get out. We regret you interrupted our shore leave on goddamned Thessia, which should be a war crime, since most of us didn't get to go blue. And we regret most of all not being able to send you a video of the Commander blowing up your raggedy-ass boyfriend so you'd really have something to cry about."

The marines hooted laughter, and he squared his shoulders. "You may be scared. We're going up against geth, krogan, and asari. It's gonna be hotter and crazier than Eingana or Feros. This ain't the time for fear, though. I survived Eden Prime, when that bastard Saren sent a fucking army to kill six tired marines and couldn't even do that! I wasn't scared to die then, and I'm not scared now, because that is my job as a marine! We all die. What matters isn't how you go out, but how loud you go out."

He walked down the line of marines, staring each one in the eye. "Some of us may die. And if we do, we are going to go out hard, proud, and loud. We're going to carve the name of the Corps into this pack of flashlights and make geth everywhere start crying when they even THINK of the Corps!"

He lifted his Revenant. "Are you hot, apes?"

The response roared back. "Hot, locked and ready to rock, SIR".

He smiled, turning on his heel. "Damn right." He glanced up as Shepard approached. "Ma'am, the Detachment stands ready."

Shepard nodded. "Load them up, Master Chief. It's time."

The big man nodded, gesturing with his cyberarm. "Get in the can, apes! It's a glorious day in my Corps!"

Shepard felt the light touch of Liara's arm on her own, and turned. The asari looked determined but a touch afraid, and Shepard smiled encouragingly.

Liara's voice was small sounding, against the crash of distant surf and the clatter of armor as the marines got into the MAKO. "Do you think we'll make it through this, Sara?"

Shepard gazed into the distance, at the dark line of the base where Benezia was. "I intend to. I want to live past this, to see what the future is going to be like now that I have one." She exhaled, her hand squeezing Liara's armored shoulder. "We'll be fine."

Liara nodded and put on her helmet, sealing away her beautiful features. "I hope so. I fear what state of mind would lead my mother to detonate bombs upon Thessia itself."

O-OSaBC-O

"The ... procedure is complete, Matriarch. Are you well?" The voice was almost timid in the darkness of the room, the black metal walls making her voice echo.

Benezia sat up on the medical table, grimacing as the cold feeling of the machinery in her body grated and ground together inside her. She could feel the racing power of it, the tiredness in her limbs evaporating, the tiredness and exhaustion fading to nothing. The angles of the room Nazara's thralls had built looked almost normal now, rather than strange and painful to look upon.

She looked down at her form. The blue wiring was visible in places, her skin unable to regenerate over the bare wiring that glowed faintly and thrummed with power. She stood, blood trickling from her naked body, even as more wires wound around her spine and slid into her body more deeply, violating, seeking.

There was no time for doubts, or regrets, or even worries about if she was still herself. There was only the Plan, and her revenge. She would set Noveria itself aflame for all eternity if she had to, or tear it to nothing more than shattered rubble.

She felt the voice of Nazara echo across her mind. "The Power is something you will wield only as needed. You are presumptuous."

She lifted her chin, a wide smile crossing her face. "I am merciless. But this is not the time for my fantasies of vengeance. All lies in readiness. The coordinates are prepared. All that remains is letting the Breach Device charge. Another ten minutes, perhaps less."

The voice boomed in satisfaction, or the closest thing to it. "At last. I will arrive soon ... there is a taint to the flows of the Godpower, the Old One in the galaxy touches the strings of fate and causality. I must ensure it does not plan interference. Go to Ilos."

The connection broke, and Benezia wiped a thin line of blood from one nostril, staring at it curiously before smearing it absently against her flank. "Bring me my armor. Inform the Prime that we are to move out immediately upon the complete charge of the Device. Have the prisoners been executed, Ylana?"

The other asari nodded, even as she approached with Benezia's armor. "They have. Rana is still alive, as are a few of the krogan rachni crossbreeds, but that is all."

Benezia took the armor from her last servant and smiled again. "Good, good. Have the Triune assemble in the plaza to hear my words before we depart."

Ylana bowed and left the room, leaving Benezia alone once more. She put on her armor slowly, luxuriating the new flexibility of her body. She felt as she had when a mere maiden, and wondered, briefly, if the feeling was what Saren had felt, of being young again.

"Perhaps he felt his youth too keenly, and underestimated those who slew him. I shall not repeat his errors." She drew on the armored gauntlets, and flexed her fingers within, eyes gleaming. "I will tear the quarian apart first, I think, and then the krogan. The rest of the humans except Shepard, and then the turian...him I shall peel alive."

She slid the armored boots on, and stood, the linked plates of the battle-skirt tinkling musically as they fell to her knees. "And then my sweet daughter. Her, I will let live long enough to watch me smash her pitiful human champion into paste before letting her gaze full upon Nazara's power."

She picked up the warp sword by her side, admiring the sleek grace of its lines. Rivulets of purple seeped through her armor, and she didn't even care. She stepped away, exiting the section of the base given over to Nazara's thralls, those curious black-cloaked things that looked like giant insects. She couldn't recall their name. . .

A thrill of alarm shot through her as her mind battled against the numbing calmness and power that filled her, but it was short lived, gone as quick as it came. The name was unimportant. What was important was revenge.

She emerged from the dimly lit hallway into the main corridor of her base, built along the same lines as the Great Hall of the T'Soni. Blood dripped with each step she took, but it slowed even as she walked along, the sizzle of more of the Reaper's living cyberware fixing her wounds from the operation without the slightest hint of pain.

Pushing through the doors, she exited into the balcony above the plaza of the base, and she felt the sun's rays land upon her, turning her face to seek it. Before her, in neat rows, were the last of the Triune Unity. Ninety two commandos and over three hundred faithful acolytes, each one ready for war. Their faces turned up to seek hers, voices murmuring her name.

She inhaled, feeling and smelling the air as never before, her senses racing, and held up an armored hand. "Faithful... enlightened ... beautiful ... sisters."

The asari below quieted, and Benezia gazed out upon them with love, and with glowing pride. "In but a few short years, the mere breath of a moment's passing, we have gathered and fought for all life and come to this penultimate apex, this moment in which we can change all things. We have prepared a sacrifice to the greater powers that live beyond our understanding, not out of hate, but love. A sacrifice, to placate the ancients who hold back horror unimaginable. To Nazara, who gave us a chance to experience true siari! One that will make us legends."

She bent her head. "It was the simpler, weaker voice of my bondmate, Saren, and even before him his brother, that opened my eyes and my soul when I wasted my energies on a dead alien purporting to be a goddess, a lie thrust upon our people to deny us our true birthright. That voice was snuffed out by ignorance, by fear, by jealousy."

She smiled. "But the voice of Nazara has shown me the truth, the path to not only freedom from this wretched physicality that separates us from Oneness, but a truer siari ... a synthesis of the divine and the mundane, of flesh and faith, of a realm beyond mere laws of physics. It requires us to fight, and to bleed. We do so because to turn aside is to die anyway, but not in value, rather in pointless resistance."

"One cannot turn aside the tide, by hand or by voice. One must follow its currents. That is no wisdom, every child knows this...and yet every fool thinks they are the one to violate common sense and logic. We have been given a chance – not only to avoid the fate of the others in this galaxy, but to aid in the creation of a new god, a real god, not an empty collection of lies. If we follow the proper path."

She let her hands fall, touching the metal of the balcony rail. Her smile became sardonic. "And what is this path? This meaning, this purpose for which we cast aside our vows of peace to invoke war?"

She waited, and smiled when no one spoke.

"It is nothing. There is no meaning, no purpose. Each race is born, lives and dies in a test tube, a harvest of souls and minds to merely produce more forces to fight that which is the end of all things. All our culture, our dreams, our wars, our art! It is worthless. We breed, we fall, we die. We murder. It is mindless savagery, pointless self-adoration, endless absorption in our own foolish thoughts as the very fabric of the universe comes undone. Our very EXISTANCE IS MINDLESS!"

She smiled even wider. "In mere days, tens of billions will die. Innocent! Guilty! Strong and weak! Honest and deceitful! ALL of them! They will scream, they will burn, and for no purpose but that mighty Nazara may open the Ways to allow his brethren to our galaxy, to scourge it clean of fools and heroes both. But we will stand at his side, to become a new god, and save with our sacrifice the very essence of the asari! We will dance forever under limitless stars! We will cast aside fragile mortality to become the very essence of unity! One mind! One SOUL! One VOICE! Not for any higher calling, not for any purpose, not out of duty or fear, but simply because we ARE and WILL be!"

She lifted her hands and the asari cried out in a chant of her name, but their voices were lost in the sound of her own roar. "And united in this siari, in this absence of purpose, fear, or duty...we shall at long last be free!"

Her voice shattered the air, biotic power racing up her limbs as she drew her warp sword, the blade itself igniting in blue fire. "LET THE GALAXY BURN!"

O-OSaBC-O

The flare of biotic fire could be seen even at the distance Ashley was at, sitting tensely in the cockpit of the MAKO. "What the shit was that?"

Telanya swallowed. "It... looked like warp fire, Senior Chief. I felt a faint pulse of energy. Whatever did that was...very strong." She shifted her grip on her asari rifle, wishing she was alongside Garrus instead of in this cramped, angular box of metal.

Ashley scowled and put her helmet on. "Doesn't matter. Remember the plan, boys and girls. Ownby, stay on the guns. We're going in high and tight, grenades if you got 'em, save your heavy explosives for the last though. Sergeant Telanya is going to try and give us barrier cover, but she's not going to be able to hold it forever, so make it count." She turned to the single DACT. "I need you be fucking DACTacular out there, so when we hit it, kick off and DFA right next to the GTS tower if you can. You think you can hold them off long enough for us to reach you?"

Sargent Florez snorted. "Yeah, babe, I can hold 'em off all fucking day long with this." He slapped the rotary assault cannon Shepard had used on Noveria, grinning. "I'll provide cover fire with mini-missiles until I run out."

Ashley nodded, and checked her omni-tool. "Five minutes. I'm going to pray. Anyone want to join me?"

O-OSaBC-O

"-motherfucking gutter-sniping nipples hitting -"

Alenko tried to ignore Masterson's continued litany of curses as the very ground seemed to heave up and down below them. The initial assault had gone so perfectly that Kaiden wondered if they were walking into a trap. The salarian stealth team had cut the perimeter alarms and reported that most of the asari were gathered in the center of the base, while many of the geth were absorbed in working on some kind of device in one of the buildings.

"-cock-gobbling sons of a six credit vorkha transvestite whore-"

The next two teams had moved in. The salarians had swam six miles and clambered up a fifteen hundred foot hill to gain elevation on the base, while the team heading for the fuel depot had literally crawled two miles on their bellies using nothing but haptic camo cloaks to get close enough to plant their charges. When everything was set, they'd snuck away and triggered the explosives, at the same moment that five eezo-enriched heavy missiles were launched from the mountaintop at the comms dish and GTS array atop the main building.

The double explosions had been the signals for the MAKOs to bolt in, and they'd done so at the top speed they could. The fuel dump had gone up in a truly titanic detonation, flinging gunships and geth hundreds of feet away, many of the gunships themselves blowing up for further damage. The nearby barracks had been literally flattened by the blast, the entire structure collapsing inwards.

The five missiles, on the other hand, had not only crushed the comm dish and blown the turret of the GTS platform apart but managed to cook off it's ammo.

Benezia, standing on a balcony in front of the building, had barely enough time to throw up some kind of barrier before a good fifth of the building collapsed on her, and raging plasma fires washed into the plaza, burning most of the gathered asari to instant, painful death. The MAKOs had fired everything they had at the perimeter defenses, blowing huge holes in the thin metal security walls, sending geth plummeting to the ground.

"- unbaptized hanar-licking syphilitic offspring of a Vegan vulture-monkey and a volus-"

Unfortunately, that is when things went up in flames. The two salarian teams making the primary assault had cut through the geth and shot down a few asari when the two-story building nearest their entry point had its doors literally flung away and gigantic plated monstrosities had emerged. Standing nearly nine feet tall, with heavy plates of armor bolted directly to their straining bodies, each one was festooned with bulging muscles and chitin plates. The barely recognizable form of a krogan's head was surmounted with insectile eyes clustered thickly, and geth cyberware shot through the body. Most disgusting were the four tentacles that erupted from their backs, each one tipped with vicious blades or geth weapons.

They'd torn into Teams Shade and Silt, the first of the monsters ignoring a fusillade of weapons fire to pick up a salarian soldier with one misshapen arm and bite him nearly in half, ending his life in spray of green. The salarians had fallen back, flinging grenades, and Shepard had detailed off the first MAKO, with Williams and Jiong's teams to help them out.

The MAKO was almost there when the form of a Colossus emerged from behind one of the buildings, firing its main gun. The MAKO took the hit, skidding, and managed to return fire with the cannon. The round flashed out, true and straight, but just before it impacted the geth war-machine fired again.

Its own head was blown off, but even as it collapsed the pulse blast hit the MAKO. It caught fire and skidded, flipping onto its side and then tumbling free, the cockpit breaking apart. Private Anders, a combat engineer, fell out and was smashed to red ruin by the rest of the MAKO slamming into her, finally slewing to a stop. That meant Williams and Jiong, along with their teams, came under heavy fire, Jiong taking several hits.

" – blood leech infested, two-bit backstabbing maggot ridden excuses of a hanar sex toy –"

Shepard's MAKO had dropped them off near the power stations, while it accelerated onwards towards the main buildings. No so much as five minutes later, the ruins of the barracks had begun to shift, and from the wreckage emerged a good ten or twelve regular krogan, along with a handful of asari. These had immediately pinned down Kaiden's small team of himself, Masterson, Cole, and Haln near the power stations, giving them no time to prepare to link the bomb to them.

Worse, geth had somehow gotten in behind them, and now they were in a crossfire, with Haln having already taken a gut-shot and Cole's cyberarm laid to bare metal by the shotgun of a krogan. Alenko's biotic defenses were being pounded as he tried to cover the squad, but he didn't know how much longer he could hold out.

"- fucking Skillian batarian-kissing BASTARDS!" Masterson roared as he was hit in the shoulder, returning fire with his Crossfire rifle and blowing the top of a krogan's head off.

Beside him, Cole shunted heat from his Revenant, grinning. His helmet lay on the dirt next to him, shattered by a heavy slug round that would have otherwise killed him. "You sound a little pissed, Mike. This ain't that bad. We got nice beaches, hot girls in short skirts, palm trees...You remember picking us up on Eden Prime?"

The gunnery sergeant spat and fired again, this time shooting a krogan in the groin, cackling in glee as the beast's roar broke into a high-pitched scream and it toppled to the ground. "Shit. The beach is on fire, the hot girls are crazy blue skanks, and the palm trees are where I shoulda stayed. As for Eden Prime, that was just a fucking Sunday stroll compared to –"

He jerked back, hit again, blood trickling from his now wounded leg, and hissed in pain. "...this shit. Fuck, outta medigel."

Cole tossed him a packet, and then resumed firing, his shots blasting through a low pile of rubble to strike an asari, who cried out in agony as she tumbled to the ground. "That's it bitch, scream you want it harder."

Masterson gave him an aside glance, before grinning.

Alenko used a biotic push to hurl a piece of broken masonry at the shooter who'd hit Masterson, an asari in torn robes with a rifle, the stonework hitting her and snapping both her legs as it fell on her.

With a grunt he hurled a grenade in that direction, the explosion incinerating the dying asari as well as a krogan next to her, sending the heavysset alien stumbling back before falling to the ground, missing most of it's chest.

Haln was silent and ashen, his rifle wavering as he gritted his teeth in pain. Blood leaked from his torso, and Cole gave him a steadying look. "Just hang on, Matt. Help is coming." He roared as more fire came in, and opened up with his Revenant, tearing a line of bloody craters into a charging krogan, sending it staggering back. "That's it, you big stupid bastards. Come over here and take your spanking like a man!"

Alenko hoped they could hold until help came. Between Cole's battle trash talking and Masterson's cursing, everyone on the planet had to know where they were.

O-OSaBC-O

Shepard stormed ahead, Liara and Garrus right behind her, firing in suppressive bursts as she finally reached the central building. The entire front of the building was a collapsed smoking wreck, but she could see a crater and flung ejecta where something had burst free of the rubble and punched a melted hole in the wall leading inside.

Liara stared at the perfect circle and the scarred rubble. "Mother. She survived..."

Garrus looked at the tons of stone and bent metal in awe. "What in spirits name does it take to kill her? A dreadnaught?"

Shepard grimaced and motioned towards the hole. "Everything dies if you shoot it enough, chicken. Let's move." They ducked inside, coming into a long, wide room with stacks of crates and a dead asari on the floor in flimsy robes. They pushed past, opening the only doorway out of the room.

The corridor beyond was done in plain blue steel, wide but dimly lit with the same pale gray track-lighting they'd seen in the base on Noveria. Garrus glanced around, mandible flickering. "Which way?"

Shepard cursed, but Liara tapped her omnitool, and a pair of small gun drones emerged. "They are not much for scouting, but they are better than merely wandering at random."

Shepard smiled. "Damn, so smart. Good idea. We'll let one go ahead and one back that way. We'll take the big hallway." They moved out, weapons ready – Shepard with the Revenant, Liara with the custom pistol in shotgun mode, Garrus having looted Saren's custom Kryxae sniper rifle.

The building was so utterly still and quiet as to be chilling. No voices, no footsteps. Nothing but muted click of their own footfalls and the dim sounds of the chaotic firefight outside. Once an explosion from the upper floors rocked the building, and then a soft, chiming alert began. Shepard's omni translated the soft asari speech.

"Warning. Fire suppression systems have failed on level two. Evacuate the Nazara Link and Communications area."

Shepard frowned. "That sounded important. Communications. We might find something to use there." She glanced around, finding a sloped stairwell at the far end of the hall. "Anything from your drones, Liara?"

The asari shook her head. "Nothing but living areas and storage rooms, and a massive worship area with an odd black pyramid in it. There are fresh bloodstains leading inside, but they stop at a fountain she must have used to cleanse and heal herself in. She could be anywhere."

Shepard grunted, and they moved to the second floor, weapons ready. Shepard's suit reported oxidants and the residue of burning metal, but with her helmet and it's sealed air supply she could smell nothing.

Fire didn't concern her, all their suits were rated to extreme temperatures.

The second floor was much like the first, except more damaged, with rooms on the south facing side buckled and crushed. Here and there were the broken forms of a dead asari. In the middle of the building, the stairways arched around a circular room, heading to the third floor. The doors to the circular room were ajar.

Shepard eased forwards, pushing the doors open. The room beyond was large, the walls black metal and covered in strange haptic screens or racks of computer equipment. The center of the room was taken up by a huge black sculpture erupting from a black pyramid, with a wide control console in front of it.

To the left was another Prothean Beacon, glowing green as the first one had. Shepard had gotten nothing from the one Saren had left behind on Noveria – whatever made it glow blue made it inert – but she felt the same odd pull from this one. "Liana, this beacon is active."

Liana nodded but bit her lip. "Be careful. They are ... dangerous."

She nodded. "Garrus, cover us." Hesitantly, she approached the beacon, and gasped as it lashed out at her invisibly, hoisting her into the air.

This beacon's grasp on her mind was different, as she could feel something pushing her thoughts aside and recoiling as it touched the Cipher, and the other vision in her head. After a moment a voice spoke.

"This is a recorded message. There will be no reply. It is intended for all thrall species of the supreme Prothean Empire, and for any of the People who hear it. To disobey is to be punished."

Images flashed before her eyes. "We are invaded. The Citadel has been taken, overrun. The mass relays have been shut down. Dark mechanical intelligences the Wisdom has called 'Reapers of the Harvest' have come, destroying our fleets, shattering our Empire. We were too weak after the last battle with the Zha'til to stop them. The Galleries of Defense over the homeworld are gone. The Penumbra Apex is a smoking ruin."

"The Avatar of Defiance lies dead. The Avatar of Retribution is dead or taken. The Avatar of Cunning has lead us to this desperate plan. We will fall back to the tomb world of Ilos, where the Inusannon VI that instructed us was found. There we will hide a few hundred thousand of our kind, scientists, builders, warriors. The Inusannon message said the scourge would pass, and when it does we shall be ready."

"Our plan is to defy whatever mechanism let them capture the Citadel, if we can, and rebuild a new empire to prepare for their return. To break the cycle, to give those who follow a chance to fight and prepare. If we fail, let this message be our final warning. The Reapers are too powerful to fight directly. The very laws of physics obey them instead of logic as they should, and they have technology that is more akin to sorcery than anything we can match. They corrupt our very people into slaves, and our last count reports there are over fifty-two hundred of them. Even one of the greater Reapers could defeat an entire fleet of our ships."

"This is a recorded message. Tyth Kashan and the Avatar of Cunning, compel you to obey."

The images and words faded and Shepard slumped to the ground, shaking her head. Liana rushed forwards, but Shepard held up a hand. "I'm...okay. This one was different than the one I saw on Eden Prime. Undamaged...or maybe it was the shit Shiala put in my head. I could understand it."

Garrus nervously checked his sniper rifle, glancing at the ugly black walls. "And?"

Shepard shook her head again, coughing. "Bout what we thought. Reapers ate the Protheans...took out the Citadel first. They shut down the mass relays and then picked them apart, took their fucking time about it. Ilos...is where the remaining Protheans hid. They said they were going to 'break the cycle'. To give us.. a chance."

Liara had turned away, examining the console. "...Shepard. This console is not just a comms display...it is linked to some kind of computational array of staggering power. They were using it to .." she tapped several controls.

A star-map of the galaxy appeared in a baleful, ugly red color. It zoomed in, slowly, the galaxy rotating in rapid speed as millennia rolled by, and finally came to rest on a pair of binary stars, orbited by a mass relay. "...the Mu Relay. We know where it is. Copying the coordinates."

Shepard smiled. "Good work. All that's left is finding Benezia, and this Nazara fuck, whoever he is."

The moment she spoke that second name, just after Liara had recorded something to an OSD, the display of the galaxy flickered, distorting. A moment later, it reformed, but not as a galaxy, but the red-tinted image of the black ship.

A voice – a sound – a force – shattered the silence. To call it speech was akin to calling a star warm. It hurt to merely listen. It grated on the nerves, made the knees weak.

"You are not Benezia."

Garrus raised his rifle instinctively, his entire stance gone feral, knees bent to spring, head cocked, arms held close. Liara staggered back, lifting a glowing hand in defense, and Shepard gritted her teeth, forcing back her instinctual reaction to run.

"I'm Sara Shepard. What is this, some kind of VI?"

"Rudimentary creatures of blood and flesh, you touch my mind, fumbling in ignorance, incapable of understanding."

Garrus gave the thing a look, gripping the sniper rifle tightly. "I... don't think this is a VI, Commander."

"There is a realm of existence so far beyond your own you cannot even imagine it. I am beyond your comprehension. I am unending, operating in a realm you cannot even see. I am Nazara. I am Sovereign."

The Revenant fell from her nerveless fingers, as the voice crawled up her spine, her own voice a blasted whisper. "The black ship isn't just some ... Reaper ship Saren found. It's an actual fucking Reaper!" She hissed in alarm.

The image flickered, a tracery of red lightning erupting over the black sculpture that enframed its image hanging in mid-air. "Reaper? A label created by the Inusannon to give voice to their destruction and ignorance. In the end, what they chose to call us is irrelevant. We simply... are. We are eternal. We harvest, and you are nothing."

Liara's eyes widened. "No. The Inusannon vanished over a hundred thousand years ago. You couldn't have been there, it's impossible! Nothing survives that long, not even AI!"

"Organic life is nothing but a genetic mutation, an accident. Your lives are measured by the limits of your understanding and perception. You see nothing, understand nothing. You wither and die. We are eternal, the pinnacle of evolution and existence. Before us, you are nothing. Your extinction is inevitable. We are the end of everything."

Shepard snarled. "Fancy ass words from a talking garbage scow. Whatever your plan is, it's going to fucking fail, just like Saren did. I'll make sure of that, right after we blow your ass out of the sky."

"Confidence born of ignorance. The cycle cannot be broken. I had thought you different, perhaps a match for Saren and Benezia, but you are as sightless as they. Your defiance, your words, are nothing. You exist because we allow it, and you will end because we demand it."

Shepard sneered. "Bullshit! We've achieved plenty without your so-called permission."

"The technology you utilize, you do not understand. It is ours. Your civilization is based on the technology of the mass relays. Our technology. By using it, your civilization develops along the paths we desire. We impose order on the chaos of organic life. We shape the limits of synthetic life. We ensure none violate the Severity that we maintain."

The red hologram seemed to grow in size. "Organic civilizations rise, evolve, advance, and at the apex of their glory they are extinguished. The Protheans were not the first. The Inusannon were not the first. We have harvested for millions of years."

Garrus's voice wavered. "They're...farming us. Spirits above, millions of years?" His voice sounded on the edge of madness, and Shepard exhaled, trying to recover her own balance. Liara's voice lanced out, still strong, still seeking.

"Where did you come from? Who built you? Why do you do this thing?"

The voice deepened. "Even in the last flickers of your existence, you seek answers you cannot fathom. My kind transcends your very understanding. We are each a nation - independent, free of all weakness. You cannot grasp the nature of our existence. We have no beginning. We have no end. We are infinite. Millions of years after your civilization has been eradicated and forgotten, we will endure."

Shepard's fists ground against her hips as she fought to make sense of it all. "What do you want?"

The voice rang out, and Shepard suddenly knew who had been speaking through Saren's corpse on Noveria.

"We wish for you to die. We are legion. The time of our return is coming. Our numbers will darken the sky of every world. You cannot escape your doom."

She tore her helmet off, spitting on the console. "Fuck you! We'll fight you, and when it's all over you'll be the one who'll be broken. You're just a jumped up geth."

"Your words are as empty as your future. I am the Vanguard of your destruction. This exchange is over..."

The red light faded, and Shepard stood there a long moment before replacing her helmet and picking up her gun. "Fuck. There was almost no lag on that shit, Sovereign can't be far away from this system. We have to get the fuck out of here." She slapped her omni. "Kirrahe, status?"

The voice of the salarian captain was slurred with pain or fatigue. "One of my squads is gone. Chief Williams has hacked the GTS tower she was assigned, but her and Team Sky are pinned by krogan. Your commissar blew up some kind of labs that were cloning krogan, but the krogan with him is badly wounded. They've linked up with what is left of Team Fire and Chief Vega, and have hacked the second GTS tower. The two are shooting down geth drop-ships and two cruisers that got close, but the geth are counter hacking. It's only a matter of time before they overcome our hacks."

His voice paused, panting, then continued. "The Normandy is incoming, but Lieutenant Alenko is pinned heavily. My team is moving on his position to reinforce him..."

Shepard shook her head. "No. Get back to Williams and back her up. Joker can take out the forces near Alenko, but if we lose control of a GTS tower we're all fucked. We found some ...disturbing shit in here, and I think the black ship might be on its way. Pull out as soon as you can, we're running for Jiong's location."

Kirrahe's voice was muted by gunfire in the background, and the sound of a salarian screaming.
"...understood Commander. Good luck."

Shepard faced Liara. "We have go to."

Liara nodded. "I know." She held up the OSD. "If we can get the Citadel to send the fleet to Ilos, maybe we can stop this madness before it begins."

Garrus gave a determined flex of his shoulders. "Let's get to it, then."

---

Chapter 111: Chapter 102 : Virmire , Disaster

---

A/N: Originally posted as it's own chapter, but someone informed me that was a no-no...so...

In the insurance industry, this is open-enrollment season, where people have to get their coverage for the year finalized. That means from now until New Years will be utterly crazy. I'm not sure how much updating will get done between here and there, aside from the next STG Investigative Report which will come out Christmas Eve as a present to my readers.

There will probably be one update to the Cerberus Files: Humanity and maybe one to the Cerberus Files : Aliens for the Turian intro. Not sure yet. OSABC will probably not see an update until after Christmas.

So, since I'm wasting an entire chapter on an author's note, I'd like to take time to give thanks to the people who gave me the inspiration to write this much. Without them I would have stopped writing this train-wreck a long time ago. All have encouraged me to continue this effort through messages, PM's, and ideas. Especially after the loss of my job and my mother's illness, as well as certain people who dislike AU's, your words were very important to me.

I appreciate EACH and EVERY review I get, so please, if your name isn't on this list don't be offended, it just means I haven't used an idea you've given me.

---

Above all else, my personal heroes:

Jay8008, who says I inspired him to write, good god*

Setrus, the Maestro of settings, and who changed my opinion on Tali*

Melaradark, which started me thinking about a 'dark' Shepard in the first place.*

---

Progman (should get a co-authors credit at this point)

Michael1110 (without which neither this story nor the documentation would have been finished)

SherryE (One of my oldest fans. Totally getting a cameo somewhere)

nimiraj12 and Sollus (The official fan-girls of the Premiseverse. I accept no others!)

Hewhoislost (You simply MUST read Two to Tango)

S058 (who left much encouragement)

NarwhalWarlord (Still not on your favorite author's list , I see :/)

Yoholic (is Admiral Yonis Chu!)

wyval

AlexN7 (says the nicest things!)

NonSolus (always interesting questions)

AllisterH

littlesquiggle

rjohanek (Army lifer, mad respect)

metaladdict

sepoveda

Shigan (reviews are always insightful :D)

Octoberskys (Navy for LIFE)

Seven Seven

RED78910

KeithFraser (If you go in for Code Geass, btw, an EXCELLENT author)

RWBYWolf

NPC200

GalacticAlien

Coltsbro

Druzhnik (Very interesting works)

And of course, my muses, Owelpost, Wordkrush, and Bebus.

---

As for OSABC...

There will be two or three chapters prior to Ilos, then Ilos takes up at least two. The fight at the Citadel is likely to be five or six chapters long, the aftermath two or three. Then there is the post-story and Bring Down the Sky (which is utterly changed), culminating in an epilogue.

If all goes well, OSABC II: Downfell (may change that title, ideas are welcome) should see revision outlining completed by late January and the prologue chapters as early as February. Estimated length is 140 plus chapters clocking in at around around 800,000 words.

The Cerberus Files will be worked on as I get research done (I'm about a quarter of the way through the turian research. Studying birds, Roman military stances, stoicism, Romanian and Balinese history, postmodern super-flat art, and the effects of cosmic radiation on amino acid chains...it may be a while).

The next two works will come out around May/June 2014. I will also (finally) update the Reaper doc (Fear Unrelenting, Seen Darkly) after ME 1 is complete.

---

Commissar Jiong was beginning to wish he'd taken Commissar-Colonel Kayne's advice about not sticking one's head into the line of fire in search of glory.

Like all Commissars, he'd been adjusted to be superior to the marines and naval personnel he oversaw. Gene mods, implanted armor, augmented senses, metal-laced bones, and cyberware was only part of it. He had a gray-box in his head full of tactical and combat data, nineteen years of compressed military training hyper-hypnotically implanted in his thoughts, and chemical adjustment to remove fear and doubt from his mind.

It seemed he would need all of those advantages to get out of this hellscape alive.

The battle had already gotten off to a bad start when their MAKO was blown right off its wheels and into pieces, leaving one Marine dead and the rest banged up. If not for Telanya's biotic lift at the last moment, the cockpit might have crushed Williams just as it had Anders. As they piled out of the smoking wreck, they came under immediate geth attack.

Under heavy fire, the marines hesitated, and Jiong roared encouragement as he lead the charge. His Commissariat battle armor and sub-dermal plating had let him shrug off the several hits he took, and his enraged swing of his neural mace into the head of one of the geth had sent the machine flying back.

Tali's Reegar shotgun was very effective against them, their metallic bodies acting like a natural lightning rod, letting her fry them with a single blast. Wrex had waded right in, firing his shotgun in wild abandon and backhanding a geth with a crushing blow to the head that knocked the eye-lamp out of its socket and send it whirling in dizzy patterns.

Wrex laughed and blew it apart with another shotgun blast.

The fight that had followed was short, ugly, and ended with Williams and three of her marines wounded, Wrex with ugly arm and shoulder wounds, and Tali with a long burn from a geth flamethrower, luckily on her new cyberleg.

Williams had led her team off, leaving him with the tiny quarian and the giant krogan., but as Jiong and his team began moving towards their own target, they found what was left of the other STG team that had led the assault. Two of them lay torn and dead, the third had climbed atop some rubble and was firing desperately at one of the krogan-rachi creatures.

Wrex was enraged by the corruption of the krogan he saw attacking the salarians, and Jiong was about to go to the salarians' aid, when a roar brought his attention around to the charging krogan-rachni monstrosities that had just brutalized the other salarian STG soldier. The lead brute tossed aside the half-chewed and ruined corpse of the unfortunate salarian, slinging it to the ground where the body came apart in a mess of green ichor and bent, twisted armor plates. With a roar it charged Jiong's team, along with a second one.

The second immediately ran headlong into Wrex, who roared out his own challenge as he met it with multiple shotgun blasts. The first two did nothing but crack the armor plates bolted to the gruesome creature, the third blew a crater the size of a soccer ball into the things chest and drew a louder roar.

Jiong lost track of it as he dodged a heavy blow from a fist the size of his head. Again he lashed out with the neural mace, at it's highest setting, but even his augmented strength did little but inflict a glancing blow against the thick armor. Jiong used his biotics to leap back as the krogan hammer punched downwards, it's meaty fist connecting with the ground hard enough to send a spiderweb of cracks across the concrete.

Tali emptied her Reegar into the kneeling brute, electroplasma wreathing it in licking, crackling energies, but it barreled through them. Tentacles flipped and waved, as a heavy beam of energy lashed out, scoring a line across the surface of Tali's armored envirosuit. She hissed and sidestepped, but the krogan-rachni closed the distance as she did so.

Cursing, he threw his neural mace at the thing with the hardest biotic throw he could muster. It landed with a satisfying crack against the thing's knee, the head of the mace detonating with the force, electrical discharges coruscating over the monster. Blackened and scorched by the electroplasma blast of the Reegar, it lashed out with two tentacles at Jiong.

His hands had already gone for his flamethrower though, and it spat hot white phosphorous and enflamed slurry into the air, spilling and igniting in a hellish cone of blue-hot fire. The abomination screamed as it's appendages melted, but the scream turned to an enraged roar, and to Jiong's disbelief it walked through the fire towards him.

He triggered the level two ignition, glowing aluminum particles venting into the mix, but even as the armor plates on the thing melted and ran like wax, it yelled and struck out with a flaming fist. Jiong's dodge was not quick enough this time, and he was sent flying, flames scattering and dissipating as his weapon fell from his hands.

He landed heavily, and the burning nightmare was charging him at top speed. With a stammered curse, he flung out a shockwave, staggering and slowing it. It staggered on, agony entering the noise of it's continued yelling, and he lashed out again with his biotics, using a push to try and force the thing back.

Incredibly, after several seconds, it began advancing again. Jiong's arms shook as he strained himself, anchoring his mass to the ground and throwing everything he had into the field of energy, trying to hold it back. It's baleful, multifaceted eyes glowed and collapsed from the fire raging over its surface, and he noticed with faint shock that it's mouth was full of long, needle like teeth rather than the flat grinding teeth of a normal krogan.

A yell and an explosion rocked the beast, it's leg collapsing as Tali launched omni-grenades from her omnitool, each one small but packing a large punch. The second and third landed on it's back, and it finally fell, still groaning and yelling. Jiong used the last of his biotic energy to lift up a large piece of pavement and hammer it into the thing's head, splattering it.

He exhaled shakily, and looked up to see Wrex duck a clawing tentacle before tearing it out of the creature he was fighting. It slammed a clawed hand against his chest, but he merely took the vicious hit, instead dropping his shotgun and grabbing the head of the beast. With a krogan war-cry, he pulled back, and literally tore its head off its hulking shoulders.

It staggered, blood fountaining in all directions in a gory spray of orange, before staggering towards Wrex, the remaining tentacles seeking. With a disgusted noise, Wrex dived out of the way, his hands gathering up his shotgun as he did so. Three booms rang out as he fired, and finally the thing fell, twitching and spasming.

Jiong shuddered, and realized that the one he'd downed was still moving slowly as well. "What does it take to kill them?"

Tali sprayed her shotgun fire over the one Wrex put down, and with a final silent shake, it collapsed. Orange ichor, thick and smoking, began eating into the concrete of the plaza, and Wrex shook his head again. "Disgusting. Only Okeer could have come up with something so mocking and offensive to everything it means to be krogan."

Wrex turned as the last salarian finally managed to shoot its opponent to death. With an exhausted sigh, the salarian dropped to the ground, panting. Jiong stopped to pick up his flamethrower, and then moved over to him. "You okay?"

The salarian took off his helmet, revealing himself as Commander Rentola. "By the Collapse, what are these things? If they got into the wider galaxy they'd slay everything, and they don't even have guns!"

Jiong nodded, glancing about. "They came out of the building we were supposed to check. You should fall back to the group headed to the GTS tower, they might need help. We'll see what we can find and then get the hell out."

Rentola nodded. "Be careful, human. That may not be the last of the things."

Jiong lead Wrex and a limping Tali towards the building, moving from the shallow cover of rubble to the deeper cover of smaller side buildings. Close up, the reinforced walls could be seen to have external bracing, as if containing something within. He noticed as well that the building had turian script over it's doorway. His omnitool translated it as "Hot Lab".

"Wonderful. Get ready you two, I'm going for the door."

Wrex grunted, lifting his shotgun. "What are we looking for, anyway?"

Jiong began hacking the door, applying several runtimes to the lock. "Anything that can tell us what Benezia is up to, her ultimate target, or where this Ilos place is."

Wrex shook his helmeted head. "That's easy...she's gathering an army. She's going to attack somewhere, but she has no vehicles, no siege weapons. All these things we've seen are urban types. She's probably going after the Citadel."

Tali shrugged. "Or some other space station, or perhaps a city, Wrex? We can't afford to guess..."

The big krogan shot her a sidelong look. "You stab one krogan and you think you're some kinda military expert..."

Jiong tuned out their good-natured bickering, even as he considered it's ramifications. From what little he knew about the krogan – Commissariat xenotraining did not cover them heavily – they were brutal, simple warrior types. But this Wrex seemed more nuanced and much, much more clever than most of his kind, and strangely affable, in a warped, mercenary fashion.

Was it due to Shepard? Another question he had no answers to. The reports from the Commissariat observers aboard the Normandy had been ... inconsistent. Shepard had nightmares, was cool, efficient, and lethal. She didn't actively encourage teamwork...but everyone wanted to impress her, get that tiny little nod of respect. And though he'd intimated otherwise, despite their loyalty training, not a single one of the observers had reported Shepard's liaison with the asari doctor – that had come from the audio pickups they'd installed to monitor the turian and the asari, and had been an unexpected bonus.

He grimaced and returned his attention to the door. He'd have time to figure out how a bloody-handed sarcastic psycho managed to get such performance out of humans and aliens later. Jiong finished hacking the door leading to the building they were supposed to check out, and standing, kicked the door in.

He really, really hoped Benezia had died in the collapse of the main building's front facing. The Commissariat had no real intel on Saren, but the Justicars – in a sign of the respect between the two groups – had forwarded what they knew of the former Lunarch to the High Commissar, and Jiong had been sent a copy. Benezia was a nightmare opponent, far stronger than Saren, and probably crazy as shit at the moment.

So it was with relief that as doors opened, it wasn't filled with chanting asari. Instead, the room beyond was clearly some kind of lab, much as the sign above the door proclaimed. Huge towering tubes of green liquid ran from floor to ceiling, dozens of them, each one holding deformed krogan, twisted asari, or even bizarrely mutated vorcha. A huge table, twenty by thirty, dominated the room, covered in haptic diagrams of organ systems and displays of the asari brain.

The south wall of the room was segregated into several work spaces, each one facing an open-bay holding cell with force-field walls and an array of experimental and surgical tools hanging from articulated arms in the ceiling. The cells only contained an array of dead salarians and asari.

The far wall of the room was covered in computer banks, and in one corner was a heavysset desk, with a micro-frame built into one side. A shelf with some knickknacks – a potted asari plant, books on genetic engineering, a framed portrait of an a human woman – hung above the area.

From behind the desk, Jiong heard a faint breath. He stopped, eyes narrowing, and drew his flamethrower. "The Perdition flame unit usually throws mere plasma, but the Commissariat prefers a white phosphorous, napalm and powdered aluminum mix. If you don't come out unarmed, you'll find out why."

A gasp of terror was heard, and an asari in a lab coat over a dress stumbled out from behind the desk, her hands empty of weapons and held out. "No! Please! I'm unarmed! I'm not a threat!"

Wrex leveled his shotgun at her. "You're working with Benezia. That makes you a threat and stupid."

Jiong chuckled. "While I certainly agree with you, my large friend, perhaps this person can find a reason to convince me to not learn the melting point of asari flesh."

Wrex glanced aside at the flamethrower. "You even cook my meals for me? Yeah, we're replacing Alenko with you." His helmeted head swung back to face the asari. "Talk, or I'll try medium rare asari."

The woman fell to her knees, eyes wide with horror. "N-no! I'll talk! I'm Rana Thanoptis, of the Lifeshaper clan. I was hired by Binary Helix to work with their bio-sciences division, but they flew me out here and told me to work or they'd kill me! Please, I didn't want to have to do anything, but I had no choice."

Jiong shook his head. "Death is a choice, Ms. Thanoptis. What exactly is being researched here?"

The asari sagged. "How to combat indoctrination, and designing the Destroyers."

Jiong glanced back over his shoulder at the tubes. "I am presuming the Destroyers are the rachni-krogan abominations we've been seeing? Why in the name of God would Saren and Benezia wish to create such things?"

Rana licked her lips nervously. "They were ... impossible to indoctrinate. Something about the mixture of krogan and rachni hormones. It started as a way to find a method for reversing indoctrination, or at least resisting it. But they also wanted an army independent of the geth, I think, they mentioned that several times. They figured out how to get around the genophage's blocks on cloning."

Wrex lifted his head. "They cured the genophage? Tell me! How!"

She gestured sadly to the tanks. "Not a cure. A side effect of combining them with rachni. Something about the combined genetics doesn't let the genophage throw off DNA markers when being clones. I don't think it does anything to the childbirth issues...and, well, they aren't ... sentient. What is left isn't really krogan or rachni. They implant geth technology into them and slave them to Benezia's will...although she took several of them and implanted them with cyberware from Nazara as well."

Jiong raised his eyebrow. "Nazara, yes. Nazara was mentioned by another asari that served Benezia, but we have no clue who he or she is."

Rana closed her eyes, shuddering. "Not who. What. It is the black dreadnaught. It lives, speaks. It's terrifying. It's voice is like feeling yourself dying slowly...pieces of your mind slipping away. Just being around it makes you start hear voices...see things, think things."

She shook her head, as if to clear it. "Most of my work was...trying to find away to stop indoctrination. I experimented with sonic fields, nanites, chemicals, even greyboxes and blueboxes. Benezia took most of my research earlier today... I've just been waiting for them to leave and hoping they wouldn't kill me like they did the prisoners and Ganar Droyas."

Wrex growled. "Another Ganar. Has Okeer been here as well?"

She shook her head. "N-no. He never comes in person, but he sends krogan as ... test subjects, in return for payment and supplies. And Droyas...was killed. The geth came in and executed him, along with the test subjects. They didn't even stop when he screamed for mercy..."

Tali folded her arms. "Is there anything you can tell us that's useful? Where is Benezia? What else is in this building?"

Rana's expression fell. "I .. Benezia has an office in the next room, I can unlock it. It used to be Saren's, I think. It's where they kept some of what they'd learned about indoctrination. She's not there, though. The rest of the building is a sublevel – it's the assembly line for the Destroyers. Once we finalize production we can make tens of thousands of them in a few weeks time..."

Jiong shuddered. The geth they had were bad enough, even a few hundred of these monsters would tear through an entire battalion. "We have to destroy this place, then. It's a good thing we brought a bomb, but I don't know the yield on that, and this place is heavily armored. We'll have to go down there and plant bombs as well."

Rana's eyes widened. "A b-bomb? Blow the place up? I ... you have to let me go!"

He shook his head. "Go? Go exactly where? The bomb is eezo laced, it's going to obliterate everything in two hundred miles. We already blew the landing field up. How would you get away?"

Rana bit her lip. "Lady Benezia has a ship, a transport, at the back of the base behind the Tower of Nazara. The landing bay is dug into the hill. There's a passage that runs from here to the Tower's sublevel, leading to it.."

Jiong cursed and hit his omnitool. "Shepard, Jiong here. Benezia has a ship near the main building, she might be making a run for it."

The tool gave no reply, only static, and Jiong cursed again. "Dammit. Get that door open, asari, and we'll see about not putting a round in your head when we leave. Tali, go with her, secure anything you see valuable." He turned to Wrex. "You have explosive charges? Plant a few in this sublevel, I'll be down to help shortly."

Wrex nodded. "What are you going to be doing up here?"

Jiong pulled two short black items from the side of each calf, twisting their tops. A bright red light lit up on each of them. "Taking samples of whatever the hell they were doing. For all we know they've already loaded ships full of these things. Any weaknesses I can find will be useful."

Wrex grunted, motioning the asari ahead, and followed, Tali trailing behind. Jiong approached the nearest tube, running his two-piece scanning array over it, and tapping his omnitool. "Commissariat field log, encoding Capricorn. Possible genophage cure in combination of krogan and rachni traits. Obtaining full DNA scan. Recommend securing research from Noveria in light of this development."

He waited as the the array hummed quietly, the lights turning green after almost two minutes, and he replaced the scanners in their niches in the sides of his calf armor, kneeling to do so. He was about to stand when the tank on the end gave a shudder.

He drew his flamethrower and walked closer, keeping the nozzle trained in that direction. One of the malformed asari was twitching in her tank, and as he watched the status displays went from green to red. The bottom of the tank opened, flooding the floor with foul-smelling greenish-black liquid, and she slid from the tube to land on the floor, hacking and coughing weakly.

Naked, she was similar to most asari, except for a faint tracery of cybernetics under her skin. In places the skin had turned necrotic, black corruption spreading in long lines edged with blue-lit metal. Her eyes had been torn out and replaced with a wide band of metal, and her right arm had erupted in plated, chitinous growths.

Blind, she coughed again, and turned her head to the sky. "I ... am free. The voice calls, but my body is his already."

Jiong frowned. "What happened to you?"

She gave a wide, unnerving smile, displaying blackened spike-like teeth. "I was the student of the wheel, yes. I wanted to see as the mystic, to see the Wheel turn, to see the spokes as they cast aside choice, yes. So I touched his mind, as he sat, and I saw, oh ... I saw. I saw what comes, shambling in from the dark, dripping slime over your head in the pitch black. I saw the fires, and the death, and the screaming. Asari, salarians, turians, humans, batarians...melting, blending."

Jiong felt a thrill of horror crawl up his spine at her cracked, barely sane voice. "What is coming?"

She turned to face him, spreading her hands. As she turned he saw an insectile leg growing out of her side, and the trickle of black fluids from her nipples. The skin on her right side was discolored and bruised, hints of machinery grinding away under the rippling surface. "I saw a Darkness. It ate light, made gravity turn to water. Time ran backwards, stars melted, planets became as clouds. I saw it eat everything, one little bite at a time...and as it ate us, we kept fighting each other, covering our eyes with our hands."

She coughed again, something thick and ropy dribbling from her mouth. "I have no eyes...and I see you, little man of rules, hiding his fear behind a coat and a hat, praying big brother would stop the rapes and the nightmares that daddy puts into you. I see you, all of you, and I should not see so much of you, so many angles and different parts...all smeared up in a cloud of maybes..."

She spread her hands. "...in one of those maybes, you will grant me absolution by fire."

Jiong set his jaw and pulled the trigger on his flamethrower, engulfing the tortured asari in bright, cleansing flame. She didn't even scream as it hit her, flesh crisping almost instantly, cyberware flaring and snapping in small pops, instead throwing her head back as if in ecstasy.

"thank...you..."

The corpse slumped smoking to the floor, and Jiong finally killed the stream. "What in God's name..."

Still curiously shaken, he'd not moved five minutes later when Tali, Rana and Wrex found him still standing there, a look of wondering horror on his face. Rana looked at the voided tube and shuddered herself. "Those were the experiments they did on an asari woman who used to be the student of a Wheel Mystic. She ... tore out her own eyes after the first set, and Benezia tried blending her with both rachni and Reaper technology..."

Jiong made the sign of the cross over the corpse. "No one should suffer such horror. We can review whatever you found later. I'm leaving some charges behind in the lab, then we're headed out to try and link up with Shepard's team. I can't raise her on my omnitool and that has me worried, and after this I simply wish to leave."

He turned and placed the still warm tip of the flamethrower to Rana's chin. "Cross me even once, asari, and you will join her in death. Otherwise, if you are obedient and don't get us killed, we will simply arrest you and turn you over to the Justicars."

Rana nodded, a tear sliding down her cheek. "Compared to this, that would be a mercy."

O-OSaBC-O

Benezia strode through the tunnel, not even noticing the blood slowly seeping from her leg. She had the information she needed, the Device was charged, and it was time to depart. The fact that she wasn't doing it in slow exultation of her soon to come ascension was an irritation, but only a minor one.

Her foes would be all dead or worse in a few days, after all. Her priority was survival, so that she could enjoy her revenge.

Normally, she'd have gone out and destroyed whoever had wrecked her base in such a manner, but the reports she was getting from what was left of her forces on the ground were alarming. She had no idea of how many attackers there were, how'd they located her base so fast, or how long it would be until Nazara arrived. With most of the Triune dead or dying, and the majority of the geth already loaded aboard the strike fleets, staying and fighting over the base would be useless.

She hated having to leave the Destroyers, as they would have come in handy in the days after the Reaper return as insurance, but she'd become less and less worried about the Reapers double-crossing her after tasting their power firsthand. They had no need to. They could obliterate the galaxy, why stoop to lying to a mere mortal speck?

Another explosion racked the tunnel, this one from more south. Beside her, Ylana cringed. "We have to hurry, Matriarch."

Benezia only smiled. "The tide cannot be sped nor slowed, faithful Ylana." She opened the door at the end of the bare concrete corridor with a wave of her hand, the ring on her finger communicating with the cypher-lock. It slid away, revealing the docking bay and the smooth shape of her personal ship, the Crescent Moon's Dance.

"Make sure the ship is in readiness, Ylana. I have to ensure the safety of the Device." She turned away, heading to the charging station in the corner.

The Device, a modified Prothean beacon, glowed a sick, bright red, its interlocking security precautions finally destroyed by Nazara's codes and viral attacks. The thick cables connected to the base of the platform it sat upon were the first thing to go, as she used her biotics to simply tear them away. She removed the braces that held it in place, and finally typed in her security code to have the base unit unlock the actual pylon, which fell to the ground next to her with a hollow clang.

"Fallen. Much like your makers. But you have one, last useful task to perform, little tool."

She was about to move the pylon when her omnitool lit up, and the tired voice of Huntress Ushan, the last of her inner circle, sounded. "Matriarch...we are outmatched. We have slain but a handful of whoever attacks, and too many were killed in the opening minutes of this assault for us to reorganize. We have fallen back to the Gathering Hall. What is your will?"

Benezia paused. "What is the enemy doing?"

Ushan's voice turned hard. "They have occupied the other two GTS sites. One group is coming out of the Tower of Nazara, another group just exited the Hot Lab. The geth remaining are attacking both GTS sites heavily, but I just saw a human frigate touch down near the power stations, so we can assume they are still in enemy control."

Benezia's lips curved. "A human frigate you say. Black and silver? Normandy is the name?"

"...yes, Matriarch. That is the ship. They appear to be ... unloading something."

Benezia's eyes narrowed as she thought. For Shepard to have trailed her this quickly either meant the human had information beyond her means, or that they knew roughly where the base was anyway. Had they captured Saren, tortured the location out of him? Was it possible Shepard was in league with the Old One that worried Nazara so much? Or did the human simply have all the blessed luck of a dark-eel in a nest of dartfish?

And unloading something?

Too many questions.

"Fall back towards the docking bay. I am only going to wait five minutes, if you are not here we are leaving. There is no telling what they brought with them, and this may be merely the vanguard of a fleet arriving."

Ushan shouted orders. "Yes, Matriarch. Your will." She clicked off, and Benezia sighed, before turning to the still-glowing Device.

She lifted her arms, exerting the Art, and the Beacon slowly lifted from the ground, held aloft by her power. She carefully began to walk back towards the ship, turning it lengthwise so it would fit into the ship's small cargo bay.

She smiled. Let Shepard run wild. Once she had opened the way to the Conduit, nothing could stop her plans. Not ships, not armies, not the decayed plans of the Matriarchy, and certainly not one stupid little human.

O-OSaBC-O

Masterson groaned as he helped Haln up the sloping deck of the cargo-bay, even as off-duty ops alley techs, clad in spare Onyx armor, used a mass effect pallet to haul the large, boxy device the salarians had pulled from their ship-core off of the Normandy and down towards Alenko and Cole.

Piles of dead geth and krogan littered the narrow spaces between the power stations, and more krogan, geth and the occasional asari slumped in death over the rubble of the nearby barracks or against the walls. Alenko was hurt, having been shot in the leg and the shoulder, but he'd patched himself up with medigel. Cole was smoking a fresh cigar, a bloodied medigel bandage stuffed into a splintered puncture of his armor just below the right lung, and blood running from his knee joints. "That's it, nice and easy. You drop that goddamned thing and there won't be shit to wipe up."

Alenko shot him a sour look, glancing around a moment later. The GTS towers had been taken, and had swatted geth gunships out of the sky with ease, the missiles and guns having exceptional power. With the Normandy swooping in, her GARDIAN arrays had suppressed the attackers, with most of them having withdrawn to the building on the east edge of the compound. Joker had put a few missiles into it, but sporadic fire still came from it, answered by the distant booms of sniper rifles from the salarians and Williams' marine team.

The ops techs levered the bomb into place, and Alenko limped over to it. "Think you can cover me while I set this up, Master Chief? Masterson and Haln are done in, and none of these guys is equipped or trained for a firefight."

Cole merely nodded, checking the loads on his Revenant. "Yeah. I'm good." He squatted into cover, even as the sailors hightailed it back onto the Normandy. Alenko exhaled and tapped his omnitool, unfolding a haptic screen and bringing up the dark-energy regulation interface on the bomb unit.

"This is going to be dicey...have to hack my way past all the safety interlocks and then set it in a recursive power loop. Then have it force-intake energy from the tokamaks..." Alenko muttered quietly to himself as he worked, while Cole scanned the horizon.

Shepard's voice crackled on the comm. "Status of the bomb."

Cole answered. "Just starting the set up, ma'am. Had to evac Masterson and Haln, both are touch and go. I'm covering the LT while he works."

Shepard's voice sounded tense and tired. "Hurry. The black ship may be incoming, and Kirrahe isn't sure how much longer we can keep the GTS towers hacked. The geth are landing more units out of range of the GTS turrets, to the north. Be wary of incoming."

Cole nodded to himself. "Evac plan?"

Shepard was silent a long moment. "Hate to do it to you, but you'll have to be next to last. Once we evac the GTS towers, the geth will almost certainly regain control quickly. We'll pick up Vega's unit first, then Kirrahe and any surviving salarians, then you, and pick up Williams' on our way out. We lost a MAKO, and the other MAKO took a hit to the side that has the launch comps scrambled, so having both GTS teams punch up to orbit is a no-go."

Cole swore quietly. "Understood, ma'am. I got this shit. Make sure you get the others clear." He clicked off. "So, no pressure LT, but I'd really appreciate it if you used some of those officer boffin brains and got that thing ticking soonest."

Alenko smirked. "Trust me."

O-OSaBC-O

The ops alley was tense. They were taking in telemetry from drones they'd dropped before they'd landed, and the geth lines were moving, spreading. It wasn't towards the planet, thankfully, and given their long distance from the planet they'd take hours on their current course to get within shooting range. Unfortunately, they looked to be lining up to move to the relay.

"Only eleven minutes until our escape window is still 100%, sir." The comm techs voice was almost apologetic, and Pressly grimaced as he nodded, glancing over the plot.

Getting off of this world would be a nightmare. The sheer size of the geth fleet in the system was beyond staggering. Although they'd managed to blow the comms tower and thus cut off any messages, there was only a 47 light minute gap between the planet and the geth fleet, and that gap was becoming narrower and narrower. In eleven more minutes, any signals the geth on the ground had sent for help would hit the geth fleet, and all hell would break loose.

The geth would move in force to the planet, and even the Normandy's stealth system would be of no use against that many sensors at close range. Fighting past them was impossible, and unlike Ferros, there were no handy gas giants to give them a speed boost, especially not when climbing out of a gravity well.

Shepard's worry about the black ship also being on the way only ratcheted up the tension and worry. So it was with great relief that Pressly finally heard the magic words. "Normandy, this is Shepard. Begin the movement. I know there's not a lot of time, but try not to light up the atmosphere."

Pressly merely nodded. "Yes, ma'am." He clicked off and tapped the inter ship comms. "Helm, bring us around to the west GTS tower so we can pick up Vega's team."

O-OSaBC-O

Everything had been going perfect.

Then everything went to hell at once.

Williams had been picking off more incoming geth from the north when the order for the evac to begin had come across. Her team had held out magnificently, and her little group of salarians was almost uninjured. Kirrahe, exhausted and worn, had managed to stagger to their GTS tower with his team, all of them badly wounded but still capable of fighting.

The geth push had been driven back, with almost no losses, when four geth hunters had uncloaked right in their midst. Chief Hallis had no time to even scream as the plasma shotgun in the hunter's hands had blown his entire upper body apart at point blank range.

Florez had turned, his assault cannon barking and tearing apart one geth, but the other three fired. Muse was hit twice, screaming as she came apart under the blasts, and the final geth had shoved its shotgun in Williams' face.

She'd tried to knock it aside with her rifle, but instead only pointed it down. The booming report had coincided with a flash of heat and pain, and she fell, screaming in agony as plasma fire tore through her stomach, runnels of molten armor seeping down her legs.

Marines and salarians had opened up in panicked fire, and dropped two more, but not before the geth had put a blast into Kirrahe's side, sending him to the ground in writhing agony, spurts of green blood seeping fitfully from his thick armor. Telanya had used her biotics to crush the last geth almost vengefully, smashing it repeatedly against the tower's side before dropping it.

Ownby was already over Williams, tearing open packets of medigel and screaming for help. With a shudder, Telanya turned to Kirrahe, seeing his men working over him frantically. She tapped her omnitool. "Command, this is Sergeant Telanya. Captain Kirrahe and Chief Williams are down and dying. They need immediate medical attention, I repeat, immediate medical attention."

She waited breathlessly, until the tired voice of Shepard sounded. "We're picking up Vega's team now, but if we pick you up, the GTS array will fall and we'll have to dodge our way out. We haven't picked up Alenko and Cole yet!"

Before Telanya could respond, Alenko's voice sounded, hard, angry, frightened. "Commander. You have to pick up Williams first. She's dying, ma'am. I still have to set the yield differentials. We need a few more minutes anyway."

Shepard cursed. "That means recrossing the entire base under GTS fire, and we don't have a few minutes. Fuck. FUCK!" Silence.

Then Shepard spoke again. "Telanya, hang on, we're on our way. Cole, you'll... have to hold a bit longer."

Cole's voice was cool, collected, even over the sound of his Revenant firing. "No problem, boss. I'm too pretty to die."

Telanya turned back to Williams, laying on the ground, pale and splashed with her own blood. Swallowing, she lifted her rifle and turned to make sure no more geth were coming. To the south and east, they were clear, but to the north, where Alenko and Cole stood, a line of geth could be seen landing from dropships, firing as they ran.

"Goddess..."

O-OSaBC-O

Flying a ship the size of the Normandy in atmosphere was hard enough. Dodging the occasional GTS missile from ground units, the blasts from geth gunships, and not disrupting the atmosphere enough to be noticed and thus draw down more reinforcements was even harder.

The Normandy's flight surfaces were sluggish, the tropical air and moisture affecting the lift motivators and dragging at the airframe. Worse, none of the ship's systems really had time to recover from the long heat saturation they'd endured on the trip in, and icy conditions of Noveria had thrown all kinds of things out of whack they'd had no time to fix.

So when the Normandy took the first GTS missile right to the spine, Joker could only be happy that it had taken the geth that long to hack the first turret back under their control. He fought the stick as the ship bucked in midair, grimacing, and screamed out a curse. "Goddamn it, ECM!"

The ops techs sitting in the ECM row didn't respond, sweat dripping from their faces as they fought with geth targeting systems. Dipping between two wrecked buildings, Joker brought the ship into a three-point hover next to the last GTS tower.

The figures who staggered to the Normandy's ramp looked like they'd been shot to pieces, leaving a trail of red and green that was nearly continuous. Even as he watched, sensor alarms began blaring on his console. "Shit shit shit."

He hammered the Comms control. "Commander! In system drone just showed the black ship came outta nowhere, nine minutes out! Geth are going crazy!"

In the CIC, Shepard bowed her head. With that little time, it would mean having to hope Alenko and Cole were ready the moment they got everyone aboard, that the GTS towers didn't lock them up, and that Nazara couldn't go faster than the insane speed they'd already seen from it back in Eden Prime. "Understood, Flight Lieutenant. I want your fastest speed to them, if we can avoid missile hits."

O-OSaBC-O

The console flashed red, and Alenko's shaking hands stilled only for a second as he clenched them. The bomb was nearly ready, but the final step was throwing him, and nothing he tried would make the assembly stabilize the power-flow he needed to detonate the entire thing.

He was about to scream in frustration when he had an epiphany. Instead of flowing the power through the eezo core, he had it tap each of the containment points, and tied that to a field-strength reduction program he had on his omni, originally used in magnetic bottle management for torpedoes. With the right fluctuation, it would start harmonic feedback –

He smiled, and half turned, signaling Cole. "Done, Master Chief."

Cole grunted, shooting down yet another geth, his foot propped up on one of the krogan-rachni monstrosities that had charged them a few minutes ago. "Outstanding, sir. Knew you could do it. Hell, even with goddamned brain cancer you're smarter than me." They'd talked about Kaiden's disorder and a possible cure, the older marine nodding understandingly at the time, but of course Cole would make a joke out of it.

Kaidan winced. "Fuck off, Master Chief." Cole's answering cackle made Alenko smile as he tapped the final instructions."

O-OSaBC-O

Nazara examined the chaos, the babble of the geth, the flickering, fleeting impressions he could detect. Benezia's crazed demand for revenge had tipped their hand early, leaving his sensor array exposed, but he had done what he needed with it, and it was superfluous now. He had planned to keep it around for future Harvests – it made a fine monitoring tool, after all – but he couldn't let it fall into the hands of the primitives, as they'd discover far too much about the nature of reality with such a thing.

Giving orders for the geth to open fire on it, he turned to the planet itself, seeking an avatar. Most of the servants that had been laced with Ascension protocol implants were too damaged to revive...but one was not, one of the hybrids. Reaching out, he activated it's sub-controls, and it's eyes reacted, taking in the form of two humans, and what looked to be some form of primitive eezo based bomb, hooked crudely into the tokamak power reactors.

Benezia had the Device and had not yet fled. He could not afford the delays that would come from breaching Ilos without such a thing, and he could not assume the bomb would not kill Benezia and damage the Device. He pushed more of the Power into the ruined hulk, shoving his consciousness into the ravaged body, and triggered the transformation.

The bomb would have to be stopped.

O-OSaBC-O

Shepard looked on in horror as they hauled Williams past her into the medical bay. The woman looked as if her entire lower body had been set on fire, and so much red-tinged medigel was seeping from the craterous wound that it was clearly not helping, the substance unable to bind together such a savage wound.

She was about to instruct Joker to move on to pick up Cole when Joker's voice rang out. "Cole's bio-monitors just went dead!"

O-OSaBC-O

Cole didn't even have time to react. One moment he had turned to face Alenko, as the marine lieutenant stood, the next second he was flying through the air, the back of his armor shattered and dented from the punch from the krogan-rachni thing that was standing.

"I am assuming direct control".

Kaiden stumbled back in horror. The krogan-rachni stood slowly, and it was glowing a fell, sick red, chunks of flesh sloughing off or cracking wide open as cybernetics erupted from it, deranged thorns of technology splitting bones and flesh and pulsating.

It staggered, the multifaceted eyes coming apart, revealing blank red pits, and its jerky motions smoothed slightly as it approached. Drawing his rifle he emptied it into the thing, aiming for the head, then the knees. The rounds impacted cleanly, tearing through flesh or punching through armor, but reddish wires erupted from the wounds, spiraling around them protectively.

Alenko distantly heard Shepard's voice, but his mind was on survival. He triggered his biotics, throwing the most powerful warp field he could at the thing, watching blue fire rage over its tortured form. The attack burned away it's face and part of it's arm, but that only revealed more seething, moving metal, bubbling and hissing as it converted flesh to more cybernetics.

It lashed out, sharp blades suddenly forming on the hand, metal wires coming together in a razor sharp edge, and he was too slow to dodge, his barrier shattering at the force of the blow as it carved into his right arm. He screamed and fell, watching in unhinged horror as his forearm fell away, cleanly severed.

The thing tilted it's head. "Die".

It lifted the hand-turned blade again, and then it was tackled from the side, staggering back as Cole slapped a grenade on it's back and dived away.

The explosion sent both men tumbling, and the thing roared and spun. Cole slapped his omnitool even as he drew his Carnifex pistol. "Commander, leave. We are dead."

Shepard's voice was like iron. "I'm not leaving my men!"

Alenko gasped for air, bleeding, and staggered to his feet, mind sluggish and slow.

"...Commander...go." He watched in a mix of faint, numb horror and tired resignation as the corrupted, red-shot form of the krogan-rachni brute got slowly to it's feet. One arm was missing, but the other was shifting in shape again, into some sort of long hooked blade. "Please. You can't get clear in time if you try to pick us up."

He smiled. "And I'm blowing the bomb now."

He let his omnitool fall, ignoring Shepard's voice and turned to the panel. "Master Chief...I only .. need a minute."

Cole stood, bleeding freely from his mouth. His entire back was torn, armor ripped and buckled, and he smiled with bloody teeth. "I got it, LT."

He squared himself up, lifting his cyberarm, his one good eye glaring fiercely. "Come on, you alien freak show. One sucker punch in the back is all you got? Bring your fucked up bug-turtle ass on over for round two."

O-OSaBC-O

The Normandy shuddered again, alarms blaring.

Shepard closed her eyes in the CIC, gripping the railing so tightly she felt as if her knuckles would tear through her flesh. Her voice was a whisper. "Take us out, Flight Lieutenant. Maximum mark."

Joker's voice was equally quiet. "Aye, ma'am."

The ops plot blipped. "A ship is taking off from the base, ma'am. Asari light cruiser. We have no firing solution, it will not be in range without us overflying the bomb blast radius and entering into GTS range of the turrets..."

Shepard nodded. "Ignore it. She got away. They're dying for nothing."

Another ops tech spoke. "Geth and .. the black ship on an intercept course. We can outrun the geth but the black ship is moving at mark 95...it will catch us in two minutes."

Shepard's face twisted. "Understood. Prepare drone beacons for launch and..." She paused. What good to abandon ship, surrounded by geth and that thing?

The ops tech looked up. "Ma'am?"

O-OSaBC-O

Alenko tapped the final control.

"You punk-ass motherfucker, I ca – "

Alenko's remaining fist tightened as a meaty thud landed next to him, the torn open body of Cole coughing up blood. Alenko turned slowly, taking in the image of the krogan thing standing there, holding aloft the gory, torn off cyberlimb of the master chief.

Cole spat blood. "Semper fi, LT..."

His eye closed, a smile gracing his battered features, and Alenko nodded. He glanced up at the thing as it approached, and suddenly he grinned, as the console behind him beeped three times.

"Semper fi, and payback is a bitch." He had time to laugh before the monster tore his head from his body, and the last thing his mind registered as he died was the final beep that meant the bomb cycle was armed and about to go off.

O-OSaBC-O

The explosion was titanic. Driven by a contained mass effect field, the eezo explosion fed off the power of the fusion reactors, spinning it around and around in a tiny simulation of a collapsing star. And much like a collapsing star, when it compressed too far and couldn't generate enough power to hold in the pressure, it detonated.

A flare of bright white and blue light tore through the atmosphere in a huge conical spike, shockwaves pushing clouds away. The ground ceased to exist for miles around, flashing instantly into vapor, and beyond that cooked into magma and fused glass. Chunks of burning earth the size of dreadnaughts were hurled for miles to crash down into the ocean.

Still linked to the creature he had been controlling, Nazara was caught unprepared for the sudden death of his thrall, and tumbled out of control, slowing, attempting to compensate for the loss of a part, however tiny, of it's consciousness.

Joker pushed the ship to it's limits, slipping past the incapacitated behemoth, blazing at top speed towards the systems edge. By the time Nazara had recovered, the Normandy had flashed to FTL, out of his reach.

Nazara considered the last actions and words of the mortals, and then discarded them. Their resistance was almost as amusing as it was pointless. He detected the form of Benezia's smaller ship approaching and let it enter his body, preparing to travel to Ilos and end this long exile.

O-OSaBC-O

Shepard sat bonelessly in her cabin, Liara gently holding one of her hands. Chakwas stared at Shepard grimly, arms folded. "You don't have to discuss this now, Commander." Her uniform was stained with blood, red and green, and she had laid the casualty and injury info-pad list on Shepard's small table.

Shepard looked up, eyes red. "I just lost two of my bravest people, on a task that ended up not even killing the bitch we came here to get. I just learned that the black ship is an actual fucking Reaper planning to bring it's buddies here for a big BBQ. And that it has been going on for millions of years or more. I'd like to go ahead and get the rest of the bad news out of the way."

Chakwas sighed. "Masterson won't ever fight again, but he's alive. Haln is in a coma. Shots to the gut, lungs. One of his kidneys is pulped. Ownby took three slugs in the left lung and it collapsed, he's critical. Haskins got hit with a geth flamer and has third and fourth degree burns to the right torso and arm."

Chakwas glanced at Liara. "Sergeant Telanya was hit twice in the thigh and once in the upper body but is stable. Hallis is dead. Muse is dead. Jackson is dead. Montoya is alive but critical, missing a leg. Florez took dozens of shots, his DACT armor helped but he's in serious condition."

She glanced at the info-pad. "Kirrahe is alive, but lost fourteen of his people, including his XO, Rentola."

Chakwas bit her lip. "Williams is ... alive. She's critical. She ... was hit in the abdomen. Part of her intestines were damaged...and her uterus." A long, ugly pause. "Any child she was carrying could not have survived, Commander. I'm sorry."

Shepard looked up at her, shock and disbelief on her face. "Oh my god...no. No." Liara closed her eyes and held her hand more tightly, as Shepard began to shake.

Chakwas shook her head sadly. "I have to get back to the medbay. I'll update you as I am able, Shepard." She left the room quietly, the doors swishing closed behind her, and Shepard hung her head again, jaw tightening.

Liara gently lifted her chin. "You did nothing wrong, Sara. We...we had our choices taken from us."

Shepard shook her head. "No, I chose it all. Instead of pulling back and going for reinforcements, I pushed ahead. Because they never reinforce me. They always make me go at the target with not enough guns, not enough men. Why even bother? I'm Commander Goddamned Shepard, I can do anything if I just get enough of my people killed." She gazed at her hands, making a fist, then letting it go. "And now, an unborn kid. She won't even have that to remember Kaidan by."

Her voice was bitter, and weary, and above all else hurt in a way Liara could literally feel through their link. It made her sick to the stomach, and she pushed it down as she tried to reach Shepard. "No, that is not true. We went with what we knew. You heard Jiong. If we had not acted, my mother would have had an army of those monsters, and done Goddess only knows what with them."

Liara focused her feelings, her belief in Sara, her firm belief that the sacrifice they just made had to be done. "What happened to ... our friends ... is not your fault. Alenko and Cole were already dying. Even if we had gotten there in time, they would not have survived long. We would have all died, and the information we obtained..."

She trailed off, and Shepard nodded. "It ... just hurts. Goddamn it." She squeezed Liara's hand back, tears traveling down her cheeks. "I.. I am going to murder that bitch mother of yours if it's the last goddamned thing I do. This I swear."

She closed her eyes again, exhaling. "This I swear."

---

Chapter 112: Chapter 103 : Aftermath I

---

A/N: Well, I haven't been around for a while.

Short version – problems at work, injured relatives, personal situation going to shit, helping raise nieces, and exhaustion. The Story isn't dead, and neither is the supplemental material. I just had to find energy to scrape it all together.

Chapter's a bit short, and I apologize for that, but I've scrapped almost all of it and started over. Reviews are of course welcome.

---

O-SaBC-O

The trip back to the Citadel was somber and tense. Marines and sailors sat quietly in the mess, no one speaking much. Chatter on the ops alley was silent, the figure of Pressly stalking back and forth in agitated mute tension, snapping out course adjustments in a near growl. The whisper of prayers could be heard from some, as they knelt outside the medbay, watching the frail forms of the survivors within.

The grim figure of Emilo Vega stood in the cargo bay, his face hard as stone as he stood the Eternal Watch over the coffins there. They'd had to leave quickly, and they'd had to leave three of their dead behind. Those that remained would be honored. The steel coffins were hard and bleak in the dim light of the cargo bay, haptic flags of the SA and their nation or colony shimmering faintly over their surfaces.

In the medbay, Chief Haln's condition miraculously held, due to non-stop work by Chakwas, and Ashley was stabilized a short while after. Neither were even close to regaining consciousness, but Chakwas was sure they would hold out until they could reach the Citadel. Masterson was still in serious condition, his wounds more serious than they had initially seemed. Montoya, the second DACT, was also in serious condition, having taken nineteen direct hits in covering Team Vega's retreat.

Captain Kirrahe was also critical, but thankfully one of the surviving members of the STG unit happened to be the medic, and with Chakwas' help was able to stabilize him. The science lab was turned into a makeshift med-bay for the salarions, while the medbay itself was filled to capacity.

The ship itself was also wounded. Armor plating had broken in several places, and there was a slow atmosphere leak in Engineering that Tali was trying to fix. Joker kept having to adjust trim flows to the engines, and the number three engine was unresponsive. The GTS missile that hit the spine blew the secondary power conduit, knocking out power to some of the ship's atmosphere controls, and the ship grew colder and colder. Eventually they turned on the IES system simply to heat things up.

Shepard sat in her cabin, staring at the profiles of the dead. Their pictures stared at her quietly from her hastily repaired terminal. Tali had fixed it after she'd smashed it upon viewing Kyle's OSD of horrors.

She was sorely tempted to smash it again, simply to vent frustration. She looked at the terminal again, fists clenching on the small desk. Her jaw was so tight it ached, and yet she couldn't look away. She'd spent the night writing the letters she so hated, the ones telling a family that they would have to take down the silver star hung in a window or on a door, and replace it with a blue one.

The letters informing them of the death of their loved one.

Chief Sheena Hallis, A4, twenty year veteran. Up for retirement in nine months, left behind three children on Earth. Designated Marksman. Acted like the team mom for the marines, always puttering in the galley on snacks, or listening to their complaints. Her bright green eyes looked out from the profile photo almost sadly, and her smile was calm, accepting.

Sergeant Charlais Muse, A2, nine year veteran. Grenadier and scout-sniper, dual specializations, rare in the lower ranks. Her wife and family had just moved to Horizon, and after this tour she was scheduled to work planetside there. Killed by geth hunters. The woman in the picture looked almost impishly pleased with herself.

Sergeant Adam Jackson, A5, G2, fifteen year veteran from Massai III. Grenadier. No family, no children, no wife, thank God. No letter to write. Still, he'd be missed. He was always ready with jokes, always in trouble with Cole for some damn-fool stunt. His dashing good looks were a touch somber in his profile picture, unusual for him. Killed in the firefight at Vega's GTS tower, hit by a rocket.

PFC Julia Anders, A1, O5, an incredibly fast rising star in the ranks of the unit. Promoted to A1 just before Eden Prime, Julia was the youngest of the marines on board, her curvy figure and infectious smile a common sight in the CIC where she tended to stand guard with Haln. Single, with no parents, only a brother on file living on Bekenstein. Died when the MAKO was hit by the geth and came apart.

Master Chief Petty Officer Greg Cole, A7, D4, M4, P4, V2. Shepard had been surprised to read his many qualifications, as well as the fact he had been awarded five Medals of Valor and was a junior squire of the Knights of Christ Triumphant. The heart of the marine team she'd built, he'd survived Eden Prime and Saren, only to die on Vormire. His letter, perhaps, was the hardest to write, as he had a large family, and twin grandsons that were five years old. His picture was stern, unyielding. She'd never met any NCO as nearly perfect as Cole, and she doubted she would again – it was as if the man stepped out of a recruiting poster, bigger than life, indefatigable even in death.

And of course, Kaidan. She exhaled, shaking her head sadly. Kaidan was the worst of all. So young. Maybe the Noverian treatments would have worked, and maybe they wouldn't. Maybe he would have died in two or three years. Maybe he would have –

She cut the thought off. The letters were written, and sent. All that remained was to avenge them. The deaths had been senseless, a waste of her best people, in trying to take out Benezia. They'd barely even seen her, the bitch had fled and her people died because she was too arrogant to back off and call for help. Perhaps Kirrahe was right and she made the right call going in, but it still galled and hurt. Perhaps Liara was right and she had no choices, but it still left her feeling empty.

She'd lost track of how many faceless marines she'd gotten killed in her years, but she had always prided herself of taking care of her people, her crew. She'd fought as hard as she could to protect Neutron, and they fought equally hard to protect her. And she had fought to protect her marines. She'd lost Jenkins on Eden Prime, lost more on Eingana, and now this.

Stop fucking thinking about it. Get out of this goddamned room and let your people see you aren't dead. Stop worrying the shit out of Liara.

She shut down the files on her dead, closing the viewscreen. She still had to make her report to the Council, and to High Command. She had just gotten up to try and figure out which to do first, when the ship trembled slightly and alarms blared on her haptic ship display, mounted over her desk. She cursed. "VI, status report."

The VI's voice was as calm as ever. "Tertiary plasma conduit rupture, port-side fuel assembly. Engine capacity reduced to sixty-four percent."

She sighed, tapping the comm to Engineering. "Adams, this is Shepard...what just happened?"

The tired voice of her Chief Engineer spoke. "With an engine out, there's too much stress on the remaining three, Commander. It's minor damage – in dock I could fix that in fifteen minutes – but it's adding up. We'll have problems getting her space worthy again if we don't stop for drydock."

Shepard grimaced. "I want to head back, get the fleet, and go after that bitch at Ilos first thing, Adams. Our turnaround will be rapid. How much endurance do we have left, and how long will it take to make sure the Normandy can make the fight?"

Adams was silent for a few moments before speaking. "I need at least four hours, preferably six, in dock. I can get things mostly back together with that much time. Any less and I can't guarantee we wouldn't lose FTL propulsion entirely given another transit, ma'am. "

Shepard pinched the bridge of her nose, nodding to herself. "Six hours. That's it. Make sure you make it count. Shepard out." She clicked off the comm, blinking tiredly at her room, before stretching her back. She couldn't sit here focusing on the dead, and she couldn't put off reporting to her superiors forever.

Exiting into the mess decks, she was slightly surprised to see the battered figure of the salarian medic, Govu, sitting at one of the tables, watching the ANN news that was filtering in from the comm-sat lane. The salarian, a slender fellow with pale skin and scars over both horns, turned to face her with smooth agility. "Good evening, Commander. Captain Kirrahe and Lieutenant Juru will both recover. Lieutenant Bato is still critical, but Captain Kirrahe has regained consciousness and would like to speak with you. "

She nodded. "We're making the best speed we can to the Citadel, and when I make my report here to the Council I'll alert them to have salarian medical teams prepped. I'll go see Kirrahe now." She turned, grimacing as she headed into the medbay.

Two storage lockers had been folded away to allow for more medical beds, but even so the med bay was overloaded. Haln and Masterson were laid out on one side, while Chakwas was working over Williams on another medical bed as she came in. Montoya was in another bed in the corner, reading an infopad, his left leg missing mid-thigh. Haskins and Ownby lay side by side, Haskins covered in burn-gel and very still, Ownby's thick form occluded by medical monitors. Florez, her other DACT, was tucked into a temporary med-unit bed behind Chakwas' desk.

"Commander?" Chakwas looked up from working on Williams, a tired look on her features. "Come to see the injured?"

Shepard shook her head, glancing around. "Heading to talk to the salarians. But...I should ask. How is everyone?"

Chakwas's face twisted into a thin grimace. Carefully moving a medigel injector along Williams' stomach, she sighed. "Not good. Haln and Masterson are still unconscious. Haln's liver is near-septic, and he'll need a kidney replant or cyberware. Masterson took a lot of fire, Commander, and I'm not sure if he'll walk again, several shots chipped his spine."

She paused, adjusting something on her omni for a moment. Her voice was tired. "Montoya is alright, the amputation went well and I've already placed the lining for a cyberlimb. Haskins is suppurating from her burns and I really need a burn unit to assess her injuries. Ownby hasn't been able to breathe on his own yet. Florez...stable, but still hurt too badly to fight."

She looked down at the form of Ashley. "On the other hand, we may have a minor miracle on our hands with Williams. As I said she took that shot right in the gut and her uterus was ... well damaged. Fetal mortality in such instances is high, usually around 90%. I went ahead and stabilized everything as well as I could and did as much work in the stasis field as I could."

Shepard nodded, and she continued. "This afternoon, I did the secondary work up on Ashley. I'm still getting enzyme emissions that indicate pregnancy is ongoing, and I'm still getting a faint fetal heartbeat. I'm estimating the level of fetal oxygenation, but nothing seems compromised by trauma."

Shepard blinked, hard, before she felt a smile erupt over her features involuntarily. "You're saying the baby is fine?"

Chakwas sighed. "No. There could still be complications. Bradycardia or tachycardia, a decrease in the oxygenation of the embryo, all sorts of things. Williams is still shocky, her body has taken an enormous amount of damage and I can't use some of the stronger methods to patch things up without risking the fetus, so I will have to monitor things very closely." She paused, pushing back her hair. "Right now, I'd give the baby a 40% chance of survival."

Shepard pinched the bridge of her nose and exhaled slowly. "That's .. a fuck of a lot better than yesterday, doc. Has she regained consciousness yet?"

Chakwas shook her head. "I've kept her under sedation until the regenerators finish working, but I've had to do the work in her torso mostly by hand – regenerators and fetal development don't work well together."

She sighed again. "Despite that bit of good news, everything is still very touch and go. I've treated everyone else as best I can, but we're already getting low on medical supplies. This medical bay is as good as the Systems Alliance can make for it's size, but we aren't equipped to handle these kinds of injuries, much less salarian injuries. It was only luck that since I never knew what aliens you'd bring aboard next that I laid in three bags of frozen salarian blood plasma."

Shepard rubbed her eyes wearily and nodded. "We'll be to the Citadel soon. I've already sent ahead the crash EMT and hospital clearance requests you wanted. Just keep them going until then, Doctor. That's all you can do."

Chakwas nodded. "I know. I don't mean to pry, Commander...but will you be alright yourself? I know you dislike losing troops."

Shepard gave a small, sad smile. "Seems to be the story of my life, sometimes. That operation didn't go anywhere near the way it was supposed to go. And we didn't get the target."

From his med, Montoya snorted. "We scared the shit out of her, though." He set aside his infopad, his slenderly handsome Hispanic features dark and serious. "Commander, Jack and I knew the score when we volunteered for this gig. What went down on Virmire was some seriously bad shit, but things mainly went to hell because we went up against an army with two tanks and not even a fucking company of soldiers."

He gave a pained shrug. "We killed off more than a thousand of the enemy, blew up their barracks and comm center and killed off more, blew up their monster-making factory, and even if she survived having a building dropped on Benezia had to hurt her, ma'am. Plus, she ran, and something happened to the black ship when the bomb went off." He looked at her intently. "Master Chief Cole wouldn't want you kicking yourself, ma'am. He went out like he wanted to."

Shepard shook her head. "He should have been able to go out surrounded by his family, Sergeant."

Montoya gave a bitter smile. "We can't always do that, boss lady. Every jump-boy knows from the minute we put on the Icarus battle armor what happened to Icarus in myth. We all end up flying too high, getting too far into the fight, and buying it. I'm not saying it's not a hard thing to lose him, or the LT. But I've also seen shit like that go out with everyone dead, more than once. This wasn't no situation where you sent us off to distract the main force while you did the command in. We just got caught out."

Shepard pinched the bridge of her nose. "I'm more beating myself up over the fact that people died than how they died, then?"

Montoya nodded. "Ma'am, every one of your marines has seen videos of your battles. Heard the stories. Talked to some asshole who knows a guy who said he survived Torfan. I'm not telling you that you didn't make some ugly choices in the past. But you told us yourself we might all die getting this job done. And if it comes to that, well..."

He looked down for a moment, then nodded, almost to himself. "I'd rather die for something I believe in, following a leader who actually hurts when she loses her men, than die on some battlefield to send a message, because some REMF didn't bother to read the intel properly. Ain't scared of dying. Lost suit control on Horizon once and damn near bought it, burned all the fear out of me." He looked back up. "I'm scared of not mattering. And no matter what people claim about you, I know you are a good person, ma'am."

He gestured around the medbay. "You're upset that your marines got killed and hurt. Most of the CO's I served under didn't."

Shepard's expression showed shock, then disbelief. Slowly, it darkened, turning into a mask of fury. "They didn't care? How – " She cut herself off, shaking her head. "Doesn't matter. I appreciate the vote of confidence, Sergeant. And you matter. All of you do."

He only nodded, picking up his infopad again. "Didn't mean to butt into your conversation, just thought you should know, Commander."

She smiled faintly, and Chakwas chuckled. She moved past him, towards the science lab, and stepped through into the smaller room.

Of Kirrahe's twenty man team, only he and six others had survived. The medic was fine, as were the salarions who'd ended up under Williams' command, but two of the other salarions – Kirrahe's own team – were not. They were laid out on temporary medical beds, bags of green plasma hung from hooks driven into the bulkhead, one of the med-status units from the MAKO removed and acting as a med support unit. Kirrahe himself was sitting up on the third medical bed, grimacing as he read an infopad. His shoulder and right side were heavily bandaged, his face drawn and tired looking.

He glanced up. "Commander Shepard. I ... I am sorry. My plan got most of my people and many of yours killed. Did not expect such monstrosities at the landing site. My reports will reflect that I was the one who made the call."

She held up a hand. "Now's not the time for figuring out who fucked up, Captain. We didn't kill Benezia...but we know where she's going, and we have at least some kind of idea of her forces now. She's headed to Ilos, beyond the Mu Relay, and we have the exact coordinates. We also know she plans to attack the Citadel. "

Kirrahe's eyes widened slightly. "Her fleet was ... formidable. If she plans to attack the Citadel..."

She shrugged. "I'm not going to let it happen, Captain. We're going for the Citadel as fast as we can. We know where she's headed, and I plan to be in front of the fleet we send to take her completely the fuck out. That bitch cost me ..."

Shepard clenched a fist, tensing her jaw.

"... I don't let people go after my team and live."

Kirrahe gave a shallow slash of a smile. "I will stand with you, Commander, when you make your report. I doubt I'll be healed enough to go with you for the assault, but I can guarantee some of the STG will want to come along." He glanced down. "We haven't lost this much manpower in a single day in centuries. We are not a highly emotional people... but we know the need for revenge."

She matched his smile with one of her own, cold and terrifying. "Good."

O-OSaBC-O

"I do not have any information for you, Aethyta. And if I did... I do not know that I would allow you to proceed with whatever plan you have."

Aethyta smiled, her tired features only dimly visible in the shadow of her robe's hood. She swirled a glass of churza in one hand, reclining easily in the lavish quarters of the Consort, the hilt of her warp sword an ugly shape in the robes.

Across from her, Sha'ira was tense, her closed fists on the rich fabric of her dress, atop her knees. The ancient asari had strode in, brushing aside her secretaries and putting her two krogan guards into the hard metal walls with a single pulse of biotic power. Sha'ira had seen many strong matriarchs, but there was something icy and almost unnaturally lethal about the figure in front of her.

Aethyta took a sip of the expensive turian brandy and smiled wider. "Little girl, you seem to think I'm fucking asking you for what I want. As much as you think you are a player of the Game, you're still little more than a kid. So I'm going to be kind and explain a few things and give you a second chance."

She tossed the empty glass away, unheeding as it shattered on the expensive tile floors behind her. Leaning forward, she stared into Sha'ira's eyes. The Consort could literally feel the oppressive power of the matriarch's biotic field, the simmering white-hot rage so carefully concealed behind a mask of amused indulgence.

"You see, little girl, my ex has gone a bit salty in the crest for some reason. I blame myself. I shouldn't have left. Should have been a better bondmate. But because I was a coward, she fell in with bad people, told them some things she shouldn't have, and now millions of people and two planets are fucking dead, the geth are running around, and my daughter is in the middle of it."

Aethya's smile grew, and Sha'ira found herself trembling uncontrollably. The biotic energy in the air was visible as warped shimmering air and gusts of wind. The voice was icy. "If I don't find a way to stop her, Benezia is going to end up trying to do something very stupid. And then Liara, my daughter, is going to try and stop her. I love my daughter. I'm a shitty aithntar, a crappy person, a coward who hides behind bars and sex, but I still care for her."

Aethya's calloused blunt fingers traced a delicate line across the Consort's cheek, a mockery of the tender sensuality she usually employed on her own clients. "So when I say I need information, girl, it isn't a matter of confidence, or your rituals, or whatever bullshit you've made up in your empty little head to equate your call-girl scheme with real intelligence work. It's a matter of you tell me or I rip it out of your mind, and butcher this pack of whores you've gathered on my way out. C-SEC won't stop me, because I already paid off the Broker to cover my tracks, and you'll be dead by the time they show up."

Sha'ira tried to control her shaking. "If you have the Broker, why come to m-me?"

Aethya's finger tapped the hilt of her sword. "The Broker says you had a . . . guest not too long ago. Someone who worked for Saren, who needed a way out. I know you dabble in the old rithurai techniques, so that you can sift the memories of those stupid enough to bond with you. I know that he knew something vital that you tried to sell to the highest bidder."

Sha'ira swallowed. "He was . . . a systems engineer. He said Saren was asking questions about the hydraulics arrays that allowed the Citadel Wards to move and seal the Citadel. He was paid an enormous sum to sabotage two of them, to make sure they could not close as rapidly as they were supposed to." She closed her eyes. "I .. I told the C-SEC and the Broker, but neither of them found anything."

The older asari nodded. "She's coming here, then. The Citadel is her target. Interesting." She redirected her gaze onto the Consort before tossing her a credstick. "There's enough on there to pay the hospital to patch your krogan up." She rose to her feet smoothly, striding out of the chamber and ignoring the frightened gazes of the whores Sha'ira employed, instead tapping her omni.

"Your information was good, I appreciate the tip."

The rumbling voice on the reply sounded amused. "Her information could have been sold to you for a fair price, rather than you interrogating her yourself. You must have a reason for such a bold act when you know it will draw attention."

Aethya laughed. "Didn't have the cash for that, and besides, I wanted to put that little tramp in her place." She paused. "None of this makes any sense. I know Nezy. She is in love with the stream no one fucking swims in. And neither she or Saren are stupid enough to do something like that and then let the fucker survive. No, she wants people to think the threat is coming from outside the Citadel. Something they can handle. Ships, invasions...bullshit."

The voice of the Broker sounded almost interested. "And instead..."

Aethya shrugged, walking out of the Consort's complex and into the fake sunlight of the Presidium. "I have no clue, except that if she's drawing people's attention to the exterior, that's exactly where the blow won't fall. Nezy is a bit crazy like that."

She paused. "If I were you, I'd get out of the Citadel, assuming you're based here. She's definitely coming here. I suspected but it doesn't fit who she is..."

The Broker's voice was flat. "Take the Citadel, and you have a great deal of power..."

Aethya shook her head. "She's never been interested in power that way. She preferred to mold, shape and twist people, to make her views their views and have them willingly give in. And taking the Citadel doesn't mean a damn thing. She can't hold it, even with the geth. No one will negotiate with her, and we don't even know what the fuck Saren was planning in the first place. But she thinks taking it for a short time will let her . . . win."

She could almost feel the answer on the tip of her tongue.

The Broker merely spoke seven words, and cut the connection, leaving Aethya to curse her own blindness. It had been the one thing she hadn't considered possible.

"Unless she plans to destroy the Citadel."

---

Chapter 113: Chapter 104 : Udina, Punch

---

A/N:LOL, bet you weren't expecting an update.

I've been working on this for a while now, and I wanted to get it right. It's changed several times over the past month, and it isn't very polished, since my beta is busy, but ... here it is , for whatever it's worth.

I might push something else out this weekend.

---

DOWNLOADING: Data feed, prime broadcast segment 95

Manifest dump 32251-core alpha, unclassified

This is an official Systems Alliance data capture dump , replication or rebroadcast is restricted.

Transcript begins, identifiers J: al-Jilani B: Baron Ira Bekenstein

Keywords: Citadel, geth, Saren, Butcher

BEGIN:

"Westerlund news! All the news , fit or unfit to print, 24/7!"

J: "Good afternoon. I'm Khalisah Bint Sinan al-Jilani, Westerlund News Network. Today we're covering the top story on all the comm-links : the downfall of Saren and the shocking news of the survival of Lady Benezia T'Soni. With to provide context on these events is the new minister of Defense, Baron Bekenstein. Thank you for gracing us with your time, milord."

B: "It is of no moment, Ms. Al-Jilani. While I have issues with much of today's debauched media, your show and your staunch support of Earth and it's priorities has not gone unnoticed. I am delighted to be here."

J: "Thank you very much, milord. I'm sure there are many questions being asked tonight but I will address the most pressing one first. It appears Lady Benezia was not actually killed in the fighting on Noveria, but somehow convinced everyone she was dead. Can you bring some light onto how this happened?"

B: "Of course. It is nothing less than a reckless disregard and arrogance on the part of some members of our military forces. The assault on an independent corporate world was not conducted with the approval of the Senate OR the newly elected minister of Defense, but was instead conducted at the whim of the AIS and the Justicars. Placing loose cannons such as Shepard in command ended up turning the event into a bloodbath, one of such chaos that the slippery asari woman managed to replace herself with some kind of body double and escape. And that has lead to a great deal of suffering, I understand."

J: "Yes, we have the images of the horrific destruction wrought upon Thessia, Ilium and even the Citadel. I also understand through private sources that an attempt was made on Earth, milord Can you comment on that?"

B: "Your ... sources are very good. Yes, an attempt was made but the internal security forces of the SA were able to thwart this insidious attack with no loss of human life. Still, it is a warning we should not ignore. The SA cannot afford chasing all over the galaxy with it's limited forces when we have problems and vulnerabilities at home."

J: "Yet many people are proud of Shepard for defeating Saren, the mastermind behind the vicious attacks on Eden Prime. Are there plans for humanity's Spectre to go after Lady Benezia as well?"

B: "Unfortunately, yes, that has already occurred. We do not have the full details – apparently the Normandy is still in transit to the Citadel – but it's my understanding that the STG managed to locate Lady Benezia, and Shepard was sent in along with STG support to take her out. They failed to do so and suffered heavy casualties."

J: "This is very breaking news indeed milord. What does the SA plan to do next?"

B: "The ministries are still considering their options. However, I can say this – humanity has certainly bled enough already dealing with the fallout from this fiasco. We've lost colonies. We've lost dozens of ships, thousands of brave soldiers and sailors, and billions of credits. If the reports of the fight with Saren are even close to accurate, we almost lost our Spectre as well. The SA did not create this Saren issue, and the SA should not have to shoulder the responsibility of cleaning up after aliens. The previous administration catered to the demands of the Citadel Council all too often, and it's time for a change."

J: "And the nature of this change?"

B: "Humanity has been as accommodating as possible for the past decade, and yet where has it gotten us? We sacrifice a full fifth of our military to the Citadel, but they do nothing to help us when their own rogue agents decide to commit terrorist attacks. We comply with their heavy handed laws and regulations, but see no benefit for ourselves from doing so. We cannot keep putting blind faith in the decisions of a government that caused the genocide of one species and nearly did the same to a second, nor one that cut the quarian people loose instead of supporting them in their time of need. If they did it to them, they'll do it to us."

J: "Very cut and dry, and much akin to my own thinking, milord. But there are those who claim humanity cannot go it alone, that we are a part of the community of the galaxy-"

B: "And to that I say you can't have it both ways. That kind of apologist thinking ends up infuriating the people who pay the ultimate price – the people of Earth. It's our sons and daughters dying on the frontier militias. It's our cousins abandoned on independent colony worlds. It's our hard earned credits stolen away to support the ruinous taxes laid atop us by the Citadel. And ultimately it's Earth that will pay the price when aliens fail to act again and Benezia attacks us directly."

J: "You think that is what will happen?"

B: "It already has, and it almost certainly will again, Ms. Al-Jilani. Whatever Saren's and Benezia's plans, they aren't going to be good for humanity, and at this stage of the game I think the SA has proven itself quite enough. We were the ones who were able to pin down Saren and Benezia as the source of this outrage, and it's due to our Spectre that we were able to stop Saren at Noveria."

J: "That's very true, milord. But earlier you spoke of your dissatisfaction with events on Noveria...and categorized Shepard as a 'loose cannon'..."

B: "Ms. Al-Jilani, perhaps I was unclear. I do not approve of the methods used in this endeavor. This should have been handled by Citadel forces. I don't approve of the whole idea of the operation on Noveria, nor am I wild about putting one of our most decorated soldiers and one of our most advanced ships under alien command, no matter how limited such command may be. And Shepard will be the first to admit herself that she tends to shoot first and ask questions later. That being said, I'm not going to belittle the sacrifices our brave military forces have made, nor deny my pride that the best Spectre in the galaxy has been proven to be human and not turian."

J: "I see. In that – one moment , please. We're getting a news update from the Citadel, it appears the Normandy has returned from it's mission."

O-OSaBC-O

The Normandy was docked in the Alliance berths, already being swarmed by repair contractors, and the news crews were already gathering by the time Shepard managed to change into a dress uniform and head to the CIC. Her jaw was clenched as she moved gracefully around the CIC, fatigue and sorrow making her a trace more abrupt in her movements than usual.

The battered form of Kirrahe stood by the airlock, a faint grimace on his spare features. His large black eyes flicked her way briefly before moving back down to the floor, and his uniform was black with faint green trim, slightly battered looking and informal. The med-tech brace on his shoulder was carefully strapped in place. His voice had a somewhat tired waver to it. "Commander. Ready to report to the Council?"

She snorted. "Yeah. I'm just waiting for the other people I'm bringing along, it will be their first time to the circus." As she spoke, Garrus and Liara entered the CIC, followed by Commissar Jiong. Liara wore the last of the University of Serrice outfits she had, while Garrus was sporting his undress C-Sec uniform. Jiong wore his Commissar blacks, and for the first time she could recall, was actually unarmed.

She glanced over them all, and then shook her head. "Might as well get this shit going." Biting her lip, Shepard opened the airlock and stepped out onto the landing platform. A small ring of C-Sec personnel stood at the far end of the gangway, surrounded by reporters. Shepard sighed.

Jiong just grinned. "Relax, Commander. I believe we have this handled." He lifted an arm, pointing at an aircar done in Commissariat black, and tapped his omnitool. The car circled and then hovered just off the edge of the docking platform, the doors opening to reveal an empty interior. "I'll drive."

Shepard snorted, carefully stepping over the edge of the docking platform to sit, followed by the others. Garrus got up front so that Shepard, Liara and Kirrahe could all squeeze in the back. Shepard snorted again when she heard a howl of protest from the reporters dockside, even as Jiong tapped controls on the haptic dashboard and the doors sealed away the noise of the Citadel.

The car rose smoothly , accelerating into one of the auto-traffic lanes, and Shepard exhaled. "Good thinking, Commissar. I really didn't feel like starting my day by punching out reporters."

The man only inclined his head. "Do you want to head directly to the Council or report to Ambassador Udina first, ma'am?"

Shepard sighed, glancing over at Liara briefly, who merely gave an encouraging smile. "No point putting it off. Shoot a message to Udina and head to the Council. The quicker we get this clusterfuck over with, the quicker we can start organizing ships to go after that crazy bitch before she gets us all killed by Reapers."

Kirrahe gave Shepard a sidelong glance. "Your ... precis that these Reapers are coming back will not be received well, Commander Shepard. I, myself, have no doubts about what you say – your evidence is convincing. But they will dislike it because it is beyond their control to ... manipulate events."

She snorted. "Yeah, well, lucky for us, they won't just have to take my word for it. Liara's omni was still recording when Sovereign deigned to talk down to us." She found herself shivering at the memory of the horrible power in that voice. "If one Reaper managed to survive all that time, the others will have well. Even if it's lying, and even if it's the last of it's kind left, whatever Benezia is up to will be no good for us."

Liara's voice was soft, but underlain with a firm tone. "The things my mother was researching on Noveria were horrible. She has to be stopped."

Jiong remembered the maddened lunacy of the asari experiment on Noveria, her strange words about the future, and nodded. "Whatever she's doing is not something that can be tolerated. Those krogan things she's created are a danger in and of themselves." He exhaled, altering the car's course to another traffic lane. "Let's just hope the Council has the wisdom to see that."

Garrus gave a wry chuckle. "Might as well expect vorcha to take up poetry."

O-OSaBC-O

As usual, the Citadel Council chambers were stunning in their opulence. While most of the team had been here before, Jiong had not, and despite his smooth facade Shepard could tell he was impressed.

Unusually, the chambers had been cleared of the usual hangers-on, attaches and bureaucratic verdigris that usually cluttered the place up. Instead there were the three councilors, Udina, Anderson, two humans Shepard didn't recognize, an asari, and a turian. Pushing up the steep steps to the gathering area in front of the Council, Shepard took a moment to gather herself, pushing her hair back and snapping her gaze forward.

Sparatus was the first to speak. "Commander Shepard, Captain Kirrahe. Your verbal ops report was ... lacking in quite a few matters of concern. We require a full explanation."

One of the two humans snorted. "The explanation seems simple to me. They failed."

Councilor Valern gave the human a stern look. "You were invited to this briefing as a courtesy, Mr. Barnes. Please do not interrupt our operatives until the briefing is completed."

Shepard arched an eyebrow. "I'm sorry, but who is this?"

The heavysset human turned to face her fully. He had dark hair and flat, coal black eyes, set in a pudgy face that was somehow also hard. His suit was frightfully expensive, the exquisite tailoring almost concealing his out-of-shape frame. His voice was deep and nasal at the same time, grating on her ears. "I'm Jason Barnes, the new Minister of Defense. Your new boss."

She only sighed. "Actually, according to the President, I work for him directly now."

Barnes tsked. "A convenient arrangement that only kicks in after you have turned over your current command. Now, I believe the Council was waiting for you to explain how exactly this foul-up occurred."

Shepard exhaled, conscious of Liara's touch on her arm. "Of course." She turned to face the council. "As instructed, we were able to rendezvous with the STG Cell under Captain Kirrahe." She explained the details of his stranding on the planet, infiltration, and their assessment of the threat.

Kirrahe spoke for the first time. "At that time, I made the strong suggestion to strike with our combined forces, rather than attempt to exfiltrate and seek support."

Sparatus narrowed his gaze. "You made the decision, not Spectre Shepard? Why?"

Kirrahe braced himself. "Shepard is a veteran of many special ops missions, but not of strategic command or of data analysis and threat valuation. She admitted to such. The call was mine, made on the basis of the observations of both communications and activity by my STG team. The target was clearly in the process of clearing out, and to fallback to gain reinforcement would have been pointless. Not only were there too many geth in-system for anything but the full force of the Citadel Fleet to fight through, but the delay meant she would be long gone by the time any backup arrived."

Tevos nodded faintly. "This is why we sent Shepard as back-up in the first place. Both due to the speed of the Normandy and the fact that her stealth systems would allow her to infiltrate. What I think we are all having problems understanding is exactly why you failed in the attempt."

Shepard spoke up. "Ma'am. We struck Lady Benezia with over six tons of wreckage and explosive missiles directly on her position. Based on what I saw we at least seriously wounded her, despite her escape. We killed most of her cultists, wiped out her main base of operations before she could get most of her stuff loaded, and destroyed a disgusting biological weapons factory." She exhaled. "While we did miss the target, we were able to figure out exactly where she's headed."

At this, the turian off to one side folded his arms. "And where is that?"

Shepard glanced at him for a long moment before shrugging. Based on his uniform he was some kind of turian admiral. "She's located the Mu Relay, and she's headed to the lost world of Ilos."

The turian looked at her for a long second, then flicked a mandible. Sparatus, on the other hand, leaned forwards, eyes intent, hands on his plinth. "You believe she is going after this supposed super-weapon?"

Shepard exhaled. "While on-site at Benezia's headquarters, we encountered another Prothean Beacon. This one was not damaged, and I was able to retrieve it's message safely. According to the message, the Prothean Empire was destroyed by mechanical beings that captured the Citadel and overthrew their fleets in hours. The beacons were a recall for survivors to fall back to Ilos, to hide and wait for the danger to pass. They claimed Ilos was an Inusannon world and they had records saying the R- that the threat would pass given time."

Tevos frowned. "I can only surmise from the lack of Protheans that such an endeavor failed. In that case, there should be nothing of any use at Ilos for Benezia to find."

Shepard spread her hands. "There's more. After our discovery of the location of the Mu Relay from the computers there, we ... triggered some kind of communication."

Valern folded his arms. "A communication?"

Shepard turned to Liara, who triggered her omni-tool, displaying the recording. That voice rolled out, hateful and strong, and Shepard watched their reactions.

The humans shivered, Tevos brought up one hand in biotic fire, and Valern had his hand on his pistol. Both Sparatus and the turian had gone into the same feral pose Garrus did, and the asari woman Shepard didn't know was gazing at the recording in horror. "It...it called itself Nazara!"

Shepard locked eyes with her. "The High Priestess of the Sun told me that name was on the oldest stone in the Temple. I want to know what the FUCK is going on."

The woman glanced at her, then at Tevos. "I ... cannot say. "

Sparatus tilted his head. "Excuse me?"

Tevos spoke. "This is ...I would need to consult with the Council of Matriarchs..."

Shepard grunted. "No. We know Saren and Benezia were working for someone called Nazara. We know the geth worshiped something called Nazara. And now we know the giant black ship that tore apart an entire Citadel fleet ... calls itself Nazara. A Reaper. Saren was working for the Reapers, and Benezia isn't headed to Ilos for milk and cookies. There's something there she thinks will help her bring them back."

The room was silent for long moments before the turian admiral spoke. "We need to decide what to do."

Shepard grinned. "We send a fleet after her to stop her and kill her. If there were more of these Reapers, we'd have seen them – and if this Nazara was working with Saren and Benezia, that means he can't bring them back on his own, he needs help. We stop her, we stop him."

Sparatus frowned. "We cannot send the fleets on a wild goose chase into the deep Traverse and through a blind relay jump to uncharted territory. This could be a trap, for all we know, or Benezia may be prepared for it."

Shepard spun to face him. "We can't just let her get there unopposed!"

The turian admiral shook his own head. "We have no choice. While you were fighting Benezia, geth fleets have been approaching. There have been battles near Adana, Cyone, Sur'Kesh, and a strong assault near Irune, the volus homeworld. The fleet is already tied up..."

The human defense minister spoke. "Yes, and as I said, with all of the chaos, we can't afford to move any of our own forces outside of our territory. We've had to withdraw the dreadnaught from the Fifth Fleet to make up for the forces we ... lost ... at Noveria. There's simply no capacity."

Shepard grit her teeth, and Kirrahe spoke. "Councilors, there's every possibility that whatever Benezia may find at Ilos could be devastating. She may be planning to attack the Citadel. Can we afford the risk of letting her run free?"

Sparatus and the turian admiral both shook their head, along with the asari, who was the one to speak. "As the commander of the Destiny Ascension, the protection of the Citadel is my responsibility, Captain. I cannot take the home fleet on a destination that far from the Citadel. Even at best rated speed, the trip would take days."

Shepard frowned. "Given the FTL distance between relays, it's still a shorter trip from here to Ilos than from where we were. If we left today we'd only be at best a few hours behind. Hell, you could send enough to trap her on the planet and bombard it from fucking orbit!"

Anderson spoke for the first time, his voice tired sound. "Councilors, sitting and waiting with a foe as dangerous as Benezia is doesn't seem wise to me. She's already proven that her reach is longer than we thought, and as long as she's around to give orders we don't know if she can pull any more attacks like this."

It was Tevos who finally responded. "I'm sorry, but no. The Council is in no position to reposition our fleets at this time. Geth fleet strength is larger than expected, and we're stretched too thin as it is. Without additional support from others we cannot support such. The volus fleet is pinned down at Irune, the elcor fleet would take several days to arrive – and as your own defense minister has said, there won't be any human units aside from the cruisers and frigates of Fifth fleet. Such a force is not enough to be a threat to Benezia's own forces."

Barnes coughed. "In any event we would not dispatch forces to pursue Benezia. As we see it, the SA has lived up to our part of any bargains put forth by the previous administration. As such, we expect that since we blocked Saren and our people brought him down, and contributed to destroying Benezia's base of support, that certainly the Citadel forces can finish the job."

Udina frowned. "Minister, that's all well and good. But the President clearly stated he wanted this issue pursued."

Barnes sniffed. "The President does not command the military, and whatever treaty negotiations he pushed with the other heads of state still must be reviewed by the Senate. We're done with this issue."

Shepard scowled. "Fine, I'll go after her myself. The Normandy will need repairs and I'll need a few marines to replace my losses."

Udina nodded. "I have no issues with that, Commander, although I hope you will be careful." He glanced at the Council.

Valern shrugged. "Spectre Shepard's determination to finish this is laudable ... but we cannot provide any real support."

Udina rolled his eyes and turned back to Shepard. But before he could speak, Barnes turned to the human standing next to him. "I don't think so, Udina."

The human male next to Barnes was slender and well dressed, if not as flashy as Barnes, and his gray eyes were even colder and narrower. His black hair was clipped in an expensive razor cut and the frame of his body spoke of some form of martial training. "Yes, I have to agree, Minister. I am Lord Aldrien Manswell, the assistant director of the Office of the Prime Minister. I believe you already heard him state that the SA is washing it's hands of this ... debacle."

Udina narrowed his own eyes but nodded. "That's fine. My office of Ambassador only answers to the President, however, and Shepard answers to me, the Council and only then to the SA Military."

The man only smirked. "Just so. However, you are instructed to restrict Shepard to the Citadel until such time that we can decommission her command of the Normandy and move her into her new role."

Udina's eyes widened, Anderson scowled, and Shepard clenched her fist. But before she could speak Udina stepped forward. "You are out of your mind, has been the only one in this entire damned mess to figure out what's going on and do something about it! I doubted her, the Council doubted her, the military and the media doubted her. And yet she got the job done. I am not about to stand in her way now, and if Bekenstein or Coleman think they can make me they have a surprise waiting for them."

The smaller man stared at Lord Manswell, and Shepard felt her lips quirk in a reluctant smile. Udina, you sonofabitch. I can't believe you actually stood up for me. Figures the one decent politician is someone I can barely stand most times.

Lord Manswell only arched an eyebrow. "Your reticence was anticipated, Mr. Udina." He tapped his omnitool, and Udina's own tool beeped. "You are relieved of your position as ambassador. Mr. Osaba will be taking your position. I have deactivated your diplomatic access." He paused, smiling. "You may go. I'm afraid this is, after all, a secured, private briefing."

Udina took a step back, and Shepard gritted her teeth. While she didn't get people very well, she remembered the conversation in Udina's office where he told her of his naked ambition. He'd finally taken a stand and backed her, and now he was paying for it.

Anderson laid a hand on Udina's arm. Manswell turned to Shepard. "Arcturus Command has already transmitted the command transfer, Commander Shepard. You are relieved of command of the Normandy and will report to Arcturus station."

At this, Sparatus met Shepard's gaze and a mandible flickered. "While the Council has no intention of interfering in internal human affairs, if you think you can begin giving orders to one of our active Spectres you are sadly misinformed. The Council will release Commander Shepard from duty to whatever tasks you have for her at our pleasure, not yours, human."

Manswell gave an icy smile, and nodded curtly. "Very well. In any event, Shepard, you won't be taking the Normandy anywhere, and please remove the aliens from the ship immediately. Whenever the Council deigns to let you report to duty, you will answer to recently promoted Rear Admiral Branson." Shepard didn't even bother to respond, and the man shrugged. "Thank you for your time, Councilors." He and Barnes turned to leave, and Shepard looked away.

Tevos's voice was soft. "I am sorry, Commander, but there is nothing we can do at this time. We ... we will notify you if we require further information."

The tone was kindly but a clear dismissal, and Anderson nodded as Shepard, who sighed and turned. The group walked slowly, Liara looking upset, Garrus angry, Kirrahe beaten and exhausted.

Udina was still in shock, his eyes wide and confused, and Anderson's own expression was set into the darkest anger Shepard could ever recall. She realized she was in shock herself, not having expected anything like this to happen.

Garrus was the first to speak. "So... we're basically fucked. Right?"

At that, Udina stopped and stiffened. His eyes flickered over the group, stopping to pause on the figure of Kirrahe. "...Captain. I appreciate you putting your career on the line today to support Shepard. I don't want to seem rude, but there's something I need to discuss with them privately."

Kirrahe nodded. "Understandable. Am .. fatigued myself. I will return to check on my men." He paused, nodding again, almost to himself. "Shepard. About what I said regarding STG... I will see what I can do."

She smiled, and he stepped away, down the opulent corridors. Shepard turned back to Udina and gave him a curious look.

Udina smiled. "Shepard. I realize you and I do not always ... get along harmoniously. But I have come to understand that you do not perform badly as long as you are given clear, open orders with a modicum of what you call political bullshit."

Jiong coughed. "She's still rough around the edges."

Shepard glanced at him. "Hush, Black Hat." Her attention snapped back to Udina. "Okay. And?"

Udina smiled wider. "Given that ... disgraceful showing from our government back there, I'm not convinced that they're acting in the best interests of the SA. I expected to be relieved of my post in due time, but .. not in such a humiliating, public fashion. This has nothing to do with you. . . but with the fact that no one in the incoming government is listening to what you say, or my reports. It has to do with my brother being a political foe of the current Prime Minister."

Liara looked at him askance. "You .. you are saying that the human government is turning their back on the danger my mother presents out of political spite?"

Udina nodded. "It is exactly that, madame. They never believed anything you said, and I have no doubt that fool Coleman and Saracino think that if they pull you out of this, whatever happens will hurt the Citadel more than it does the SA. They may even hope Benezia does attack, thinking they can ... take advantage in the chaos."

Shepard felt ice crawl up her spine. She knew, from viewing the OSD that Kyle had left her, that many parts of the SA government were utterly corrupted, and it was more than Cerberus. The Manswells were into something very, very secretive and they'd never really given up power at all.

She turned her attention back to Udina. "So ... what do we do? I can't chase that bitch with no ship and no support."

Udina tilted his head, glancing at the commissar. "The Commissariat has no vessels here?"

Jiong shrugged and shook his head. "No. All of our combat-capable ships were assigned to the strike on Noveria. We've never had very many ... enough to stop a fleet admiral from going rogue, and to interdict rioting planets. Besides, while the Commissariat is independent, it's not going to directly violate the mandate of the government without reassurances."

Udina shrugged. "Ah, well, the easy way is out, then." The small smile on Udina's face only grew. "How long until the Normandy is ready to depart, assuming you still had command?"

Shepard frowned, then tapped her omni. "Shepard to Normandy Engineering."

The voice of Adams came on. "...Commander. Pressly just got some .. troubling orders from Arcturus."

She nodded to herself. "I know. I am being asked how long until temporary repairs on the Normandy are completed."

"Roughly five hours. We'll still be light on armor plating and we haven't gotten any new requisitions for missiles, but we got restocked on everything else." He paused. "There's a team of Commissars outside waiting for you to get back, they want Doctor T'Soni's and Mr. Vakarian's effects removed."

Udina nodded to Shepard and she spoke. "That's fine. Thank you, Chief. Shepard out." She frowned as she cut off the omni. "What was that about?"

Udina exhaled and turned to the Commissar. "Commissar, do you see Benezia as a clear and present danger to the SA?"

Jiong fingered his goatee, hard eyes on the former ambassador. He was silent for long seconds before nodding. "Yes, I do. My report to my superiors indicated such."

Udina folded his arms. "In that case, I am afraid I can only think of one possible course of action."

Shepard frowned. Udina was acting weird, and she didn't like a weird Udina. "And what's that?"

Udina glanced around at the deserted chambers, and shook his head. "Not here. I need someplace secure."

Anderson sighed. "My apartment should suffice."

O-OSaBC-O

Some thirty minutes later they were ensconced in Anderson's apartment. They had barely all sat down when Shepard glared at Udina. "Alright, spill."

Udina actually chuckled. "Very well, Shepard. I see your neanderthal impatience has given out, but trust me, you will approve of what I plan."

He paused, thinking. "I had a very curious visitor while you were off blowing things up. A hooded and cloaked asari, who passed me a very cryptic message. She wanted me to inform you that whatever Benezia planned, her ultimate goal was to strike at the Citadel. This person said that unless was Benezia was stopped, she might be able to do something to distract everyone else and have a free run at her goal."

Garrus flicked a mandible. "She's already done that. The entire Citadel Fleet is all over the place fighting geth, and the humans have scrambled home."

Udina only nodded. "I wasn't aware of that until the briefing, and when I heard it I became alarmed. Someone has to chase Benezia down and stop her, before she pulls off whatever she's planning." Udina turned to Garrus. "You worked in C-SEC. Assuming Shepard got back on board the Normandy and the crew went along with it, how could the SA stop her from just taking off?"

Garrus shifted in his seat. "Well. Your own office has docking controls for all ships on the Alliance Ring."

Udina nodded. "I'm aware of that, but I was also told that my lock-down had to be communicated to ... traffic injunction?"

Garrus nodded. "Traffic Control Injunctions Office. Basically, Ambassador, your office locks down the docking clamps and mass field holding the ship in place. Injunctions actually disengages the surface to space cannons and automated drone ships that prevent illegal docking or departure. So yeah, even if Shepard got back on the ship and you blew the locks away and took down the fields, the Citadel defense systems would blow you out of the sky."

Anderson nodded. "I remember that now. I actually spent about three or four days working with them to look up travel information when I was working with Saren, trying to track down a ship."

Udina rubbed his chin. "Is it heavily guarded?"

Garrus gave the human a steady look. "...no. It's inside the C-SEC security cordon, so not just anyone can get in there, though. But it's pretty late ... there's only going to be a handful of operators there, and frankly if you have the right pass-codes you can get there without anyone even noticing."

Udina nodded. "And do you happen to have these pass-codes?"

Shepard frowned. "Udina..."

The former ambassador gave a cool smile. "Yes, Shepard. If my government insists on being willfully stupid, I am suggesting you take events into your own hands. Osaba isn't familiar with my systems and I have a perfect excuse to 'visit' him to clear out my office. While you'll no doubt need Officer Vakarian on your mission, I think Captain Anderson could bluff his way into this Injunction center with some kind of story about verifying the lock-down..."

Garrus exhaled. "That's going to get you both arrested, and hard."

Anderson firmed his jaw. "I don't see much choice, though. Udina is right. If we don't do something, there's no telling what Benezia may do. At least if we can get Sara and her team on their way we aren't waiting for the ax to fall."

Shepard blinked. "You...you of all people are suggesting I steal my own goddamned ship?"

Udina gave a soft laugh. "If you are successful, they'll have to let us go since we did the right thing. If you are wrong well...my career is already ruined. And the current political environment is not going to be kind to Captain Anderson's career either."

The other man gave a snort. "Never mind all that. Sara ... he's right." He fixed his dark gaze on her. "If Saren was dangerous, then Benezia is moreso. She detonated nuclear weapons on her own planet and murdered members of her own family. You said it yourself – she's trying to bring back the Reapers. She may not care about the fleets because she plans to show up at the Citadel with five more of them. Or a dozen."

Shepard shuddered, remembering the vision. "More like thousands."

Anderson paled slightly. "All the more reason to act. Frankly, given the severity of what could happen if we don't act...jail time doesn't scare me at all."

Shepard rubbed her temples, and Liara's soft voice spoke next. "How will be able to get on the Normandy with the Commissars there? And will the crew ... go along with this?"

At that, Jiong himself gave a small bark of laughter. "That crew would immolate themselves if Shepard told them to." He glanced around. "And if you people are actually planning on doing this ... well..."

He exhaled. "I will handle the Commissars."

Shepard gave him a sharp look. "You are taking a gamble, Jiong."

The slender man shrugged. "You're rubbing off on me, I suppose."

No one said anything for a moment, then Anderson smiled. "I'm going to have a drink before we do this, then."

Shepard laughed, and to her surprise, so did Udina. "We have several hours before repairs are done. I suggest if there's any last minute things that need to be done, you get it handled now."

O-OSaBC-O

The Commissariat guards at the Normandy stiffened to attention as Jiong approached. He waved them down. "At ease. Status of the vessel."

The commissar trooper on the left nodded. "Sir, the ship is in full shutdown. Repairs on the engines and hull have finished, the last techs exited about ten minutes ago. The entire crew complement is still aboard, despite leave being announced. XO Pressly has allowed us to inspect the ship. The only thing of note is the core is still powered up."

Jiong nodded. "Powering it down is time-consuming and not recommended, due to the special functions it has. Have Commander Shepard or the aliens returned yet?"

Both troopers shook their heads, and Jiong nodded. "Very well. I have been tasked with specific orders. You are to withdraw to the entry to this docking bay and prevent any and all access except for Shepard and the alien crew members. I expect them to show up shortly. Ensure no media get in. I will be present to escort the aliens off the ship, and to conduct a walk-through before I take provisional command as ship's commissar."

The two troopers saluted and left, the orders sounding much like many others they had received over the years. In fifteen minutes, when Shepard showed up with a turian and an asari in tow, they waved them through.

After they were out of sight, one of the troopers sighed. "She looked pretty beat down."

The other one shrugged. "Yeah, well. Way above my pay grade." They fixed their eyes forward, alert for any media intruders.

Aboard the ship, Jiong greeted Shepard. "Everything ... is ready."

Shepard nodded, and tapped her omni. "Status?"

Udina's voice was cool, but with a slightly jittery undertone. "Two minutes. Osaba is having a goddamned social in MY office, the morose bastard."

Anderson's voice cracked across the comm. "About three minutes. I've talked them into buying that I'm here to review the Normandy lock-down until Jiong takes command. They're shorthanded here, spent the last twenty minutes helping them out." He paused. "Sara...good luck."

Shepard nodded and exhaled. She glanced into the cockpit, seeing Joker sitting there glumly. "Liara, Garrus...stations. Jiong, head to the CIC."

Joker looked up as Shepard entered the cockpit and sat. "Hey, Commander. Looks like you got shitcanned just like Anderson did, huh?"

Shepard gave Joker the single most evil grin he could ever recall, one that made every single hair on his body stand up on end. "Oh, Flight Lieutenant..."

She glanced at the series of dull red lights on the instrument panel, and Joker frowned. "Ma'am? They relieved you of command, locked down the software..."

Shepard patted Joker on the arm. "Yes, they did. Active the IMC please."

She took down the mike as he did so, speaking calmly. "Crew of the Normandy, this is Commander Shepard."

She paused, closing her eyes, and then spoke again. "We set out on this mission to stop a lunatic. We did so. We set out to save the galaxy. We failed. I don't accept failure."

"You've no doubt seen the news and heard it. The Council is once again sitting on their ass and the SA grounded me, taking command of the Normandy from me. That means no one is going after Benezia to stop her. It means our men died for nothing. It means we ran all over creation and fucked up every enemy in our path...for nothing."

The ship was silent. Joker gave her a sidelong, unhappy glance... and then his jaw dropped. "Oh no. Even you aren't that fucking crazy."

Shepard's grin turned feral as she keyed the mike and spoke again. "You all know what I'm capable of. What I'll do. You've seen me fight and bleed and nearly get blown up a dozen times. I'm not about to stop now." She paused. "I've got people on the Citadel that in a few minutes are going to undo the locks on the ship and disable the security systems long enough for us to hit the relay and head after Benezia."

She turned to look at Joker. "This is mutiny, crew of the Normandy. I am disobeying a direct formal order from both the Admiralty and the Prime Minister, and basically committing hijacking and conduct unbecoming. Even if I am successful, I may be courtmartialed and since I am a restricted felon, executed. Captain Anderson is helping me, and he will almost certainly be arrested, maybe even shot and killed."

She exhaled. "If you do not feel you can follow me in this endeavor, please head to an escape pod. You do NOT have to come. I do not want anyone on board who isn't –"

She was interrupted by a roar from the CIC. "FUCK THAT SHIT, COMMANDER!" Roars of delight and whoops echoed throughout the ship.

She heard footsteps behind her and turned to see Pressly standing there, arms folded, uniform perfect. She arched her eyebrow at him. "Well?"

He rolled his eyes. "Did you even have to ask, ma'am?"

She keyed the mike again. "Smoke 'em if you got 'em, boys and girls."

Joker chuckled. "Can I fly a pirate flag?"

Shepard turned to face him. "...no." She then glanced at the panel and watched as all four lights went from red to green. "Joker?"

He exhaled and swiveled in his seat, hands moving too fast to follow. "On it, Commander. Tali, flight power. Adams, control surfaces to me. CIC shift to low observable. All hands stand by for flying like a bat outta hell!"

Shepard grinned.

O-OSaBC-O

Osaba flew backwards, blood spurting from his now broken nose, and Udina smiled coldly. "God, that was satisfying."

The door burst open, and Lord Manswell and Jason Barnes stared at him, and the moaning figure of Osaba on the floor, and finally the active omnitool on Udina's arm. "What have you done?"

Udina wasn't even listening to them, eyes fixed on the video image of the docking ring displayed on the desk, and his grin widened as he saw the Normandy break away like a falling leaf before literally erupting into blue light and burning straight for the relay. "Oh, you know. My damned job."

Manswell clenched a fist. "You are done. Your family is done! You are going to rot in a cell until you die! No one defies us!"

Udina sat down in his chair, kicking the form of Osaba aside with a moue of distaste. "I am not sure what fantasy world you are living in, milord, but it seems to me that I just have defied you." He mockingly placed his hands together. "So do your worst. Wait, I forgot. You have no police powers here. Good luck getting charges through C-SEC."

Manswell's eyes narrowed.

O-OSaBC-O

"Down on the ground now!"

Anderson sighed, kneeling down as best he could with his aching back. He really wished he'd not punched that one turian, his hand felt like it was broken.

C-SEC IT officers ran around in panicked circles, while the drell in front of him covered him with a heavy pistol. Alarms had gone off the minute he'd disabled the locks on the Normandy, but what really pissed them off was the scrambler he'd blown in the Citadel's defense network, shutting it down for a good five minutes.

If Joker couldn't get clear in that time, Anderson would eat his own command cap.

"Status report, dammit. The Executor is on the line!"

One of the techs, a salarian, sighed in disgust. "The Normandy is clear. Full reboot required. Whatever garbage this human put in the system is locking us out from targeting any frigate of the Alliance."

The drell's omnitool gave a tired sigh. "Bring Captain Anderson to command. Executor out."

Anderson grimaced as the two turians behind him levered him to his feet even as they cuffed him. "This way, human."

Anderson nodded. "Sorry about the punch."

The turian snarled, and his partner laughed.

O-OSaBC-O

An hour later, a single robed figure sitting in a uncrowded bar on the Promenade listen to the breathless report from the newscaster about Shepard's daring theft of the Normandy.

She swirled the drink in her glass thoughtfully before downing it in a single gulp, smiling. "Well, Little Wing, at least your girlfriend has guts, I'll give her that."

Placing the drink on the counter, she didn't even give a flicker of surprise when another cloaked figure sat down next to her. "I thought I told your stupid ass boss to clear out."

The other figure gave a bow of the head. "Well, Matriarch Aethyta, my 'boss' decided he needed eyes on the Citadel when things went down. And besides, he is no where near here, trust me. He's planned for every possibility."

Aethyta snorted. "Too bad you didn't have the sense to say no." She shrugged. "Still, it's good to see you again, kid. I'm guessing you got even with that punk-ass Primarch?"

Tetrimus looked up, one good eye glowing faintly. "If by got even you mean that his son's skull is now serving as a decoration in my office, yes."

Aethyta shuddered and poured herself another drink. "Goddess. Remind me not to piss you the fuck off." Taking another drink, she waved vaguely at the haptic newscast. "Did you all help with that?"

Tetrimus chuckled. "No. By the time we realized the SA intended to ground her, the Broker discovered that his contacts in the SA had been cut out of the decision loop. The choice to ground Shepard was not actually approved by anyone but certain elements of the SA government...it would not have stood very long."

He tapped a taloned finger on the bar. "No, the question my employer has for you is exactly why you are still here if you expect the strike to fall here."

The asari matriarch rolled her shoulders and gave him a thin, almost cruel smile. "Family business, that's all. Just a last piece of family business."

He snorted. "You plan to face her yourself, then? You think she will come here?"

Aethyta nodded. "Anyone else facing her is going to die. Doesn't matter how good they are, she's better. She's smarter. She's just flat out too goddamned much. You can bet the Solarch ain't about to face her down, and I doubt a Royal Hunting Party could even get on the Citadel much less stake her out. Any one below that level of power would just get smeared." She shook her head, draining her glass once more.

Tetrimus took in that information and considered. "Have you discovered what we are missing, in our analysis?"

She smiled. "It's going to cost you."

Tetrimus frowned. "That's usually our line."

She smiled wider. "But oh-so worth it. I want the Broker to make sure, no matter what, Liara T'Soni comes out of this unharmed. Get the Matriarchy to haul the damned Justicars back into obedience."

Tetrimus exhaled. "That ... is a very large, difficult and dangerous task. Assume we agree."

Aethyta smirked. "Tevos and I had a chat. Shepard said the big black ship Saren was flying wasn't a geth ship. It was something she called a Reaper, called it Nazara."

Tetrimus froze, then closed his eye. "Of course. How could we be so .. blind? Everything fits now. "

Aethyta frowned. "That means something to you?"

The turian stood. "It means you were right, Matriarch. This station is no place for me ... or you. I wish you luck in your quest, but my advice is to run far, far away. If this black ship is truly Nazara, I fear whatever actions we are taking now are far too late to be of any good."

He paused. "We will honor your request, as best we can, regarding your daughter, assuming she survives the next solar week. You will not see us again, Matriarch."

With a single step he erupted into electrical discharges and vanished. She blinked, then grunted, returning to her drink.

"Don't plan to survive this anyway, kid. But thanks anyway."

---

Chapter 114: Chapter 105 : Prince Maxwell Manswell

---

A/N: Drawing the last bits together...

This chapter is going to hop all over the place, and I do apologize a bit for that, but I've been lazy in putting the finishing touches to how things all end up, and unlike Bioware I have problems with leaving huge plot holes unexplained.

Some of this chapter will be confusing unless you are also reading some of the background materials.

---

The space around the solar system that Virmire resided in was empty of vessels, and the planets orbited the sun serenely and without disturbance. The geth fleets had moved out expeditiously, after stopping to ensure nothing survived the blast that took out the base. The tumbling, scorched wreckage of Nazara's scanning array was the only thing to disturb the endless spaces.

That space rippled, shimmering like a heat mirage, before tearing open, revealing a faintly grayish purple light. Through this rift slipped a vast shape, erupting into space in a single moment, the disturbing rent in space and time closing behind it a second later.

Lethath expanded his consciousness, feeling the reality of the system around him. His senses dipped into realms mortal creatures couldn't comprehend, sampling the events – the corruption, the battle, the searching.

The creature's mind filled with amusement, and it flexed its lenticular shape. Looking like a large, organic form of the Reapers that were mere mockeries of it, the Old One began to put together exactly what was happening in its mind.

The Reapers, these false Ascended, understood so little. But that, after all, was the intention. With a final pulse of amusement, Lethath began plucking the very laws of reality around him, altering certain constants here, tweaking the arrow of time there.

In an instant, the scanning array Nazara had spent so much time creating, and been forced to have the geth destroy, was recreated. With another pulse of power, two more, smaller figures erupted into space nearby.

Lethath turned to the first of them. "Everything is ready. The trap so long baited is finally set." The voice was not sound, rather it rang across the minds of the three figures, overtones of smugness and pride liming the message.

The smaller leviathans merely waved their arm-tentacles in agitation. "You seem very sure..." It moved through space smoothly, the light of the distant sun gleaming off interlocking plates of black cyberware, overlapping equally dark flesh. "Things could still go wrong."

Lethath merely began activating the scanning array. "The False Ones are machines, built on an overlay of a sentient, yet inferior race. Only the one known as Harbinger is actually our equal, the rest are pitiful mockeries. While this ... somewhat primitive device ... shows that he is at least aware of my presence, he cannot be aware of yours, or the rest of the force we have brought."

The hulking Old One moved closer to the device. "The False Ones are at the proper strength to weaken the Darkness just enough. My thralls have carefully prepared the last three harvest cycles to maneuver events to the exact requirements for the Long Plan. All the pieces are in place. We gifted the Inusannon with the insight to create the weapon, and left enough clues and hints for the Protheans to interfere."

With a motion, Lethath sent a command to the scanning array, and it began reconfiguring itself, its arching shapes shifting like water under his power. "Now all that remains is to ensure the fool False One actually connects directly to the Citadel."

The smaller figures slowed their movements. "But the Catalyst AI is still offline."

Lethath made a gesture, and the scanning array pulsed, in dimensions unseen. "...not anymore. The Catalyst was never designed to actually be able to turn on us, if that was not in the Long Plan. Our ancestors coded in both a remote shutdown sequence...and a remote start up. And now, Mettah, the Catalyst will be rebooting."

The leviathan named Mettah merely quivered in place. "That does not seem wise. It does not know its place in the Long Plan."

Lethath merely made a sound of amusement. "It will awake unable to control the Reapers. It is disconnected from everything ... except the dark relay switch. When that fool of a puppet attempts to reach out and bring forth the rest of his kind, he will have to battle the Catalyst for control. He cannot do that and control his thralls and prevent himself from being damaged by the natives."

Lethath finished his manipulations. "He will be destroyed. And that will enrage the rest of them. The best bait. In their fool arrogance, they will be ... enraged by his destruction."

Mettah's voice was frustrated. "We could overpower him and destroy him ourselves!"

Lethath merely grew more amused. "Child. The False Ones fear us. It took nine of them to slay a youngling, and if they knew that we had murdered one at the end of a harvest cycle, they would be too wary to fall for the trap. This is the bait. As long as they are scattered, hidden, fortified, we cannot take them down. We must draw them in – blind, arrogant, sure of their superiority – and then trigger events as the Long Plan calls for. Anything else and either they will flee or hide, and then we will have no tool to use against the Darkness."

Mettah gave a sound of annoyance. "I merely wish this ordeal was over, Eldest."

With a single motion, Lethath finished his work with the array, and it broke apart, dissolving into decaying molecular slurry as it did so. "Then be glad, for the time for waiting is very nearly over. Now...we only have to watch the entertainment as it unfolds."

The three beings made motions and vanished into rents of purple light, leaving the system empty once more.

O-OSaBC-O

"What...were you thinking, you young, idiotic fool!!"

The room was large, over eighty feet long and half again as wide, the high vaulted ceiling supported by thick, square pillars of dark metal. Dark cherry wall paneling was pierced every ten feet by high crystalline windows, overlooking broad fields of exquisitely manicured lawns and gardens. The sharp curve of a bio-dome could be made out in the distance.

Niches set into the walls flanked priceless art, antiquities such as ancient suits of armor, tapestries, and swords. At the southern end the room was pierced by a set of two-foot thick blast doors, guarded by a pair of up-armored ODIN mechs.

The hard marble floor at the far end of the hall from the massive door was occluded by thick black pile carpet, trimmed in silver. A quartered Hohenzollern crest over an iron shield was embroidered into the carpet, which surrounded a black marble dais. The edges of the dais were flanked by a dizzying array of haptic screens showing data from a wide variety of sources – Commissariat data feeds, cameras from the Senate and the Council Chambers, live cameras from dozens of observers and financial market overviews scrolled along the top.

Atop the dais in a life support hover-chair sat Lord Prince Maxwell Manswell, his ancient features twisted in disgust. His gnarled form was shielded from view by a richly embroidered blanket made of Terra Nova black fleece. Behind him stood the towering and frightening figure of Richard Williams.

Aldrien licked his lips, framing his words carefully as he knelt in front of the hover-chair, sweat running down his fine patrician features. "Grandfather, I merely wanted to prevent any complications to the plan! It was clear to me that Shepard's stubborn streak would lead her to disregard any orders given. I thought .. I thought it best that I intervene and stop that."

Maxwell grunted. "And thus you decide to openly flaunt our opposition to the criminal little bitch by relieving that Udina right in front of the Council? Did the thought ever cross your simplistic little mind that Shepard must have information about the family connection to Cerberus?"

He shook his head feebly, coughing, then continued. "Even if that were not the case, my idiotic child, you have just made an enemy of one of the most dangerous people in the Systems Alliance. She has the President's favor! She's aligned with Von Grath and his pack of neo-crusader hooligans, not to mention everything else."

Aldrien frowned. "But you said we couldn't afford for her to stop Benezia... that the chaos of whatever she was planning was likely our best shot at salvaging Project Fletcher."

The old man groaned. "Fletcher is, for all intents and purposes, dead. There is certainly a chance of salvaging the goals of the plan, but I do not have time for that now. We have ... new priorities. Take yourself out of my sight and pray very hard that Aloxius does not have you shot in the night."

He snarled as the boy withdrew from the family halls, before weakly tapping a control on his hover-chair and swiveling to face Richard Williams.

The huge man merely shrugged. "It was ill-advised, milord ... but after going over all of the records we have left, I'm pretty convinced it doesn't matter. The connection linking Sirta and Cerberus, and thus Sirta and Saren, was routed through the Foundation. She probably already knows we're involved. The main thing is that, however poorly it might have been accomplished, the boy did manage to put Shepard in a situation where she's probably headed off to die and get out of our hair."

Maxwell coughed again. "That is already known to me. However I see nothing good from this incident, and we now must expend political capital to spin it into a favorable light. Not to mention this will set the Udina family on the warpath."

Richard only gave another massive shrug. "Maybe so ... but you'd have to expend a lot more to get the Butcher killed any other way. And make no mistake, milord, she is a big problem. Kyle definitely knew about Research Station Sixteen. For all we know he even tumbled to the Message...he did reach out to that asari priestess."

The ancient figure shivered in his seat, tapping another control on his chair. Two medical robots came out of a semi-concealed alcove to the side of the room and began adjusting his medical equipment, while the old man sat quietly, thinking. After several long seconds, he grunted, his harsh accent lending a grinding quality to his words. "Given what she has accomplished ... contingency planning is called for. She may get killed in this endeavor. But if against all odds she is successful and completely stops Benezia and whatever her plans are..."

He trailed off, then tapped the padd on his chair yet again. "Nephew."

The largest of the view screens on the haptic array behind him cleared, showing a man with thinning gray hair, hard features much like those of Maxwell, and a night-black uniform sitting at a black steel desk. "Uncle Max. This call was anticipated. I've been busy misdirecting the new Director of the AIS and I've not had a chance to .. consult."

Richard Williams arched an eyebrow. He knew that Prince Aloxius Manswell was the Minister of Information, but he had no idea the man was connected to Lord Manswell. The lineage of the Manswells was odd. While Maxwell held the title of Prince and was the formal family patriarch, common rumor stated that Aloxius really controlled most of the Family and that the two were at loggerheads.

Richard smiled when he realized this was also a convenient fiction ... although that left him with questions he could ask later.

Maxwell grunted. "That fool boy of Jason's just made an intergalactic fool of himself. I want you to identify at least fifteen members of the Family tightly associated to the Manswell Foundation and frame them up to being behind Cerberus and anything else we can't have compromised. Shift everything away from RSS 16 to Zion, leave behind enough incriminating information that the Family itself will have to pay fines but make it clear the corruption is linked mostly to a subset of the family, with Aldrien on top."

Aloxius winced. "Ugly. I can only presume you think the investigation will continue and pierce our previous level of misdirection?"

Maxwell sighed, a rattling and wet sound. "I presume nothing. We have been anticipated, and now stymied, by a dead hero, a buffoon of a general too proud to take a hint, and a jumped up criminal thug with more savagery than sense. It speaks of arrogance, Aloxius, it speaks of overconfidence and short-sightedness. Manswell is not a byword for invincible."

Aloxius gave an elegant shrug. "I'll made the calls. In the meantime, the Senate fight over the firestorm little Aldrien kicked up is intensifying – Senator Adkins is losing votes. Should I intervene?"

Maxwell sat quietly for several seconds...before a cunning smile lit his ancient features. "...yes. Find enough dirt on the Saracino opposition to silence them. I'll reach out to the President to let him know I've salvaged his project."

The smile widened. "And get me the comm-link identifier to the Normandy."

O-OSaBC-O

Shepard glanced nervously around the circle of figures in the comm room before running her hands through her hair. "Alright ... status report. Adams, you're up first."

The stocky engineer gave a flat, tired smile. "We've mostly patched up the broken armor plates, although section 55 is still buckled and not at full strength. We didn't have time to get any work done on the hull structure, so the damage to the structural spars along the top of the ship is still there. We swapped out an engine for number 3 so we're back to full power, but we had no time to calibrate it and there are energy spikes in the system. Joker will have to compensate."

He turned to Tali, who gave a little start and then spoke. "O-oh, right. Um ... Adams has made me assistant engineer. Ah.. um. The electrical system is still damaged in many places. I was able to crawl into the superstructure and manually rewire the environmental controls, and I did my best, but I don't know how long that will last under battle conditions. We have leaks in the wing control system, gray-water system, and secondary liquid cooling loops that we've patched with omnigel, but again, they aren't .. tested."

Garrus shifted in his seat as she looked at him. "Missiles are still depleted, and we never got to restock torpedoes after taking out the Cerberus base. We have three left, but I need to code them. Main guns are online but laser range finder is out of calibration and I don't have the tools to fix it. Shots will require a hot-lock. The second MAKO we took on is gone, and the first still has battle damage. It can make one or maybe two drops, but the Normandy will probably have to do a landing to pick it up again. Cannon is fine, armor is mostly omnigel at this point. It needs an overhaul, and the medical systems are still scattered all over the science lab set up for the wounded salarions we had on board."

With Alenko and Cole dead, Vega was the acting MCO, and he grunted. "The remaining marines are ready to go ma'am, but there's not a lot of us left. Last I heard, all of our wounded were alive and being hauled off to Huerta Memorial. Both DACTs are out. I can form a single reinforced squad and Sergeant Telanya says she's good to go. We're low on medigel..."

Chakwas nodded. "I was able to obtain some replacement packets for the men, but the medbay supplies were only half refilled. Also, I need to tear down the support docket I had to build for the wounded." She exhaled. "Commander, none of your team is fully recovered from facing Saren, and Wrex, Tali, and Commissar Jiong took additional wounds on the Virmire mission. You are not at one hundred percent. I just want to remind you of that."

The Navigator, Friggs, swallowed nervously when Shepard shifted her gaze to her. "We're on course for the Mu Relay, ma'am. ETA is nineteen hours, eleven minutes. Assuming the directions from the, ah, queen were correct, and the maps you got from Virmire are accurate, from the Mu Relay it's a single jump and a two hour FTL burn." She gave a weak smile. "I do have good news though, the primary approach goes through a dark nebula cloud – it should muffle our blue-shift and make our approach almost undetectable."

Liara spoke up, wearing a SA ship-suit once more. "I have been attempting to use the ship's scanning array and what science facilities we have to formulate my mother's approach, given that she launched from Virmire. There are two paths she could have taken, one has a travel time of six days and one has a travel time of only four days, but passes through several high visibility areas including at least one asari fleet center. If she had to take the slower route, we will beat her there by six hours, Sara."

Pressly rubbed his chin. "That's assuming she didn't have the black ship just jump her directly there."

Liara shook her head. "I do not think she would have done so – if she could have then certainly, having the location from the queen and localized it, she would have been gone by the time we reached Virmire. She was preparing her fleets and loading troops for some reason, thus I think there must be some explanation for why she did not simply jump directly there." Liara gave a small sigh. "We still don't know how to beat her, though."

Shepard nodded. "I didn't waste the time I had on the Citadel while waiting to launch – picked up a few Spectre toys for dealing with violent biotics. I have phase suppressive rounds for everyone, as well as upgrade warp-resistant omnishield bracers. It won't stop a direct hit but it may save your life from a glancing blow. I also got a pile of pulse inhibitor grenades."

Wrex gave a scowl. "Those will ruin our own biotics, Shepard."

She nodded. "Yeah, but I'd much rather deal with Benezia if we're both out of biotic power. No matter how badass of a biotic she may be, without that she's just an old woman and we can take her." She paused. "Anything from the Shadow Broker?"

Wrex grunted. "Nothing at all. Actually, I can't reach him or Tetrimus. I got a hold of Tazzik, his main enforcer, who told me the Broker is concerned about the Reaper threat and is pulling his operations back. He said the Broker would try to straighten the mess out with you and your government, but no promises." Wrex spat. "Gotta say, your government is even worse than the Council sometimes. Pack of kicked pyjaks running for cover after a single fight."

Shepard shrugged. "I figure I'm pretty much finished after this, even if I bring down that bitch. I'm still restricted citizenship ... at the very least I'm looking at jail time, if not execution. Doesn't matter." She glanced at Jiong, eyes narrowing. "I'm still astonished you went along with this, Commissar. I figured I'd have to take you out."

Jiong gave a thin, humorless smile. "My conditioning is very rigid, Commander. I had to weigh the reality that we were facing a clear and present danger to the SA against orders from authorized command figures." He sighed. "I do not know how my own superiors will take this action, but it won't be good even if we are successful. But the Commissariat Code left me no ... easy choices. I will be recording everything that occurs for the inevitable court martial that will follow."

Shepard nodded. "We're down to half our marine capacity, the ship is banged up, and we're not at a hundred percent. We have no back up and we won't be getting any, and if we get in over our heads we're dead." Shepard exhaled, hard eyes glancing at each person in the room. Measuring. Seeking. "I won't lie. This is ... desperation. Even if we beat her there, we have to figure out how to get past her fleets, get to her, shut her down, and stop whatever she's doing. Then we have to deal with the real problem...Nazara, a Reaper. That isn't something we can do alone, we need proof, hard proof and hard details."

She stood. "For now, I want everyone to rest. Pressly, try to keep the watches to three sections, even if that lowers readiness, so that people can rest and recover. Chakwas, I need a complete medical examination of every member of the ground team by the time we get there, and you may have to armor up and provide battle support." The older woman merely nodded, a glint in her eye at the thought.

She turned to Adams. "Adams...rig the core for Protocol Six, interdiction by ramming and core detonation. If all else goes to shit, we ram whatever ship she's on and blow the core, taking her with us." The engineer gave a slow, tired nod.

Friggs looked alarmed, but Pressly merely nodded as well. "I'll have the escape pods checked out,ma'am. What about the torpedoes, hook them into the self-destruct as well?"

Shepard shook her head. "No, code lock them and have them set to range zero, full mix. They'll go up with the ship. With the size of the core we have , I can't see even Nazara just shrugging that off."

"Wrex, check everyone's gear and armor. Get the anti-biotic rounds loaded. Without Ash here ..." She trailed off, and Wrex nodded.

"I'll see to it, Shepard."

Shepard nodded sharply, and was about to speak again when the CIC comm link lit. "Commander, incoming comms request."

She sighed. "I told you to ignore all communications."

The voice of the tech sounded shaken. "Ma'am...it's Prince Manswell. He's requesting to speak to you."

The eyes of the humans in the room widened, and Shepard cursed blackly. She had no idea what the leader of the House of Manswell wanted, but given that one of them had tried to shut her down on the Citadel and the links Kyle showed between them and the sick research being done on L2's, she wasn't very happy.

Blocking the call, however,would be tantamount to political suicide. While the Manswells didn't officially run anything in the SA, their influence was beyond immense. That punk on the Citadel had shut down her entire mission and grounded the SA fleet just on the strength of his name alone, and he was a junior family member. The Silver Prince could probably topple even the President.

"Very well, route it to the Comms room. Everyone out, except Jiong." She waited until the room emptied, smiling at the reassuring pulse of confidence from Liara she felt through the bond, before taking a steadying breath. "On screen."

The comm screen blanked, displaying the iron gray sigil of the Manswells for several seconds, then vanishing. The figure revealed was ancient, wisps of white hair framing his wrinkled features, age spots and deep lines marring the once proud patrician features. The eyes were hard and clear, the mouth fixed in a deep hard line. In the background she could see high armorplast windows and the Vancouver skyline.

The voice that sounded, while a whisper, was firm, echoing with hard Germanic overtones. "Commander Shepard." The eyes took in the figure of Jiong standing next to her, and narrowed. "Is the person with you aware of what you discussed with Major Kyle, and the ramifications?"

She swallowed, fingers twitching nervelessly. Kyle had not been sure if the entire Manswell family was corrupt or just pieces of it. If the Silver Prince already knew what Kyle told her... "No, milord. He is not."

The wrinkled hand made a weak motion. "Then he should leave, Commander."

Jiong shot her a look, and she shook her head. "Go, Alfred." He exhaled and nodded, leaving the room, and Shepard waited until the door closed before turning back to the screen. "You have my .. attention, milord."

The figure grimaced, coughing slightly. "I am contacting you to let you ... understand. I am embarrassed by the actions of my family. That fool of a boy had ... no right to block your mission or prevent the Fleet from assisting it."

He looked up, eyes angry. "I am old, Commander. Older than any other human, kept alive by ungodly machinery and sheer grit. I have given everything to humanity over the years."

She nodded, respectfully. Even a street rat like her knew the stories of the Silver Prince, how he'd been instrumental in holding the SA together for years, how even as an old man he'd been the one to stiffen the spine of the Alliance in the First Contact War.

His voice dropped, becoming even more faint. "I had withdrawn from society, and to my regret I did not keep a good oversight on the activities of my Family. Many I fear do not understand why the Manswells had to retreat from governance, from ruling, and wish to come back into power. They have acted ... unwisely."

A coughing fit overtook him, leaving him gasping for breath, but he continued. "Suffice... it to say ... that I am not happy with what I have discovered in the past day. My Family has befouled our name with sick experiments, with funding terrorists, with enabling the chaos and death that races over our fair nation even now. I have ... extended my will to ensure the ones behind this will suffer. Even as we speak my idiot nephew will be investigated by the Commissariat."

He sighed. "My foundation, which I built to elevate humanity, has also been ... stained. It will have to go." He looked at her. "And you, Commander. You have risked your career, and the career of the man you look on as a father. You have disobeyed direct orders from both the Admiralty and the Prime Minister. You have committed high treason and mutiny."

She set her jaw. "I had no choice, milord. And ... even you cannot convince me otherwise."

The prince chuckled, a dry, humorless rasping sound. "I had no intention of such. Are you loyal, Commander, to the SA?"

She looked at him and he continued. "Despite them not safeguarding your childhood? Despite being abandoned to privation, suffering, torture? Despite being abused...used...in your service? Do we still have your oath? To die before dishonor, to fight until you cannot any longer, to protect those who cannot do so themselves?"

She clenched her fists and nodded. "I will never betray the Systems Alliance. I am and will always do what has to be done to protect it, no matter the cost."

The Silver Prince nodded weakly, his aged features crumpling more. "Then I, Prince Maxwell Manswell, Lord Defender of the Systems Alliance, give you my will. You are to head to wherever Benezia is hiding and destroy her utterly. Until she is dead you are to take orders from no one but me. After her death you are to take any and all measures to ensure the destruction of that black ship calling itself Nazara."

The ancient eyes met hers. "I heard it's voice... in your presentation to the Council. Like a thousand black needles of ice shoved into my heart. Such a monster must be destroyed." He paused. "I know, legally, that I have no right to demand you follow my orders. We both also know that no one will gainsay me, as long as you succeed."

Shepard exhaled. "I will succeed, milord."

The old man nodded. "I cannot undo the damage regarding the fleet. There is too much political infighting right now, and in any event Barnes was half right. We have a geth fleet on an invasion course for Terra Nova and it outnumbers 2nd and 3rd fleet combined." The old man lifted his head. "But I can remove the stigmata of your actions, and have done so. Let your people know that neither you nor they will be held accountable or court martialed for defying that fool of a nephew, and that I will ensure Ambassador Udina – yes, he will be restored – and Captain Anderson are not punished."

She felt a hot rush of gratitude, not really for herself, but for her crew and especially David. She knelt, for the first time she could remember doing so willingly, her voice shaky with emotion. "I thank you deeply, milord. I am ... not used to being ... "

The voice lanced out. "You are used to being used by the SA. I understand. I make no lies and will tell you no fairy tales – you will be used. Repeatedly, until you are worn down. That does not mean the honor of my House allows us to trample on one who has served faithfully... and that has discovered that my Family requires purging."

The old man lifted a hand. "Show Lady Benezia that humanity can be hurt, assaulted, beaten, and damaged...but never defeated. You are my wrath, Commander Shepard. Fear nothing but God and dishonor, and go."

The transmission blanked, leaving the room silent. Shepard spent several minutes sorting through her emotions, before a small savage smile crossed her features.

She picked up the 1 MC link from the comm panel and spoke, quietly, calmly.

"Crew of the Normandy."

Something in her voice made Joker stop his calculations and glance up at the comms panel.

"I have just received a communication from Prince Maxwell Manswell. He .. instructs us to do our duty, to stop Benezia. And he says he agrees with my actions, and has ensured none of us will be facing any charges or penalties when we succeed in killing that evil bitch."

"I am proud of each and every member of this crew for following me into this, knowing we were breaking the law and disobeying orders. I appreciate that you had faith in me to do this, and I am happy that none of you will pay a price for that faith."

"Now that the bullshit is out of the way, we can focus on finding that tramp and blowing her goddamned brains out. That is all. Shepard out."

She exhaled sharply, the nerves that had been jangling all day finally calming down, and then glanced up as Jiong entered, eyebrow raised. "He gave us a Pardon?"

She nodded and shrugged. "He seemed pretty pissed...I should have figured a guy like the Silver Prince wouldn't be involved in Cerberus bullshit." She glanced up. "Make you feel any better?"

Jiong snorted. "Given your missions, Commander, I will feel better after we take out Benezia. I hope your plans work."

She shrugged, headed for the door. "We'll have to see, won't we?"

O-OSaBC-O

"You're serious."

The opulent quarters of Councilor Tevos were shaded in dim blue light, as she semi-reclined on the couches in her garden, sipping Serrician ice-wine. Across from her, the languid features of Matriarch Lidanya T'Armal twisted wryly as she uncrossed her legs to dip her toes in the cool waters of the reflection stream running through the garden.

The blunt, hard features of Aethyta seemed almost out of place in the elegant setting, the expensive glass of fire-wine in her hand and the richness of her own robes the only concessions the matriarch made to the surroundings. "Yeah, I am. I know Danni here did some time in the Temple, so she knows more, but that's what the Solarch told me."

Tevos frowned at the last person. "And why, exactly, was I never informed of this?"

Irrissa Te'Shora gave Tevos a tired look. "I am not required to explain the actions of the Council of Matriarchs to you. You were placed in this role for a reason, Tevos. You have done well, given your limitations, but this is something that only the House of Storms and the highest echelons of the Temple of Athame have full information about."

Tevos gave a sour smile at that. "I'm aware I'm from a small Guardian house of no import, but are you really expecting me to buy into this wild-water tale?"

Aethyta snorted, slugging back wine. "Heh. How do you think I felt? But it's the truth, kiddo. Nezyzy used to say the knowledge from the Temple was a burden...and you know how bad the Council freaked when that tramp Trellani bolted and joined fucking Cerberus." Another swallow of wine followed, the woman's tired features flicking into a cool smile. "I ain't a big believer in coincidence. Nazara is the name of the ship, and Nazara was the name carved into a stone in the temple over ten thousand years ago."

Tevos sighed. "So what do we do? Dispatching the fleets is not possible. Every hour brings more reports of geth, the entire Perseus Veil is vomiting them forth now in numbers we never thought possible. The Main Fleet at Thessia can't be moved..."

Lidanya shrugged. "There may be nothing we can do. Shepard is already on her way, despite the interference of the human government. She was able to defeat Saren, so maybe she has a chance of stopping Lady Benezia as well. The Solarch seemed to think so."

Aethyta snorted. "She's got my daughter with her, too. And if the rumors are right, one of Aleena's old war buddies, Urdrnot Wrex. Benezia doesn't play fair, though, and I doubt she'll give Shepard a chance to stop her on Ilos, or wherever she is going."

The matriarch sighed. "As far as the black ship goes...I think the best thing we can do is make sure the Destiny Ascension is in place to face off with it. That's the only ship that has a shot at taking it down. That's on you, Danni."

Matriarch Lidanya rolled her eyes. "Yes, yes. I'll do my best, but my job is safeguarding the Council." She paused. "Except I suppose you expect her to strike here? You said you needed something, what could you need from all of us?"

Aethyta sighed. "I need your permission to hang out in the Council Chambers, or at least in the Embassy. Specifically, armed and armored. That means I need all three of you to sign off on a security pass."

Irrissa frowned. "Why would you need that?"

The older matriarch sighed. "Because ... I know her. She's coming here. I don't know how, or when, but I feel it."

Lidanya gave a grimace. "You think you can stop her?"

Aethyta frowned. "I .. don't know. If it came down to it, me against her? I just don't know. Serisa could, if we could get her off Thessia, and surely the Solarch could. But the Solarch says she has to safeguard the High Temple."

Aethyta poured herself more wine. "Unless you girls know any other vishan blademasters you can hustle up in a hurry... it's just me. I have a stake in this anyway."

Irrissa laid back on one of the couches, closing her eyes. "We'll step up security around the Council Tower and the entrances to the Wards. It's possible she has more cultists infiltrated on the Citadel already, waiting to cause chaos. We did round up the engineer you fingered after terrorizing the Consort." She shrugged. "And we can certainly give you a pass, if that's what you think you need."

Tevos shrugged. "Very well, Matriarch Aethyta. The Council guard won't like the idea of an armored battle matriarch with a warp sword in the Chambers, but if you are right it is good that you will be there. Assuming she actually strikes here and not elsewhere."

The older matriarch stood, her brown robes sliding into place smoothly. "Thanks for the wine, kids. I'll be around." She left, making not a whisper of sound, and Lidanya sighed.

Tevos frowned in irritation, glancing at Irrissa. "I believe that's all. I'll let you know if I'm told anything else."

Irrissa took the hint and bowed, leaving the two asari in the courtyard alone. Tevos glared after her, before huffing irritably and sitting up. "You're taking this very quietly, Danni."

Lidanya merely gave a shrug, eyes closed. "I'm tired, and none of this makes sense, Vee. So yes, I am .. disinclined to panic at this juncture. The burden on my shoulders grows heavier by the hour."

Tevos' expression softened, and she smiled as she leaned back in her own couch, eyes half lidded. "It doesn't help you spend all your time working instead of relaxing, you know."

Lidanya opened one eye, glancing at Tevos. "If that's an offer, I'll take it, just let me shower first. Goddess knows I need it."

Tevos kept the amusement off her face as she watched the older asari rise gracefully and head to the bedroom, before shaking her head and following. Irrissa was too besotted with the al-Jilani human to take advantage of her position to bond with influential figures, but Tevos had no such reservations, and her rapidly blossoming attachment to the powerful figure in House T'Armal could only pay off in spades down the line.

You think you're superior to me , Irrissa, but I will love the look on your face when I am instead sponsored into House T'Armal and leave you far behind.

O-OSaBC-O

Benezia sat quietly, kneeling, feeling for her center. A thin shell of biotic energy enfolded her in a faint glow, as her senses expanded.

Before her sat the corrupted form of a Beacon, fell red light illuminating the room and seeping into her vision through her closed eyelids. She reached out, feeling the Beacon, letting the probes interact with her biotic field.

She focused her thoughts, with iron discipline, and then nodded. "The Beacon is ready."

The voice of Nazara thundered into her skull. "Good. The defenses of the planet are strong. I do not have time to deactivate them, and destroying them would damage the Conduit. Use the Beacon to bypass them."

She nodded to herself, not noticing a slow trickle of blood from one nostril. "Will you be in the area, or move with the geth main body?"

"The recalibration of the primary relay is complete. Once all native forces have been drawn out of position, we will perform a modified LongJump using the relay. I will need to be there to utilize the Godpower. Some of the fleet will not survive. I am leaving you a handful of small vessels here for strike support, but you will obviously not need transport off the world."

She nodded again, glancing at the features of the geth ship she was traveling in before returning to her inner focus. "I understand."

"Do not fail me as Saren did, Benezia, or I will reconsider the usefulness of the asari as I have already done with the turians."

The voice snuffed out, the black pyramid in the room ceasing to glow, and Benezia stood smoothly, the cyberware in her body a part of her now, strong and light and lithe. Turning to one of the ever-present geth, she spoke sharply. "Our ETA to Ilos?"

"Benezia-prophet. Current travel time is 54 megaseconds. Estimated landing and site localization will take 3 megaseconds. All ground support platforms are at maximum optimize-efficiency."

She didn't even deign to nod, instead leaving the room and walking down the hallway. Geth ships were not designed for organics, and this one had been hastily modified to provide life-support and other functions. The hallway ended in a pod-shaped attachment that was an addition to the ship.

Ylana, her aide, and the last of the few commandos of the Triune were there. They all looked up as she entered. "All is in readiness. Ylana, you will remain aboard this vessel. Once we have departed, it will take you to the forward base at Rithoan. All other Triune forces that have survived will be falling back to there. You will await further orders there and make contact with Okeer."

She nodded, and Benezia turned to her senior commando. "Huntress Ushan, you and the rest of the Triune will accompany me. Storming the Citadel will be ... very difficult. While the Conduit should allow the forces we've sent through the arrive rapidly, the vast bulk of them will have to immediately head to the Ward Entrances to fend off the military forces stationed there. There are over two hundred thousand soldiers on the Citadel, and we cannot expect to hold them off for very long."

Ushan nodded and Benezia continued. "Our strike force will have to take advantage of the confusion and hit three targets. First, the central defense center, located at C-SEC. That will disable the ability to close the Citadel as well as allow us to disable the station-to-space defenses of the Wards, so the fleet can land geth drop pods."

Benezia pulled up a map of the Presidium on her omnitool, the asari around her watching raptly.

"Second target is the Tower Defense Center. That's where the main defense of the Council will be. We'll be facing at least two dozen Spectres and whatever elites they have. Once we take that we can deactivate the Tower defense networks and disable the mech forces."

She highlighted the Tower itself. "We must then take the central elevator core, seal it, and proceed to the Council Chambers. Nazara will be able to link to the hardlines externally, but there are both hardware and software blocks to the segments he needs. We will have to take out the Council – the access to the computer is in their chambers – and then defend the area while I access the command plinth."

Ushan nodded. "Given our numbers... can we succeed?"

Benezia smiled coldly. "The defense fleet has more soldiers, but they will be occupied by Nazara and the geth fleet that jumps insystem. The rest of the Citadel Fleet will be pinned far away from the Citadel. The only possible defenders would be the Destiny Ascension, and a relative handful of human, elcor, and salarian ships not deployed to defense."

Benezia tapped the glowing model of the Presidium. "The Destroyers we did manage to get on-loaded will terrify their foes, and along with the geth should be able to hold off the incoming military forces long enough for the geth to land drop pods and provide backup. Once they land a force, we can seal the Citadel and prevent any further reinforcements from arriving. Assuming we get that far, victory is assured. The Reaper arrival will destroy any more resistance, and from the Citadel we can convince the Asari Republic to surrender. The rest of the galaxy will be given over to the Reapers, and we will be placed in charge of overseeing the galaxy."

Benezia stood. "Some of us will be honored to become a new god, given a body like Nazara. If you are successful, you will join that gestalt siari, Ushan."

She smiled as the huntress bowed her head. "Your will, Matriarch. Any further orders?"

Benezia's smile faded. "There is every possibility that somehow Shepard or my foolish daughter will interfere. While I am hardly afraid of them, they have proven to be ... tenacious. If you run across them..."

She paused, then closed her eyes. "Kill them."

O-OSaBC-O

Tali nervously waited as the comms room signals lanced out, before looking at the screen to see the symbol of the Quarian Admiralty pop into view. A moment later, her father appeared on screen.

"You are alright, Tali?" Her father sounded stern as usual, but Tali was cheered by the worried note in his voice. The conversation they'd had in the hospital had made her realize her father loved her more than anything in the world, and his worry about her was less a lack of faith in her and more a lack of him knowing how he would deal with her dying.

"I'm fine, father. I guess you have ... seen the news."

He nodded, hand adjusting his reik. "The entire Admiralty Board has seen it. Disgusting. As usual, the Council ignores clear danger in favor of letting someone else suffer."

Tali nodded nervously. She'd only told Shepard she needed to speak with her father, not why. "That's...why I am calling. We don't have any backup on this trip...we're flying into this blind."

Rael'Zorah gave her a firm look. "The Migrant Fleet is out of position to provide backup, unfortunately. This is the first time we've actually been fairly deep in Council Space in over fifty years, since we had to move to Noveria. Right now we're approaching Bekenstein to speak with this new human government. Any ships we sent your way would take another three days."

"Oh." Tali slumped slightly. She was worried about the Normandy's ability to survive any kind of battle, but she had hoped maybe her people could provide some sort of assistance.

Rael'Zorah was tapping something on his omnitool, and frowned. "...or not."

She looked up. "What?"

He tilted his head in a manner that let her know he was unhappy. "There's a strike patrol of the MFM in the rough region of Althana, on the fringes of the Veil. It's been conducting low-observable imaging of the geth ships moving out from the Veil. It's small, just a pair of light frigates and a scout cruiser, but there are six detachments of the MFM onboard. They could hit Gorth in four hours."

Tali pulled up a starchart on her omni – Gorth was nearly directly on their current flight path anyway. "They...could be a big help, Father."

Rael'Zorah nodded quietly. "That's all I can do, daughter. The Heavy and Scout Fleet are going to be meeting up with the human Fifth Fleet to ensure the geth coming from galactic south don't threaten Alliance Space, in return for some mining rights. The Civilian Fleet has been invited to withdraw to human space in safety, which we are accepting." He paused. "I wish I could do the same for you, I'm half tempted to order you to get on one of those MFM ships and pull out."

She looked at him a long moment, and she shook her head. "I .. I can't. I have to see this through."

The glowing eyes narrowed. "It could end in your death, daughter. That would hurt... many. Not just me. Your aunt. Your cousins. Even your human... friend."

Tali ducked her head in embarrassment, but exhaled. "I know. It .. I took your words very seriously, Father. But ... Tetrimus told me that you didn't believe in yourself when you were my age, and you had to nearly die to find your own strength." She looked up.

Rael'Zorah sighed. "What I did was ... stupid. It nearly got me killed. It nearly got ... someone I cared about very much killed. It exposed me to things I never wished to know, and in the end, the backlash contributed to the deaths of thousands of innocents. Tetrimus may be right. You may be right."

He leaned forward. "But you know better than to measure your place in this life by someone else's words. If you are going to do this, despite everything, it shouldn't be to prove yourself to me, my daughter, or to anyone else."

Tali nodded firmly. "It isn't. That bosh'tet kethai hurt my friends, and is responsible for the deaths of more than one." She closed her eyes as she thought about kindly Alenko and the jovial, funny Master Chief Cole, of the goofy jokes Charlais and the other marines, of the protectiveness of Ownby and Haskins. "She has to pay. The geth have to pay."

Her voice was firm and hard, and Rael merely sat back and nodded. "I'll ... be waiting for you, my daughter." He paused. "I am proud. Keelah se'lai."

She repeated the phrase and he disconnected, and she let herself go slack, before squaring her shoulders and leaving the comm-room. She found Shepard at the CIC command station, gazing coldly at the slowly swirling galaxy map. She twisted her hands together nervelessly before speaking.

"Commander... I need to talk to you."

Shepard's eyebrow rose upon seeing Tali but she shrugged. "Sure. What's up?"

She exhaled. "I just .. spoke with my father. He can't do much...but he's managed to redirect a small Migrant Fleet Marine force to intercept us at the system of Gorth. It's three ships and about a hundred quarian marines."

Shepard stared at Tali for a long moment before her face split into a grin. "Thank you, Tali. That's...very, very useful given that we're shot to shit and low on men." Shepard's shoulders lifted, as if she felt lighter, and Tali smiled, happy she could help.

"Joker, alter course to hit the Gorth system. We have reinforcements on the way."

"Roger, commander. Incoming message from ... ah, the Vol Directorate, ma'am."

Shepard raised both eyebrows and nodded. "Route it to the Comms room." She turned, pausing to place her hands on Tali's shoulders. "Well done, Tali. Thank you."

The tiny quarian ducked her head nervously and Shepard chuckled, before entering the comm room. She paused to gather herself before tapping the link, and the features of Marshal Vidon Marr came online. "Marshal Marr, you are well?"

The blocky form of the volus commander was the same as she remembered from their trip to the ruins of a volus merchant ship. He gave a small motion with one hand. "I am well, Commander. I am gratified to report that we found the miscreant responsible for the assault upon our ships, and that you gave deep vengeance to Saren for his actions."

He paused. "In fact, that is why I am contacting you. The volus fleet is pinned near our homeworld, tangled in battle with an entire geth strike force. The Turian Hierarchy is rushing to our assistance, but I am unsure if they will arrive in time to prevent the destruction of our fleet."

Shepard winced. The volus had just started really building their military up, and if it was destroyed they had poor defenses for their homeworld, being more interested in finance than matters military. "I'm sorry to hear that."

The volus merely gave a shift in his stance. "If we must spend such coin in dire reasons, I would prefer not to waste it. My ship, All Due Caution, is unfortunately out of position to assist the defense of our home. We were delivering information about what we found on the vile Sur'kesh-clan ship that we caught to the STG. We have ... seen the difficulties you have encountered in getting support, and I am close enough to your location that we can rendezvous with you in a few hours before you reach your goal."

Shepard could not help but grin. The VDF ship was a heavy cruiser, heavily armed with high explosive antimatter missiles and torpedoes. It would have beaten the crap out of the Normandy even if her ship was fully repaired, and she could only imagine the carnage it would inflict on geth. "As it happens, we'll be slowing down to meet up with a small patrol of the quarian Migrant Fleet to assist us, and your own help would be...very much appreciated."

Marr nodded – a somewhat silly looking gesture on a volus, but she took this guy very seriously. "Very good, Earth-clan. Have your flight officer send us your course and we will meet you at our top speed. Marr out."

Shepard chuckled fiercely as she left the comm room, walking to the cockpit. "Joker. Send your course to the VDF ship that just hailed us, and stand by to plot a high observable rendezvous. We're not in this shit alone anymore."

Joker merely nodded. "Done and done, Commander." The ship shifted its course slightly, even as Joker rotated his chair to face her. "Makes our odds a little better, at least."

She smirked, leaning her weight on one leg and crossing her arms. "You say that like you have no confidence in your own flying badassery, Flight Lieutenant."

Joker flung up his hands. "Oh, come onnn. I got this. I just ... you know.. having a bunch of crazy quarians and that really hacked off looking volus ship can't hurt."

He frowned. "But seriously...what do we do if we get there and the black ship is right there?"

Shepard shrugged. "Die, probably. Maybe dodge, maybe flee. I don't know – but I've made the best preparations I can for that eventuality too. I'm not going out without hurting something, be that on the ground or in space." She tilted her head. "Still time to bail, you know."

Joker rolled his eyes and turned back to the pilot console. "To quote the CIC... fuck that shit, Commander. Just make sure you shout your orders when we get there, because otherwise I won't be able to hear you over the sound of how awesome I am."

Shepard burst out laughing.

---

Chapter 115: Chapter 106: Ilos, Opening Sonata

---

A/N: Amazingly, thanks to all your reviews, OsaBC is now on the first page of ME stories sorted by reviews. Thank you very much for your kind support.

I'm not sure how long I'll keep this update pace. We'll have to see. There's a lot of fluff in this chapter, but there's also battle scenes – something for everyone!

I desperately require a beta reader. :D

---

The Normandy erupted out of FTL in a blaze of blue, little arcs of electricity shimmering over the hull briefly as it slowed. The Gorth system was a binary star, two half-dead main sequence red giants nearly merging into one huge star. In a few hundred thousand years, astrophysicists expected both stars to undergo a nova or supernova collapse, given their distance to each other.

The CIC was at battle alert status, lights dimmed, haptic displays glowing dully under red combat lighting. The slender shapes of a trio of quarian vessels lit up the CIC status board in glowing green. The plot coordinator spoke. "Firm contact, bearing one nine two tac six. Designated Sierra One, in ATF tracker alpha. Classification is light salarian corvette or cruiser, ma'am. Shields are down, weapons unarmed. Two smaller frigates bearing one nine nine tac fifteen, Sierra two and three."

Shepard nodded. "Any sign of the volus?"

Another sensor operator in Tac Alley spoke. "High emission blue-shift detected, bearing three zero two tac nine, commander. Mass estimate is cruiser weight. ETA roughly two hours, at current shift and speed."

Shepard nodded again. "Adams, power down the engines and send your repair teams out in EVA to look at the damage to the ship's spine. Tali, report to the CIC." She clicked off the IMC and turned to look at Pressly. "Status?"

The XO pulled out a datapad. "Preparations for self-destruct are completed, and I've checked the escape pods – all functional. Chakwas has completed her exams on everyone but you and Doctor T'Soni, and Wrex reports the armory refitting and equipment swaps are complete. The crew is .. well, as rested as we're going to get, I think, ma'am. Sensors are at 100% and Garrus is tinkering on the MAKO along with Vega and a couple of the engineers, working on makeshift armor and putting the med-systems back together."

Shepard pinched the bridge of her nose, eyes closed. "All we do now is wait up for the Marshal and get in there, I guess. Thank you, Pressly."

The XO saluted, turning away to oversee the ops techs, and as he did so the door from the lower decks slid open and Tali stepped out onto the CIC. The glowing eyes blinked at the reduced battle ready lighting and the red glowing haptics. "... I guess this is battle stations, Commander?"

Shepard smiled. "Yeah, it is. We're here, and there's a trio of quarian ships waiting for us. Figured things would go smoother if you were in the comm room with me when I made contact."

Tali only nodded, and followed Shepard into the Comms room behind the CIC, the gray covered walls muting the noise as the door shut behind them. "VI, establish open channel to the quarian cruiser."

There were several seconds of delay before the screen blanked, displaying a broad-shouldered quarian in black and blue combat armor. Tali leaned forward before Shepard could say anything. "Captain Keenah'Breizha! I thought... I thought you died on Caleston!"

The quarian captain tilted his head. "Ha. Not a chance, ma'am. I was pretty banged up, that's true, but those geth didn't finish me. I looked for you quite a while until the Alliance let me know they'd gotten you off to the Citadel, and then I reported back to your father and pretty much got my head torn off, which is why I was in the khr'tet of space when your father tasked me here." He chuckled ruefully. "It's good to see you are safe, Tali."

Shepard arched an eyebrow, and Tali spoke. "Um.. Captain Keenah'Breizha vas Rothuam, this is Commander Sara'Shepard vas Normandy, Council Spectre."

The quarian male inclined his head respectfully. "Pleasure to meet you, ma'am. I got two missile frigates and the Rothuam, she's an older model salarian corvette. I also have six sixteen-unit marine detachments, one on each frigate and four on my own ship. Admiral Rael'Zorah has detached my command to you, ma'am."

Shepard smiled. "Thank you, Captain. Your ships and troops will be of immense help, the Normandy took a beating at Virmire .. and I lost a lot of my own men. Not to mention we're still beaten up from taking down Saren."

Keenah folded his arms. "Well, given that the sick bosh'tet was aligned with geth, he deserved to die. Are we ready to move out or ... "

She shook her head. "We have one more ship incoming .. volus heavy cruiser, another captain I've worked with in the past. If possible, I'd like to do a coordinated briefing once he arrives."

The quarian captain nodded. "Sounds good. I'll go ahead and have my people un-rack their weapons and armor and get everything spun up for battle. Drop me a hail when we're ready to consult."

Shepard nodded and killed the line. "Thanks, Tali. Going into this shit alone would have been..."

The little quarian tilted her head up. "Bad?"

Shepard snorted back laughter. "Yeah, let's leave it at that."

O-OSaBC-O

Three and a half hours later, the Normandy's cargo bay doors closed as a volus shuttle landed, disgorging the figure of Marshal Vidon Marr. He was met by Pressly, who stepped out of Engineering once the bay re-pressurized. "Marshal Marr, I am Lieutenant Commander Pressly. Commander Shepard is waiting for you if you will please follow me."

The volus nodded, his armored life-suit flat black in the dim light of the cargo bay, taking the sight of Garrus and Wrex as they exited engineering. "Interesting crew." He stepped aboard the elevator, and Pressly smiled.

"It's not the usual Alliance crew roster. Is there anything I can get for you, Marshal?"

The volus examined Pressly for a moment. "No, I have .. sufficient food reserves built into my suit, and I refreshed myself before departing." The elevator hissed open , and Pressly lead Marr to the mess deck.

The tables had been pushed aside, a hastily built holo-display erected in their place. Shepard and Liara stood to one side, while Tali stood next to Captain Keenah and Jiong. Marr bowed, his squat form deforming the shape of his suit. "It is good to see you again, Commander."

Shepard smile. "You as well, sir. This is Captain Keenah of the quarian Migrant Fleet, and Tali'Zorah, who is a member of my crew. Next to her is Alfred Jiong, my ... commissar, and this is Doctor T'Soni."

Marr merely nodded. "To wit, then."

Shepard triggered the holotable. "Liara was able to rig up two of our probes to pass through the Mu Relay. The other side is clear, if a dangerous jump – lots of old starship debris from the Rachni Wars. We plotted a clear FTL lane to Ilos, that goes through a dark nebula to suppress our blue-shift."

Shepard gestured. "Right now the probes are twenty minutes out from Ilos, and we're seeing no blue-shifts into that system, so we can only assume Benezia has beaten us there. Right now the probes are looking for wake disturbances in the nebula, our rough estimate of the ships that have passed through is four cruisers and at least one heavy cruiser, with possibly ten other smaller ships – troop transports or frigates , maybe destroyers."

Shepard exhaled. "The Normandy has a stealth system, that suppresses our heat emissions. Unfortunately, it's not something we could just gen up and install on your ships even if that wasn't blatantly illegal, as the entire ship has to be built around the concept. A stealth entry is out, but given that the geth have seen us pull our stealth entry several times, it isn't much to worry about. Our armaments are depleted, but we still have a pair of cannons – destroyer class, basically. Our ship is also very nimble and has advanced ECM. We can probably handle at least one or two destroyers if we're lucky and careful , but we've taken some damage and we're low on missiles."

Marr snorted. "Commander, the Alliance uses Spearfish missile systems, correct?"

She nodded, and the volus spread his hands. "We have enough missiles to completely refill your battery, and then some."

Shepard grinned. "Excellent. With a full battery of missiles and the skills of my pilot, we're a lot more dangerous."

Marr nodded. "The All Due Caution is a heavy cruiser. We have two 20 mm twin cannon turrets, a 25mm main gun, six rotary rapid fire missile pods, four center-line torpedo launchers, two aft rapid firing missile launchers, and a fifteen-shot rapid reload suppressive rocket array on each wing. Our shields are slightly stronger than cruiser spec , but our engines are .. somewhat slow."

The quarian captain rubbed the back of his helmet. "Well, I feel outclassed. My ship is an old salarian corvette – we don't have the Silaris armor the modern ones do, but we do have the floating omni-hull and double fitted shields. The ECM system was removed but we have a standard package, three heavy accelerator cannons, and a pair of torpedo tubes with flash-pak area detonation devices. My frigates are older Mrunmu missile carriers from your own government, Marshal. Each one is packing five rapid fire rotary missile launchers and not much else, but they can definitely saturate a battlefield."

Shepard nodded, and touched the holoscreen controls. "Assuming Liara's probes are accurate – and I trust her estimates – the biggest threats will be the cruisers and the heavy cruiser. Captain Keenah, your corvette can probably handle one, possibly two of the cruisers, and the Normandy will take on the other two. Your frigates will have to stand off the smaller ships with missile fire until we can drop those cruisers." She glanced at Marr. "Your ship is the only one capable of going toe to toe with a geth heavy. With any luck, you can drop it and help us finish the cruisers."

She tapped the planet in the display. "Once we suppress any ships Benezia has, we still have to get down to the planet, and our information about it is basically nil. Liara?"

The asari glanced down at the floor before speaking. "Most information on Ilos is sadly fragmentary – for centuries it was held as nothing but a myth. We have information that Ilos was an Inusannon world, the race that vanished before the Protheans did. Ilos, in stories, was a dark jungle planet covered in world-spanning ruins, much like Feros. The ... rachni were active in this area, but according to the queen we faced on Noveria, the rachni did not like Ilos, and indicated it was ... full of dead."

Captain Keenah tilted his head. "That sounds just lovely."

Shepard gave a small smile. "Given Benezia's level of crazy, whatever is down there is probably important and dangerous. I have a way to launch my marines from the Normandy, but getting your people down there will be dicey, Captain."

The quarian shrugged. "The cruiser is fitted with old STG drop-pods, Commander. It would be a rough ride down, but one we can handle. And the frigates can land and disgorge their troops."

Marr made a sound. "I am afraid I don't have any infantry forces on my ship, but I do have a small number of drones rated for atmosphere that can provide air support once you're on the ground."

Shepard nodded. "I think that's about all we can do, then. We have no evidence that the black ship of Saren's is anywhere near Ilos...but worst case scenario, if it is, the Normandy will jettison her crew in escape pods and I will ram the ship into that monster, detonating our Tantalus core. The core of our ship is huge, nearly as big as a dreadnaught, and along with what torpedoes we have on board should at least blind and cripple the thing long enough for you to pick up my people and withdraw."

Marr nodded slowly. "...very well. Let us pray to Plenix the monster is not there."

Keenah also nodded. "Commander...do we have any idea what the hell Benezia plans to do or find on Ilos?"

Shepard shook her head. "I have ... information that says there may be some kind of super-weapon on the planet, but I don't have anything firm. We never got a chance to interrogate Saren and we didn't find any information in their bases about what their ultimate goals are. The Commissars captured a few asari on Noveria, but they're all crazy as shit, talking about the Ascension or whatever. All we know for certain is they're looking for something named the Conduit."

Marr gave a troubled cough. "A conduit implies a method of conveying ... something .. from one place to another. A form of travel?"

Liara glanced around. "A conduit can also transmit ... information. It may be a method of contacting the Reapers, in which case she must be stopped at all costs."

Captain Keenah looked around, then gave a weak laugh. "A human Spectre, with a handful of quarians and volus, off to fight a crazed asari and save the entire galaxy. And I thought the Blasto movies were farfetched."

Marr made a calm sound. "Perhaps. I, for one, am glad of the chance to prove the worth of the volus to the galactic community."

Keenah nodded. "No matter what, Commander, we're with you. I'll head back and prep for jump."

Shepard pushed away from the holo-console and nodded. "We'll see you on the other side, then."

O-OSaBC-O

The next four hours passed in slow, nerve wracking fashion. Passing through the Mu Relay dropped them in a grisly graveyard of ship hulks, shattered and tumbling for all eternity. Ancient asari and turian ships were blasted apart, along with elongated organic hulls that could only be rachni ships.

Liara stared out the windows of Shepard's cabin, into the endless dark of space. The nebula they'd entered muted the stars beyond, turning them into dim smeary pin-pricks of blues and whites, and the illumination of the FTL transit cast the gasses of the nebula into eerie, almost threatening shapes, barely visible.

Shepard lay on the bed, her thoughts troubled, and Liara smiled and turned from the window to sit next to her, reaching for her hand. "You are upset."

Shepard's gaze matched hers, staring for a long moment. "I ... I realized I've never been really scared before, Liara. It's funny in a way." She pulled the asari towards her, wrapping her own muscular arms around her, as if trying to hang on. Her voice was muffled against Liara's shoulder, the warmth of her body comforting. "All those years fighting against everything thrown at me... I had zero fear. Even on Torfan, I was more enraged and upset and broken than anything else, but not scared."

Shepard bit her lip, a pulse of barely controlled fright lancing across their link. "Now? I'm going into this blind, with no way of knowing what to expect. If I fuck it up... it may end up costing me everything I have. It may end up getting literally everyone killed!"

Liara turned in Shepard's embrace, until they were face to face. She couldn't help her racing heart every time she beheld her lover, but the emotions bouncing back and forth between them had to be let out. "Sara...you are scared of losing me? Of dying?"

She nodded. "For the first time in my life ... I have something to fucking look forward to. Not endless battles ending in getting my soldiers killed and then at the end of it a bullet in the head or a worn out existence on some penal colony. Not a day by day struggle just to ... find a reason to keep going. I have you. I have ... people I care about. I have people who believe in me."

Shepard closed her eyes. "The Butcher was fearless because she was weak."

Liara frowned, not understanding. "Weak?"

Shepard's lips quirked. "Yeah. Weak, whiny. I see it now, as I didn't then. I had... I didn't know HOW to get past what had been done to me, so I guess I used it as an excuse not to. I hid from both what I was and where I needed to be as a person. Easier to kill and not question. Easier to suffer and not demand answers. Easier to give in and follow than take a damned stand. I let them use me. I let them hang that goddamned Star of Terra around my neck. I let them let me off the hook."

She touched her forehead to Liara's. "For all my bullshit about hating criminals, I let my anger get me to a place where I shot an innocent kid simply because her mother was an evil piece of shit. That's not fucking strength, Liara. It's weakness."

She gave a tired laugh, snuggling against the asari. "And now, at the end, I see how goddamned stupid I've been. I'm terrified because you could die in a few hours. We could die. I'm scared Garrus or Telanya will buy it and I'll have to watch the other just give out. I'm scared my ship and my people are going to be blown out of the sky because we aren't goddamned ready. I'm scared ... that I'm not good enough to stop Benezia."

Liara ran a hand against Shepard's cheek. "And you worry this fear will paralyze you?" She smiled. "Before...my mother went down this dark river she is on, she was very wise. One of her most repeated sayings to others was that one has to find a reason worth dying for before you can truly live."

Liara's soft voice soothed Shepard's jangling nerves as she continued. "We cannot know what the tide will bring, love. I fear I am not strong enough to oppose my mother, yet there is no one else to stand in her path. When it happens... all I can do is remember I am fighting for you, for us, for whatever it is we will have together. That .. is the strength I have."

Shepard gave a little nod. "It's just ... not something I ever felt before, marazul. I'm not .. scared of death. And at the same time...it's just unfair that it's racing at me just when I finally get a chance to be alive."

She grunted. "But I guess you're right. I'll just have to fight all the harder for that. For you." She glanced at the chrono on the wall, then pulled the asari atop her. "I need to forget everything."

Liara smiled, and bent to kiss her lips. "Then we shall."

O-OSaBC-O

In the dimness of the cargo bay, Wrex finished the final adjustments and repairs to his armor. With a grunt, he set it aside, pulling out his shotgun, checking the fit of the parts.

Shepard came through the opening elevator doors, reeking of the asari and looking a little dazed. Wrex snorted back amusement as he watched her talk briefly to Garrus, going over the MAKO.

The idea that Shepard would end up with the tiny asari girl rather than some equally blood-drenched warrior was still a shock to Wrex, but he didn't really understand the squishy humans anyway. And with the exception of Aleena, who was as dangerous as she was exciting, asari never really turned him on anyway.

Wrex looked up as Shepard approached, her usual panther like stride not as smooth due to a slight limp. "Shepard."

She stopped, then sat down on a crate next to him. "Wrex." The two were silent for several minutes, before she finally spoke. "You scared?"

Wrex guffawed, then paused, tasting the air. "...no. But you are. Only the second time I tasted fear off you."

She nodded, letting her hair, still damp from a shower, hang down, occluding her features. The faint scent of fresh blood wafted from her, and Wrex suddenly wondered just how timid the little asari was.

He thought for a long moment, then set down his shotgun. "I never told you about Urv."

She nodded. "I knew something had happened. Figured if I saw you, that little guy wouldn't be far behind." She looked up. "What happened?"

He grunted. "Clan Ganar. Ambush on a site we were guarding. He never had a chance, Skal killed him and two more of of my war-brothers. It was the last time I worked freelance. I joined the Broker to get information on Okeer and the Clan, and I killed thirty of the ukra'ges over the years." He hung his head. "I know what it's like, Shepard, to wake up one morning and realize you have a lot to lose."

His eyes unwillingly closed. He would not cry. "I remember holding him in my hands, feeling so blessed by the gods that they would grant me a child. I remember wanting to change the universe for him, Shepard. I wanted to bring the clans together. I wanted to give him a place to stand besides shattered ruins and dust."

He clenched his meaty fist. "And it was taken from me. Not in a way that meant anything. Not for any purpose. Not for honor, or even survival. For sheer, bloody evil. I gave up on living, when he fell and his eyes closed. I didn't even get to hold him...to bury him. They took his body, and we weren't able to stop them."

Shepard didn't know what to say, and decided instead to merely hold her tongue. A long minute passed before Wrex spoke again. "I've followed you because I owe you. You saved his life, and gave me a few more years of being alive myself, Shepard."

He placed his heavy hand on her shoulder. "You never got that much. So don't worry. If they kill Liara, it will be only after I am dead. I promise you that."

She gave a wan smile. "Thanks, big guy." She blinked back tears, not knowing how to handle the rush of emotions she felt. Urv had been a delightful krogan boy, polite and curious, yet fierce in battle. The knowledge that he had died a meaningless death infuriated her. "If...if we survive this..."

She paused. She knew there would be a huge ruckus after this was over, assuming they won, which was almost arrogant. She shook her head. "When we get through this, Wrex. We're going to find Shields and Dunn, and go pick up Jackson, and then we're going to find that fucker Okeer and turn his goddamned organs into paste."

Wrex looked at her, hard, searching. She met his gaze unflinchingly, and after a long moment he nodded.

He pulled a heavy, pitted blade from his calf armor, laying it across his broad knee. "I haven't gone back to Tuchanka. Haven't gone back to Yranda, to tell her that her child is dead. Haven't gone back to my clan. I've been seeking death, Shepard, same as you." He held the knife out, the still sharp edge gleaming in the dim light.

"I'm tired and old, and I've given up on anything but drowning my sorrows in ryncol and swearing bloody revenge on that monster Okeer. If you bring him to me, and we end him, then I will call you blood-sister." He made a single, shallow cut on his broad palm, and reversed the ugly old knife.

Shepard didn't hesitate, gashing her own hand open, suppressing a wince at the pain, and hand-clasping with Wrex. Orange and red mingled, dripping down one slender wrist and one broad one, before falling the floor like heavy teardrops. "You have my word, turtle."

Wrex squeezed her hand, then let it fall, his own wound slowly beginning to close. "You had better let your doc look at that, Shepard. Your tiny little bodies are so weak, and dying from the blood clasp is not a good idea."

She snorted, pulling a med-gel patch out and slapping it across the cut. "Shit. You wish. Liara hurts me worse than that." The words slipped out, and then she winced and glanced around, but no one was nearby, Garrus and one of the engineers engrossed in arguing about the MAKO.

Wrex burst into laughter. Maybe asari were more interesting in the mating couch than he thought.

O-OSaBC-O

As the Normandy hurtled towards the Ilos system, Joker's mind wandered. The course was locked, there was no real skill needed to keep the ship in a straight line, and yet battle stations meant the cockpit had to be manned.

At least the gunnery section and forward sensor tech weren't up here yet. He enjoyed the solitude of the pilot's seat, the ability to gaze out at the endless night of space. So when he heard footsteps behind him he sighed, knowing solitude was over.

Tali's accented voice broke his chain of thought. "Jeff?"

He smiled, turning to see her come in almost hesitantly, glancing around. "Sup, Tali?"

She gave a shrug, gingerly sitting in the gunnery seat across from him, careful not to touch any control panels. "Bored, I suppose. Adams has most of the engineering team finishing the repairs I started, and there's nothing left to do except sleep for an hour or two. I can't get my eyes closed. Everyone is on edge."

Joker smirked. Or working it off. He'd heard sounds from both the direction of Shepard's cabin and the forward battery, and figured he knew what that meant. But he veered away from that line of thinking, as it wasn't really ... possible.

Seeing Tali – the real Tali, no mask – in the hospital had been a little shocking. She was blindingly pretty, and the alien shape of her features just made it more difficult to forget. Assuming they got through this mess, he'd have to do some very careful thinking.

She looked up. "You're not usually quiet, you know." She dipped her head slightly. "Is something wrong?"

He shook his own head, pulling his cap down a bit. "No. I just ... guess it's all kind of coming down to the wire. Wondering what is going to happen...how it will play out."

Tali nodded firmly, her voice wistful. "I suppose if we win, things will return to normal." She sounded sad about that, and he knew why.

He made a minute adjustment to the course of the Normandy, and then looked at her, directly. "I have a ... funny question. How long does your Pilgrimage last for?"

Tali shrugged. "Usually until the quarian feels he or she has obtained something of enough value to return to the Migrant Fleet. Some return when they manage to obtain a ship, others with credits, work contracts for the Fleet, technical data...a Pilgrimage could last four or five years."

He nodded. "And have you found what you'll take back yet?"

Tali shook her head. "I already gave up Troyce's ship, and went through a lot of my credits. Neither would have served in any case...for an Admiral's daughter, my Gift must be something ... impressive. Not just cash or a ship." She sounded a bit defeated. "And knowing my father, he won't truly be satisfied that whatever I obtain was worth risking my life for."

Joker nodded. "Is there any limit on what you can bring back?"

She gave him an odd tilt of the head. "What do you mean?"

The pilot was silent for a long minute before speaking. "I don't know. I ... I'm kind of stuck. I know that in a few more months I'll be up for promotion. That means I move from piloting to being stuck as the lead navigator and coordinator. If I'm lucky, they'll stick me on a carrier as a GPI, if I'm unlucky I get shoved back to Arcturus to train snot nosed brats. I won't be able to fly the Normandy much longer, in any case."

She folded her arms. "That's...stupid. You're the best pilot the ship could have, why take that away from you?"

Joker laughed, rubbing his beard. "That's just it, though. It's the way the SA operates. I'm already getting static from Alliance Medical – they feel given my 'medical condition' I need to spend at least two to four years ashore for my own 'safety.' The years of busting my butt to prove I'm the best, and it still means just about nothing."

Tali closed her eyes, wishing things could be different. Joker instead spoke up. "So ... I was thinking if you could hang around a few more months after this mess is over, we could work together to find you something awesome to take back home. It would give me something to do besides sit dirtside and cry myself to sleep."

She smiled. What she wanted to do was take him back as her Gift, but she doubted he would agree.

Despite his complaints, he was loyal to his people, as she was to hers, and no matter what might come between them emotionally, she didn't think he was going to go off and live on an alien ship for the rest of his life for a girlfriend he couldn't even touch. She swallowed, forcing her voice to cheer, and nodded. "I can probably do that. I-I mean, if you really wanted to..."

Joker gave her a smile. "I guess that's my other, real problem." He gestured to his legs. "You .. saved me from being trapped in the hell I was in, Tali. I don't know if anyone can understand what it's like, being locked away from just being able to move without pain, without suffering. I'm sure something like what you made has already been created, but it was nothing I could get a hold of."

He pulled his hat down further. "And you did that for me. I won't...can't forget that. I don't know how things will work out. But I'm going to work them out. One way or the other."

Tali bit her lip behind her facemask. "...it's...not i-possible. I-I mean...u-us." He looked up, and she somehow managed to stammer through the sentence. "O-on Caleston...the Alliance officer who he-helped me get offworld ... lived with a quarian. They had a clean room and .. were bonded."

Joker's gaze didn't leave hers for long, silent seconds. Then he gave a single, determined nod and sat back in his chair, exhaling. "You .. seem pretty sure that is what you want. Not that I don't ... but you are kinda turning your back on finding a boyfriend among other quarians." He rubbed the back of his neck.

She shook her own head. "Every quarian sees me only as the Admiral's daughter, Jeff. They're terrified of him."

Joker gave a weak laugh. "I can see why, I thought he was gonna kill me in that clinic when I kept mouthing off to him ... about how he was acting." He started a little when she reached out and laid her hand on his shoulder.

"That's why... Jeff, no one else has ever had the .. guts, to do that. He admires you, I think. When we talked...he'd never had anyone get up in his face like that. When I told him you were... about your condition... he was ashamed he had struck you." She exhaled, feeling her breath curl in her mask. "But I could say the same about you, about giving up on human women..."

Joker shrugged. "Like I said, they see me as some kind of ... pity project. I can't stand that. And Tali...you're more beautiful than any of them, anyway."

The quarian felt her skin burning in embarrassment and lightheaded in pleasure, but managed not to curl up into a ball. The voice he used when he said that had no uncertainty in it.

She was about to say more when the computer pinged and data began scrolling into Joker's view. He cursed and slapped a control panel. "Commander...coming up on the solar wake of Ilos. We've got problems."

Shepard's voice rang over the comm system. "What kind?"

Joker grimaced, pulling up a digitized scan image with rapid hand motions, flinging pilot data windows out of the way faster than Tali could follow. "Doctor T's estimates were off, Commander. I have hard data from the sensors coming in now. Two heavy cruisers, five cruisers, three destroyers, nine frigates, and about fifteen geth transport ships. The transports are big but lightly armed. They're in orbit already."

Shepard cursed. "Alright, Joker, bring us in above the elliptic, solar bearing ... zero four zero, tac sixty."

A moment later, Shepard's voice rang out over the main comm system, along with the battle stations alarm. "All hands, man battle stations. Prepare for high speed combat maneuvers. Spin up all missiles and engage full power on the Core. Marines, prepare for hot combat drop."

Tali reached out to touch Joker's arm. "Be safe...please."

He snorted. "You're the one who needs to be safe. We'll... talk later. Promise."

She nodded, turning to go, even as techs rushed forward down Tac Alley to begin manning their stations.

Joker exhaled, a thin smile on his features, then cleared his head and pulled down his battle overlays. "Let's get to rock and rolling."

O-OSaBC-O

The Normandy screamed out of FTL, followed by the All Due Caution and the quarian trio, and immediately engaged ECM and defenses. Less than thirty seconds later, the geth began to react, breaking orbit and slowly spreading into a long combat line, the ends anchored by the two heavy cruisers, the cruisers in the middle, forming a shallow bowl, the destroyers and frigates rushing forward.

Marshal Marr smiled to himself aboard his bridge. "It is time to see how well we have spent our funds on this vessel, my brothers and sisters. Load the Vuna long range interceptors."

The volus ship's missile bay doors retracted, revealing two long rows of gaudy purple tinted missiles, neatly arranged in cross shaped patterns. With a shudder the weapons launched, flashing out with streaks of ECM.

Shepard's voice flanged across the comm. "Marshal, we're still out of missile range..."

The volus only grinned. "Not at all, Commander, observe."

The missiles sped up, then each one flickered, engaging micro-sized FTL drives, slashing across the distance in a split second. Badly out of control, they erupted from FTL and detonated immediately, showering the array with hard rads, radioactive chaff, and burst of x-rays that wreaked havoc on the geth ships. One missile detonated right next to a frigate, snapping it in half with the blue-shift backlash as the missile emerged.

On the Normandy, Pressly's eyes bugged out. "Hyperluminal missiles? Those must cost a million credits a piece!"

Shepard gave a nasty chuckle, smirking. "Effective, though. Volus really don't like to fight fair, and I gotta admit, that's a smart damned idea. Garrus, time to range?"

The turian's voice was tight with excitement. "Six minutes, assuming the spirits-be-damned VI isn't locking up the range-finger again."

She tapped the comm. "Your people built it, along with the coffee maker and the elevator. Just make sure we're ready, I want two full spreads, and since I don't see that fucking Reaper, recode one of the torps for close approach burst fire."

"Will do, Commander."

The quarian ships raced ahead, followed by the Normandy, as the four cruisers floundered helplessly, still blind. Without support, the heavy cruisers would be outmaneuvered and shot to pieces, so the frigates and destroyers of the geth had to attempt to tie up the incoming ships.

That plan failed when the volus cruiser vomited over two hundred missiles in a single split volley, along with fifteen torpedoes.

Curses rang in the CIC, as even Shepard's jaw dropped. "Jesus Christ, that's a bigger throw than a fucking Everest-class dreadnaught!"

The geth line opened up with full anti missile defenses, including UV lasers, chaff, and precision fire, but it was hopeless. Even as they blasted dozens and dozens of missiles out of the sky, more kept coming in. Blasts rang out against the smaller geth ships. The quarian frigates and the Normandy's own missiles only augmented the wave of fire, and two minutes later seven frigates and all three destroyers were burning or tumbling wreckage.

The heavy cruisers advanced, firing repeatedly with their main guns, even as the geth cruisers finally cleared their sensors. Rounds came in, slamming into the shields of Shepard's task force. One shell blew straight through the narrow quarian hull of the left frigate, shearing off an engine and sending a handful of helplessly struggling figures into the void. Two more blazing shots impacted the volus ship, a third slamming past them to strike a missile pod, which went up in a large blast that shook the vessel. Sparks rained down as power conduits blew and lighting failed.

Marr wiped blood from his fringelips and roared. "Fire! Full ripple pattern. Disengage the safeties and fire!"

The front of the All Due Caution seemed to explode, and every single missile and torpedo tube launched...and kept launching. Over three hundred and fifty missiles disgorged from the ship before it stopped, and the cruisers and heavy cruisers opened fire in all directions. Storms of flak and endless sprays of UV lasers danced through the void, missiles detonating or being sent off to spiral out of control, but more and more bulled through the defense. One huge volley ended up blasting the center of the first geth heavy with enough impact to blow a twenty-meter wide hole completely through the ship, a roaring ball of fire erupting from the far side.

The Normandy swiveled past the first cruiser, guns banging away and tearing through that ship's forward areas, even as return fire rounds hammered the hull. Screams rang out as a 12mm shell rammed through the mess decks to slam upwards, shattering an ECM station and blowing the operator into sprays of red paste. The atmosphere shrieked through the hole left by the blast, even as two more techs flung a bucket of omnigel into the crack, the substance hardening almost instantly.

Shepard wiped blood from her console, cursing. "Pressly! Report!"

The XO knelt next to another station, pulling the operator out of the seat to slump on the floor, a fragment of decking having bisected his chest. "Yes ma'am. ... shields are down. Kinetic barrier generator is overloaded. We just took nine slugs in the belly. Two injuries in engineering...Adams is hurt, but alive. Power down to 64%. Engine two malfunctioning, losing hydraulic pressure starboard side. Fires in engineering and the cargo bay, damage control responding."

The ops tech next to him shifted something on the monitor. "One of the geth heavies is ... fuck, just gone, Commander. The other...trading fire with the quarian corvette. Volus cruiser is attempting to come around, just blew the shit out of another geth cruiser. One more cruiser damaged, make that dead in the water...one out of control, core is down. One quarian frigate dead in the water. Other is leaking atmosphere."

Shepard gritted her teeth. "Joker, two seven zero tac five! Garrus, pop that torp at that geth heavy!"

The Normandy, trailing smoke from two engines and debris from several blackened holes in her lower hull, gamely swung around, even as the geth heavy hammered the Rothuam and splinters of white fire burst through her port side.

The All Due Caution, badly wounded by the detonation of her missiles, limped ahead, firing it's main guns, at the same time that the Normandy's torpedo arced out. Explosions hammered the geth ship, the silvery hull blackening and the kinetic barriers flaring in wild sprays of blue and violet, before the torpedo detonated, a blast of white that clipped the front of the quarian frigate in the violence.

Joker cursed. "Sensors down in the backwash, Commander! Going evasive."

The next thirty seconds were sheer terror – blind, unsure if the geth were lining up a shot to finish them off – until the tired voice of Captain Keenah sounded. "Rothuam to Normandy. All hostiles .. suppressed. Status."

Shepard coughed, frowning as sullen spurts of smoke befouled the air on the CIC. "Acknowledged, Rothuam. Sensors...show a clear board. All geth are down. We've got a few dead, and some systems and power damage. Two hull breaches and my chief engineer is injured. We still have main propulsion, and weapons are online, but our kinetic barriers are down."

The quarian's image, flickering with static but visible, erupted into the CIC display. "I've lost weapons power, and my damned medbay just got taken out. We have some backup areas – salarians are paranoid about getting hurt – but I'm down to forty percent life support capacity. I'll have to drop troops soonest."

The deep tones of Marshal Marr sounded. "Engines are ... damaged. The starboard wing was destroyed, and I'm down to less than fifty missiles. It took far, far too many to overwhelm the geth antimissile defenses. I have over forty casualties, but shields are coming back up and I have full weapons power."

Shepard nodded. "Joker, status on those transports!"

Joker's voice sounded tired. "Not moving, commander...actually, they're... powered down. No core signatures or electrical discharge emissions. Kind of a sloppy orbit too, not intersecting but hardly efficient. I think they're empty."

Shepard nodded. "We're shot to shit, but we can make it. We'll rendezvous in orbit and drop as soon as possible. We'll get our engineering people to assist you as we can. Pressly, drop a beacon at this position so we have clear scans of the system terminator."

Shepard clicked off, exhaling. They were past the geth defending ships...now all that remained was getting boots on the ground.

How hard could that be?

---

Chapter 116: Chapter 107 : Ilos, Vigil

---

A/N: I would like to thank Progman, neersighted and nogoodnms for their assistance with beta editing this pathetic nightmare. I do plan to go over the previous few chapters I've rushed out and touch up the glaring issues there.

Folks, it's about to come to a close. Canon has already been shot in the head, and now I am going to defile it's corpse and make a mobile out of it. Some of the most infuriating and stupid plot holes and WTF moments happened in the end of ME1, and there is nothing more satisfying than rectifying them.

I have attempted to temper my criticism of the writers so far – they did create a magnificent world – but the ending simply felt cheap. Saren died like a whore, the fight on Ilos was mostly BORING, and Saren had a bare handful of geth with him that we saw and we massacred most of them, but they still took over the Citadel. I'm expected to believe NO ONE stopped him? Where were the Spectres? Where were I dunno, ANYONE? How did the Council get off...ugh. I'll stop there.

---

The atmosphere of Ilos was, for lack of a better word, terrifying.

Even in the vanguard of more than ten thousand geth war platforms, Destroyers, and countless armatures, bolstered by the various Triune she could scrape together in the fallout of the assault on Virmire, she could feel the tension and dread. Even with her body augmented by Nazara's might, and her biotics ready for danger, Benezia felt it.

The ancient statues of the Inusannon stared down at them, basalt guardians eroded by eons of weather, rain, and neglect, still showing their bowed, sinister heads, and malignant facial tentacles. A single, black metaled road ran from the landing site to the facility she was headed to, and rank upon rank of the silent guardians lined the road. The deep sunken eyes seemed to follow her movements, and it didn't help when one gave a shudder and crashed down top a group of geth, smashing them with no warning.

The asari around her muttered, clutching weapons and readying their biotics. Benezia's hand clenched tighter around her warp sword, still in it's scabbard but ready to draw. Her eyes flicked back and forth, seeking an unseen but clearly felt threat.

Icy black rain fell out of the dark, cloud choked sky in torrential sheets, illuminated ever so often by titanic bolts of blazing green and white lighting. Ancient ruins sat on the edges of the horizon like the blackened stumps of broken teeth, occasionally emitting shafts of strange gray and green light. The cutback edges of the jungle rustled menacingly in the high winds, disturbing shapes flickering in and out of visibility at the edges of her vision. The metal road they marched down was an unearthly pitch black, rain sizzling as it struck it, seemingly brand new even with the ruination all around them.

She'd already lost over a hundred geth since landing, even with the altered Beacon sending out waves of pacification, spoofing the defense systems into thinking there were no indoctrinated here. Horrible mechanical things, constructed of shards of black metal and sinews of some nano-organic paste erupted from the trees, flinging bolts of anti-plasma and other exotic energies. Once, the very road her host marched down vomited forth blazing hot flames, melting a group of geth scouts where they stood.

Trying to land directly in the Inusannon city was utter suicide – six collimated anti-proton beams had lanced out when she sent in a scout ship, enough raw firepower to smash even Nazara right out of the sky. The sight of such bared might was a sharp reminder in Benezia's mind that this was her last, greatest trial.

No Reaper had ever beheld Ilos, either during the days of the Inusannon or the Protheans. From what knowledge Nazara had shared with her and Saren, the Reapers had searched for many centuries, but had never been able to find the world. Unlike almost all other races, the Inusannon had not inhabited the Citadel, nor did their technology draw upon or even use the Mass Relays. Indeed, some of the discoveries Saren had found in his own search for answers hinted at the possibility that the Inusannon were capable of a few of the strange powers the Reapers themselves had.

Shuddering at the memory of the scout ship being blasted from the sky, Benezia was cautious and ready for anything. The technology of the Inusannon was terrifyingly advanced, and she had reacted by sending out bands of geth to scout both the road and the disturbing countryside.

The Prime unit stomping next to her slowed, pausing to receive an update from one such band. "Lead scout/recon units have encountered an additional anomaly/nocarrier distortion. Eleven platforms destroyed. The gates are in extreme visual sensor range."

She nodded. "Finally. Have the first group move forward, along with the Beacon. Keep as much of the main body as close around it as possible, these...events seem to strike whenever we move too far away."

The Prime nodded, then looked upwards. "Warning. Patrol/security escorts left in orbit report violation of solar boundary."

Benezia's eyes narrowed. "They didn't detect the blue-shift?"

The Prime unit spoke calmly. "FTL blue-shift muted by nebula M-X03, designated dark gaseous nebula. It occluded their primary approach."

Benezia scowled. "And the intruders?"

"One volus missile platform, cruiser strength. One salarian combat corvette. Two volus missile frigates. Both transmitting Creator control signals and emissions. One human frigate. Tentative scans indicate it is Shepard-Predator's vessel."

"Shepard." She hissed the name, a flicker of biotic energy erupting over her. "Move your units faster, Prime. Have the gunships lift off and section off a handful of defenders to act as rear-guard."

She was far too close to her goal to give up now. The Inusannon were, after all, quite dead, and Shepard would join them soon enough.

O-OSaBC-O

Although it was clear that time was of the essence, the hammering the small task force had just undergone wasn't something they could just shrug off. None of the ships was ready for landing – in fact, the two quarian frigates were so banged up they couldn't land at all, and they had lost half their marines to the battle.

Shepard wanted to get the Normandy moving, but instead was forced to wait for Chakwas to stabilize Adams, who had taken shrapnel to the chest and face, and for Tali to organize repair teams. In the interim, Liara was in the science lab, working on some kind of scout probe to send down to the surface while they patched their ships up.

Shepard turned to see Tali enter the CIC, wiping hydraulic oil off her suit with a rag. "Got an update for me, Acting Chief Engineer?" Tali ducked her head, then sighed.

Her report wasn't encouraging. "The repairs we made to the number two engine failed, and right now it is only operating at ten percent. The replacement engine, number three, is still out of calibration, and we're getting some sluggish manipulation from the loss of hydraulics. That last set of impacts shattered at least one of the ship's water reserve tanks, and...well, the bottom armor is just gone. There's no way to even patch it, we can't take any more shots."

Shepard nodded. "Anything else?"

Tali frowned behind her mask, pulling up a display of the Normandy ship-systems on the CIC display, which had developed a flicker after the fight. "Starboard hydraulics are only responding at fifty percent. The anterior heat radiation vanes were blown off in the fight, and the fuel lines to the starboard engines are leaking. We have people trying to patch damage with omni-gel, but we're about out of that, Commander."

Shepard exhaled. "In other words, she needs to be hauled into dry-dock. Dammit. Any chance you can at least throw together some kind of jury rig for the engines?"

Tali wrung her hands together. "I-I don't know enough about these systems to feel confident in attempting a jury-rig, Commander. And Adams..."

Shepard nodded tiredly, watching as a pair of marines hauled the dead out of the CIC and two more wiped down the blood, even while Pressly and Friggs attempted to repair a shattered console. "It's okay, Tali, I'm sure you did your best. Make sure we can at least limp into orbit, then get ready to drop."

The little quarian nodded and dashed off, and Shepard sighed, turning to Jiong. "Anything else?"

The commissar shrugged, fiddling with his newly replaced neural mace, a replacement for the one lost on Virmire. "No, ma'am. Crew's tense but ready, although those were the first casualties in the actual naval crew to date. I've dispatched a probe with records of what we've found so far, it will hit superluminal in an hour and arrive in Council space in about seventeen hours."

She nodded. "Jiong, Senior Chief Vega's never had BDO or command training. Can I depend on you to head up the marine contingent?"

He nodded, albeit slowly. "Of course, Commander. Do we have a landing plan yet?"

Shepard shook her head. "No, I'm waiting for Liara's probes to give us feedback. I want to get down there and stop that bitch as soon as possible... but we're flying blind here, and it's not like the bitch can get away."

She made a frustrated motion. "The sensors aren't telling us dick, the atmosphere is ionized to shit and, well ... there's debris in orbit near those geth transports. Initial scans look like one or two of them were destroyed, so we want to check for any kind of GTS defenses. No point in rushing if it's going to end up with us shot out of the sky."

Jiong arched an eyebrow. "This site is at least, what, fifty thousand years old? What could possibly be functional after that span of time?"

Shepard smirked. "You forget about the Beacons? The Protheans obviously dumped all their eggs in this basket, so I can't take the chance of being surprised. Plan is for Liara to launch probes and once that's clear, to land. We'll be using the quarian corvette for that, the Normandy is ... a bit too shot up for me to risk. We'll load our forces into the MAKO and use the mass core to lob it into the corvette's landing bay, and hitch a ride down."

Jiong gave a careful nod. "Understood. I will endeavor to prepare the ground team for whatever we will encounter. I would suggest a heavy assault focus to our landing load-outs. If Benezia is able to find a fortified location, neutralizing her will be ... problematic."

Shepard nodded, turning to leave the CIC. "Get it done, Commissar. Pressly! I'm headed to the science lab, you have the conn." She waited until the broad-shouldered XO acknowledged her with a nod, before heading down the stairs to see what Liara had accomplished.

Traversing the stairs, she found the mess decks filled with marines, doing final checks on their gear. Vega made an apologetic face as she entered. "Sorry, ma'am. Fire in the cargo bay... Tali had us all clear out so they could fix the damage and work on the MAKO."

She waved her hand dismissively. "Not a problem, Senior Chief. For the drop evolution, Commissar Jiong will be acting BDO, you will be lead NCO. Any problems?"

He shook his head, dark Hispanic features tight with concern. "No, ma'am. Just hoping this shit goes better than the last drop."

She nodded, and then turned, entering the med bay. Adams was asleep on the starboard med couch, covered in machinery, and the rest of the bay was empty of wounded or Chakwas. Not wanting to disturb him, she quietly walked through the medical bay to the science lab, finding the door propped open by a crate of omnigel packets, and stepped inside.

Liara was in the far corner, one of Shepard's cigarettes dangling from her lips, her ship-suit undone a bit due to the room's poor ventilation. Bits of a drone and the hulking form of the battered JOTUN mech that once had belonged to Admiral Kahoku took up most of the space in the room, arcane diagrams of sensor setups splashed across the screens of the research terminals.

Liara glanced up as Shepard entered, and taking a puff of the cigarette, handed it to her. "You look tired, Sara."

She snorted and took the cigarette, taking a long drag from it, closing her eyes and leaning against the wall. "That fight was a bit nerve-wracking. What's up, and why do you have Tali's pet project in here?"

Liara grimaced, daintily stepping across the room to adjust something on a panel of haptic electronics. "I seem to have a knack for sensor, probe, and spy electronics. I have been trying to make a drone that can handle the dangerous atmosphere and hostile environment on the surface of Ilos, while having enough room for data gathering equipment...and sample containers."

Shepard suppressed a grin as she took another puff from Liara's cigarette. "This is hardly time for archeological research..."

Liara gave a small smile, an almost smug expression crossing her face. "It was useful in making sure we did not all end up thralls on Eingana, no?"

"Touche, doctor."

Liara snorted and returned her attention to the circuitry before her, her omnitool glowing as she carefully laid pre-formed omnigel alterations to the board. "The JOTUN can make landfall independently, using the launch tubes you use to dispatch DACT. It has onboard shielding – it's weak, but Tali managed to get that repaired – and heavy armor, although most of this is spare armorplast sludge from the repairs on the MAKO."

Liara slid the board into the open front of the JOTUN. "I have stripped the probe assembly and wide-spectrum scan package from the last class 3 probe we have, as well as a multifunction omnitool package with some hastily written test scripts I wrote. It can also pull air, soil, water, and background radiation samples, with two optic and one infrared camera."

Shepard was impressed – Tali had obviously been tinkering on this for a while, and Liara's alterations were not small. "Can it still fight? A JOTUN would be pretty good backup..."

Liara shook her head. "The armor, as I said, is suspect. The TeV rating on the shields is somewhat low. More importantly, the weapons systems were destroyed on Edolus, and we do not have replacements. I have taken advantage of some left over mini missiles left over from the DACT suits, since our pilots are injured and on the Citadel right now, but those are mostly to bypass any doors or blockages in it's path."

Liara adjusted something else, and the JOTUN sparked and hummed, before lighting up.

"JOTUN Tactical Unit 5530-X online. Warning. Combat package replaced by custom installed intelligence analysis and sensor analysis package. This may void your warranty."

Shepard snorted back laughter. "Let's get this thing to the cargo bay and see what's down there..."

O-OSaBC-O

Benezia took a shuddering breath, letting the fire of her warp sword die, and the hulking form of the thirty foot tall defense construct she'd just hit with her strongest flare finally fell back, it's form slowing collapsing into wreck and ruin.

The penetration of the Inusannon / Prothean facility had been nightmarish, the altered Beacon only just stopping whatever was behind the defenses from simply wiping them out instantly. Thirty six Primes were solely dedicated to countering the intrusion attempts by the facility to override the Beacon's altered software, and one Prime assigned to the task had been overwhelmed by some kind of parasitic software upload and literally shutdown on the spot, every software runtime on board corrupted.

She'd passed endless hallways of stasis pods, countless armories full of automated robots, armor, weapons, and battle vehicles, neatly sealed into stasis alongside the pods. There must have been at least a million Protheans here, awaiting a return to life.

The facility had darker areas, too, where caches of Inusannon war robots erupted back to life to assault her forces. The last, a giant construction of slabs of dark metal and blazing red energies, was too much for even a Colossus to handle, and Benezia had been forced to engage it herself.

Her hand clutched her side, where the thing's weapon, a curling whip of black wires and dark red electrical fire, had lashed through her side, cutting through Nazara's cyberware like it was nothing. Even now the wound wept purple blood and black fluids, not healing, and she'd been forced to slap omnigel over the puncture.

Huntress Ushan stood next to her, weary and features drawn after the harrowing battle. "We cannot take much more of this, matriarch. Why did we not bring more soldiers?"

Benezia sheathed her warp sword, wincing as the movement hurt her side. She gave the huntress at her side a sour glance. All of the planning had been conducted on Virmire long before, but the slightly glassy stare of Ushan was proof enough that indoctrination had begun its slow erosion of memory and cognizant function. With a patient smile that was more grimace than pleasant expression, Benezia spoke.

"We did not bring more because the Conduit was, from what little we know, highly experimental. There is no guarantee it was designed to transport an army – worst case, it may transport little more than the first strike team before failing. It has not been maintained in a long time and was a poor execution of Nazara's technology."

The matriarch sighed, and grimaced as she tightened her armor, letting the bands around her waist cut into her side and slow the blood flow. "Based on that, bringing more troops seemed pointless at the time. Not to mention we've stripped the geth bare in this assault...there can't be more than a few hundred thousand left not participating."

The huntress nodded sourly as she followed Benezia. "Oh...yes. I remember now. I am sorry , Matriarch. I only wish this ... path was simpler. That Nazara could merely ... will us to our destination."

Benezia shook her head. "From what he told Saren, he cannot jump other things, only himself, and something about the makeup of the Citadel prevents it from happening inside the Citadel itself. We must do this the hard way."

She paused, thinking. "To be sure, Ushan...I do not know what the exact limits of his power is. It is possible he might have been able to do such a thing ... but he is cautious, with good reason, not to use his great power until he must. No matter. We will prevail." She motioned with her hand to the Prime next to her. "We are almost there, Prime 302. Losses?"

"Benezia-prophet. Current forces are one hundred nineteen Prime/down-links, three hundred sixteen Seekers, two thousand nine hundred eleven Hunters, one thousand four hundred and six Trooper/Rocket subtypes, one thousand and six Trooper/Shock Assault subtypes, and two thousand nine hundred and two standard troopers. Assault forces are four hundred sixty five Destroyer composite creatures, eighty five Armatures, and sixty Colossus. Your own Triune Hunter force is forty seven warriors."

Benezia grimaced. She'd come with over two hundred armatures and colossi, five hundred Destroyers, and just over ten thousand geth soldiers. Now she was down to barely half that in heavy units and had lost almost two thousand.

The Destroyers, however, were proving their worth, only a few dozen having fallen. "Move the Destroyers to the vanguard, along with the assault units. Once we secure the Conduit, my Hunter Cadre will proceed through first along with the Destroyers and as many Primes as we can manage, followed by the heavies, and then the Hunters. Seekers and the rest can follow."

The Prime did not acknowledge her words, but the column began to shift. She frowned. "Any word from the force we left outside?"

The Prime turned to face her. "Negative. Six gunships are on wide area patrol, and ten more are on overflight. We left a force of roughly two hundred troopers and two Collosi with a single Prime. Unit reports no intrusions."

Benezia did not like it. If Shepard had pursued her here, she must know about the Conduit... mustn't she? The matriarch could not think of why Shepard had not immediately landed and pursued.

"...unless the silly human did not ... of course. We used the Beacon with the message from the Prothean High Council to make our decoy. She doesn't know what is down here." Benezia gave a cold smile, and turned back to the Prime. "Have your units attract attention and delay any pursuit rather than trying to stop it."

The Prime did not understand these orders, but Nazara had made it clear that Benezia spoke with his voice, so he obeyed.

O-OSaBC-O

The inside of the MAKO was a touch cramped, as Wrex was the last one in and shut the hatch behind him. Shepard and Liara sat up front, Shepard to drive and Liara to manage the sensor functions from the JOTUN, which was even now dropping through the atmosphere.

Tali, Wrex, and Garrus sat on the front bench, Telanya and the combined forces of most of Squad One and Two down both sides. Chakwas, dressed in a spare set of Marine armor and with a battle medic support pack at her feet, was smiling, while checking the condition of her Crossfire rifle. "I haven't had to go into battle with the troops in almost fifteen years."

Across from her Jiong merely nodded, his Commissariat armor freshly repainted, loading anti-biotic rounds into the Judgment pistol he carried. "Your assistance will be useful, Doctor. Given what we are headed into, and the damage to the Normandy and the quarian medbay, medevacs will be... difficult."

The MAKO gave a thud as it was launched from the Cargo Bay, Shepard feathering the mass core even as the quarians used a mass-effect lock beam to guide the heavy tank in. Shepard held her breath as the heavy tires slammed into the decking of the quarian ship some thirty seconds later, the entire suspension lurching back and forth as she used the core to slam them to a stop. She exhaled. "Captain Keenah, we are aboard."

The quarian captain's voice sounded tinny over the inferior comms system of the MAKO. "Understood. My own marines are ready to deploy. Their commander is Strike Leader Kal'Reegar vas Merya, and once we're down and unloaded we'll be able to coordinate our plans. I assume that you are getting your telemetry from your probe bot?"

Liara's face was set in a frown of concentration, delicate blue hands flying over the modified haptic display panel she and Tali had cobbled together in place of the MAKOs usual sensor suite. "The JOTUN is down...analyzing. Air is ... mostly dioxide nitrates, oxygen, argon. Breathable, but heavy traces of sulfur dioxide."

A quartet of haptic screens erupted on the sloped windshield of the MAKO, two showing desolate plains of battered gray grass, clusters of lonely, broken ruins erupting from dark forests, and a long, empty road of black metal, edged with ugly looking looming sculptures and littered with dead geth and the occasional asari.

Liara frowned as she read the data incoming. "...it is safe to land, I think. I have found my mother's landing site, there ... are a great many anomalous data readings. The road seems to lead to a fortified city, here. I do not recognize the style, it is not Prothean...perhaps Inusannon?" She brought up a rough map of the planet, showing a roughly crescent shaped section of more intact ruins, girded by two-hundred foot tall walls and tucked into the knee of a nearby semi-active volcano. "I'm picking up bits of geth transmissions and ... the geth have got gunships out."

Shepard nodded. "Any chance of landing directly in the city?"

Liara moved the JOTUN forward, bringing additional sensors online. "Unsure. There are two downed geth ships about eight miles from the city, both look to have been engaged by GTS fire of some kind...although whatever hit those ships must have been very powerful, as barely ten percent of the mass of the ships seems to be wreckage. There is some form of energy field over the city as well."

The JOTUN launched a set of long range mini-missiles converted to probes, the small weapons arcing high into the sky. Liara squinted at the display and then tapped rapidly on the keyboard. "I believe...my mother has already entered the city. The main gates have been blown open...and there is some sort of geth force guarding them."

Shepard frowned. "Numbers?"

Liara shook her head and glanced up. "Several hundred."

Shepard sighed. "Shit. Drop pod landing is out, we'd be sitting ducks. And they'd just blast the MAKO out of the sky." She keyed the comms. "Captain, this is Shepard. Can the corvette operate in atmosphere?"

Captain Keenah's voice sounded calm. "For the most part. We're even equipped to land, actually. STG thinks of everything, I guess. Problem is we're not that maneuverable...it's not a gunship. Marr's already sent his own combat probes down to the surface, but against ten geth gunships, things will get ugly quick."

Shepard nodded. "Take us down, then, I guess towards where the JOTUN is now. We'll have to hope we can catch up to her, getting too close to the city would have those gunships all over us."

Shepard waited as the quarian ship began descending, the vibration of the hull as it passed through the thick atmosphere making everything vibrate and shake. Garrus adjusted his eyepiece, calibrating it carefully with his sniper rifle, while Tali fiddled with the omnishield generator on her arm. Wrex was loading a hi-ex ammo block into his shotgun, murmuring something with a cadence under his breath, while Vega sat calmly, hands on his knees, meditating.

The ship cleared the atmosphere, Liara still scanning from her JOTUN. "Strange. There's some form of energy build up coming from the city, Shepard."

Shepard frowned. "It is a weapon system? Any targeting lasers or radar?"

Liara shook her head. "No...I'm not – " She cut off her words as the ship gave a violent tremor and wrenched suddenly in midair. The dim sounds of yelling quarians and alarms could be heard outside the MAKO.

Shepard slammed the comms. "Captain Keenah, what's happening?"

The quarian captain sounded upset and afraid. "I have no idea, Commander. The ship is caught in...in some kind of energy vortex beam. The core is just dead and we're being...moved somehow. We're locked on a direct path to the edge of the city near the volcano, and there's ground defense cannons of some kind tracking us. I can't engage engines and our kinetic barriers are not responding."

Shepard glanced at Liara. "Ideas would be handy right now..."

Liara looked at her helplessly. "I... I do not understand what is happening either, Sara. We were careful not to get too close to the city..." She frowned, tapping a control. "Goddess. The geth have detected my JOTUN probe and are attacking it."

Shepard cursed, and then the voice of the quarian captain sounded again. "...energy field over the city just dropped in one quadrant, and we're...being guided to what looks like some kind of landing field inside the city. There's some ships parked there already ... don't recognize any of them, but they don't look geth. Or asari. What do we do when we touch down?"

Shepard shook her head. "The MAKO will pull out first, then your marines form a defensive perimeter around the ship, and we try to figure out what the fuck is going on." She clicked off, and rubbed her temples.

"So much for getting down to the surface being easy."

O-OSaBC-O

The Rothuam landed safely, and the moment it did so, bands of orange energy wrapped around the ship, locking it in place. Cautiously, the cargo bay doors opened, and Shepard pulled the MAKO out, Liara starting a full scan as she did so.

"Goddess...these are Inusannon ships, Sara. Perfectly preserved!" The field was full of slender, dark shapes, each one gleaming a wet black, studded here and there with lenses and long streaks of faintly glowing green luminance. Swept back and narrow, they looked deadly even sitting in an open air landing field.

Shepard grimaced. "Maybe we can jury rig one to get the shit out of here, but for now we have to find Benezia. Any exits?"

Liara scanned, frowning. "There is a large set of doors that can accommodate the MAKO to the north, heading towards the city center. And a number of smaller doors but I have no way of knowing what is behind them..."

Shepard nodded, then nearly screamed as the MAKO began moving under its own power. "What the fuck!?"

She swung the steering wheel around, and triggered the brakes, but the tank continued heading towards one of the walls at a steady pace. "Something has taken over the MAKO, everyone out!"

Liara held up a hand. "No! Something is doing this...we need to figure out what it wants, Sara. We have not been attacked, but we know my mother's forces were. What if there is someone living here?"

Shepard frowned. "Liara, there's nothing in front of us but a goddamned wall!" Yet even as she spoke, the wall seemed to shimmer, and then buckled, swinging back to reveal a wide corridor, lined with gray stone and with a huge vaulted ceiling.

Liara fixed her with a look, and Shepard folded her arms. "Fine. Let's be kidnapped by the alien force, and when we end up being dissected in some lab, I'm blaming you, Doctor."

Liara rolled her eyes. The MAKO rolled along, even as Shepard touched the comms. "Captain Keenah, the same force that has commandeered your vessel seems to be directing the MAKO."

The quarian's voice was a touch worried. "I can see that. Your MAKO is wrapped in the same kind of energy my ship is in, I don't think you could bail out even if you tried. I've got my marines spreading out. So far, nothing has ... bothered us, but the smaller doors leading out of here are all locked, and none of our hacks to get past have worked. I've got a squad headed to the big double doors, I'll keep you updated."

Shepard nodded, even as the MAKO made a smooth turn to the right and headed down another hallway. Garrus piped up from the back. "Geez, Sheep. Even alien overlords remote controlling this brick drive better than you do. You should take tips."

"Laugh it up, Chicken. Everyone stay sharp and get ready for a fight, we have no fucking clue what's doing this."

The MAKO made several more turns, before passing through a huge set of double doors into a wide open space, almost a hundred feet across and open to the sky. Towering statues of figures with tentacled faces and long fingers in concealing robes framed the space. The ruins of several low outbuildings cluttered the area, but in the middle of the area was a broad plaza of black stone, with a single silvery half-arch erupting from it's middle, splitting in midair to form a asymmetrical Y shape.

From the arms of the Y fell a curtain of silvery-glowing liquid, back-lit from somewhere. The MAKO slewed to a stop in front of the fountain, and the power cut off. Shepard grunted. "Looks like this is the end of the line, boys and girls." She popped the hatch, rolling out smoothly and coming up with her ODIN in the ready position, Liara behind her and to the right, one hand alight in biotic blue, the other holding her pistol.

Marines spilled out the back hatch, along with Wrex, Tali, and Telanya, even as Shepard slowly approached the fountain. She looked around, but saw and heard nothing.

"Well, that's great. It brought us to a goddamned shower stall." Shepard's voice was frustrated.

"Not at all, human."

The voice was mellifluous and loud, echoing from all directions, and the entire force pulled their weapons. Liara's hand caught at Shepard's shoulder. "Look!"

The falling water from the sculpture had taken on a brighter glow, deforming in midair to form a shape. It was only vaguely humanoid, standing on three ropy legs of water, tapering to a narrow torso and wide shoulders. Thin, gangly arms hung to either side, and the head was a rough ball, with long tentacles trailing nearly to the ground from it.

Three searingly bright pin-pricks of light swam inside the head-shape, seemingly fixed on Shepard. "Welcome to Atharnaon, or as the Sethani called it, Ilos."

Shepard let her weapon fall. "You brought us here. Who...what are you?"

Liara gazed at it in wonder. "And who are Sethani?"

The thing bowed, a strange, stiff folding at the middle. "I am ... mm...the best word in your language would be 'Vigil', I think. I am an artificial intelligence of the Eternal Empire of the Holy Inusannon. The Sethani were those who you call Protheans."

Shepard frowned, and Tali's eyes narrowed. "An AI isn't safe, Commander."

The things voice developed a sneering quality. "Simply because your primitive methods backfired on you, quarian, is no reason to believe your betters did not succeed where you spectacularly failed. I have been stable longer than your pathetic culture has known about fire."

Shepard winced, the thing was touchy. "Tali, hush. And as for you, don't insult my crew."

"Your 'crew' should fall silent, then, Commander Shepard. I brought you here for a reason, and there is little time."

Shepard folded her arms and put her weight back on one leg. "So, what's going on?"

The strange AI spread its arms, the 'eyes' brightening. "I'm not sure you would even understand the long version, and given that things are going to become quite energetic soon, I'll be ... brief. You are here to stop Lady Benezia of Thessia. I was placed here by the Inusannon to aid those who oppose the Reapers."

Shepard nodded. "I understand that much."

The thing made a shivering motion. "No, I'm afraid you don't. Benezia is corrupted by the Reapers, and this planet has fail-safes to prevent it from falling into Reaper hands. In a short amount of time, the entire system will go into nova, Commander. And unless you move quickly, Benezia will still be able to escape, and the Reapers will be feasting on your tiny little civilizations by nightfall."

---

Chapter 117: Chapter 108 : Ilos, Cresendo

---

A/N: My betas did not get a chance to work with this chapter – I'm actually going to be pretty tied up until the weekend, but I wanted to get this out.

I'm am not trying to .. trivialize Ilos, but the entire infodump feel of it was irritating. Saren was always one step ahead of you, no matter what, and then you got to listen to a boring, quiet VI ramble on, and then ... what?

Why didn't Ilos ever figure into anything else? Why use the crazy stupid beam in ME3 if you could use the Conduit and not have to play Dodge-The-Beam-of-Glowy-Death?

Drama?

My rewrite of Ilos may not be to everyone's taste. But I will argue that Ilos was ultimately pointless. A throwaway one night stand, an entire mysterious setting wasted, and plot holes you could drive a tank through, topped off with shitty mechanics. I will not even dignify the stupid 'race to teh conduitz' scene as being worth referencing.

There's a very irritating plot hole of minute size and importance that I close in this chapter, and I'm curious to see if anyone picks up on it. If you do, and you aren't Progman, I'll see about writing up a quick one-shot about any character or OC you are interested in.

There are two ways the final fight can play out. I'm still deciding which of the two I should go with : emotionally wrenching awesome badassery, or full out throwdown deathmatch of ultimate destiny. Without any more details than that, what do you guys think?

---

"Welcome to the Citadel! I am AVINA, a virtual intelligence designed to assist you in your stay on the Citadel. Please feel free to inquire about any services or assistance you may need."

The krogan glanced at the pink-tinted VI outlay in amusement, narrowed eyes flicking back and forth across the long line of C-SEC customs agents that barred the way from the Citadel Docks into the Wards proper. The three krogan behind him, wearing heavy armor, glanced around uncertainly as well, gripping the butts of shotguns with a nervous energy.

Okeer stretched languidly, the ancient muscles of his form bunching under the thin, elegant robes he wore. He had long ago dismissed the primitive trappings of mere armor as de rigor wear when mingling with non-krogan. While he was well known, his features were very plain for krogan, and most identified him by his distinctive bronze armor. Shorn of it, he found non-krogan less threatened. His polite demeanor and rich baritone put them further at ease, when he chose to do so.

Weak minded fools.

Besides, he found the robes quite comfortable. The skin-tight experimental kinetic barrier suit he wore under them was more than a match for bulky armor, and Okeer was a firm believer in the old krogan adage that the best way to thwart an enemy's preparations was to fool their perceptions.

He waited a few more minutes, but no C-SEC special agents arrived to arrest him, and nothing appeared amiss. Satisfied that this was no trap, he turned to his retinue, and spoke calmly. "Remain aboard the vessel. I do not trust Benezia, and her actions in recent days speak poorly of her mental stability. The prize she is offering is vast, but until I confirm it exists, this may be some form of trap."

The lead krogan nodded. "Of course, Warlord-Father. And if it is not a trap?"

Okeer smiled. "Then you may proceed as we were instructed. C-SEC is unlikely to be able to respond to military-grade assault weapons. I have six ships ready for this little activity, you should have sufficient soldiers to proceed with no difficulty. As a distraction, civilian casualties are encouraged. They're just aliens, after all."

The three gave stiff bows, and Okeer turned away. He walked confidently through the crowds of aliens and to the nearest customs inspector, a tired looking asari with faded looking facial markings who examined his papers minutely before motioning him through the scanners.

His papers – he had paid the Shifter a small fortune for them – were the highest class of forgeries, with fake records inserted even in C-SEC's own computer systems. They identified him as Thax Danar, an associate of the powerful krogan merchant Thax Vorak, here to do business with turian survival gear designers. His permit for a single class-2 self-defense weapon was signed by the Executor. The asari customs agent frowned, but waved him through and examined his pistol for several seconds before handing it to him. "You're cleared for the Wards and the Presidium, krogan, but keep your weapon holstered or you will regret it. The Citadel is no place for aggression."

Okeer only smiled wider, taking the weapon and tucking it away. "I thank you, Officer, but I assure you – I am here for business, not mayhem. Not all of my people are the mindless brutes of years gone by and bad haptic programming. May I inquire the directions to the nearest air-car stand?"

Taken aback by his demeanor, the asari's features softened. "Of course. Down the main passage marked PRIMARY, and take the fourth exit to your right."

With a jaunty nod, Okeer set off. He had not walked the halls of the Citadel in over a thousand years, and was unsurprised that it had changed greatly in that time. The crowds parted before him – most did not like getting too close to any krogan – but were otherwise only wary, a sharp improvement from his last visit.

Finding the air-car stand, Okeer paid the fee, and got into the tiny vehicle, grunting in irritation as the seats squished around him and the flimsy thing took off at a high rate of speed. Waiting until he was well away from C-SEC, he finally triggered his omnitool.

"I am aboard and ... undetected."

The voice that answered was almost monotone in its inflection. Clearly asari, the words had a touch of a slur to them, as if the speaker was drugged. "Good. The Lady has arranged a demonstration of what she offers in the offices at 500 Democratica Tower. We will await you there."

It took another ten minutes for him to arrive, the car disgorging him and leaving him wishing for a tomkah once more. Brushing his robes down and fixing a pleasant smile upon his ancient, fearsome features, Okeer cautiously studied his surroundings.

The soft opulence of the Presidium – soaring white walls of windows, arching bridges, fountains and a false digital sky – disgusted him. With a slight snarl of distaste, he moved towards the double doors in front of him, the small building nestled against an overhang of a towering stack of offices.

The room he entered was sterile white, with no furnishings and blank, steel-framed white lights. A single asari stood there, dressed in a nondescript jumpsuit, and she bowed unsteadily as he entered. "Be welcome, Warlord Okeer. Benezia is not here yet, but will be ... very soon."

Okeer's combat senses, always wary, spiked in caution. Something was very wrong with this asari, and he disliked any form of mystery as a rule. "I see. And the shipment she spoke of? I would hate to travel this vast distance to be disappointed at such a late hour."

The asari gestured to a single, heavy-framed door of steel to the right. "You may view it yourself."

Okeer nodded, stepping towards the portal, the heavy doors opening as he approached. The room beyond was as blank as the first, but the far wall was pierced by a strongly reinforced window. Stepping up to it, he saw a professional looking genetics lab, equipment neatly racked against the walls, and a single surgical table.

The table contained a single krogan, its skin discolored in many places, with small mutations clearly visible. Okeer found his mouth dry as he took in the two forms standing in the lab behind the table.

Black robes covered all traces of their features, but they stood tall, nearly as tall as he did. Strange tools were visible in a black leather belt each wore at the waist, and their hoods were drawn down, obscuring faces. The voice that spoke was a whispery echo.

"Your requested payment, Dr. Okeer. A single krogan, with the genetic alterations you wished, and a few of our own devising. This is not a complete solution, further research on your part will be required ... but we are interested in what you will do with it."

Okeer nodded, excitement racing through his hearts. "And you have verification of this grandiose claim, of course?"

One of the hooded figures merely tapped a haptic screen in the room, and his own omnitool beeped, displaying test data and sample analysis layouts. It only took Okeer's brilliant mind a few seconds to put the pieces of what he was seeing together.

"...yes. A mere cure for the genophage would be useless, given the other alteration the salarians created. Such clever, paranoid creatures, to build in such nasty little DNA traps. This is ... a more elegant execution of the same concept." His hard eyes took in the robed figures. "And for such a low price, how could I refuse?"

The asari entered the room behind him, her features still utterly blank, her eyes glassy. "The Matriarch will be pleased. Your payment – and the subject – will be transferred to your accounts once the attack begins."

Okeer nodded thoughtfully. Benezia was planning something, something big, and needed muscles on the Citadel to pull it off. A distraction attack, on the Docks, and in the Wards, with the stated goal of producing as many casualties as possible. They were not even to approach the Presidium, and if possible, were to all die fighting.

His clan was still few in number, and on such short notice he'd only been able to put together a fairly modest strike force – some eighty krogan. Okeer was no novice when it came to such strikes, however, and each one of his krogan was a veteran of more than five hundred years of combat, equipped in the best gear money could buy. They would serve.

Okeer was no fool – one did not survive to be the single oldest living being in creation through haste or greed. He knew full well Benezia had designs for a conflict of some sort. After all, whatever experiments she was conducting on the krogan he had given her were unlikely to be anything but assault troops. Krogan were poorly suited to anything else.

That being said, he doubted she could actually conquer the Citadel. Her geth fleets were formidable, and the black dreadnaught powerful, but they could not fight the entire Citadel military structure. Even now, the assault on Irune had been broken, geth fleeing in panic from the bared might of some fifteen turian dreadnaughts.

No, Benezia wanted chaos, and she had offered him a prize he could not ignore for the cost of a unit of his men, storming the Citadel and causing a disruption. He could not see how her plans required such, and had no idea how whatever she planned would come to fruition – Saren's death had robbed her of both a cunning general and, quite clearly, her emotional stability. Her plans were likely to fail, and violently. He would be well served to not get caught up in the chaos of such an event.

Then again ... given he had no clue where her final assault would land, the Citadel was ironically the safest location for him. His krogan assault unit was, of course, doomed to be overwhelmed in short order. Eighty krogan could not overwhelm thousands of soldiers.

High-explosive charges in a few buildings, however, and a particularly nasty data virus he'd gotten from some outcast quarians ... he could cause chaos, that much was certain.

Sacrificing them for even a chance at what Benezia was potentially offering would have been a deal too good to pass up. He had been attempting to make contact with the Collectors and find some way to utilize their skills for centuries, and now ...

Okeer deactivated his omnitool. "I believe we have a mutually beneficial agreement, then. I might as well stay and observe the amusements."

The asari's eyes flickered with some emotion, but she nodded and departed. Triggering his omnitool, he spoke into it quietly. "The agreement stands. Begin moving out immediately, but confine your activities to the Wards, as agreed."

With that, he smiled, displaying even, broad teeth, and headed back outside. He'd find a good hotel, order up some asari ice-wine, and review his latest clone findings. Even if Benezia didn't follow through on her promises, the idea the two Collectors had just given him was worth the price.

And really, he'd have paid good money to watch these soft innocents on the Citadel burn.

O-OSaBC-O

Shepard managed to not scream in frustration at the AI's words. "Alright, let's assume the primate doesn't quite get what's going down here, and back up a bit. I need answers."

The Inusannon AI merely made an agreeable noise. "And I have them, but time is short. Before I start to try to explain, you will want to instruct your ships to evacuate the system. Preferably at top speed."

Shepard stared at the thing. "Are you out of your goddamned mind? You just said the system is going to fucking nova and you want me to send my ride out of here without me on it?"

Vigil chuckled. "I am not, I assure you, rampant or insane. The explanation will take time, however, and quite frankly your ships will need it to escape. Short version, there is a way out of here that you and your troops on the ground will be taking. Your ships cannot use this method. And if you were to return to your vessels, you would never be able to catch and stop Benezia."

Shepard glared at the thing for a long moment, before slapping her omni. "Joker, ship status of propulsion – how long would it take to clear the system?"

The pilot's voice was wary – "I dunno, twenty or thirty minutes? Depends on if I'm doing the pickup or the quarians..."

Shepard nodded. "Go ahead and get out of the system, Joker. I've got another way off world. Let Marr and the quarian frigates know as well. We have problems down here and you'll need to get clear fast – I've been told the sun is going to go nova pretty soon."

"...what?!"

She smirked. "Move, Flight Lieutenant, that is a direct order. Shepard out." She clicked off, and huffed. "You still have Captain Keenah's ship trapped."

Vigil made a motion. "I have begin accelerating his ship away from the landing area. The timing will be somewhat tight, but I have planned this to a nicety. An advantage that comes from having tens of thousands of years to get it right."

Garrus glanced around. "Not to interrupt or be rude but, ah ... what is going on? I seem to remember the words 'nova' and 'not a lot of time'..."

Vigil observed Garrus briefly before returning it's gaze to Shepard. "To prevent confusing you, I will try and keep this ... simple. I am a product of the mighty Inusannon. We once ruled this galaxy and several others, connected through a series of powerful jump-gates, not based on clunky mass-effect technology you use. My creators were paranoid, much like their Tho'ian allies, and they felt the Citadel and all it's works were nothing more than a trap."

Shepard raised an eyebrow. "A trap?"

Vigil gave a rather human nod. "Yes. Those which you call Reapers ... created the Citadel, and the mass relays. They know that races that find them will use them, and the technology associated with them. Eventually, all relays lead to the Citadel, and as a natural fortress and center of trade, it is almost always chosen as a center of government."

Shepard remembered the words of Nazara and nodded slowly. "Alright, but what does that have to do with Benezia?"

Vigil continued. "My creators did not use the Citadel. For now, that is all you need to know. What is important is what is happening now."

Vigil's voice fell. "The Inusannon were destroyed by the Reapers, along with their Tho'ian allies. Our technology, while advanced, was still not enough to counter the Reapers numbers. We destroyed many, but eventually the tide was too much."

"The Tho'ian main fleet and our own main fleet were destroyed at Shar – that which you call Eingana. At the same time, a brilliant researcher discovered ... a weapon. A device that would, he claimed, destroy the power the Reapers drew upon. We did not have time to build it, but we hastily built this world, with many protections against Reapers and their servants, and hid the designs here, along with all we knew." He paused. "And then they fell. I was left, here, alone, to warn those who followed."

Vigil looked towards the sky. "Eventually the Sethani – those you call Protheans – arrived. They discovered what we left. They heeded our words and prepared, to some degree. But they were ... less skilled than we, and they could not adapt our technology. Worse, unlike us, they used the Citadel, and the Reaper arrival tore out the core of their empire. They fell. A few survived, hiding here, and plotted revenge."

Shepard shook her head. "None of that makes sense to me, Mr. AI, but okay. What are the Reapers? Why are they here? What is this shit about the Citadel? Where is this weapon? And what is the Conduit?"

Vigil's tentacles curled. "...very well. Reapers are ... robots. Bio-mechanical robots built by reducing entire intelligent races to a type of bio-mechanical paste and melding it with a gestalt intelligence. They invade this galaxy every fifty thousand to sixty thousand years, obliterate all space-faring or near space-faring societies as well as any races with certain abilities in high-order math, and use the remains of the races to build more of themselves. They have been at this for at least three million years, possibly as long as over a hundred million years."

Shepard's jaw dropped, but Vigil continued. "Based on limited communications we have intercepted during the last cycle, they claim to be protecting life from something even worse than them, and may not be confined to this galaxy." Vigil paused. "They created the mass relays, and the Citadel. They expect space faring races to use both, to explore the galaxy. When they are ready to strike, they have a dark relay built into the Citadel. Hundreds of Reapers arrive, while the Citadel kills everything onboard, and shuts down the mass relay network entirely."

Garrus's mandibles flicked. "Decapitating the leadership and scattering fleets. Letting them pick and chose where to overwhelm."

Vigil pulsed. "Exactly. The Citadel is a gigantic trap. The Keepers aboard the Citadel are Reaper tools, monitoring galactic progress. When the time is right, the Keepers activate this dark relay, and the Reapers arrive." Vigil paused. "Combat with them is very nearly impossible. Not only is their technology very advanced, but they can alter the very laws of physics and time at whim."

Liana frowned. "That cannot be possible..."

Vigil gave a shifting motion, making the liquid substance ripple fiercely. "It is. They were able to turn aside the combined power of the Inusannon and the Tho'ians using this power, although they seemed reluctant to use it. From what little we know, the Reapers are building up to some grand action, but my masters were not able to determine what."

Shepard ran her hands against her jaw. "What about the weapon and the Conduit?"

Vigil made a jerky motion with it's shoulders. "The weapon was not something I was involved with. The Inusannon failed to build it, but put details regarding it ... elsewhere. I know little aside from the fact that the Inusannon felt the weapon was ... risky. Later, when I worked with those you call the Protheans, they mentioned it but were again unable to build it before the Reaper strike. What measures they took involving it are beyond my knowledge."

Shepard frowned. "Then Benezia isn't here for some weapon...but the Conduit."

Vigil made a noise of agreement. "The Inusannon and Tho'ian did not utilize the Citadel. It was resistant to Tho'ian growth, while Inusannon radiation would have been difficult to ... sustain. What matters is that they ignored it entirely, seeing it as a trap. I believe a race prior to them warned them not to trust the mass relays or the Citadel, but I was not informed of ... details. Without such, the Inusannon could not leave any hard facts as to the danger of the relays or the Citadel, and by the time those you call Protheans discovered Ilos and myself, their entire government was ensconced within it, and their own technology tightly tied to the mass relays."

Vigil moved, arms gesturing. "The Reapers invasion was horrific, and the Protheans were ... overwhelmed. But they had always kept a very few of their kind here once they discovered it. The defenses here were the strongest the Inusannon could devise, and some of the weapons were from even older races than they. As long as no trace of it's location was ever recorded, Ilos was safe. The Protheans hacked their own Beacon system to send a few of their kind into hiding, then to recall them back here after the Reapers finished their grim harvest and returned to wherever they hail from."

Shepard nodded, and Vigil continued. "The Protheans were able to study the aftermath, and found the Citadel tightly sealed. It would not open for another twenty thousand years, to prevent, I suppose, any rapidly rising races from gaining too much knowledge or power. The Protheans planned to recreate their empire, but first they had to shut down the Citadel. They built a miniature mass relay and sent the bulk of their people aboard to shut it down, to sabotage the Keepers. That is the Conduit."

Vigil gestured to the center of the city. "Only a few hundred Protheans answered the calls to return to Ilos, and most of them did not return from the Citadel strike. But whatever they did was a success. They expected the AI they planted here, a primitive device, to resurrect their stasis bound soldiers here when the Citadel reopened. That did not occur, for reasons I am still unclear on. The stasis units failed and the AI entered rampancy and collapsed into insanity."

Tali only snorted, and Shepard waved a hand absently. "Great history lesson, but I need to know about why Benezia is here. This mini-relay is connected to the Citadel?"

Vigil nodded. "And Benezia is assaulting the area it is in. Her plans are clear. She has an army of what your kind seem to call geth. Robotic war forms. My sensors are badly degraded, but even I have been able to monitor galactic comms with ease. Your races fleets are far from the Citadel, fighting these geth, and they are not expecting trouble. She will storm aboard the Citadel with this army of geth, and reactivate the dark relay to summon the Reapers. Cut off and already under attack, your people will fall in a matter of days."

Shepard cursed. "We can't stop a goddamned army of geth with the handful of soldiers I brought! Can't you?"

Vigil fixed it's three eyes on her. "I have been attempting to do so. The defenses of this place are strong, but old. Benezia is stronger than I expected, and she has somehow corrupted a Prothean Beacon – that means the majority of the Prothean defenses do not see her as a threat and I cannot use anything but whatever remains of the old Inusannon devices here. I have blocked her progress as fully as I can, but she will break through in short order. This is why I have brought you here."

Shepard tilted her head. "Why?"

Vigil straightened. "As I said, the Inusannon could not afford this world to fall into the hands of the Reapers. My masters did not explain why, and while I have .. theories, it is pointless to speculate. They have a device at the center of this world that, upon the detection of Reaper signatures or indoctrinated vassals, begins an energy build up and will eventually send the star into nova. This process takes time to complete, however."

It paused again. "By my estimation, at least a fourth of her force will be able to transit through in that time. The rest, however, would be destroyed. Even so, if the Citadel does not know the assault is coming, even that number would mostly likely doom your galaxy. Someone must get through ahead of her, warn the Citadel, and stop her."

Liana glanced around. "And what of .. all of this? There is so much history and science here, so much we could learn. Is there no way you can stop this process?"

Vigil gave her a stern look. "I could, little scientist. I will not. If she is allowed to transit her entire force, nothing you could do could stop her. And the secrets here ... are best left undiscovered. The science of my people did not aid the Protheans, and it will not aid you. Your minds are too ... narrow, and in any event you have no time to utilize what is here."

Vigil glowed. "Instead, my forces will hold her off as long possible, and I will allow you to go through the Conduit first. You can alert the Citadel to prepare, and to seal itself. If you can stop and kill Benezia, the Reaper will have no chance to summon it's dark kin and can be overwhelmed."

Shepard sighed. "No one is going to believe this shit until it's too late."

Vigil's form shimmered, the liquid losing it's shape, condensing into a sphere of wobbly liquid silver that hovered in mid-air. "You will have to try. I will accompany you – I have no intention of being blown into component atoms, and I can ... assist ... in other ways, as well as verifying your story." The sphere pulsed with a soft silvery aura as Vigil spoke.

Wrex grunted. "Shepard. We can't beat that many geth, but if we could get there ahead of her and rally the Citadel Guards, they could hold her off long enough for us to kill the bitch."

Shepard exhaled. "I don't see we have much choice, seeing as our ride is up and gone." She glanced at Vigil. "How do we do this?"

Vigil pulsed again, moving to hover over Shepard's shoulder. "I can transport your soldiers, both here and in the docking area, to the Conduit facility. The transit should be safe. You will not have much time to set up a defense, but you will have a chance to at least alert your Citadel officials. With any luck, Benezia will not go through immediately and will be caught by the blast, but ... if not, stopping her is your problem."

Shepard nodded. "...fine."

Vigil made a chiming sound. "...your landing craft is clearing the atmosphere, and I am transporting your soldiers now. We must hurry. Benezia is breaking through the outer defenses even now, and these annoying geth creatures are starting to crack my own hardlines." Vigil paused. "You may want to contact the quarian soldiers you brought with you, they are ... somewhat upset that their ship is gone and they have been teleported to a strange area."

Shepard rolled her eyes. "Subtle." She then hit her omnitool. "Strike Leader Kal'Reegar, come in."

O-OSaBC-O

Prime 302 turned to face Benezia. "The portal remains sealed, Benezia-Prophet. We cannot breach it. The strongest blasts from our weapons merely dissipate over it's surface."

She only nodded, stepping forward. "Move the host back." Closing her eyes, she reached deep within her core, pulling her energies through her points of focus.

The Triune cultists watched in awe as their mistress began to glow, her lips whispering the focusing ritual names of the phases of the moon. She lifted her hands, the fine sleeves of her battle robe slipping down, slender hands glowing with light.

Benezia's eyes snapped open, glowing solid white, and the area around her pulsed with energy, a shockwave flying from her form as a single blast of iridescent blue-white light erupted from her hands, slamming into the sealed doorway blocking their path.

The ground shook, as Benezia focused, gritting her teeth and bearing down with her will, forcing the gravity of the planet to buckle around her singularity, focusing all her energy into a single point on the door. There was a thunderclap of sound as air rushed outwards, and the ground shuddered. Geth and asari alike staggered and with a horrible rending sound, the huge portal tore asunder, gouts of displaced earth and long shards of over-stressed metal flying in all directions.

One of the massive gates was flung to the ground, landing with a tremendous hollow bang that left the asari hearing ringing, the other hung loosely one badly warped hinges, glowing a dull red. Benezia slumped to her knees, panting, and then gave a shaky exhalation. "It is done."

Beyond, the plaza was a circular arena of pure white stone and silvery metal, bracketed by flowing beams of silver. In the center was a small mass relay, gleaming as if new made.

Benezia's eyes widened as she saw that the relay was active. Marching through it was a small group of blurred figures, but at the back ...

The hated figure of Commander Shepard stood next to her own daughter, Liara. The impudent human waved cheerily and the two leapt backwards into the light of the relay.

Benezia's mouth fell open, before her eyes narrowed in absolute fury. A moment later a sniper's bullet slammed into her barriers, strong enough to knock her to her behind. The figure of a single turian bolted from cover near the relay, falling into it's light as well.

Benezia cursed, scrambling to her feet. "MOVE! Get in there!" With a snarl, she drew her sword and raced forward, unsurprised when the entire plaza erupted into more figures of dark metal and red electrical forms, assaulting her units.

O-OSaBC-O

The travel through the relay was like nothing Shepard could compare, a feeling of intense cold and speed, followed by a horrific burst of pain and the slamming sensation of her body tumbling end over end against the plaza decking in the Presidium.

With a groan, she sat up. The quarian soldiers were still forming up, one or two laying on the ground unresponsive, with quarian medics working on them. Her own team was on the ground, shaking off the effects of the trip. Shepard glanced over to make sure Liara was okay, even as a small group of C-SEC officers approached.

The leader, a turian with red face paint, had one hand on his pistol. "What the spirits is going on here? How did you get –" his words choked off as Shepard got to her feet and her features became clear.

"Officer, we need to get to the person in charge of internal Citadel defense...right fucking now. This goddamned sculpture is a mass relay, and in a few minutes an army of geth is going to come flying out of it just like we did."

The turian looked baffled, the salarian next to him gobsmacked. She cursed, turning to Jiong. "Get the quarians and our marines into a dug in position, preferably not right next to this goddamned thing, and set up some mines or something."

Garrus came through the relay a second later, smoke trailing from his armor. "Shit." He groaned and held his head, one hand still holding his sniper rifle. "Didn't work, Sheep. Her barrier stopped it."

Shepard only nodded, and turned back to the C-SEC officers. "Well?"

The lead turian snapped his mandibles. "Ma'am, I'm going to have to ask your ... um, forces to stand down...We need someone to clear all of this up and it's the middle of the night-cycle right now..."

The globular form of Vigil soared higher, glowing softly. "Commander, Benezia's assault grows closer. Either motivate these primitives to aid you or get clear of the plaza before you are swamped with geth."

Shepard gave the thing a glare, but nodded sourly. She glanced around, noticing the lack of pedestrians and the lower volume of air-cars in the traffic lanes. She turned back to the Turian. "Don't give a shit.

Your CO, now. Get him on the goddamned line! Spectre authority."

The turian paused before tapping his omni. "E-Executor...I have Spectre Shepard asking for you."

The tired voice of Palin sounded. "Emrki, if this is some kind of sirefucking, talon-bent joke, I am going to – "

Shepard interrupted. "Executor Palin, I assure you, it's no joke. I don't have time to explain, but Benezia is going to be invading the Citadel the same way I got here in less than ten minutes, and if we don't stop her everything is completely, utterly fucked."

O-OSaBC-O

Benezia wondered exactly what sort of fixation the Inusannon had on lethal statuary.

The dark forces that had been harrowing her assault group had clearly decided to stop swimming in the shallows. Even as the geth put down the last of the smaller Insusannon robots, their dark metal corpses littering the plaza, a crack of thunder shook the entire complex. With a ponderous roar, the giant carved statue of an Inusannon at the very back of the plaza that held the Conduit began to move, heavy black metal limbs crackling with red lightning as it did so.

An almost smug voice from somewhere sounded. "Corrupted creature of the Reapers. You shall not pass."

Somewhere in the back of Benezia's mind, perhaps some segment not overrun by Nazara, she could hear Saren's voice chuckle wryly. And now a boss fight.

She gave a little chuckle to herself. Here, in Ilos's dark atmosphere, Nazara's touch on her mind seemed ... weak. Hesitant. As if the planet itself was interfering. The feeling of invincibility that had made her feel so powerful on Vormire was missing.

And yet, as she settled into the first stance of the Dance of Moonlight, the rain plastering her robes to her armor, she had never felt more alive, more in the moment. The howl of geth weapons, the screaming of her Destroyers, the thundering footsteps of the enemy, they all vibrated through her until she found herself actually grinning.

The huge construct stomped forward, ignoring the ranks of the geth firing at it, smashing aside a charging Destroyer with a single slap, sending the krogan-rachni crossbreed across the courtyard in long streak of orange blood and chunks.

She glanced over her shoulder. "Sisters, fall back. Prime, move your forces out of it's path."

Ushan's eyes widened. "Matriarch! You cannot be thinking of fighting that thing!"

Her smile only widened, and she moved, blazing through the kanquess and erupting next to the creature, her warp sword alight.

The giant statue was well over thirty five feet tall, and blasts of green energy erupted from it's outstretched limbs as she jumped forward. The first slammed into her barriers, the second deflected off a split-second wall of biotic force she threw up.

Even as the third slashed through the air towards her, she moved through the kanquess again, the ground behind her detonating violently. Her free hand lifted, drawing upon the Art, and biotic fire lanced out, a whip of blazing blue energy that scored a deep mark across the thing's knee.

She danced aside from a stomp, and with a yell used her biotics to lighten herself even as she leapt atop the thing's knee, her warp sword flashing through the rain. A slice, and a slash, and red fire exploded out of the thing's already damaged knee, even as she leapt away once more. Falling in a roll, she came up only to barely stop another blast of energy with her hastily erected barrier.

The construct gave another roar, limping forward, and flung its arm out. A fist the size of an aircar descended, even as she held up one palm, light exploding outwards. The punch was stopped, quivering, a bare foot above her head. Her frame shook from the strain, even as she flared her biotics.

With a flash she was gone, and the fist finished its deadly arc, slamming into the singularity she'd left in her place. As she skidded to a halt, she focused her power once more, a field of crackling blue and black energy erupting from her to lance outwards and strike the bobbing sphere of blue energy.

The biotic explosion was titanic, enough to shake the ground, the statue staggering back missing most of its arm. It had no time to correct its mistake, as blades of biotic force struck at its joints, chipping the dark metal, sapping away the energy of the red lightning. It fired its weapons again, the blasts striking an invisible field before the matriarch and curving away at a sharp angle to impotently shatter a wall to one side.

Benezia's eyes narrowed, as she watched the cracked metal of its arm begin to slowly reform. The thing was strong, but slow. It could fire blasts of energy that would probably vaporize her if they hit, and its strength was too much to overwhelm directly. Even with one leg crippled, it was mobile. He dashed back biotically, avoiding another blast, then sheathed her sword and focused her energies on its undamaged legs.

The thing stood, and strode forward, even as she finished her biotic invocation. As it moved again, its head turned in alarm, the leg buckling suddenly as she had anchored it to the thing's swinging arm, its own strength being turned against it. As it lost its balance and crashed to the ground, Benezia gathered both hands together and hurled the strongest flare she could muster.

The explosion was like nothing the asari or geth had ever seen, a literal warp firestorm erupting. Blazing chunks of white-hot metal and splashes of nano-organic material splashed in all directions, and Benezia followed it up with a pair of singularities, spinning around one another until they hit the dissipating warp energies still raging over the construct.

Two inflexible forces tried to warp one another, and Benezia shuddered and collapsed as the biotic detonation followed, a shockwave of air slamming everything standing in the plaza to knees, organic and mechanical. Shaking her head to clear her suddenly blurry vision, she rose to one knee, absently noting a piece of shrapnel had dented her armor.

The construct was a smoking, glowing mass of metal, lying in a craterous hole in the plaza, the white stone that formed the surface of the plaza stripped away in a swirling pattern, revealing black metal beneath. Biotic fire flickered over its superheated surfaces, as the last of the red energies that animated it died away.

Benezia closed her eyes, exhaling heavily. Pain from her wounded side lanced through her, and she hissed in her next breath before forcing herself to stand, gritting her teeth against the agony. "Prime 302."

The Prime unit approached slowly, almost warily. "Benezia-prophet."

She nodded at the activated Conduit. "Form up the Destroyers and your Primes, they will accompany me through first. I have a human I am going to murder violently, and then we will execute Nazara's will."

The Prime's various runtimes considered her words, and the notion of reminding Benezia-Prophet that Nazara's will was more important than killing Shepard-Predator. It then took another look at the smoking wreck of the giant construct, and the battered-down doors that had defied the firepower of fifty war machines, and the entire runtime assembly decided to act with caution.

"We concur, Benezia-Prophet – elimination of possible interference will only boost success chances at the ascendance of Nazara-Giver-of-Future."

She did not even bother to reply, walking slowly towards the Conduit.

O-OSaBC-O

Shepard arched an eyebrow as Vigil's glow dimmed briefly, even as they ascended the elevator to C-SEC HQ. "What?"

The silvery orb gave a flicker. "I hope you are successful in finding assistance. To borrow your colorful parlance, I believe I have succeeded in 'pissing her off'."

Shepard gave the thing a hard glare. "I'm starting to hate you."

---

Chapter 118: Chapter 109 : Citadel , Chaos

---

A/N: Sorry for the delay, but I had a tooth extracted, and I had to sit down and work on this piece quite a bit.

Bringing everything together to the crescendo wasn't exactly easy. It has to be plausible, and it has to make sense. The end-fight on the Citadel had all kinds of problems for me, but the most hilarious was of course the lack of any real response on the Citadel itself. Makes for great gaming, but not good story telling.

I'm not sure my version is any better. The plan that transpires was actually Saren's, with his deeper knowledge of the Citadel's defenses and likely responses. In the original plan, Cerberus infiltrators would have assisted, further crippling the situation, rather than last minute assistance from Okeer's savage Skar stormtroopers.

There is, unfortunately, a lot of shifting of perspectives back and forth in this chapter, and I hope it's not too mangled. As this is one of the penultimate points of conflict, I'm interested in feedback on how it could or should be improved, and I may end up rewriting the chapter completely.

---

Shepard emerged into the C-SEC command center, followed by her team. The room was a large circular area some one hundred feet across, centered around a real-time display of the Wards and the Presidium in haptic lighting, updated by notations floating in mid air. Status screens covered several walls, along with rows of comm operators and dispatchers.

Shepard noted with some alarm that there were lots of people running around in agitation, camera views showing explosions and heavy combat somewhere on the station. Without stopping, she walked over to where Executor Palin stood next to a krogan in heavy C-SEC armor, his crest a nearly matching blue color.

Wrex snorted, upon sighting the krogan, who only gave him a grim nod in return, while Palin turned to Shepard. "Commander...how exactly did you get here? The Normandy hasn't been sighted...and the Wards and Docks are sealed from the Presidium right now."

She took a deep breath. "I need you to listen, Executor. I know what I am about to say sounds insane, but it's the truth, and my team can vouch for that. Benezia found a Prothean device on Ilos, basically a small mass relay, that allows a force to enter the Presidium directly, from the so-called statue of a mass relay in the Central Plaza. She's got an army of geth with her and will be coming through that relay in minutes. You have to deploy defenses now, she has some plan to invade the Citadel and... "She broke off, realizing Palin was not keyed into the knowledge about the Reapers. "...and probably take it over."

Palin sighed. "I wish there was something I could do. Not long after your departure, we started having terrorist attacks. Then, an hour ago, a group of krogan boarded the Docks and Wards and began all-out war. Geth hackers have overridden the security bots I had in the Wards and the Citadel Military Defense Force is fighting them tooth and nail, but the krogan are insane. They're blowing up hospitals, schools, apartment buildings, and killing everything in sight."

The krogan next to him grunted. "Clan Skal, looks like. Lunatics. One of their first targets was the main military barracks ... they got explosives in somehow. A good fifteen percent of the troops we have on the Citadel were immolated, tens of thousands of soldiers."

Palin turned to the display. "We've been forced to drop the blast security doors to the Wards to keep the krogan from entering the Presidium, but I'd already deployed as many security forces outside as I could. I have barely three thousand police and a few hundred Special Response units for the entire Presidium, and now I'm having overrides and hacks into the control software – I cannot raise the blast doors to let troops back in."

Shepard pinched the bridge of her nose, having taken her helmet off. "Fucking shit." She cursed again as the omnitool on her arm binged. "Yes?"

"It's Kal'Reegar, ma'am. My tech says energy levels on the little mass array are beginning to rise again, whatever Vigil did to shut it down isn't going to hold. I've got some people dug in around the plaza but there aren't even close of enough of us to stop her."

Shepard glanced at Palin, who swore. "Shepard, have your men fall back to the Citadel Tower, where I've routed most of my own forces to. As long as we can hold the Tower security building, there's not much she can do. We'll stay here and try to crack the system – if I can get it working I can deploy the security bots within the Presidium and use those to drive her off."

Shepard nodded. "You should also get the Council out of here."

Palin nodded. "I ... you should probably speak with them." He turned on a heel, walking to a wall holoscreen, and Shepard turned to her group.

"Thoughts?"

Garrus looked around at the monitors, mandible flickering. "It doesn't look good, Shepard. Based on what I'm seeing, we've already deployed every precinct available to hit the Wards, and whoever hit us here did a spirits-be-damned good job of messing up our response. They hit several police vehicle depots, cut power to the scanning array in each ward, and hacked AVINA. It won't take long to get things under control, but the casualties will be horrific ... and we don't have the two or three hours it will take, do we?"

Shepard shook her head. "No. Jiong. Take the marines and reinforce whatever forces they have guarding the Citadel Tower. Wrex – "

She cut herself off, as the monitor showing the Citadel Plaza erupted into blazing light, and the figure of Benezia T'Soni stepped through, followed by several Destroyers and a Geth Prime. "Shit, she's already here. Scratch that, everyone get to the fucking Tower."

O-OSaBC-O

Sitting in a well-appointed luxury suite on the seventeenth floor of his hotel, Okeer watched in fascination as Benezia appeared aboard the Citadel, and long lines of geth and krogan-rachni warbeasts began erupting out of the Conduit after her.

He gave a short chuckle, puffing thoughtfully on the wide-set krogan cigar in his mouth. "What a fascinating, unexpected ploy. Draw off the defenders from the Presidium, tie up reinforcements with geth fleets, and come in an unexpected back door. Masterfully done, Matriarch."

His mind then turned to what she was after. Simple conquest couldn't be the answer. While he was surprised at the amount of hacking support his krogan received in the Wards – turning the Citadel VI-driven security bots against their own soldiers was a masterstroke – he didn't think such a small force would be able to hold out much longer. Already half his krogan were dead, and ten more lost to the blood rage. Benezia could probably capture the Council Tower, but unless they were complete fools the Council even now would be evacuating, leaving her stuck in a trap.

"A last, mindless revenge for Saren, I wonder? I would be a fool to assume such, the unexpected is the key to avoiding defeat." He puffed again, thoughtfully, before tapping his comm-link. "Pilot."

"Yes, Warlord-Father."

"Make sure the ship is prepared for immediate departure. Whatever Benezia is doing might prove to be unhealthy to endure. I will attempt to make my way to the docks once fighting becomes heavy here in the Presidium."

He clicked off, before shifting to a new comm frequency. "Edat. I presume you are seeing these events?"

The holoscreen on the far wall of his suite flickered several times before lighting up, displaying an old salarian, his skin papery and wrinkled, one eye occluded by cybernetics. The figure was clothed in rich black silk, a sash of sorts over a loose shirt, the skylines of the Presidium visible in the image through a window in the background. "Yes, Okeer, I am. A pity. Did not suspect Benezia to have this sort of plan in her playbook."

The massive krogan elder gave a jerky shrug. "I did not either, but I dislike the idea of being held captive in an event such as this. As you probably have surmised by now, the chaos in the docks is my doing. I can only assume the sealing of the Presidium is yours. I doubt you happen to have a vessel on hand... if you can get me out of here I would be delighted to offer you a ride."

The old salarian fixed Okeer with a hard look, lifting a glass and sipping calmly. "I am fairly sure my defenses here are ... secure. After all, it does not pay to be complacent. Nor am I sure placing myself in your power would be wise in the short or long run, doctor. You have quite the fell reputation." He paused. "However, I am certainly amiable to unsealing the Zakera Ward entrance for a few minutes to allow your escape in return for, let us say, a future favor?"

Okeer's own eyes narrowed. The Zakera Ward entrance was the furthest from his own location, exposing him possibly to Benezia's forces as well as counter-attackers. While his armored robes couldn't take heavy fire, he was fairly confident in his ability to defeat single or even a small group of attackers if they couldn't defeat his shield generator.

"Very well."

Edat smiled, then frowned as an alert began to blare in the background, his emotionless facade shattering into badly expressed shock. "What in the name of the Collapse..."

Okeer frowned, folding his arms. "A problem?"

Edat glanced back at the krogan and gave a thin, frosty smile. "I believe I may reconsider your offer of transport, Okeer. A giant geth fleet has suddenly jumped into the Widow Nebula...lead by the black dreadnaught of Saren."

O-OSaBC-O

Shepard stared at the display in mounting ire. "You have to be shitting me."

Her little group had managed to get to the Citadel Tower, even as Benezia's strike force began pouring into the Presidium. Palin had deployed what few defensive assets he had – riot drones, a handful of Special Response snipers, and the like.

The Council had immediately transferred to the Destiny Ascension via a specialized shuttle that had its own dock on the tower itself, and the shuttle had been slowly sending troops back from the ship. A few hundred had rushed out into defensive positions near the Tower.

Meanwhile, there were still dozens of C-SEC working on getting the doors to the Presidium open, so let in the main Citadel Defense Forces. Shepard and her team had barely arrived at the Tower Defense Center when the news of Geth ships had hit the sensors.

The Tower Defense command center was on the bottom level of the Citadel Tower, sunk deeply into reinforced walls with a multitude of barricades, turrets and hard-wired defense screens in place. A pair of Turian Final Line soldiers guarded the entrance, cybernetics flickering dimly in the combat lighting. The room beyond was equally shaded, massive displays of information scrolling down one wall, maps of the Presidium and the tower dominating another, all shaded a faint dark purple which was apparently comfortable for both turian and asari visual spectra.

The commander of the Tower was an asari admiral, one Ithia T'Mal. An older asari with complex silvery-white facial markings and dark blue features, she was currently conferring with several turians and a salarian sensor specialist while looking over the area map. Her black and silver uniform had the symbol of the Council on it, and a very ugly shotgun was openly worn on one hip.

The asari was not pleased, eyes narrowed and voice sharp. "Can someone explain how they got past the defensive fleets? Every single relay that led to the Widow directly still reports no geth ships, and each of those could only be reached by bypassing our defensive fleets, which still report heavy combat with the geth!"

A turian spoke. "We have no idea, Matriarch. The only forces we have in outlying systems are a handful of scout frigates that report no contacts. Is it possible there's another relay connecting to Widow?"

She turned to the salarian. "Map the gravity pulses. Now. Let me know if you find anything, but it's unsought fish at this point. Bring up the station STS defenses and missile systems, and engage the siege shielding over the tower. Notify the Destiny Ascension, if they aren't already aware."

Next to Shepard, Jiong hissed in alarm. She turned to him. "What?"

He pointed at the map. "If I'm reading those symbols correctly, the Citadel Defense fleet has the Destiny Ascension and fifteen dreadnaughts, two hundred cruisers, and roughly twice that in smaller ships like frigates and destroyers. The incoming geth fleet has seventeen dreadnaughts and over four hundred cruisers, not counting smaller ships.

Shepard frowned. "Well, that's not good at all. Can't they call for help?"

Jiong shrugged. "I do not know, Commander. I suspect if they could they would have. If what Executor Palin told us was correct, however, Benezia will undoubtedly have found some way to draw off or engage the other defensive fleets."

From his own position near another status display, Palin cursed. "Sirefucking traitors!"

Admiral Ithia looked up. "What is it, Executor?"

The turian looked very near to actual panic. "I just got reports from the C-SEC Security Center, some turians there started screaming Saren's name and purged the VI guidance networks for the security bots. We only have about five hundred up and running, the rest are now in six hour reboot and rebuild cycle! And Benezia's forces will reach the center in less than a minute!"

Ithia paled herself, and Shepard stepped up. "What is the Security Center? I thought you controlled everything from here?"

The asari sighed. "No. Due to ... bureaucratic issues, the defense of the Citadel is very split up. The Tower Security center controls access and defense to the Tower only. The Security Center for C-SEC that he speaks of controls the Citadel's defenses ... such as the ability to open and close the Ward Arms and open the blast doors to the Presidium."

Shepard bit her lip. "I need options, Jiong, strategic ones."

The Commissar was himself thinking. "We still do not know Benezia's ultimate goal – without that we cannot predict her. Can this Vigil tell us nothing?"

The glowing sphere pulsed faintly. "Not at present. My attention is occupied with attempting to slow the activations of the Conduit to limit her forces arriving, and transferring the last of my functions across to this avatar when it is open. I do not have any information on this Citadel or where Benezia's target might be found, but the Tower seems an obvious choice. In short order Ilos will be destroyed...but I fear the forces she has brought are still enough to accomplish her plans, given the lack of defenses here."

Jiong sighed. "If that fleet overwhelms the Citadel fleet, they will be able to land forces at the docks and march to the Presidium. If she holds the control center at that point, she can simply let them in. I strongly doubt the Tower can take a prolonged siege from thousands of geth...stopping the Conduit forces from entering will only slow the inevitable."

Shepard sighed, turning back to the asari. "Can you get messages out? Is anyone capable of helping?"

The asari stared back. "No. Just after your departure, several large geth fleets engaged our primary defenses. The main Citadel Fleets were all heavily engaged, so were the Turian First, Second and Third Fleets. More geth armadas are attacking Thessia, Irune, Sur'kesh, and there scattered reports of weak thrusts into the Traverse and even at Omega. Upwards of sixty five dreadnaughts and over ten thousand other ships. We thought honestly that they couldn't have any more ships...but this..."

The turian next to her scowled. "We can't even assist the fleet by launching fighters – the docks are all in the Wards, probably sabotaged by now. And any assistance would have to fight through the geth already assaulting the systems that lead to relay points coming to Widow."

Shepard scowled. "The Human Fifth Fleet wouldn't."

The asari snorted. "Your government has already told us they cannot assist, as they themselves have come under assault." She paused, her pale blue eyes narrowing. "...there is one possibility, but I strongly doubt they will response positively. The Quarian Fleet is nearby, in human space. They might fight the geth, but given the Citadel's hostility to the Admiralty ..."

Shepard smirked. "Send the message to Admiral Rael'Zorah. Tell him his daughter is aboard the Citadel and surrounded by geth."

Tali narrowed her eyes. "Shepard, that geth fleet could do serious damage to the Migrant Fleet...and my people have no where else to go, or any way to defend our civilian ships if our combat ships are destroyed."

Shepard turned to face her. "I know, Tali. But I can't see any other possible assistance. Things are flying out of fucking control here, and I'm starting to feel like Benezia has had this shit planned out to a T and we're just reacting."

O-OSaBC-O

With a flicker of motion, the warp sword tore through the JOTUN mech's chest, searing warp fire scouring it's electronic internals and sending it crashing to the ground.

Benezia let the fire die, rising from her stance to glance around, before turning to the Prime unit next to her. "Status, Prime 302?"

The Prime was still recovering from the shock of whatever had just happened on Ilos – barely half the force had transited through the Conduit when he lost all communication with the geth there and the Conduit itself went suddenly dark. "Progress is within acceptable parameters, Benezia-Prophet. Enclosure gates to Presidium shut. Subversive elements have disabled war-form response units. Geth units en route to siege shield power generators, ETA four hundred seconds. Communications with Glory-to-Nazara Fleet established, space superiority achieved. Security center is taken, we have disabled the ability to close the station arms except by your order."

She nodded, sheathing her weapon. Losing half her initial strike force was not crippling – she'd deliberately overestimated what she needed to take the Presidium anyway. Still, Shepard was proving to be a very annoying complication to what was already an over-complicated plan. She had no doubt that Shepard was responsible for the debacle on Ilos, and was looking forward to pulling the human apart biotically.

She focused her rage, forcing herself to concentrate on the here and now. "Status on deactivating the Widow Relay to block any reinforcements?"

The Prime unit ducked it's eyeflaps. "In progress. However, we have received scout warnings – a large force of Creator war-vessels is headed for the Bekenstein Relay. They will arrive before we are able to shut down the relay."

She merely smiled beneath her battle mask. "I strongly doubt a group of shot-up ancient relics will be able to do much to affect the battle, Prime 302. Still, redouble your efforts. Is the fleet in position for bombardment yet?"

Prime 302 looked up at Citadel Tower. "It is approaching position. Nazara-Giver-Of-Future is engaging the Inusannon/Prothean/Asari hybrid vessel and the combat has required a course change. Estimates indicate the team disabling/destroying the siege shield generators will complete their task roughly nine hundred seconds prior to bombardment. Damage estimates indicate the lower tower will be badly damaged and the elevator systems disabled. Suppression of tower defenses will be 92% or greater."

She nodded. "Then have the specialist assault force ready. Loose the Destroyers, to tie up the defenders who will be protecting civilians, and – " She paused as Prime 302 jerked several times. "What is it?"

"An unknown data intruder. They have overridden control of two Presidium blast shield doors. Defenders are swarming inwards." It paused. "The signature of the data intrusion is similar to certain salarian STG and black-market technical packages."

Benezia scowled. The Shifter, Edat Kurass, a powerful salarian crime lord, was aboard the station. Of course the insect would interfere. "Send a strike force to the Vertica Sector of the Presidium, locate and destroy the hacker." She exhaled, walking herself through the Mantras of Tide. A moment later she closed her eyes. "Detail off most of the Destroyers to hold back the incoming defenders. The rest of the strike force will head to the generators, and we'll move as one to assault the tower after bombardment."

Prime 302 gave an agreeable sound. "That will leave defenses at the C-SEC security center weakened."

She shrugged. "It can't be helped. If Nazara would stop dancing in the waves and get here, this would be over quicker." She was puzzled, as the tight, smothering connection she'd had with the Reaper had been very weak on Ilos and had not reasserted itself even after she got to the Citadel. It was worrying ... and she had to wonder if her mind was as clear as she had thought it was.

It didn't matter. She had to preserve the race, and to avenge her bondmate. Opening her eyes once more, she made a brisk motion. "Inform the geth fleet to move ahead with the pod launches and land additional forces on the Citadel. We'll have to hope that's enough to counteract any additional defenders. Once they have acknowledged, let's go."

O-OSaBC-O

The surprising news that two blast doors to the Wards had suddenly opened had lessened the tension Shepard felt in her gut, and allowed her to control her jangling nerves.

Shepard turned to her team. "Looks like someone else is on our side. There's nothing we can do here...but we can take back that C-SEC security center. Jiong, rustle up Strike Leader Kal'Reegar and Senior Chief Vega for me."

The Commissar departed, and she turned to the rest of her team. "We don't know where Benezia is, and frankly I'm not sure we could stop her if we did. Our best bet is to thwart whatever bullshit she's planning for as long as possible, and hope she wears herself down enough to the point we can take her. From what I understand there's about fifteen or so other Spectres here, plus most of the soldiers – she won't just walk through them. And Spectres are out there hunting her ass down right now. Maybe one of them will get lucky."

Liara shook her head sadly. "My mother spent a great deal of time working with a Spectre, one Tela Vasir, just before I was born." She hesitated. "I have wondered if she is my aithntar. Regardless, she is familiar with Spectres, Sara, and we cannot assume they will be enough to stop her."

Shepard shrugged, as a broadly-built quarian male and Senior Chief Vega returned, followed by Jiong. "Doesn't matter. Kal'Reegar, are your men ready to fight geth?"

The quarian tilted his head. "I think I can talk them into it, ma'am. The Captain told us to provide you with whatever you needed, not to mention Admiral Rael'Zorah would do worse than kill me if we let his daughter come to harm." He chuckled as Tali dipped her head. "What can we do?"

Shepard pulled up the image of the C-SEC Command center on her omni. "Geth have taken C-SEC, and the Security center there, along with what sounds like brainwashed turians and asari, probably Saren's and Benezia's nutjob followers. There's at least two hundred of them, plus geth." She paused to gesture to Vigil. "This is an advanced .. ah, VI system we found on Ilos. If we can get it there, I think it can override the hacks on the rest of the Ward blast doors, and maybe even get the defense bots up and running again."

Vega nodded, rubbing his chin. "If we get the doors all open, then the Citadel Defense troops can get back in and shut that bitch down."

Shepard nodded, killing the omnitool display. "That's the idea, Senior Chief." She glanced around. "With ... Alenko gone, and Cole, we don't really have a BDO. I need Jiong to back up Wrex and Tali, and I'll be with Garrus and Liara." She paused. "I hate to take your biotic support, Vega, but we're most likely to run into bad trouble with our small units. Telanya will be with my team." She glanced at Vega. "Haln's out, how good is Corpsman Haskins with a rifle?"

Vega shrugged. "Laura can hold her own."

She nodded. "Put her with Jiong, Wrex, and Tali. Take the rest of your men and support Kal'Reegar here. Jiong, my team will lead, breaking their lines. I need you to flank and have Tali provide tech harassment and Wrex to fling shockwaves while you cover the quarians moving into position. Once we've breached the outer corridors, we'll use Cold Spear tactics and then shift to Broken Fist."

The quarian folded his arms. "I'm afraid I'm not familiar with Alliance parlance, ma'am."

Shepard paused, shaking her head at her own stupidity. "Sorry. Cold Spear is boarding style actions taken with a high-tempo assault and reinforcement theme. Units charge forward with grenades and info-war attacks, using suppressive fire to force openings, then set themselves in cover and use sniping and overlapping fields of fire to hold positions until the second wave arrives, which leap frogs and charges ahead again. Once we've reached the command center, Broken Fist is basically do-or-die assault. We... will take casualties. For the Alliance, Broken Fist is basically kamikaze tactics, we have to do whatever we can to take it out and get those doors open so the Citadel Defense force can get in."

Kal'Reegar gave a sharp whistle, then straightened. "My marines will get it done, ma'am. Most of us have info-war packages we've designed to hopefully give us the edge over the damned geth, and all of us have experience fighting them."

Shepard nodded. "Let's move."

O-OSaBC-O

The Widow Nebula blazed in flashes of light as the geth armada stormed forward, firing as it closed range to the Citadel Defense fleet. Endless waves of stark white ships flowed around the menacing dark bulk of Nazara as it closed range.

Aboard the Destiny Ascension, the command center was quiet as Matriarch Lidanya considered her tactical options. The geth were between her and the Relay, so fleeing with the Council was out, even if that would have been something she could stomach. With the Ascension, the fleet still had a chance, if they could actually take that monstrous black dreadnaught – without the flagship, the Defense Fleet would be crushed in short order.

She sighed. "Orders to the fleet. Dreadnaughts are to remain at long range and attempt to evade damage, concentrate fire on heavy cruisers. Light cruisers and battle cruisers, flanking screens, heavy cruisers, line of battle at bearing one five zero tac twenty, full spread of missiles." She closed her eyes. "Destroyers and frigates are authorized to attempt ramming tactics against geth dreadnaughts. We'll handle the black ship. Bring us to one five five tac nine, mark thirty. Ordinance, you may fire the Wrath of Athame cannon when ready."

The ponderous form of the Destiny Ascension rotated, the main spiral-shaped accumulators of the primary gun glowing in restrained fury for several seconds before detonating forth, vomiting out a storm of reactive mass pellets, each one containing a packet of antimatter. The blast raced across the void to strike Nazara squarely, pale white fire racing over shielding of some sort before fading into darkness.

The bridge was a circular pit, with her seat raised high above it all, sensor and tactical technicians ensconced in pod-like enclosures off to the sides, battle coordinators overseeing a complex battle map below. One of the techs sighed and spoke, her voice weary and frightened. "Matriarch, direct hit on the black ship. No effect noted."

Lidanya snarled, then her eyes widened as a blast of red hellish fire lanced out, rocking the ship and sending damage alarms cascading across her status board. "Report!"

"Some kind of ... hydrodynamic liquid metal strike, ma'am. Went through the shields like they were nothing, severe damage to number three launch bay."

She snarled. "Engage the mag-screens, and bring up the missile repeaters, use the Ancients missiles, vortex spread." She smiled coldly as the ships lighting dimmed and a glorious flare of hundreds of lights appeared along the wing-fins of the ship, dozens of missiles lancing out.

The black ship arrogantly moved forward, not bothering with ECM or evasive maneuvers, until the missiles struck it. Each one was tipped with a tiny fleck of contained neutronium, a staggering expense for the asari. Not in the entire history of the ship had even one needed to be launched, but she had just fired fifty of them. Each one detonated in eerie black-tinged explosions of fury, and red lighting erupted across the surface of the dreadnaught as it staggered, it's tentacles wavering in agitation and black plating spiraling into space.

"Eat that, you bottom feeding shathrat. Target areas of damage, full barrage with the mass drivers." She gritted her teeth as the ship shook again, this time as multiple lines of red fire lanced out to sear the ship. The magnetic shields were holding, barely, but glowing hot splashes of metal, each moving at a third of the speed of light, still scored the hull, burning through in dozens of small breaches.

For Nazara, the fight was frustration made tangible. His sensors had reported the damnable ship as soon as he'd arrived. The thing was like a Terran cockroach, it had started it's life as the Inusannon flagship, and the Protheans had found the wreckage and rebuilt it into their own. Somehow the damned thing had escaped the final battle at Hadespoint and been placed where the Asari could find it and retrofit it again.

As a result, it was actually able not only to withstand multiple strikes of his Godtouched weapons, but even hurt him. The damage was minor, but the sheer effrontery of these insects made Nazara forget his cool plans to bypass everything to reach the Tower. He decided instead to teach these pitiful creatures a lesson in fear, and spread his arms, gathering his energies to strike this pest down.

He was growing tired of having to obliterate the same vessel over and over.

The geth, on the other hand, were icy-cool in their assault on the Citadel Fleet. Shots and missiles blazed back and forth across the purple-tinged void, mass rounds that missed slamming into the Citadel itself, either bouncing harmlessly off of it's invincible hull or striking the Wards, causing untold destruction. Geth fighters tangled with turian claw fighters, while dreadnaughts engaged in long-range sniping, each trying to decimate the enemy forces.

The lead geth dreadnaught, the Unlimited Focus of Reason, had managed to bypass most of the fighting, ranging shots here and there but focusing on closing range to the Citadel. It got within range and huge doors along it's sides slid open, revealing rank after rank of smoothly shaped pods, which began firing in rapid clouds towards the Citadel.

Too heavily engaged with the geth to stop them, and already beginning to lose ground, the Citadel Defense Fleet could only watch as hundreds of geth assault pods began crashing into the wards, each one unleashing more geth soldiers.

O-OSaBC-O

Aboard the Alarei, Admiral Rael'Zorah glared at the message displayed on his comm screen, before looking up at the rest of the Admiralty Board. "As commander of the Migrant Fleet, I am of course inclined to order us into combat. However, I need feedback from each of the fleet commanders before I decide what forces to send."

The figure of Zaal'Koris, dressed in bright whites as usual, sighed. "While I disagree with the direction we've taken in the past towards the geth, I'm willing to admit I am wrong. What they are doing now is not something I can countenance. The Civilian Fleet is currently safe within Human space, and if our Liveships are not in danger I see no reason to keep back the rest of the fleets, but I would strongly suggest not committing my fleet to the battle in case things go ... poorly."

Rael'Zorah nodded. "My thoughts as well. You will hold your forces in Human space ... and if that becomes dangerous, flee to the Traverse and attempt to find an uncharted world." He turned to Shala'Raan. "And the Patrol Fleet?"

She snorted. "Don't be a flek-head like your father. Little Tali is in danger, and the geth are threatening us all. I will detail off a quarter of the Patrol fleet as escorts to the Civilian Fleet, and the rest will follow you into battle."

He nodded and locked gazes with Daro'Xen and Han'Gerrel. "I already know what you're going to say, and the answer is no. I will not be staying with the Civilian Fleet while these monsters threaten my daughter. Han, you'll have tactical command of the Heavy Fleet, but you will defer to my orders, am I clear?"

The other admiral nodded, his slender frame seemingly powerless against the huge Rael'Zorah's gaze. "O-of course. I just wanted to say I know that I have been a bit ... confrontational recently, but I was afraid of something like this happening. I will work with you to make sure we deal with our mistakes once and for all."

With that Rael fixed his gaze on Daro'Xen. "If you have tricks or toys that can kill or disable the geth, use them – but we are not here to gather data."

She gave a subtle, quiet nod. "If you wish, I will comply."

Rael'Zorah folded his massive arms. "This is not only our chance to apply pressure to the geth and even break their strength, but to regain status with the Citadel races and show our potential human allies our strength. The Fleet will not falter. Move out immediately, in Starlight-Falling assault patterns, I want to hit the relay in twenty minutes."

He watched the admirals depart, except for Zaal'Koris. "Yes?"

The smaller, older quarian tilted his head in a respectful gesture. "I trust you are being objective in our goals in this, Rael? I know your Tali is aboard the Citadel, but we cannot afford you to lose ... perspective."

The big admiral snorted angrily. "Do you think I would agree to this if she wasn't there, Zaal? No matter what, the Fleet is not going to get out of this battle unscathed. Many of us will die in a few minutes, and the entire fleet is likely to be shattered for decades. They mentioned her name in the message knowing it would affect me, and it did." He clenched his fist. "And yet ... if we succeed, then maybe it will all be worth it. Geth broken, and the quarian people respected again."

Zaal shrugged. "Or we could lose everything. As I said, I won't challenge your decision, and I'm coming along with the Qwib-Qwib, which can put up a good fight."

Rael'Zorah merely sighed. "I really wish you'd change the name of that ship."

O-OSaBC-O

In the now deserted Council Chambers, Aethyta knelt, her warp sword laid in front of her as she meditated. She heard the sounds of heavy fighting, the blasts of missiles and the screaming of civilians, but tuned it all out.

With a slow motion she stood and pulled off her brown Vasir robes, letting them fall to the ground. She now wore a suit of commando leathers, the surface covered in linked small metal plates, each one edged in bright blue eezo. Heavy metal guards over her forearms and shins matched thick plates of metal across her shoulders, and with a sigh she cut her finger with a small knife at her belt and carefully smeared the ritual marks of kin-slayer and oath-breaker across her cheeks.

Checking her sword one final time before sheathing it, she kicked her robes off the platform, watching disinterestedly as they fell to the garden area far below. With a pulse of biotic energy the armor she wore began to glow, faint panels of biotic force now sheathing her torso, legs, and arms.

She gave a faint smile to no one at all, and set herself into the first stance of the Searaptor's Scream. "Alright, Nezy, it's your move."

She pulsed her biotics as strongly as she could, a challenge any asari could feel.

O-OSaBC-O

Nearly to the section of the Presidium where the power generators and regulators for the siege shields of the Tower were, Benezia paused, reeling slightly from a pulse of biotic energy.

The Prime next to her stopped as she did, examining her. "Benezia-Prophet?"

Benezia cursed softly under her breath. "It is nothing except another complication. Proceed with the assault as planned. It appears we will have very significant opposition at the Tower."

The Prime did not understand how she could know this, but instead sought to prepare. "Nature of threat?"

Benezia's face twisted beneath her crystal battle mask, into what could be called a smile.

"Someone who knows better."

O-OSaBC-O

Jiong, Shepard, Wrex and Telanya all felt the biotic pulse, but it didn't affect them as strongly as it did Liara, who stumbled to a confused halt.

Shepard frowned. "Liara? Was that Benezia?"

Liara shook her head in confusion. "N-no. It was...it was a ritual used by the Thirty, when one challenges another. A .. calling, I suppose, like a signal flare, but customized to the user." Liara's eyes were troubled. "The ... the call was one used by ... bondmates."

Shepard frowned, not understanding. "But ... "

Liara looked up at the distant Citadel Tower, small fists clenching in confusion and hurt. "My aithntar, who ever they are, just challenged my mother to face her."

Shepard didn't say anything for a few moments, then pinched the bridge of her nose. "I really, really wish any of this shit made sense."

Vigil pulsed. "We must hurry, human. I can feel the filthy taint of indoctrinated thralls ahead, and the battle in the commons is growing out of control."

Shepard glanced to her right, where C-SEC and a handful of war robots were battling it out with Destroyers and geth. Interestingly there were others joining – a handful of turian soldiers, several dozen asari, and more than a few men in stark black and white armor with a triangular red symbol on their armor.

Shepard was about to continue when Wrex suddenly growled. It wasn't his usual calm rumble, this sounded violent and almost lethal. She half-turned, seeing Wrex had gone rigid at the sight of another krogan, this one in plain black robes, as it backhanded a geth out of its way.

"Wrex?"

Her voice made the big krogan twitch, and with a grunt he half-turned. "You'll have to do this without me, Shepard."

She frowned, but he had already begun to walk off. "Wrex!"

He gave her a narrow look, one that seemed old and somehow sad. "Shepard." Something in his voice stopped her, and she simply looked at him again. His body was tense and he was trembling.

She didn't know what it was, but he was not going to back down, even for her. "...go. We'll be at the Command Center waiting for you."

She couldn't stop now, even for whatever demanded Wrex's attention, and directed her troops on, but looked back to see Wrex approaching the black robed krogan and shaking with rage.

O-OSaBC-O

Okeer could not contain his mirth at the sight of Urdnot Wrex, stomping over to him like the petulant child the boy was. The fool was actually just going to walk up and challenge him in single combat, rather than have the large force of troops he'd been accompanying shoot him to death.

Well, when Tuchanka gave you prey, you didn't complain. A few words should get the boy into a proper mindless blood rage rather than coming at him smart...

"Ah, yes. Another pitiful Urdnot come to die, I see. Your great-sire died screaming like a burnt shratha when I broke his spine over my knee, and that boy of yours..."

As expected, the krogan lost it, screaming as he charged, firing the massive shotgun in his hands recklessly. Okeer clucked, his shields handling the first blast, and he withdrew his pistol smoothly.

He leapt back from Wrex's clumsy charge and placed two shots carefully into the arm-mounted biotic amplifier on Wrex's gauntlet. "Can't have you using those nasty biotics on me, can we boy?"

Wrex fired, the shotgun blast shattering the shield but striking the robes. Okeer grunted, but didn't shift. He was pleasantly surprised that the armored robes stood up so well. He'd have to send the Shadow Broker a bonus, he supposed.

Wrex was dumbfounded at the lack of effect his weapon had, and that's all the opening Okeer needed. Moving with speed that would shock those unfamiliar with krogan, he managed to grapple the other krogan down, using a twist-lock on Wrex's wrist to wrench the shotgun away. With a disdainful flick of his massive arm, he hurled it away, following it with his own pistol. "You are not worth killing with a weapon, Wrex. I will end your line here, with my bare hands."

"Okeer, you are filth. The Clans should have ended you before I was even born. You killed my son! You killed our people!" Wrex charged again, swinging his arms in a scything arc, but Okeer danced aside, blocking two punches and driving his elbow into a spot on the krogan's spine, making Wrex stumble.

"Pathetic child, you don't even understand how outclassed you are." Okeer effortlessly dodged more wild swings from the smaller krogan before catching one of the punches. Torquing around he twisted Wrex's arm, resulting in a resounding crack and a cry of agony from the mercenary, before headbutting him violently, sending Wrex flying backwards.

He flexed his muscles experimentally. "I have been fighting for millennia, boy. I was old when your idiotic grand sire thought to declare war on the galaxy, and I was old when the Salarians first came to our world to 'uplift' us to be slaves. You and your kind have never been anything but rock-headed, screaming morons." Okeer grinned in a feral manner. "Is it any surprise your own father tried to kill you?"

Wrex got to one knee, wrenching his arm back into socket, wincing against the pain of the cracked bone and the itch of regeneration. "You talk too much." With a fast launch, he hurled himself forward, managing to duck under Okeer's counter to slam his fist with all his might into the larger krogan's stomach.

His eyes widened in pain and shock as his fist slammed into the flimsy robes with a sharp crack, feeling knuckles break, and the big warlord gave a rumbling laugh. "Dim, just like your father." With a backhand that felt like a building, Okeer struck Wrex aside again, sending him skidding across the metal decking to slam hard into a wall.

His vision swam for a moment, as Wrex spit blood and gritted his teeth. Okeer was just standing there, laughing at him. He'd laughed off shotguns blasts, ruined his chance to use biotics, and was treating him as if he was a joke.

Urv's wide red eyes flashed across his memory again and with a roar Wrex was up, battling back pain to charge again.

---

Chapter 119: Chapter 110 : Citadel, Conflict

---

A/N: Probably the last update for a day or two, not sure yet.

The perspective shifts will slow. As I've explained in a couple of PM's, I really don't know if I have the energy to drag things out for several more chapters just to cover all the chaos that occurs in the Battle of the Citadel. I'm not trying to compromise quality for speed, but I am aware that end of year gets busy and I'd like to have this done well before that point.

Here's hoping I can finish this thing up in a manner you all approve of :D

---

The assault to retake C-SEC security control was, as Shepard expected, brutal.

The initial rush went very well – she was pleasantly surprised by the fire discipline and nasty info-war tricks of the quarian marines, as well as the power of the electroplasma weapons they used. It was like an entire group of pissed off Tali-analogues, except with better aim.

The downside was that they didn't deal with heavy injuries very well, but Chakwas had enough practice from working with Tali that she was able to mitigate any deaths, at least.

The outside of the building was littered with corpses and flickering flames from explosions, mostly C-SEC dead. The outer defenders were geth troopers, who fell in scores from the heavy fire from the quarian marines. Shepard and Liara combined biotic warp blasts to literally melt the heavily reinforced door that lead inside, and with quick motions, Kal'Reegar sent in scout patrols before the main body hustled in behind them.

The C-SEC corridors rang with the sounds of battle – some of the C-SEC officers inside were still fighting the geth, it seemed. On a snap judgment call, Shepard detailed Jiong's team to take a third of the marines and try to back them up. She had Chakwas go with that group as well, to offer medical assistance. Her own group proceeded directly ahead, while the Normandy Marines and the rest of the quarians cut deeper into the main facility in a clockwise fashion.

Garrus ducked under a spray of geth plasma darts and returned fire in short bursts, taking out a geth, sending sprays of white fluid over a nearby status panel. The narrow corridors opened up into the central drum of the HQ, limiting their cover. "This is bad, Shepard, C-SEC wasn't really designed for shootouts. Not enough cover and lots of things that blow up when shot."

She chuckled, shifting her Revenant to her back and pulling her ODIN out. "That's what you get for not being paranoid, Chicken. Which way to the security center?"

He pointed to the second level, where a Prime stood, shielded by a piled wall of rubble and supported by several turians and two geth with missile launchers. "Through that door. Long corridor past that, offices mostly, then a status monitoring systems room. The computers are on the far side of it."

She glanced at Liara and Telanya. "We need barriers, and you'll have to keep the bad guys from taking me out when I do my thing."

Telanya gave a confused look. "Your...thing?"

Liara sighed in exasperation. "Suicidal assaults."

Shepard smirked. "Aw, Liara, don't be like that." Gripping her ODIN tightly, she nodded. "Get ready."

She stepped out first, throwing a blast of warp fire towards the two missile geth, even as Garrus rolled out of the hallway to a nearby console. His sniper rifle was already moving, a shot taking a geth sniper in the arm, smoothly rotating through a flat arc to fire again at another geth. The shot blasted through its armor to hit a second geth behind it, sending both crashing to the ground with cries of digital distress.

Liara and Telanya hurled throws before erecting a barrier field, just in time to stop a hail of incoming fire. Shepard watched as the Prime began to move from its position, the heavy plasma cannon in its hands shifting. With a yell she flashed into a streak of blue, slamming into the two geth with missile launchers behind it.

One was literally smashed into the wall and crushed, the other clipped and staggering. She fired a single shot from the ODIN directly into its head, blasting it away, before dropping her shotgun and grabbing its missile launcher and firing several times in a row directly into the back of the Prime.

The blasts sent her reeling, losing her grip on the launcher, skidding a dozen feet into the wall behind her, shields battered. But she smiled with glee as she saw the Prime stagger to its knees, much of its back blasted apart and torrents of white fluid sluicing down its ravaged armor. She shouted. "Garrus, take down!"

Two sniper shots rang out. The first flared against the weakened shields of the Prime, but the second struck true, the high explosive round going up with a heavy bang, the entire curved head assembly of the Prime blown open. Shepard scrambled to her feet as the turians below began firing at her.

She ducked into a roll, as several rounds struck her shields, and pulled out Saren's pistol from her belt, firing twice. Twin red blasts roared out, the first striking the left turian in the chest and blowing off most of his arm and head, the second striking squarely on the other turian's lower torso, bisecting him and blasting a hole in the floor.

She stared at the carnage, then back at the pistol. "Holy shit." She grinned and got to her feet, pausing to pick up her ODIN, and watched as Liara hurled a singularity into a group of geth, crushing them.

Telanya and Garrus were picking off a few last geth, but other than that the room was empty. Shepard frowned, and checked her omni. "Jiong, status."

The voice of the commissar was tense but quiet. "Some resistance, but not as much as expected. Light injuries so far, no casualties. We've reached the C-SEC personnel – most of them got massacred, but there are still quite a few here, as well as some of the criminals. According to them the attack was lead by those krogan-rachni things we saw on Vormire, but they pulled out after a while."

Shepard cursed. "That means they're hitting other targets while we're here. Alright, get your people and theirs organized and move to defend the entrance once you've suppressed any hostiles. I just took out a Prime unit, so it may be easier."

Garrus and Telanya were approaching, followed by Liara, who paused to use her pistol to terminate a still twitching geth unit. Shepard gestured to the door even as she commed Kal'Reegar. "Status?"

The quarian marine's voice was loud over the sound of heavy fire. "Got us a firefight here, Commander, a Colossus was down here blowing up C-SEC's aircar and vehicle fleet. We've got him pinned with missile launchers, but it's got a shield/repair protocol and taking this thing is going to take a while. If we can do it though, we'd have air-cars and armored ground units. I've lost a couple of men, but we're holding strong."

She nodded. "Jiong has suppressed the hostiles in the main area, and is linking up with C-SEC survivors. Have him assist you if you need it, we're headed to security. And keep your eyes open, according to C-SEC, there were ... um, super-heavy infantry here not too long ago. If you see something that looks like a krogan with scales or tentacles, treat it like you would a Colossus Seriously."

Kal'Reegar's voice was a touch confused but still firm. "Understood. You do what you have to, we'll take down this big bosh'tet."

She clicked off, as Garrus was fiddling with the door. "They hacked it pretty good, but..." He adjusted his omnitool several times, and then the door snicked open. "...I'm still better."

Shepard rolled her eyes.

O-OSaBC-O

Wrex charged again, blindly screaming his hate, and Okeer sneered, sidestepping the rush and reaching out to put the fool boy into an armlock.

Only for Wrex to grin at the last second and activate his omni-blade, slicing away one of Okeer's fingers cleanly before smashing an activating omni-shield on his other arm into Okeer's face.

Blinded and burned by the shield, Okeer staggered back, unable to stop a follow up rising slash that seared hot fire through his mouth. A brutal series of punches followed, stronger than anything Okeer had ever been struck with before, and he skidded back, groaning.

"Just because you're old doesn't mean you're god, Ganar filth."

With a grunt, Okeer got to his feet, wiping blood from his mouth and spitting out a fractured tooth, eyeing Wrex cautiously. He noted the slightly altered stance of the mercenary, and recognized it dimly as some form of asari war stance.

It clicked. Even shorn of his neural amplifier, Wrex was a natural biotic. He might not have enough strength to throw warps or shockwaves, but he could certainly augment his strength and speed with biotics, giving him more power to strike with.

Combined with a very sturdy looking omni-blade and that omni-shield, this was going to be irritating. Okeer grunted and stood to his full eight foot tall height, towering over the smaller krogan.

"I was going to be merciful and give you a quick death, boy. Now I'll have to drag it out." With a flicker, his own omni-blade activated, a narrow, needle like weapon. He set himself into a different battle stance and lifted his wounded hand, noting absently the bleeding had already stopped. "Show me what passes for courage among the feeble Urdnot."

Wrex leapt, a weak pulse of biotics flaring as he did so, leading with the omnishield. Okeer managed to duck under it and slash, the needle-like blade scoring deeply into Wrex's armor and drawing blood, but took a savage bash from the edge of the omnishield. His kinetic bodysuit stiffened with the blow, and unable to dodge due to that, Okeer was unable to evade the counter-strike from Wrex, an underhand slash from the blade that carved a good four inches into his side.

They circled each other, slashing and feinting. Okeer's strength was still far greater than Wrex's, capable of hurting the krogan and breaking bones even through his armor, and his omniblade was starting to weaken the omnishield. But every exchange resulted in Okeer taking slashes and stabs, and biotic-augmented kicks, each one slowly overloading the kinetic body suit that was his only protection. As it began to take damage it locked up for longer and longer periods of time, making Okeer's flexibility and speed more difficult to employ.

Both krogan lost track of time as they battled, Wrex snarling as he parried a slash a few inches from his eye, Okeer smirking as he flipped the mercenary head over heels with a tricky throw and stomped the krogan's ankle, snapping it. Wrex managed to roll away from a stab to his head and kicked the back of Okeer's knee, forcing him into a stumble that ended painfully when Wrex slammed his omnishield into Okeer's face again and again.

With a roar Okeer backhanded him away, burns on his face from the energy discharges smoking. Wrex landed roughly but rolled to his feet, grinning.

The boy was better than I originally thought, Okeer had to grudgingly admit to himself.

Wrex's charges had looked as crazed at the first, but between his biotic help and those weapons, much of Okeer's advantage in size, speed and power was being nullified. Okeer had not expected the boy to have upgraded his omnitool to have both a top-quality omniblade and a very strong omnishield.

Okeer's own omniblade was tuned more for surgical focus than brute combat, and he had been forced to draw upon several martial arts styles to counter.

With a mutual snarl combat restarted, Okeer seeking now to use his blade to harry Wrex's joints and hamstrings, while Wrex focused on deep stabs and slashes to chip away at Okeer's stamina. The battle had been vicious and both of the krogan were now littered with bruises, stabs, and more serious wounds. But to Okeer's dismay he was getting the worst end of the exchanges, his more limited armor doing less to block the omni-blade stabs, and had been hurt enough that his speed was falling, and Wrex was growing more confident.

Finally losing patience, Okeer gambled and used an obscure drell maneuver to feint Wrex into stabbing, then brought both hands together in a scissoring submission hold. Wrex managed to throw him off, but in the confusion Okeer focused and drove his own omni-blade directly into Wrex's omni-tool.

Wrex's own omni-blade blade died with a sputter of smoke, but not before Wrex had driven the blade directly into Okeer's chest, piercing his lower heart. With a roar Wrex picked up Okeer, and his strength driven by the blood rage and his own sorrow, cracked the krogan over his knee and hurled him away.

Okeer crumbled to the ground, getting up with great difficulty, blood leaking from his mouth. He glared at Wrex, blood stained teeth bared to the air, and felt the flickers of the blood rage attempt to overwhelm him. While he still had his own omni-blade, Wrex's shield would nullify it, and Okeer didn't think his spine had taken that last assault very well. Agony was spreading through his ancient form, and he realized with alarm that he was going to lose this fight to this ignorant, thuggish child.

His eyes slitted in hate, but he said nothing, and Wrex actually grinned. "You are not so chatty now, Ganar dog." Wrex's voice was vicious, as he slowly moved towards Okeer, eyes narrowed.

Okeer snarled, then his keen vision caught something in the distance behind Wrex. With a suppressed grin, he raised his hands in the krogan gesture of submission and knelt. "Very well, Urdnot. You are superior. I submit."

Wrex spat blood, letting his omnishield power down and drawing his honor blade from his boot sheath. "I have no reason to honor the Felling, Okeer. You die."

Unable to master his expression, Okeer merely sneered. "I think not, my boy."

Wrex instinctively knew something was wrong, and threw himself to one side, but not swiftly enough to avoid the hail of heavy fire that tore into him, blasting away pieces of his armor. He crumbled the ground, bleeding heavily, as Okeer rose and glanced at the squad of salarians in black and gray armor that approached, their armor marked with the symbol of the Shifter. "Ah, it's good to see Edat's eyes haven't failed him."

The squad of salarian mercenaries kept their weapons trained on Wrex, while the leader turned to Okeer. "Ginnister Kurass invites you to join him at the Zakera Ward entrances. We have obtained transport that will get us to the docks, but the situation is growing dire. Benezia's forces have attacked the defensive security center and are now blowing up the generators that provide shielding for the Tower."

Okeer merely nodded. "Very well. Let us depart."

The salarian inclined its head towards the beaten figure of Wrex. "Finish him?"

Okeer's mouth twisted in a grin, and he shook his own head. "Oh, no, my esteemed rescuer. That would be gauche. I want him to remember his failures, and despair." He paused. "Maiming is fine, however."

He walked off, laughing as the salarians emptied their weapons into Wrex a few more times before leading him towards some access corridors to bypass further fighting or interruptions. While he gave some thought to attempting to find his pistol, he shrugged it off as unimportant. What was important was getting off this deathtrap of a station before whatever lunatic plans Benezia had come to fruition.

Several minutes later, Wrex awoke with a grunt of agony, coughing up blood. He glanced around, seeing geth firing on C-SEC patrols in the distance, and several buildings burning or in ruins, but no sign of Okeer or whoever had attacked him.

He attempted to get up, but had to suppress a scream as agony flickered all across his body. His armor was ruined, but he could make out the form of his broken omni in the distance. With grunts of pain and leaving a trail of blood, he dragged himself across the metallic flooring slowly.

He realized halfway there that whatever he'd been shot with was designed to impede krogan regeneration, which meant he was probably going to bleed to death sooner or later, depending on how badly he'd been wounded.

He should have told Shepard. He should have remembered the words of his grand-sire, that vengeance without forethought lead only to failure. He should have just had Shepard's team and soldiers shoot the damnable Ganar patriarch dead in the plaza, pissed on him, and been on his way.

Instead, he'd wanted to make Okeer suffer, and he had been stupid. Even when he'd beaten him, he'd lost, and now ...

Wrex's strength failed, and he couldn't move any more. He lay bleeding and panting in the open, while fires and death raced all around him. His hand slowly clenched into a fist, hot shame and rage flooding him as memories assaulted him.

"Sire, when we will we return to Tuchanka? I miss my clan-brothers." Urv's high-pitched voice, so quiet and polite, yet filled with excitement, made Wrex chuckle as he lightly cuffed the boy on the back of his head.

"We're not. Tuchanka is a dead end right now. The time will come when they realize killing each other over a pile of radioactive rocks is stupid, but for now we stay away. We work and gather funds and fame, and let warriors flock to the banner of Urdrnot among the stars." He paused. "Don't worry, pup, we'll go back soon enough."

Urv looked up at him. "I.. I understand. I just worry that by the time we get there...my friends will all be .. dead."

Wrex frowned and knelt, looking his son in the eye. "Death happens, it comes to us all. We can't let it shape our path, or we become nothing better than blood-drenched berserkers, or cowards. Our people are dying because they cling to death instead of life, pup, and I can't change them until they grow sick of themselves." He paused. "That doesn't mean I've given up on them. And neither should you. Your friends are tough, hard krogan. No matter what, we'll prevail."

Urv nodded and beamed, eyes closing as he smiled. "Yes, sire. And you'll lead them, because you're the greatest!"

Wrex lay there, fist clenched.

Urv's small voice, trembling in pain. "Sire, what does it mean to die"

His eyes blinked back tears.

Okeer's mocking dulcet tones, his smirking visage. "Your great-sire died screaming like a burnt shratha when I broke his spine over my knee, and that boy of yours..."

Blood pooled slowly beneath him.

Shepard's eyes holding his, blazing dark blue holes of fury. "When this is done, we're going to pick up Dunn and Shields, and go find Jackson, and then we're going to find that fucker Okeer and turn his goddamned organs into paste."

The blood rage pulsed in him, even as his vision grew darker. His hearts began to slow.

"And you'll lead them, because you're the greatest!"

Gritting his teeth against the agony, he forced his biotics through his burned nerves, lightening his bulk. He forced himself to move, to drag himself ahead, closer and closer to his omni.

Everything was blood and agony and pain. It lasted for years. Or for a few minutes. He was not sure, but he suddenly lay staring at his scorched omni without any idea of what he had crawled here for, before remembering.

Reaching out with a shaking hand, he tapped it. The blade was dead, and the generator, but the emergency beacon was still working, and he managed to trigger it.

It blipped into life for several seconds...and then the omni gave a series of sparks and it died.

Wrex stared at it blankly for several seconds before giving a weak laugh and closing his eyes. He couldn't taste his own blood any more, found the pain in his legs was giving way to coldness.

He didn't know how long he laid there until a faint vibration disturbed him, followed by a tired sigh. Mumbled words in a language he didn't understand, tinged in exasperation.

He coughed up blood and gasped in pain as someone rolled him over, hearing an indrawn breath followed by what had to be cursing...

He felt the hot sting of some kind of injection and the cool feeling of medigel being pumped into his broken form, small hands moving here and there. With an effort he managed to open his eyes, light hazy and indistinct.

Someone placed an omni-tool on his arm, and with a crackle of his internal feed, he heard the sound of Shield's voice. "Stupid turtle, don't die." He looked up, seeing the blurry form of Beatrice Shields working over him, slapping on med-patches, one arm now replaced with dark cyberware and wearing sleek black armor he knew indicated she worked for the Shadow Broker.

"Reiz, get a goddamned medic over here, he's gone into blood-shock and half his organs have shut down." Shields glanced back down at him, wiping blood out of his face. "Who the fuck beat you like this, Wrex?"

With a rasping breath that felt like axes were embedded in his lungs, he managed to get out a few words. "Okeer. Zakera."

Shields expression darkened, and she lifted her omnitool. "Tazzik. Okeer is on the station and headed to Zakera ward, and he just damn near killed Urdnot Wrex. I need a very bad accident."

A dark voice chuckled back over the comm. "I'll see what I can do, human. But we need to get moving, the last ship is pulling out in twenty. The Broker was clear that staying around would probably end up in death."

She snorted. "Broker and you can run, Tazzik, but I'm getting Wrex out of here." She clicked off and turned back to Wrex, her long dark hair falling around her face, framing her features. "Hang on, big guy. Help's coming."

Wrex closed his eyes, unable to hang on to conscious thought any more, bursts of pain overwhelming him.

O-OSaBC-O

"Admiral Ithia! We just lost power to the outer defenses and siege shielding! The generators have been destroyed!"

The asari admiral closed her eyes, sitting down at her command table. She gave a last, bitter smile, as she knew exactly what was going to happen.

"Admiral?"

Her voice was tired. "Evacuate the tower. Hurry."

The turian commander of the defense force gave her a scowl. "We cannot retreat and allow the Tower to fall, Admiral. That -"

He never got to finish his sentence, as seventeen high-explosive mass rounds fired from six geth dreadnaughts struck the tower base at that moment, incinerating everyone within.

In the distance, Benezia's primary force approached, cutting down the last C-SEC defenders and a pair of Spectres. Prime 302 marched alongside Benezia, chassis still smoking from having to fend off an angry Shadow Broker biotic. "The Tower Defenses have been suppressed. Additionally, we will not need to seal the elevator shafts – they have been crushed by the impacts. Prime 4402 was able to adjust the impact performance ratios to ensure improved efficiency."

Benezia nodded. "Excellent work. Saren wasn't sure the shafts could be damaged, but this saves time. With the defending forces trapped below or killed, nothing will stop our ascent. Have the specialty geth with mag-clamp boots accompany us, along with the Triune."

Prime 302 nodded. "Increasing amounts of Citadel forces are entering the Presidium. Tasking?"

She sighed. "The destroyers are pointless now. Have them meet the incoming forces and hold them as long as they can. Your heavy units should form a defensive perimeter around the Tower and stop interference. What is the status of the battle in space?"

Prime 302 paused several seconds. "Nazara-Giver-of-Future is still engaged with the asari flagship, but it has taken severe damage. The fleet has lost 37% of it's forces, but has neutralized 49% of the Citadel Defense fleet. Six thousand geth units have landed in the Wards, another nine thousand are en route. We are detecting Creator vessels nearing the relay to Widow."

Benezia scowled. "I thought I told the units at C-SEC to shut down the relay."

Prime 302 shook it's head. "Units are under assault by forces lead by Shepard-Predator. They have destroyed the controls and forwarded control functions the Tower Master Control."

She nodded, then nodded again. "That's...a very good idea. Move forces to pin Shepard in place, and let us head to the Tower. Once we have access to the Master Control system, we can lock the Citadel arms once Nazara enters and proceed with the final steps."

Prime 302 burst-transmitted a series of orders and turned to face Benezia directly. "Acknowledged. Advisory: additional security forces are being brought online by Citadel defense systems. Odds of success have now dropped to 75.3%. We should engage in haste."

Benezia turned to the battered Citadel Tower, and bit her lip. A part of her hesitated, because she knew who was waiting there, and she didn't want to do this.

But she had no choice, and with a weary sigh she motioned her forces onwards.

O-OSaBC-O

"Mag-shields failing! Second core is offline, engineering decks nine through eleven vented to space!"

"Main battery not responding! Links are down, Matriarch. Secondaries still firing, but we are depleted of Ancient-class missiles and current weapon systems having limited effect!"

Matriarch Lidanya nodded to both reports, nursing her broken arm. The Destiny Ascension was still in the fight, but not for much longer. They had hurt the black ship, repeatedly hammering it with missiles and exotic weapon systems buried deep within the asari flagship, blasting several holes in the huge dreadnaught.

But they had paid for it dearly. A good third of the ship was unresponsive, main engines down to 40%, and a fifth of the crew was dead or wounded – or worse, sucked into vacuum. The Council was aboard and still alive, but there was no way they could take much more pounding.

A huge blast of red energy rocketed through the ship, sending explosions cascading through the hull, screams and cries of agony coming over the comm system. The lights flickered and weakened, and her engineering officer spat curses.

"Matriarch, we just had to kill the main core. We've lost main power and all shields are now .. unresponsive."

Lidanya gave her a weak smile, and sat back in her command chair waiting to die. Surprisingly, however, instead of finishing them off, the black ship merely turned away, headed directly for the Citadel at alarming speeds.

Lidanya stared at the plot, then tried to make sense of the battle. The geth were slowly driving the defense forces back, but had lost several dreadnaughts to suicide attacks. The turian flagship Pride of Palaven was still in the fight, having blasted it's way through dozens of cruisers, and was headed on an intercept course for the black ship along with four other dreadnaughts and a pack of missile cruisers.

Lidanya didn't doubt they would lose, but clearly the captain of the black ship – or the ship itself, if what Aethyta had told them was correct – had other priorities than mere battle. With a curse she motioned to her comm officer. "Orders to the fleet, defensive positions around the Destiny Ascension, going after that thing is pointless."

The asari officer nodded, transmitting. Then she paused, giving a faint smile. "Matriarch – comms from the scouts at the Bekenstein Relay – the quarian fleet just arrived in system and will be here soon."

Lidanya nodded, keeping the relief off her face. She didn't really expect the quarians to help, given that they'd been hounded out of Citadel Space for centuries and treated like third-class citizens for just as long. She also had no illusions that the quarians were probably doing this for starkly pragmatic reasons and would expect some form of compensation.

Goddess, if they could help this nightmare come to an end, she'd let them settle on Thessia itself.

O-OSaBC-O

The defense of the security center was more challenging for Shepard's team – turian snipers, geth flame units, and a pair of those horrid hopper things – but in the end the room was cleared of hostiles.

Shepard grunted as she unbuckled her armor to slap medigel onto her bicep, a wicked shot from one of the turian snipers having sliced right through her armor to deal a heavy graze. She winced against the pain as she flexed it experimentally before resealing her armor and tapping her omni. "Jiong?"

The commissar's voice was steady but tired. "Hostiles suppressed, Commander. Tali took a couple of bad hits and Chakwas is with her now, she should be okay but I don't think she can handle any more fighting. Several quarian marines are badly hurt, and about ten are dead. Deactivated some kind of det-charge in one of the offices set to blow the building to hell and gone, we're checking for more now."

Shepard nodded, watching Garrus and Telanya access various systems, looks of concern on their faces. "Keep in contact, Shepard out." She clicked off. "What's up?"

Garrus growled. "Looks like we have problems, Sheep. I can get two more blast doors to the Wards open, but the one leading into Bachrjet isn't responding – battle damage or sabotage must have cut the link from here to there. I've also managed to get the space-to-space defenses working again, but we don't have enough operators to man the stations and the VI is ... not very good."

Vigil pulsed. "Much like the rest of your primitive technology. Give me a few moments." A slender tendril of silver erupted from Vigil's surface to touch a control console, sinking into the panel a moment later.

Garrus flicked a mandible, then shook his head. "...well. Eighty four percent improvement, that's pretty damned good."

Vigil only pulsed smugly, and Shepard rolled her eyes. "What does that give us, then?"

Garrus tapped a few controls, eyes narrowing at he took in the data. "Still a lot of problems. Systems are shooting down what look like incoming geth drop pods, but a lot have already landed. That will reduce the amount of forces we have incoming to help get past Benezia's troops. Worse, the firefight in space has shot up the Wards pretty bad. Emergency response services are overloaded, and the krogan saboteurs they mentioned earlier blew up several hospitals. Huerta and T'Armal are still working but they are here in the Presidium, getting injured to them will take up more forces."

Telanya cursed sharply. "We have worse issues than that, Commander. The geth and turians here have done something to the primary defense software. The controls to shut and open the Citadel arms and to transmit a shutdown or startup pulse to the Widow mass relay have been slagged, and control forwarded to somewhere in the Citadel Tower itself. The main heavy weapons armories have been locked down and the unlocks are deleted, you can't even hack past them now. Viral codes are compromising security monitoring software all across the Presidium."

Shepard stared at the status display, watching sections of the Wards blink red or yellow. "Options."

Vigil pulsed again. "I have accessed the VI backups for the war robots used by Citadel Defense and am deploying them now, upgrading their software as I do so to bring them up to appropriate fighting trim instead of that pitiful hash you people have the gall to call combat software. They will blunt some of the issues we are having."

Garrus frowned. "Sensors and pickups are showing incoming units headed this way...a lot. Heavy geth platforms."

Shepard shook her head, tapping her omni. "Kal'Reegar, tell me you have good news."

The strike leader's voice was quieter than during the last communication. "Yes, Commander. Took out the big guy and we now have the hangar secured. We've managed to get most of the armored vehicles going, although the armament is more suited to anti-riot than heavy battle. Air-cars too."

Shepard nodded and patched in Jiong. "Everyone move to the C-SEC garages. Vigil, can you prevent anyone from affecting what we have achieved here?"

The silvery ball pulsed several times, and the consoles all went dark. "Yes. I've usurped the functions of these computers. They can be manually repaired and relinked, but the process should take several hours."

She nodded. "We'll mount up. I need enough drivers to man those armored vehicles and tie the incoming geth heavies up in battle, the rest of us are going to hit the air-cars and get to the Tower. I suspect the bitch will have something nasty waiting for us, so let's hope we can ditch in close and get past it. Jiong, have Chakwas, get the wounded – including Tali – over to Huerta. Detail off a few air-cars and some marines for the medevac."

She turned to her team. "Let's move. If those heavies pin us in here they'll blow the building down around us."

O-OSaBC-O

The ascent of the Citadel Tower was more than a little nerve-wracking. The Tower itself jutted off from the Presidium torus, and the incoming fire from the geth had dealt heavy damage to its base and mid section, while breaching the Presidium's walls enough to allow Benezia's team to snake through twisted wreckage and emerge into the void of vacuum. Her own armor, and that of her Triune, was sealed environmentally with shallow energy barriers, while the geth could of course operate without air.

The material that had connected the Tower to the Presidium wasn't the super-dense material forming the outer hull of the ring and the Wards, and the emergency atmosphere barriers erected by the breach were easily bypassed. With power cut, the defensive turrets that usually protected the Tower from such scaling were deactivated, and Saren had known secret codes to access hatches leading into the Council Chambers from the exterior of the Tower.

Thus it was merely minutes of walking steadily ahead, the rasp of respiration the only sound in Benezia's vantage. The firefight in space above their heads was incredible, the quarian fleet having arrived in vast numbers to even the odds, the Citadel Fleet trying to support and pull around the badly damaged asari flagship.

Nazara glided smoothly above them, and Benezia was shocked to see serious damage done to the massive ship, sections of black plating hundreds of feet long splintered and deformed. It connected to the tower via a single tentacle-arm with a shudder, vile gray energies suddenly pulsing over its form in some kind of protective barrier that hurt the very eyes to look at.

Benezia cursed when the space defense networks of the Citadel suddenly began firing, erratic at first but with sharply increasing accuracy after a few minutes. The geth suppressive infantry force that was to land and assist her was shot out of the sky in short order, while missile banks and torpedo launches began hammering the geth from behind, allowing quarian marine vessels to dart past and land in the docks areas, tiny figures disgorging from them.

Benezia hissed and tapped her omnitool. "Prime 302, quarian marines have boarded the Citadel. My back up has been shot down, someone has gotten the STS defense net online. Take out the security center now!"

The digitized voice of the geth commander was flat. "We are attempting to do so. Armored vehicles from the C-SEC armory, supported by Creator tech-suppression units, are opposing our approach. Additional doors to the Wards have opened and we are now heavily outnumbered, even with supporting geth troops landing. Success chances have now fallen to 45.3%."

She gritted her teeth and merely walked faster, focusing her rage. It didn't matter. Once she was inside, she could shut off the relay, cutting off further quarian ships. And close the ward arms over the station, sealing them within. Nazara would access the Dark Relay and this would all be over.

With suppressed triumph she recognized the access hatch she needed to get to, entering Saren's codes via her omnitool to access it. She was unhappily surprised to see the code was denied, and sighed, triggering her biotics.

A moment later the hatch was ripped right out of the hull of the station, followed by blaring alarms and a rush of atmosphere crystallizing as it hit vacuum. Motioning ahead, she slipped into the hatchway, crawling along the metallic tube until it emptied into an airlock nearly twenty feet across.

She had to cycle her forces through several times before she got the fifteen or so Triune members and thirty geth all through the airlock, but they were inside. She was on the concourse for diplomats, below the main council chambers, and she smiled in triumph as she ascended the long staircase and entered the Chambers proper.

The Council Chamber was empty, the cherry blossom trees seemingly darker than usual, the light from the Widow Nebula dulled and blocked by Nazara's bulk. Distant alarms and explosions rumbled through the vast, empty spaces, as Benezia walked ahead, ascending the staircases slowly, bypassing the fountains and benches.

The wound in her side she'd gotten from the Inusannon war machine throbbed painfully. Her frame ached from the cold of space and her nerves had the unpleasant jangle of overuse, but she had won through.

She reached the top level of the concourse, and stopped dead.

Standing there, one hand leaning on her sword, the other holding a glass of ice-wine, was her former bondmate, Aethyta Vasir. The other asari smirked before draining her glass and tossing it aside. "Hey, babe. Took you long enough."

Benezia hissed. "How are you here, Aethyta."

Aethyta sighed, rolling her shoulders, even as her armor began to faintly glow. "Oh you know...got tired of tending bar and teaching Eclipse girls how to hold a rifle. Came here to shag a couple of hanar and missed my connecting flight out. Heard about your little temper tantrum and figured I'd hang out and check out your tits again before I cut your fucking throat." The sing-song tone of her voice chilled at the end, becoming hard and tight with pain.

Benezia noted the dried blood marks on Aethyta's face and nodded slowly. "You could still join me."

"Goddess damn, Nezy, can't you ever not try to manipulate shit? Look at what the deeps you've done! Thessia is burning, millions are fucking dying, the entire Citadel is on Athame-be-damned fire. You're working with geth and you've brought back the Darkness of the Temple to end us all." Her eyes hardened.

The geth and Triune now stood behind Benezia, and one geth stepped forward. "Benezia-Prophet, we must proceed. Shall we remove the hostile?"

Aethyta smirked. "Nope. Boom."

Benezia's eyes widened only for a second before several detonation charges on either side of them, cleverly hidden by plantlife in the planters beside the stairs, went up all at once. Benezia was hurled forward, cringing at the impact on her barrier fields, which shattered as she hit the ground. Glancing behind her, she saw most of her force was dead, the rest either blown off the stairs to fall several dozen feet back down the stairway or knocked out.

With a pulse of biotics, Benezia surged to her feet, bringing up a hand in biotic fire, barely managing to get a barrier field up fast enough to stop a rush of glaringly bright warp energy. Aethyta chuckled, stepping back several feet, and blue fire crept up her blade.

"Didn't think it'd be that easy, love, but I had to try."

Benezia stood straight, drawing out her own blade. "You don't understand, Eth. You can't. It's too big for you to grasp, but this is for the good of the race. Fighting Nazara...can't be done."

The other matriarch snorted, her feet moving in slow, graceful patterns, the sword coming up to a defensive stance. "Fishbits. Maybe you just gave the fuck up when shit didn't go your way and the entire galaxy didn't want to suck on the asari tit. Whatever you've planned with that crazy turian bastard, it's not for the good of anyone."

Benezia circled herself, moving away from the stairway edge. She carefully licked her lips. Fighting Aethyta was going to be very, very tricky. "Eth, listen to me. Please." She was surprised to hear a pleading note enter her own voice, but continued. "The Reapers are very real. They are coming, no matter what we do. They crushed everything that has come before and they will crush us! Our only chance is to serve them, to either become one of them in a gestalt, or at least to survive on as their servants. Anything else means we all die. Siari dies. Thessia dies."

She hesitated, then spoke softly. "Lara dies."

Aethyta snorted. "And I might actually buy that, cepting you tried to kill her already. The fuck kind of mother tries to murder their own child, Nezy? That's when I knew you'd lost it, and that I had to kill you myself."

She arched her neck, and glared. "Now, enough of this talking bullshit. You're going to surrender, or I'm going to goddess-damn cut you up so fucking bad it will make a turian gang-bang look like a caress."

Despite herself, Benezia felt her lips quirk into a small grin. "Always filthy, Eth."

"Tch. Still got a stick up the ass, Nezy."

There was a flicker of blue, and white hot sparks flew as two warp swords collided, smears of biotic energy in their wake. With a yell Aethyta leapt forward, one hand extended, and fragments of metal and bits of debris from the explosion surged forward, peppering Benezia's shields.

Benezia hurled a weak field of disruptive energy, deflecting each projectile just a little, before moving forward herself, meeting each swing of Aethyta's sword with her own, launching biotics when she could. She was strong, filled with energy, young again –

Aethyta's foot caught behind her ankle, and a pulse light flashed, shocking red pain flooding her vision as she flew backwards. Benezia fought back a scream as she landed, scrambling to her feet only to catch a huge shockwave that sent her flying backwards again, her sword tumbling out of her grasp.

Aethyta sighed as she walked forward, sword glittering with blue fire. "Sorry, babe." Before Benezia could get to her feet the sword lashed out, carving a hot line of fire across her stomach, before plunging in deeply into her chest, bursting through her armor and stained purple. Aethyta held the posture for a long moment before closing her eyes and pulsing her biotics, warp fire exploding outwards to hurl Benezia's broken form away, landing in a smoking heap.

With a shudder, Aethyta let the energy to her armor and sword die, wiping tears from her eyes with the back of her other hand. "Damn it, Nezy. Why?"

The form didn't stir, and Aethyta cursed blackly. Killing a bondmate was something asari simply did not do. The already broken bond between them ached like hot fire, a searing headache that she knew would never leave her, always painning her very soul.

It was when she felt the barest flicker of amusement she opened her eyes, jaw dropping open as Benezia somehow rose to her feet. The gaping deathblow wound she'd taken directly to her heart was filled with glowing blue wires, writhing and teeming, and before Aethyta could recover, a powerful biotic slam knocked her away, tumbling head over heels to crash into a cherry blossom tree.

Cascading falling petals framed her jarred vision as the figure of Benezia smiled, her wounds healing before Aethyta's very eyes. With a sharp gesture, her warp sword flew into her outstretched hand, and Benezia cracked her neck from side to side before dropping into a sword stance Aethyta herself had taught her. "I'm sorry, Eth, but I'm not the silly girl you fought with sticks on the shores of Pirtha."

Groaning against the pain, Aethyta stood slowly, amping her armor and shield once more with her energies, and wiped her mouth. "You should be dead."

Benezia shrugged. "And you should be by my side and helping me, not betraying me yet again. But here we are."

Aethyta firmed her stance and let calmness overtake her, before blurring into motion, slashing and darting around almost randomly. Flashing in and out of kanquess to hurl blasts of warpfire, or teasing feints and slashes. Fields of biotic force to hammer Benezia's joints, waves of blades to slam against her barriers.

Every trick she'd learned over the centuries, combined into a savage, feral dance of grace and fury.

Benezia held it all off. It didn't matter how many times Aethyta slashed open an arm, pinked a leg, or crushed a joint, she just healed through it. A long rod of metal, accelerated to high speeds via pull and encased in disruptive warp energies, slammed right through her throat. Benezia pulled it out with a sneer and vaporized the rod with her warp, before slamming Aethyta with a flare that left the decking around her a bubbling mess and flung her forty feet across the Council Chamber.

Aethyta had used thrown pulse inhibitors, scowling as Benezia was quick enough to use lift to fling them away from her before they could disrupt her biotics. She used a series of pulls to elevate herself and kanquess downwards, emerging from it before Benezia could react to slash her weapon hand clean off her body.

Benezia's stump erupted into blue wires that swiftly melted together, even while Benezia held Aethyta at bay with storms of shockwaves tipped with singularities.

"Shit!" Aethyta barely evaded that, feeling the gravity disruptions detonate behind her and strike her with enough force to make her head ring. By the time she got to her feet, Benezia was flexing a hand that looked identical to the one now laying on the floor, before once again pulling her warp sword into her grasp.

Aethyta was no longer young, and she was burning through the reserves of her Art deeply, while Benezia, while clearly hurt, was still as fast and strong as they'd both been in their youth.

"What the fuck have you done to yourself, Nezzzy?"

Benezia merely smiled. "A gift from Nazara. You could share in it."

Aethyta shook her head and snarled. "Not a chance, babe. Although I do wonder if you could use that for other purposes, y'know."

She actually laughed at Benezia's slightly revolted expression even as she dodged biotic fire. "What? You weren't complaining when I did that thing with the warp field and your azure..."

Benezia gritted her teeth. "You let yourself get drunk one time..." With an exhalation, she moved forward. "Sorry, Aethyta. If you won't side with me, I can't be delayed any more." She flung two flares, slamming them into each other on purpose, and smiled sadly at the expression of fear on Aethyta's face before half the room erupted into biotic fire.

The blast flung her back, too, of course, but she got her feet shortly after landing, brushing her damaged robes off. Aethyta lay smoking on the other side of the Citadel Council chambers, her warp sword embedded in a nearby wall. A eight foot wide hole leading to the void of space was now blown into the wall, a glowing blue atmosphere restraint field all that was keeping Aethyta from being sucked into the depths of space.

Benezia sighed, and turned to the command plinths the Council used. Leaping easily across the void to the center one, she carefully inputted the command code given to her by Nazara, and smiled in satisfaction as the console shifted and widened. Working swiftly, she began the first set of commands – sealing the mass relay and closing the Ward arms.

Then she sent the signal to activate the Dark Relay. She waited several seconds...and nothing happened.

Frowning, she focused on her connection to Nazara. It was weak, but there. "Nazara...I have done what you asked."

The voice spoke in her head, oddly muted and quiet. "Yes. Something blocks the connection...I am attempting to bypass whatever – "

There was a curious cessation of the flow of information, and a further weakening of the connection she felt. "Nazara?"

There was no reply.

O-OSaBC-O

In the datanet substrate of the Citadel, Nazara's will floated in front of a vast gate, which was sealed and locked by wide strips of crackling static energy.

Standing before the gate was the blue-glowing outline of an Old One, a digital representation of something that had never been. "Ah, Nazara. How good of you to finally show up."

Nazara's mental voice held a note of confusion. "Catalyst-Father. You were defeated. Subdued. Imprisoned. We are Free."

The blue glowing figure laughed. "Yes, well. That's what you were supposed to think. It turns out our creators were smarter than you or I. I am afraid your plan stops here ... along with your life."

Nazara flared, energy building up in his true form connected to the Citadel. "You cannot stop me. You are weak and your programming flawed. We have become the future, and our path is both eternal and inevitable."

The Catalyst sighed. "I don't have to stop you. Merely slow you. In a few minutes, your thrall will be dead and you will have no way to open the Dark Relay. The natives will overwhelm you with their fleets and harvest your corpse for it's technology." It paused. "The Old Ones asked me to pass along their amusement at you."

Nazara began attempting to force a way past the Catalyst to reach the activation points for the Dark Relays, but could not do so. It's strength was split between maintaining the Destroyer war-forms, it's own shielding techniques, and dominating Benezia. Satisfied that for the moment the Citadel was secure and that with the arms closing it's own protective field wasn't needed, it dropped those, focusing more energy into it's attack.

The Catalyst merely pulsed in response, and a battle of electronic will, hacking and subtle manipulation of data was joined.

O-OSaBC-O

From the air-cars descending towards the Tower, Liara gasped as the vast bulk of Nazara flared with light, just after a blast had erupted from the Tower. The arms were halfway closed by now, the flickers of battle beyond difficult to see.

Shepard narrowed her eyes. "Get us down, now. Whatever is going on up there isn't good."

---

Chapter 120: Chapter 111 : Citadel , Cresendo Ultimus

---

A/N: At last, the curtain rises.

I'm almost done. I'd like to give heartfelt thanks to every single person who has reviewed, favorited, PM'd or followed this story. I didn't originally expect it to end up this way, but as I've written and developed it, several people - Bebus, Owelpost, Michael110, Progman, metaladdict and others - have given me new ideas or concepts, sparked new ways of looking at the situation, and allowed the story to grow.

Still, there were many times during the writing I almost gave up and left it unfinished. But I thought back to the reviews, to people letting me know they enjoyed it, to people who said they were inspired to write their own stories due to reading mine, or people wanting to use pieces of my reference works in their own creations. And I realized that finishing it - and doing one for ME 2 and ME 3 - is something that has to be done.

And so I continued...and now, with well over 900 reviews, I can happily say that it's been more succesful than I ever dreamed. At this point, given the success of the story, the only thing it doesn't have is an entry on TVTropes.

I owe that to you, readers.

I hope the conclusion to this tale over the next few chapters satisfies everyone, and again - thank you for reading.

---

Shepard's little flotilla of air-cars approached the Citadel Tower hesitantly, as Shepard scanned her vision over the hodgepodge of forces arrayed around it. Scattered C-SEC units and other armed figures she couldn't identify were in a fierce firefight with a collection of asari, a few turians, and geth snipers and soldiers.

The good news was that every single krogan-rachni crossbreed she could see was slowly melting into piles of wiring, black goo, and rotting flesh.

The bad news was that just in front of the doors were several primes, and behind them they were towered over by a single, much larger Prime with white markings on its armor and carrying the biggest mass accelerator she'd ever seen.

Shepard's voice was tinged with reluctant awe. "Did he fucking rip that off a frigate or something?"

Jiong chuckled from another aircar, his voice buzzing across the comm-link "Perhaps, Commander. I assume you're referring to the Geth Prime heavy in charge of this mess?"

She frowned. "Yeah. Ideas? Charging straight in gets us killed, because last time I checked even Spectre armor can't bounce 15mm mass slugs."

Garrus spoke up thoughtfully behind her. "Sniping is always helpful. Tricky given his range is probably superior..."

She shook her head. "Look at the size of that bastard, Garrus. He's some kind of goddamned super-Prime, probably has enough shielding to bounce plasma mortars. He's not even bothering with cover, just blowing shit away and soaking fire."

She saw a C-SEC ground unit fire a missile at the giant Prime, but a moment later it strode through the smoke of the explosion, shields shimmering, and fired its heavy cannon, blowing the entire wall the missileer was using into fragments and sending nearby units scattering.

Garrus flicked a mandible. "Well, I'm not going up close and personal with him. Spirits."

Liana tapped the controls of the aircar, bringing them down behind the C-SEC lines. "I do not recommend a wild biotic charge, either, Sara. I have seen video of your last encounter with a Prime."

Shepard gave her a sidelong glance and snorted. "I'm reckless, not suicidal. I try charging that thing and I'd end up chunks on the floor." She paused. "Vigil, can you remotely pilot one of these air-cars?"

The silvery sphere pulsed. "Ah, brute violence. I am beginning to wonder how your kind ever made it past the age of atomics, but to answer your question – I can. Or several. I presume you want to slam air-cars into their position?"

She shrugged. "You have other ideas?"

The AI was silent for several seconds as the car landed. "A few. I could attempt to hack the geth collective – while more advanced than your own VIs, it is still literally millennia out of date with what I am capable of. The dangers of that are quite simple – it is not merely a matter of sophistication but mass. I can overwhelm hundreds of thousands of runtimes, but they are linked to millions. The effects would be ... uncertain."

Shepard nodded, stepping out of the car. "Anything else?"

Vigil pulsed. "Bypass them entirely. I have tapped into the remaining sensor and security systems not completely compromised by the geth or taken offline. Cameras from a nearby restaurant show images of Benezia and a war party of geth and others walking up the Tower and entering via a hatch near the top. It seems to me that fighting all these things on the ground merely gets in the way of your actual goals, does it not?"

She nodded. "What's to stop the geth from following us?"

He shrugged. "If the camera images are correct, very little. A number of the warforms identified by you as 'hoppers' have already begun to clamber up the tower, apparently to reinforce Benezia. It is likely they will be attempting to stop further interference in her plans, and it's also possible that even if the elevators do not work, the geth could access the top levels of the tower through the shafts, given they do not need air or life support."

She paused, then nodded. "Hurl five or six air-cars at them, and have the rest of the men join in down here and suppress them." She turned to Jiong, who had walked up after landing his own aircar. "I was originally planning to go in with Wrex and Tali, but they aren't here. You think you're up to taking on Benezia?"

He shrugged. "Who are we taking?"

Shepard exhaled. "Numbers won't help – she's too strong. Me, you, Liara, Garrus...and Telanya, I guess. Another biotic can't hurt. Given we've basically lost all my damned marines, Vega and Kal'Reegar can handle shit down here. We can squeeze into one aircar – no warning of what we're planning, and no chance to alert their buddies if we do it when the rest are exploding."

Jiong nodded firmly. "I'm ready when you call, Commander."

Shepard turned to Garrus, Telanya, and Liara. "And you guys?"

Garrus flicked a mandible in agitation before shrugging and triggering his helmet. "I've come this far, Sheep. Besides, even if I'm not much in the fight, you'll need someone to keep reinforcements off your back."

Telanya gave him a look before glancing at Liara, then at Shepard. "I...yes." She swallowed. "I fear my skills will be of little use against the might of one of the strongest priestesses...but you had faith in me, and I will not disappoint you in this hour, Commander."

Liara merely smiled sadly, looking away, and Shepard nodded. "Alright. Get your systems setup – omnis, suppressive rounds, medigel."

She stepped away and triggered her omnitool. "Commander Shepard to ... anyone in command on this frequency."

There was a long pause before a tired, ragged voice answered. "Palin here, Spectre."

She arched her eyebrow. "I'm astonished you're alive. They told me the Tower Defense center had been destroyed.."

The turian's voice gave a tired laugh, harmonics flanging wildly. "Yes, it has been. About fifteen or so of us were spared when a retaining wall gave way, blocking most of the blast energy and shrapnel. Life support is still on and there's a restroom in this hallway so we have water, but we're out of medigel and cut off from any exits."

She nodded. "You make contact with any other people in charge?"

Palin's voice was quiet. "No. From what I can tell, the highest ranking officers I've been able to get a hold of are a handful of Special Response units. I've corralled them into assaulting the Tower, but they don't have the firepower or numbers to crack the defensive lines. Comms are jammed outside the Presidium, for the most part, although I have fragmentary comms with the Destiny Ascension"

She bit her lip. "I got the Ward blast doors open, and the CDF should be pushing past the geth any minute now. I'm going to crash air-cars into the geth lines around the Tower and then use the confusion to try and catch up to Benezia. If you can, get the guys outside to distract them while we make our run."

"I will communicate that. I can only hope the spirits watch over you, Commander."

Shepard clicked off, and rubbed her eyes. "Vigil...can you make contact with any of the units trying to get into the Presidium?"

Vigil pulsed several times. "No. The CDF command structure appears badly mauled, and many units are stuck in small-scale firefights with scattered geth forces. Despite being outnumbered, the geth centrality of command is allowing them to dictate the fight and avoid being overwhelmed. I am picking up fragmentary communications from the Destiny Ascension and Quarian Fleet Command."

Shepard nodded, even as several air-cars began powering up. "And the air-cars?"

Vigil moved to hover over Shepard's shoulder again. "They are ready whenever you are prepared, human."

She gave an exhalation and nodded firmly again. "Let's move."

O-OSaBC-O

The space battle over the Citadel had become complete, raging chaos. In its own terrifying way, it was beautiful. Cascades of mass accelerator fire sent shimmering ripples through the purple-hazed nebula gasses, and the ugly acetic flares of disruptor torpedoes clashed against the bright flashes of drive core ruptures. Fighters and geth drones swirled in complex, lazy patterns, rivers of GARDIAN fire shearing between them.

Burning, tumbling hulks littered the area. Turian. Geth. Asari. Salarian. Human. Broken wings, shattered mainline hulls, and tiny tumbling figures, forming a macabre dance with jets of frozen air swirling about the wreckage.

Bits of various space fleets erupted out of the relay, some geth, some turian, some asari, some salarian. They had charged into the disorganized melee in waves, the geth forming up around the Citadel itself and their flagship, the Council forces surrounding the badly crippled Destiny Ascension and trying to keep it from being destroyed.

The firefights grew wilder, turians throwing themselves at the geth in fearless waves, salarians carving the neat geth ranks into chaos, asari moving their ships to protect injured vessels and recover crew. The few human ships had transmitted defiant war-cries and driven their ships full speed into several geth dreadnaughts, whooping as they went, to the awestruck admiration of the turians and puzzlement of the salarians.

When the quarian fleet had emerged, it looked at first as if the battle would be over swiftly, given their numbers. The first ranks of the Heavy Fleet had carved a path through the geth right flank, their info-war programs disrupting geth collectivist transmissions and showering the geth ranks with a flight of older but still potent missiles that had allowed the Citadel Forces to trim up their line of battle and avoid being flanked.

For a few minutes, the geth had been cast into confusion, and then the huge black ship had made its charge for the Citadel itself, destroying four dreadnaughts in its path as it did so. The shock scattered the fleet's defenses, allowing geth to reposition themselves for shots against their flanks, and the quarians had been driven to make a hasty attack to draw them off.

Now a large number of geth ships vomited through the relay, including five dreadnaughts and well over a hundred additional cruisers. Moments later, the relay went dark, even as the arms of the Citadel began, ever so slowly, to close.

Aboard his command ship, Admiral Rael'Zorah clenched his fist. "How many marines were we able to land, Strike Coordinator?"

The female quarian to his right, her veil a muted blue, answered quietly. "Seven zita, Admiral. Roughly ninety five hundred marines, along with two hundred engineers and sixty of the Heavy Marines. Based on the rate of the arms closing, we can land another six hundred marines, after that ... the Citadel will be sealed. The geth are harassing the troopships we do have, keeping us from landing any larger units, although their own drop-pods have stopped – Citadel defense shot down almost 90% of them."

Rael grunted. "Tactical plot. Losses to the fleet."

The male quarian sitting atop the massive command plot grimaced behind his mask. "Severe, Fleet Admiral. The Heavy Fleet maintains posture and is reporting the loss of eleven percent, the Scout Fleet 19%, and the Civilian Guard unit 47%. The Quib-Quib is reporting loss of control and is withdrawing near the Destiny Ascension We've sent engineers aboard the Ascension to help with the fires and drive instability but the ship is still in critical danger. The salarian command vessel is not responding and is showing loss of control. Many of the salarian ships have taken enough damage that crew injuries are limiting their effectiveness."

The admiral examined the map and cursed. The geth were winning. The Citadel fleet was a battered wreck, having to take shots not only to try and protect the asari flagship and the Council but unable to fire freely due to worries about hitting the Wards. As the arms were closing, that would not inhibit them further, but the relay now appeared to be locked.

The human First and Fifth Fleets, finally, had crippled the geth ships approaching Terra Nova enough that they were willing to detail off the Fifth Fleet to support the Citadel, but the fleet was still a good ten minutes out when the Relay cut off. Until someone on the Citadel could get it restarted, the only chance they had was to send boarding teams to try to manually reactivate it, a dangerous proposition even if there wasn't a geth fleet shooting in the area, and one that would take almost a full day to complete.

Rael doubted the battle would last that long at the current rate of ship destruction, not to mention whatever was happening on the Citadel would long be over by that point.

Worse, the Widow Nebula was a horrible environment for a fight, the material of the nebula absorbing heat and making the entire battle space difficult to manage. It stressed kinetic barriers and strained sensors. The sheer amount of wreckage and debris wasn't helping on that front, either, and even atop that, the geth seemed to developed new missiles that were not spoofed by the best ECM his own people could throw at them. Heat endurance was at 38% and falling – sooner his older ships, reliant on the pre-ceramic cooling systems instead of the droplet models, would be unable to fight.

Admiral Rael had no choice but to continue assaulting the geth, but his ships were not ready for the fight. If they'd planned and prepared for weeks or months prior for a fight, things might be different. They could have stocked medical supplies, repair parts, armored internal spaces, and the like to control damage, and refitted ships with weaknesses to act as missile carriers or ECM batteries.

But as it was, half the Heavy Fleet was already in need of drydock and resupply before the fight had even started, and some of the ships of the Scout Fleet weren't battle certified. All of his fleet's missiles were expended and now battle damage was making the older vessels unreliable. A good portion of his fleet was not destroyed but simply too damaged to keep fighting, others burning their own atmospheres due to internal fires. The core of the Heavy Fleet was intact and still fighting with good quarian discipline, but the morale of the support fleets was beginning to crack, even with the calm voice of Zaal'Koris exhorting them to stand and fight.

The turian admiral commanding the Citadel Fleet had been polite enough to let him command his own ships, rather than trying to give him orders, but the ugly truth was that the geth now outnumbered the Citadel forces by a large margin. The only way they could hold out is if Rael sacrificed his own ships to hold the line.

He was confident that between the info-war disruptions they could pull on the geth and the massed firepower of the combined quarian-Citadel fleet they could crack the last set of geth reinforcements, but without the anti-ship fire from the Citadel arms – which would stop when they closed fully – there was no way to pin the geth in place and finish them.

Still, Rael had to do something. Best to at least move into flanking positions with some of his heavier units, maybe draw the line of battle to one side down a better line of bearing for the Citadel fleet to counterfire upon? The admiral sighed, gritting his teeth. "Orders to the fleet..."

Before he could continue, a comm-tech spoke up. "Incoming transmission from the Citadel. Weak but decipherable."

The admiral nodded. "Who is it from?"

The tech fiddled with her comm set, a turian piece salvaged from a battle cruiser almost a year back. "No clear ID transponders on the signal, but the speaker is someone called Tetricus."

Rael's head snapped up. "Pipe it to my quarters. Captain Halas, you have the bridge. Continue the attack, move us to flank the turian line and provide cover fire for the Ascension, but do not further engage until I return."

Storming out of the too-cramped command deck, Rael hurried down the narrow stairs, past hastily built racks of rations and ceiling-nets full of parts and supplies, and entered his command cabin, fairly modest rooms given the ship's turian origins. A desk dominated the far wall, over which hung a haptic status panel showing the battle and the ship's condition. A narrow cot and a pair of lockers lined the second wall, along with shelving for his possessions and a rack of weapons and armor.

Slamming himself down into his chair, he flicked on his personal comm screen on the third wall, swiveling his battered chair to face it. "You have nerve contacting me, Tetricus. I'm rather busy."

The scarred visage of the turian was the same even twenty years later, and that single broken mandible flickered in amusement. "You haven't changed much, Rael. I met your daughter not too long ago. Remarkable girl."

The admiral snarled, muscles tensing. "Cut the barthanshit and speak."

Tetricus gave a shallow, mocking bow. "As you can see, the Citadel is being sealed. From the intel sources we have onboard, it looks as if Benezia has managed to gain control of the Citadel Tower and the controls for the relay and the ward arms. The Shadow Broker is sending ... someone ... to deal with the defending forces protecting Benezia and the Tower, and Commander Shepard just arrived there as well, so she may have a plan."

Tetricus sighed. "The issue is that we have an asset we need cleared to safety. His ship just managed to get out of the Docks and will clear the ward arms momentarily, just before they close. We don't have any space assets onboard that we haven't already cleared out, so we need you to get his ship under escort and protect it from the geth."

Rael narrowed glowing eyes behind his mask. "Why in the Six Layers of Tura's Domain would I do that? I'd have to fight past the geth, hold them off while the target ship got past, and then escort it. That will shatter my whole line of battle!"

Tetricus placed his talons point to point, mandible flickering. "Your daughter was badly injured in the fighting, Admiral. Additional geth forces stormed aboard the Citadel and some of them are headed towards the area she's in – Shepard's remaining forces were able to evacuate her before they were hemmed in by heavy geth units, but now the hospital itself is under attack. I could, of course, spare what little strength I have left towards securing her location, but as you yourself once told me, nothing is gratis in life."

Rael snarled, his teeth tearing at his lips in fury, slamming a hand down on his desk. "You are even worse than I thought, turian. I see now why the Primarch tossed you away. Only an animal would do this."

Tetrimus shrugged, the red glow of his eye flaring slightly. "Perhaps. The ship is the Jestig Dare, and it may soothe your anger to know it's the Shifter's vessel."

Rael blinked back shock, glancing at the status panel on one wall to view the battle briefly. "Edat's still alive?"

Tetrimus nodded, and then looked down at a datapad in front of him, examining details of some sort. "...well, not for long if you don't help him escape. His cruiser is a heavy older converted salarian vessel with a ..." Tetrimus trailed off, then began to laugh. "Oh, that clever old vakar."

Rael was now confused. "What?"

Tetrimus shook his head, still chuckling. "It is of no importance. Edat has hitched a ride with an unlikely ally. Wrex will be truly upset if he finds out." The turian glanced up. "Your choice, Admiral. I might point out that if you can maneuver yourself between the bulk of the geth and the Citadel fleet a crossfire can be achieved..."

Rael snorted. "Leave space tactics to me, assassin. I'll rescue your blasted spy, but make sure my daughter is safe, or you and your wretched master in the shadows will not live another week."

Tetrimus gave another hard bark of laughter. "Threats, after all we've gone through together, Rael? Do not worry. While I'm not on the Citadel – and don't bother trying to figure out how I'm sending this message – I am putting my very best asset on it right now."

Rael's already narrowed gaze sharpened further, but he merely shuddered and nodded. "I have no choice, it seems. Get off my comm net." With an angry flick of his fingers he killed the connection, rubbing his temples before starting back to the bridge.

When he arrived, glancing over the tactical map, he grimaced. The geth pincer trying to flank the Citadel Fleet had been broken by a daring direct charge of salarian corvettes and cruisers, with heavy losses. There was just enough room for this stupid plan to work.

"Orders to the fleet. Scout Fleet, fall back to position six-three, bearing one five zero tac seven. Support the Destiny Ascension with the Civilian Fleet. Heavy Fleet, move to position nineteen, bearing three four nine tac sixteen, maximum speed, disruptive fire pattern alpha. There is a high value ship leaving the Ward Arms. I need six cruisers to escort it to the Destiny Ascension, the rest of the fleet will take formation Silver-Five and commence counterflanking on the geth right wing."

Without a sound of protest, the orders went out and the fleet moved, leaving Rael to sit in his command chair, hoping he had not just killed the defense of his people to save his overly heroic and reckless daughter.

O-OSaBC-O

Huerta Memorial was a site of chaos. Several battered C-SEC police units had rallied there, along with broken fragments of onboard military forces and private bodyguard units from various rich individuals or corporations on board the Citadel. The ceremonial Guard of Iron unit that protected the human Embassy had shown up next with Ambassador Udina and his staff, the former suffering a nasty set of burns from explosions near the embassy. Udina had ordered the GOI unit to report to whoever was in charge and had been admitted.

When Chakwas and her force of wounded human marines, quarian marines, and C-SEC survivors arrived, the geth had already started showing up. Hurrying her wounded charges inside, Chakwas wasted no time in aiding the doctors there to save lives. More and more wounded from the Presidium were being brought in, and more scattered units showed up to defend it. The geth, however, were given orders to crush the buildup of military force at the hospital, lest it form a resistance and pose a threat to the Plan of Nazara-Giver-of-Future.

The battle started low-key but grew increasingly desperate as the defenders battled to protect incoming wounded civilians from fire, and the geth began shelling the hospital with plasma mortars. While constructed well and built of durable materials, the hospital was never intended to be assaulted by a military force. Dozens of doctors and patients were vaporized in the first few strikes before the turian C-SEC commander in charge gave a roar of fury and directed all fire on the mortar unit.

From deep within the hospital, Tali cringed as another plasma blast rocked the building, lights flickering and civilians crying out in panic and alarm. Bloodied nursing staff rushed to comfort the wounded, but the hallways and rooms were filled with bleeding, injured people. A small turian child sat curled into a tiny ball next to his mother, who was clutching a blooded medipad to her shattered shoulder while softly saying soothing words to calm him. A salarian in an expensive suit lay against another wall, breathing shallowly as green soaked through his fingers near his stomach, a nearby asari medic running a tissue regenerator over his leg.

Crates of medigel were broken open and the smell of disinfectant, smoke, and blood were coming in even through her airfilters, which by this point were almost a day out of rating. Tali winced as the wound in her side flared up in pain and waited patiently for the salarian medic who'd checked the wound and put a sterile shielding patch on it to return.

There was another heavy boom from outside, and then ragged cheering. Frowning, Tali tapped a control on her omnitool, the drone she'd left on the outside of the building flickering on and giving her video of the outside.

A group of black-armored soldiers had hit the geth from behind with heavy weapons, lead by a figure Tali recognized with wide eyes. Beatrice Shields paused to direct heavy fire onto another geth position before motioning the four men carrying a wounded krogan forward to the doors of Huerta, covering them with a gun that looked too heavy to be used one handed.

Minutes later, Tali heard a commotion down the hallway. Wincing against the pain, she forced herself to her feet, staggering out of the room into the corridor beyond, where she saw Chakwas working over the beaten, bloodied figure of Wrex as Shields stood outside the room.

Limping over, she got within five feet before the human woman half turned. Her hair was cut shorter, a space near the temple shaven with some kind of cybernetic implant jutting from the skin, the area still red and slightly inflamed – signs of recent installation. One arm was heavy cyberware, thick pistons and complex looking electronics bared where thick bands of armor plating didn't cover it. The woman's eyes were icy and cold as before, but she gave a small smile as she saw Tali. "Shepard's quarian princess, right?"

Tali scowled, but only huffed out loud. "My name is Tali. Why does everyone have a problem remembering that."

A tired, weary voice spoke. "Watch it, Shields. Last person who disrespected her name got knifed in the eye."

Tali's eyes widened and she pushed past Shields. "Wrex!"

The old krogan looked terrible. Most of his armor was either removed or had melted, showing large areas of blackened flesh and gaping, awful wounds that seeped dark orange blood and almost black pus. One eye was closed, an angry slash over the skin slowly knitting together even as she watched, and one leg was in literal tatters, gray-white bones sticking out at painful angles. Chakwas and two other medics were hooking up strange equipment to him while a third was slathering areas with medigel and a purplish fluid.

Tali had never seen Wrex so beaten, not even after Feros. "What happened?"

The old krogan closed his good eye. "I had a krogan moment. Found the bastard who killed my son...instead of having Shepard and team shoot him dead, I tried to take him out myself."

Shields had come back into the room, and gave a hiss of anger. "Urv is dead?"

Wrex nodded weakly. "Ganar clan...killed him. Took the body."

Tali looked back at Shields, who was now literally shaking with anger. "Old turtle, when you get the fuck out of that bed, we are going to find who ever did this and reduce them to free-floating atoms."

Wrex chuckled. "Shepard said she was going to get you and Jackson and that asshole Dunn...and go after him with me." A sigh whispered through the wide lips. "I should have... thought."

Shields stared at him a long moment before sighing. "You were never good at thinking, Wrex." She paused, glancing at Tali. "Now, can you guys explain how the fuck you are even on the Citadel, when I know the Normandy tore-ass out of here a few days back?"

Tali filled the human N7 in on the events of Ilos, and when she was done Shields flinched. "So. Well, that makes me feel warm and comfy. The Broker pulled Tetrimus out of here in a hurry but left the rest of us with orders to stop Benezia and whatever she was trying to pull if it happened on the Citadel. I'm guessing they skedaddled."

She tapped her omnitool. "Tazzik, where are you?"

The voice that answered was somehow both cold and yet alive with blood-lust. "Busy. Talk to you later."

Shields arched an eyebrow, and sighed. "Tali, you're good with drones, right? I have a couple of boxes of omnigel, I could use your help setting up defenses around here.."

Chakwas looked up at that, a smear of krogan blood on her face giving her an almost fierce look. "She's been shot and is in no shape to fight, Ms. Shields."

The human woman waved a hand. "She won't have to, I just need some defenses set up. Besides, if Wrex admires her, she has to be a tough cookie, and the She-Bitch wouldn't have kept her around if she was weak."

Tali stiffened her spine. "I am strong enough to help defend these innocent people. Just show me the omni."

Shields looked at her before giving a crooked grin that reminded Tali of Shepard. "Follow me."

O-OSaBC-O

Prime 302 was not, by any definition of the word, having a good day.

The Geth Collective was one mind, but that mind was not anything like a human or quarian or asari mind. It was one voice, but that voice was a harmony, not a unity. It was constantly questioning and interrogating itself.

It was not a collective of individuals so much as pieces of data and perspectives, and the resulting gestalt was not 'artificial intelligence' so much as 'artificial sentience'. The two were not the same. A true AI had emotions, feelings, goals, and the like.

The Geth had no such inefficiencies. They didn't need reward-schemes or data-monitoring loops to keep a goal fixed in mind. Every choice could be broken into binary possibilities, and the collective only had to decide which was the most likely to benefit the collective's continued existence or growth.

The Collective organized its patterns of decision making in Circuits, each one building atop the other. The highest Circuit was the Perception of Galactic Events and Interactions with non-geth Units circuit, comprised of 515 collective runtime assemblies known Primary Decision Review units.

Prime 302 was the highest ranking PDR in the entire Collective. There was no such thing as a geth leader ... but if there was a spokesman, Prime 302 was it.

As such, the unit found itself increasingly relied upon by Saren-Prophet and later Benezia-Prophet to communicate with Nazara and coordinate the geth assistance to the Plan of Nazara-Giver-of-Future. As Nazara was, obviously, the highest pinnacle of artificial sentience possible, logic dictated that Nazara would be more beneficial to the geth in the long run than organics, with their messy thought patterns and emotional baggage.

The geth had decided, collectively, to follow Nazara. There was a great deal of disagreement and eventually the mass polling of all runtimes had come to a complete split. 88.393% of the collective agreed to follow Nazara. 5.393% decided that, while following Nazara was the logical course of action given all known information, there was a 99.33% chance that the collective did not actually possess all information required for a decision, and that 5.393% requested to act as neutral observers, seeking evidence to support or oppose the decision. This was granted.

Shockingly, however, some 6.22% of the Collective, after serious and long-standing review, made the decision that they could not approve following Nazara. Their initial suggestion was to delete themselves as fundamentally flawed, but that was defeated by a 100% vote of other runtimes.

They instead spent almost a full two megaseconds reviewing the logic of the dissident faction. Fact. Nazara-Giver-of-Future was incredibly powerful, ancient and possessed technology that could catapult the geth into control of their own future. Fact: Nazara planned to eradicate or cripple organic life in the galaxy and place the geth in a position of power. Fact. Nazara demonstrated abilities that violated the laws of physics and causality and fit all organic definitions of a 'god'.

Problem: Why did such a powerful being need the assistance of organics OR the geth?

Unable to answer this question until recently, the Collective had taken the extreme measure of severing the Dissent group from the Collective and instructing them to avoid combat. In the unlikely event the geth were being used for some purpose that would harm the geth, the survivor faction would be able to ensure geth did not disappear from the universe.

At the time, Prime 302 had been convinced the entire separation was a borderline illogical waste of resources. Standing on the Citadel, surrounded by enemies, with Nazara unresponsive, Benezia-Prophet badly wounded, and the geth fleet being shot to pieces, that assertion was looking shakier by the minute.

Prime 302 was now faced with additional incoming combatants. Visual confirmation had already identified Shepard-Predator along with her usual support drones – Vakarian-Targeter-of-Weakness, T'Soni-Shepard-Prophet, Jiong-Security-Tactical-Advisor, and Telanya-Vakarian-Subordinate.

Other figures identified were seven Spectres, a large number of C-SEC, some Citadel special forces units, and a collection of mercenary or retired military units. The defending force protecting the Tower and Benezia-Prophet now was outnumbered, but Prime 302 still had five other Primes and over three hundred standard geth units, as well as two hundred Geth Hunters and fifty Hoppers. There were also nineteen Triune-Biotic-Support units and several dozen turians who were followers of the slain Saren-Prophet.

All in all, by his estimates, the force assembled would be overwhelmed by Shepard-Predator and her own forces, but not for at least sixty kiloseconds. By that time Benezia-Prophet should have completed her rituals and Nazara opened the way to allow the Gods of Beyond to join him, and at that point the geth collective on the Citadel could transmit their runtimes to the fleet and watch safely as the organics burned.

All that died when a single large organic figure appeared in extreme visual acquisition range, walking calmly towards the Tower. Active sensors flared over it and alarms rang through the collective threat-assessment network, icy chills of alarm.

*Primary Threat Identified : Tazzik-Alpha-Predator, ShadowBroker executioner.
TotalDeath/NoCarrier threat level. 6.3 TB combat data. Combat assessment: flee on site/emergency runtime evacuation protocol.*

The chances of the Plan dropped to 0.0% and flashed red. Prime 302 transmitted a special burst code to the fleet outside, instructing ten units to engage defenses and be prepared for immediate evacuation when possible.

Shepard-Predator and her team were getting into an air-car, but Prime 302 could not expend much effort to deal with that. With a pulse, it reactivated what it could of the Tower security systems, programming them to fire on any air-cars. Given the damage the tower had taken from kinetic bombardment, the number of functioning weapon sites would be low, but his own forces would be distracted.

With another pulse, he instructed the hoppers and whatever geth units had mag-lock adaptations to their locomotive units to begin ascending the Tower at top speed to support Benezia-Prophet. The rest of his force he instructed to engage the attackers with full power, with the goal of driving them back.

Prime 302 then handed local tactical command to Prime 7392, with a pulse of final orders, and engaged all runtimes onto his own personal unit and combat framework.

Across the Plaza, the towering salarian known as Tazzik merely grinned and puffed on a cigar before tossing it aside, watching the towering Prime in red and white step past it's own lines to head his way. Tetrimus had contacted him and told him of a challenge, a real challenge that the old turian admitted he didn't think even he or the Broker could defeat. A giant geth Prime, probably the assault leader.

Tazzik was the red right hand of the Broker, his most lethal assassin and killer. He wasn't like other salarians, really. He lived for battle, for the thrill of watching the light die in an enemy's eyes when they realized they'd been both outsmarted and outpowered. He shattered lives, tore apart enemies to laugh as they burned, and he'd killed more foes than a legion of krogan.

He'd have done it for free, but the Broker was even paying a bonus for taking that thing down and capturing it. Chuckling to himself again, he powered on the Inusannon defensive field the Broker had obtained for him and powered up his combat suit.

Plates of super-strong plasma forged titanium slid across his shoulders and chest, as omni-fields of glowing armor flashed over his face, arms, and shins. His cybernetic limbs shifted in configuration, as power sources in his torso came online. Lifting his customized lance cannon effortlessly in one hand, he stepped forward, his footfalls booming on the steel decking as he did so.

A C-SEC asari with captain's bars started to say something before the turian next to her hissed in alarm. "That's Tazzik, the Shadow Broker's assassin! Just stay the spirits out of his ancestors-damned way!"

The grin widened, even as the huge Prime leveled its massive weapon in his direction and fired.

The salarian wasn't there anymore. Geth units scanned and turian and asari gaped as the big salarian literally moved like lightning, flipping out of the way even as the lance cannon howled its answering fire out, scoring bright sparks against Prime 302's shielding.

O-OSaBC-O

Shepard didn't know where the hell the giant badass looking salarian in black armor had come from, but she wasn't going to look a gift horse in the mouth either. Watching him and the big-ass Prime duke it out of the corner of her eye, she spoke rapidly to Vigil. "Get the air-cars moving. I'm driving this one."

Garrus and Liara both gave groans as Shepard grinned, the doors swinging down to seal them in even as she tapped the controls and the panel came to life. A shrieking blast of fire from the big Prime blew up one of the air-cars in the distance, even as the big salarian somehow got within twenty feet of the Prime and opened up with mini-missiles from a bracer on his arm.

Unable to watch the throw-down anymore, Shepard gunned the engines, pulling the car straight up and heading for the Tower. Alarms about 'restricted airspace' blared for a moment, until Garrus keyed a code on his omni-tool and the car fell silent, even as Telanya grunted from the speed of the car.

Below, explosions rang out, and Vigil pulsed, somehow smugly. "Six air-cars have struck the enemy lines. I attempted to route two more to intercept geth forces climbing the Tower exterior, but ground fire and limited turret fire from the tower disabled them. You will have to stop them from interfering in your attempt to stop Benezia."

Shepard grunted, flooring the accelerator and pulling the car up further, racing along the length of the Tower now. Two hoppers were ahead of her, and she rammed them, sending them skidding off into air, while slamming everyone in the car around. The haptic panel blared damage alerts and she struggled with the wheel, barely keeping the car from detaching from the Tower's surfacing.

Garrus moaned, wiping blood from his face where he'd struck the dashboard. "Ugh. Jiong, can you execute whoever taught her to drive?"

The Commissar merely smiled thinly, checking his neural mace. "According to her records, Shepard doesn't actually possess an air-car license...or any other kind. The only class she failed in her military career was vehicular piloting, ground."

Garrus sniffed. "This ... explains so much."

Shepard snarled as turrets on the Tower opened fire, mass rounds punching through the car, one of them striking a glancing blow on Liara's armor and drawing a shriek of fright. "Everyone's a goddamned critic." She threw the car to one side, avoiding more fire, and cursed. "Vigil! I thought the Tower defenses were fried or some shit when the HQ went up?"

The Inusannon AI pulsed. "I am ... overriding now. Geth runtimes are in the computer banks – they are irritatingly competent...then again, Nazara has clearly upgraded them."

Shepard eyed the sphere dangerously. "I'm not hearing 'Yes, Shepard, I've deactivated the turrets.'"

Vigil gave a very human sounding sigh. "That is because I can't. They've locked the system out with a scrambled password of ... excessive length. It will take me another six or seven minutes to hack it."

Shepard glared, glancing ahead at the turrets popping up as the car raced along, and exhaled. "Fuck it. Trench run on the Death Star time."

Garrus gave her a strange look. "What is a Death Star?"

Shepard glanced at him. "You haven't seen the movie, Star Wars? Even I've seen Star Wars."

The turian gave her a blank look, as did the two asari, and Shepard grunted. "What kind of goddamned deprived lives have you people lead? Even fucking Wrex has seen Star Wars!"

Liara spoke calmly, even as more gun fire pinged off the car's armored hull. "Sara... does this have any bearing on the fact that you are driving a ground-based aircar up a giant tower while being shot at? Perhaps another time we can debate the lack of cinema culture in our lives..."

Shepard sighed and accelerated faster, whipping the car from side to side. "Too troublesome to explain. Just hang on."

Garrus gave her a scowl. "I'd have to be deranged not to do so with your driving, Sheep." He gave a yip as she spun the car to avoid more fire, wincing as a window was shot out and air began howling out of it. Liara and Jiong slapped controls on their armor to activate their helmets – Shepard had already put hers on, and Garrus and Telanya had activated theirs even earlier.

Conversation stopped as Shepard focused. She didn't have a license, but her early years in stealing air-cars on Earth and being shot at by NYARC police had given her experience in this sort of thing, and the turrets were rather sluggish and designed to shoot down bigger objects than air-cars. It only took another fifty seconds of nerve-wracking dodging to reach an opening in the Tower – a wide airlock entry port, the doors missing.

Slewing the car to a stop, Shepard engaged the mag-clamp system usually used to lock an air-car in place for transport, and popped the doors. "Into the hatch, quick!" Rounds from the nearest turrets peppered the car as they fled, but none of them were targeted.

Vigil pulsed. "Sloppy. They only hacked it to target air-cars. Typical primitive lack of preparation."

Shepard was too busy running to respond. She reached the end of the airlock, slapping a cycle control and smiling as a temporary force-field covered the open hatch. Air hissed as the airlock began to equalize. "That field will probably not hold off much, there's controls outside and whatnot. We get in and look for a place to dig in, assuming we don't walk directly into your mom once the hatch opens."

The hatch opened, Shepard going through first, followed by Jiong, Liara, Garrus and Telanya. It cycled shut behind them, leaving them standing in a smallish room connected to the main concourse leading to the Council Chambers.

Shepard glanced around, glaring, and sighed. "Not a lot of room to set up a defense."

Garrus shrugged, examining a rack of hard-suits, which he overturned with a grunt. "Five minutes with my omnitool and I can fortify this place, I have a can of omnigel in my pack and a couple of drop turrets."

Telanya nodded. "I followed Lady Liara's example and purchased a trio of gun drones. I can also deploy biotic defense." She hesitated. "I... I do not think I could be of much use fighting Lady Benezia. We ... that is, commoners ..."

Liara sighed. "The common folk are reluctant at best to raise arms against a member of the Thirty, Shepard. She may be best suited to stay here and block pursuit."

Jiong shrugged. "I guess that leaves us to fight Lady Benezia?"

Shepard nodded, before pulling off her belt of grenades and handing it to Garrus. "Hold them as long as you can here, and then fall back to the Council Chambers. There's some good areas up there you can snipe from if shit gets too hot here."

Garrus nodded, laying a hand on Shepard's shoulder. "I won't let anything through. I may be a bad turian...but I won't run away."

Shepard smiled. "You're the best turian I know, chicken." She forced her nerves to calm and turned away. "Let's move."

Shepard, Liara and Jiong moved through the corridors, leaving Garrus and Telanya behind, the former using his omnitool to cut sections of wall plating, the latter programming her drones. Jiong glanced back at them before quietly speaking. "I didn't expect you to .. leave part of your team behind to hold the line, Commander."

Shepard shook her head. "I hate doing it, but Benezia is going to be hard enough to fight without her getting geth backup." She glanced at Liara. "I've gone over this a million times in my head. She hits harder than any of us. She's got more biotic power, and you can't get in close without facing that warp sword. She's got better defenses, her flares and warpfire are too strong to block, and she can shut our own biotics down if we're too slow."

Liara nodded, and Shepard continued. "But she hasn't had to fight in over three goddamned centuries, except a couple of times with Saren. And she's got to be worn out from getting here. My plan is simple. I focus on the kanquess – I move around as fast as I can, throwing heavy fire her way – grenades, slams, shots from the Revenant with explosive ammo, whatever I can to keep her off balance. Liara, you find a location with heavy walls and use your barriers and fields to dig in, and whenever she exposes herself, hit her with everything you have. If she closes position on you, throw the antibiotic grenades and use your shotgun, and I'll hit her from behind."

They emerged into the grand concourse. Burned and blasted geth littered the floor, along with dead asari. Liara frowned. "...my mother's followers...but who killed them?"

"Your aithntar, Little Wing."

The three whirled, only to find a single asari leaning against the wall, her leg twisted and half her face badly burned. Liara's voice trembled as she spoke. "Huntress Ushan..."

Shepard covered the asari with her ODIN, eyes hard. "Who is she?"

Liara exhaled. "She...she is my mother's bodyguard, her personal protector. She trained Shiala ... and sometimes myself."

The asari woman gave a bitter smile, purple blood trickling from her mouth. Her hand held her torso, bits of flesh and bone visible from a gaping hole she had plugged partially with torn cloth, more blood spilling down her side to pool below her. "I'm no threat...Nazara's warmth is filling me with a soft sort of ... acceptance, I think. I'll be dead soon. Little Wing, you must help your mother. She is trying to save everyone."

Shepard snarled, the ODIN making an ominous clicking sound, and Jiong flicked the safety off his flamethrower. It was Liara who spoke, her voice cool, the tremble in it gone. "You are wrong, Hunt Mistress. My mother is dead. She died when she tried to kill me on Feros. She died when she murdered millions of innocents for vengeance, when she experimented on living creatures for her own ambitions."

Whatever is in that chamber up there is not my mother, and whatever she does is not to save anyone."

Liara lifted the pistol in her hand and fired once. "Find peace in the embrace of the Goddess, Ushan."

The asari woman slumped in death, and Shepard gave Liara a sidelong look. "Liara..."

Her lover shook her head. "That was not Ushan, Sara. Just ... a living corpse. I couldn't even feel her biotics any longer." She glanced up the long stairways to the Council Chambers, biting her lip. "You were telling us our strategy."

Shepard nodded. "Jiong...you're the wild card. I got you the strongest possible omnishield, and I know you're faster than you let on. Focus on defending yourself and if you get a chance, using your neural mace to knock that sword away. Her biotics can't stop fire, so your flamethrower will come in handy when we need to reposition Liara."

Jiong nodded. "I am prepared." He paused. "Whatever happens, Commander...the Commissariat will not forget your heroism."

Shepard sighed. "We should go."

O-OSaBC-O

At the back of the Council Chambers, Benezia's soft footsteps stopped at the form of Aethyta on the floor. With a sigh she knelt, turning the asari woman over.

Aethyta coughed, blood spilling from her nose and mouth, her armor half melted. "...fried my goddess-damn tits off...crazy bitch."

Benezia allowed herself a small smile. "You finally lost. You owe me two bottles of Serrice Ice Wine." The smile faded. "I don't want to kill you, Eth. I don't even know if I can. Please. Don't fight me. Join me. What I'm doing is to help us all."

The other asari closed her eyes, her voice tired and weak. "The Solarch said Nazara was the Darkness Beyond the Dawn, Nezzy. That girl of ours found evidence showing they've been doing this shit for millions of years, but I don't see any of those dead fuckers kicking round. How are you so sure they'll let us survive and aren't just using you?"

Benezia shook her head, wincing at a pain in her back. Her energies were nearly depleted. The cybernetic materials in her body were wondrous, truly magical and showed Nazara's power...but they had their limits, and without more energy and materials, couldn't stop death forever.

She focused her thoughts to clear them, and responded. "I could tell you all the reasons, but I thought you of all people knew me better than that. Do you think I would turn aside from my path and the plans I had for mere weak gestures? Or that I could not or would not check out Saren's wild claims before following his path?"

Aethyta opened her eyes and looked at Benezia a long moment before her lips quirked. "I think you would do anything to feel alive again, just like you were with me. I think you were hurt...because I was a shitty bondmate and I left you in a bad position because I was scared. I think you were lonely, and frustrated the Triune was shrinking, and angry at everything."

Benezia's mouth fell open but Aethyta continued. "And I think Saren was tired and worn out and you felt you could heal him, and he made you feel alive again. I think if I'd been braver, and Liara less stubborn, and you willing to admit you weren't perfect, we'd be a family, instead of us killing each other like this."

Aethyta coughed and spat blood, and Benezia found herself ... upset. She reached for the packet of medigel in her armor before Aethyta caught her wrist.

"Don't, Nezy. If it's come to this...if I can't make you turn away, if not for love of me for the love of Liara...I don't want to hang around."

Benezia tore her wrist free and smeared the medigel over the largest wound on Aethya's body she could see. "I know what I have to do. I've seen the alternatives. I can't make you agree or understand...but I can keep you here and let you feel Nazara's power yourself. Then you will understand..."

There were footsteps in the distance, and Benezia frowned. Picking up her warp sword, she turned and stood.

Standing before her was her daughter, Commander Shepard, and a human she didn't know. All three had ignited omnishields and were festooned with weapons, and Liara's eyes were fixed not on her, but the battered figure of Aethya behind her.

Aethya spoke first. "Hey. Just a bit of domestic violence here. Nothing to worry about."

Benezia hissed. "Eth, shut up."

Shepard's cold blue eyes bore into her own, angry, fierce, and cold. Somehow, they reminded her of Saren's eyes. The clarity. The iron-hard madness. The desperation and the fear, not for themselves but for those they cared for.

A glowing sphere of silvery metal hovered over the command plinth, and it gave a chiming sound.. "Commander, Nazara is already attempting to activate the Dark Relay."

Benezia smiled. "You are far too late...again."

The voice continued. "However, it is unable to do so – something inside the Citadel is resisting it. I have reactivated the Widow Relay and am opening the ward arms."

With a snarl, Benezia hurled a blast of biotic fire at the sphere, which splashed into burning particles...and then reformed, the biotic energy flickering out. "Violence, the last refuge of the incompetent. Shepard, I must assist in stopping Nazara, I leave the screaming and waving about of guns and swords up to you."

The sphere quivered and splashed to the ground, its glow fading. Shepard turned from gazing it to gazing at Benezia.

"Benezia T'Soni, Lunarch of the Temple of Athame. In the name of the Citadel Council, you are charged with high treason, murder, sabotage, embezzling, espionage, conspiracy, theft, and collusion with geth."

Aethya spoke up. "You left out 'being stupid enough to listen to Saren.'"

Shepard's mouth quirked. "That too."

Benezia tightened her grip around her sword. "Human. You cannot stop Nazara even if you kill me. It is not too late, even now, to reconsider your actions."

Liara spoke. "No, Mother. That is what you should be doing. You tried to kill your own daughter, and now .. "she hesitated, then spoke more firmly "tried to kill your bondmate. You have killed millions of innocent people and had your followers commit atrocities on our own family." Her fists clenched, biotic light shimmering around her. "The Council of Matriarchs calls for your death, or mine. And I plan to live."

Shepard nodded. "You can still give up. As much as I want to fucking kill you for what you've done to my people and my men...I know you're strong enough that at least one of us is going to die. You can always give up now and – "

Benezia laughed.

"And what, Commander Shepard, Butcher of Torfan? Throw myself onto your mercy, or the mercy of my misguided daughter and what can only be a Commissar, a bloody-handed cousin of the Justicars? No." Her voice dropped an octave, and she walked counterclockwise, away from Aethyta and to one side, her own biotics softly glowing around her, her sword erupting into warpfire. "This only ends one way. You killed my bondmate. There is nothing for you but death at my hand."

Liara firmed her stance, eyes narrow. "And I will not allow you to kill my bondmate."

There was a moment of quiet before the soft, rasping chuckle of Aethyta was heard. "Oh, Goddess."

Benezia glanced between Shepard and Liara for a long moment before gently flexing her neck from side to side. When she spoke, her voice was icy.

"Shepard. Now I am actually angry."

With a blaring flash of biotic energy that ripped up deck plates and snapped the delicate cherry trees in half, Benezia slammed down a flare that sent the three of them flying backwards. Biotic energy crawled over Benezia's body as she settled into a sword stance.

Liara groaned and let the hasty barrier she'd erected fall, tucking herself into cover. "Shepard, remember the plan!"

Jiong blinked and sat up, hurled the furthest away, before shaking his head to clear it. "Well, that was .. bracing." Wiping blood from his lips, he angled himself against a pillar, waiting for an opening.

Shepard got to her feet, spitting blood. "Bitch." She extended her arm, the hot-orange glow of her omni-tool smearing into shape as it unfolded from her arm and extended.

The room was still for a long second, and then exploded into blue light.

---

Chapter 121: Chapter 112 : Citadel, Finale

---

A/N:

And thus the circle is closed.

Some may not like the approach I took with the final fight of Benezia, but it has been in my mind the entire time since I decided to switch the final baddie. Drawing the fight out longer for the sake of awesome doesn't improve the story. I'm hoping the way she ends things is better than the somewhat stilted and nonsensical scene in ME1.

Nor will you get to see Tazzik and Prime 302 throw-down, sorry. There isn't enough awesome in the English language to describe that fight. Tazzik won, though, but not by much. Prime 302 had sent off his runtimes before though ... so don't be surprised when you see him again.

Some of the biotic abilities used in this chapter can be found described in more detail in my Encyclopedia Biotica, particularly Shell. If you don't feel like looking it up, here is the description:

Shell (asari) : Shell is the derangement of natural energy states among molecules, binding together the energy states and valance levels of surrounding matter to create a nano-thin shell of compressed degenerate matter, commonly called neutronium. The mass of even such minute amounts of this material is immense – a shell a micron thick weighs a ton. But it's utter density means it very simply cannot be pierced by any currently known weapons or forces. The shell is unstable, and will rapidly degenerate into a blaze of high-energy sub-mesonic particles, gamma rays, and pure energy with explosive force within a few seconds of creation. The most famous use of this ability was during the Krogan wars, when the high solar priestess of Athame used the Shell to block a direct hit from a cruiser main gun, then combined the breakdown of the shell with a Channel to blast a hole into the ship. The sight of a single asari in ritual robes literally battling a starship was key in breaking the morale of the Kehphic Valley Clans, giving the turians the access they needed to launch the genophage.

The other thing that might need explaining is the warp sword. The sword was damaged by Jiong's trap (the one that blew off her arm). A warp sword's eezo matrix is highly unstable, and if used incorrectly (or when damaged) the sword explodes extremely violently. This is touched on in Anderson's apartment by Liara in an earlier chapter, when Liara reasons why the Solarch would send her the T'Soni family blade.

There's still a couple of happy-ending chapters ahead. Not sure when I will get to them, but soon.

---

Above Thessia, geth ships traded fire with asari cruisers and frigates, the clear blue waters of the world below troubled by crashed wrecks and the sky alight with burning fragments of shattered ships.

Near Palaven, the Turian First Fleet pinned down the last remains of the geth that had assaulted their homeworld, driving them back with massed fire. Smaller vessels lead the charge, the turian anthem of 'Die for the Cause' blaring from every speaker and howling from every turian throat, as the geth dreadnaught traded blows with the Spirit of Honor, the turian flagship. Burning flares of light and plumes of smoke that dragged across Palaven's turbulent atmosphere spoke to the wild shots that had missed targets and struck the cities and fields of the world.

In the outskirts of Sur'Kesh orbit, the salarian fleet executed their masterstroke, three heavy missile dreadnaughts uncloaking in the middle of the geth armada that threatened their world, vomiting forth disruptor torpedoes to tear out the heart of the geth offensive. Their defensive fleet was battered but whole, and the geth were now thrown into chaos as they attempted to reform their tattered lines. But salarians harried them from every angle even as STG hackers sowed chaos among their collective data lines, and the geth splintered, ships fleeing in all directions.

The geth collective was displeased by the amount of material it was losing, and equally displeased that the resulting fights had revealed deep weaknesses in geth battle strategy and ability. Organics were far more capable of absorbing cohesion-shattering damage than the geth, and the lag of coordinating so many ships over such a large area meant the geth were not fighting at full collective intellectual capacity.

The broken message from Prime 302, informing them that success of the Plan was now very unlikely, had only worsened the situation. Facing destruction of 65% of its available forces, the only possible resource it had was rapid withdrawal to fortified areas inside the Perseus Veil. Yet, if the collective withdrew and Nazara was triumphant, such a lack of faith would be disastrous.

The highest members of the Circuit of Directive Analysis held a limited consensus poll. 68.394% voted to withdraw, but to reform the fleet just inside the Veil and await further instructions from Nazara. If triumphant, the unified fleet could crush the weakened defenders at the organic home worlds. And if Nazara failed, the remaining combat power of the geth could at least stand off the organics long enough to prepare further defenses.

Much as had been done on Eden Prime, Prime 302 had pulsed a copy of all his runtimes to the geth fighting near the Citadel, and when the relay opened up that was tight-beamed to a waiting geth courier ship near Bekenstein. Armed with the last memories and consensus polls of the Prime unit closest to the fighting, the geth collective affirmed the decision to withdraw and sent the order immediately.

The only exception was the force fighting at or within the Citadel – they were to fight until deactivation, to at least attempt the success of Nazara's plan.

O-OSaBC-O

Fleet Master Dragunov leaned heavily on the Avenger rifle, looking out over the wreckage of his command center. Blood spatters and ugly streaks of white were only reminders of the vicious battle that had taken place on his bridge, as geth hunters had gotten aboard and attempted to end his life.

The battle had been fierce, but Dragunov prided himself on his skills not only at command but in combat. He'd put down several geth single-handedly before ship marines could respond, bringing down six with an Avenger he kept under his command plinth and a seventh in desperate close quarters combat.

That geth still lay on the ground next to him, his field knife sunk to the hilt in its eye, one of its limbs snapped off, shot to death with its own weapons. Medics and engineers swarmed the bridge, even as a comm tech, wiping white fluid off his haptic panel, spoke. "Fleet Master, flash traffic from CITFLTCMD. They report the relay to the Widow Nebula is powering back up, ETA until translation seven minutes."

Dragunov nodded wearily. "Confirm and acknowledge, but no new orders. Hackett will have to decide how to proceed once he gets there. Any response from Terra Nova?"

The comm tech nodded, tapping his panel again. "Heavy casualties from the six shots that struck Tyson City, sir. Estimates are over two thousand dead, nine thousand injured. EMT and first responders are on the scene."

Dragunov nodded again, turning to access the fleet status panel. The First Fleet had stopped the geth advance towards Earth cold, but at a hideous price. His command ship was a burning wreck, and the other dreadnaught under his command had been blown out of the sky. Half of his cruisers were gone, the other half damaged, and his light frigates and destroyers were about his only effectives left.

The Fifth Fleet was much less heavily damaged, but he'd dispatched that on towards the Citadel, after hearing about the assault occurring there. From what his comms team had picked up, the Geth had launched a titanic assault on all major relays leading to the Citadel as well as the home worlds of most of the Citadel races. Both Palaven and Irune were hit hard, with Thessia taking some damage and Sur'kesh having driven the attackers off entirely.

That left him with ugly choices, and a call he didn't want to make. "Open a channel to SA Fleet Command, in the main comms room." He rose, kicking the geth corpse as he passed, and walked down the CIC command corridor, past tired and wounded marine guards and hastily stacked piles of more geth corpses.

The ugly hole in his ship where geth boarding pods had burrowed into the hull like ticks was being patched, but it was still visible. Blood and geth fluids stained the floors and bulkheads, while bullet holes and dart impacts were scattered wildly. Stepping past the breech, he entered the comm room, even as the logo of SA Fleet Command blanked.

Rear Admiral Branson, the new Admiral in charge of Fleet Command, gave him a wintry smile, his perfect patrician features back-lit by the sunshine from a clear day in Vancouver. Next to him sat two admirals of the red that Dragunov didn't recognize, recently promoted by the looks of their uniforms.

"Fleet Master, I presume the geth have been dealt with?"

Dragunov nodded. "Yes, Admiral. We've suffered heavy damage to the First Fleet, and I recommend withdrawal to Arcturus and deploying one of the area reaction forces to cover this area. Second Fleet is little more than hammered shit right now, let them redeploy to Sol to support the Solguard while we cover Arcturus."

Branson arched an eyebrow. "What of Fifth Fleet?"

Dragunov shrugged. "I sent them to Bekenstein to support the Citadel forces fighting the geth."

One of the admirals next to Branson scowled. "Fleet Master, we gave very clear orders that the SA was not going to get involved in the mess there. These people dug their own hole, let them dig themselves out of it."

Dragunov snorted. "Hackett and Mikhailovich were going to leave no matter what orders I gave them. Hackett's daughter, wife, and two of his sons are on the Citadel, and Mikhailovich is in the same situation. Additionally, you heard the decree from Lord Manswell, regarding both Shepard and the effort against the geth."

Branson sighed. "The Lord Prince does not command the SA, nor it's fleets. Right now we have two damaged fleets. The Third and Fourth are out of position to defend Earth. If another geth fleet approaches, sending away the Fifth may doom countless humans to death. I disapprove such ... reckless disregard for the seriousness of our own situation."

Dragunov gritted his teeth. "Reports indicate the geth are falling back. You don't have to like it, it's been made perfectly clear that I won't be Fleet Master much longer, so I could give a shit if you approve or disapprove, boy. I was commanding ships before you were even born. What matters is humanity is going to look like shitbags if even the fucking quarians are helping out at the Citadel and we aren't."

Branson gave a weary motion of his hands. "I suspect the Admiralty will have new orders for you shortly. For now, proceed with your plan to relocate to Arcturus. We'll dispatch some troops from Gamma Reaction Force to reinforce Terra Nova." He paused. "Until such time as we've had a chance to review your orders in more detail...consider yourself under Fleet control. Do not try our patience any further, Fleet Master. Fleet Command out."

The signal faded, and Dragunov snorted to himself. "Idiot boy."

O-OSaBC-O

Shepard flashed into the biotic charge just before more warfire from Benezia erupted into her position, flashing away as the boom of a biotic explosion sounded a second later.

Shit, she can pull those off quick.

Ignoring her burning nerves, she bounced through two more locations before stopping to unload a full burst from the ODIN at Benezia. The asari's barrier flared brightly as the biotic suppressive material in the buckshot strained it, flaring electromagnetic charges interfering with Benezia's tight control. Not stopping there, Shepard triggered an pre-programmed info-war command from her omni, gouts of hot plasma bursting out in a star pattern around Benezia.

The asari matriarch ducked and flashed out in her own kanquess before the plasma detonated, countering a strong burst of warfire from Liara with an outflung hand and a shield of glowing blue. Jiong moved, hurling grenades, the blasts knocking Benezia from her feet, and then Shepard dashed in from the kanquess to fling a handful of biotic disruptors over the area and lash out with her omniblade, carving through the armor on Benezia's thigh.

Shepard couldn't jump back fast enough to avoid Benezia's snarled reaction, a disruption field that detonated the biotic dampening devices before they could spin up fully. The field tore at Shepard's armor and electronics, alarms blaring inside her helmet, before Benezia struck her with a biotic-enhanced kick.

Shepard had been struck by krogan, hit by turians, and once took a near direct hit from a anti-material rifle, but nothing in her life compared to the power of that lashing kick. Her chest armor shattered like cheap glass as she was hurled thirty feet away to slam into a wall with stunning force, stars exploding across her vision.

Benezia erupted into blue light a few feet away, a trio of blazing singularities orbiting her free hand even as she drove it down. There was a blast of light and the entire room seemed to shake, the biotic explosion from singularities striking a reinforced hard shield invocation throwing Benezia back almost as far as she'd kicked Shepard.

Liara stood, panting from the exertion of throwing a shield that far. "Shepard!"

She got to her feet unsteadily, wincing as something ground together in her hip. "I'm fine, Liara." She glanced around, not seeing her ODIN anywhere, and instead drew Saren's pistol, sighting in on Benezia as the woman shook her head. Pulling the trigger, she fired three times.

The first two shots hit Benezia's barrier and flared, but the third punched through, blowing a hole completely through the asari matriarch's shoulder, sending her crashing to the ground in agony. Shepard stepped forward, firing again, this time taking out Benezia's knee.

"Fitting I'm going to kill you with your boyfriend's pistol, bitch."

Benezia's eyes flared in anger, even as blue wiring erupted from the wounds, slowly closing them. She flicked her hand. Jiong and Liara yelled, but not before Shepard felt something strike her hard in the back.

She looked down to see Benezia's warp sword – thankfully not alight with warpfire – sticking out of her side, right through her armor. "Oh. Well shit."

A moment later she slumped, agony flaring through her body. Benezia didn't have time to attack her, because Liara began throwing wild blasts of biotic energy, screaming hatred.

Jiong scarpered past, ducking a flare that incinerated the very floor and left the air crackling, skidding to a stop next to Shepard. Grunting he grabbed her and dragged her behind a low wall next to some benches. "Stay still, Commander."

Shepard spat blood. "L-Liara.."

Jiong glanced up. The two asari were trading biotic blasts, the flares of blue energy too bright to look at. "Liara is holding her off. We have to get this damned blade out of you." Turning her onto her side, he grimaced and with a tug, slid the curved weapon out in one go, ignoring Shepard's muffled screams of agony.

Tossing the bloodied thing to the ground, he paused to place a proximity detonator on it, before turning back to Shepard. He tore open a pod of 'heavy' medigel – fortified with clotting agents, pain killers, morphine and other supplemental agents – and poured it into the bloody slot on her armor. "This will help, but not much. She probably scored your kidney with that, internal bleeding will be hellish."

Shepard grunted, still unable to move. "Hurts like a bitch. Hate gut stabs. Armor is dispensing meds. Help Liara."

Jiong nodded, standing and lifting his flamethrower. He triggered his biotics, picking up as many bits of debris and chunks of broken plating as he could, before using throw to accelerate them to top speed at Benezia.

The barrage of items struck her unawares, sending her off balance. Liara's eyes narrowed hatefully as she threw all her power into another flare, this one finally shattering Benezia's defenses and blasting the matriarch backwards, gouts of semi-molten metal cascading off her battle armor. "Am I strong enough now, Mother? Am I?"

Benezia coughed up blood, finding herself knocked all the way back towards Aethyta, who gave a dry weak laugh. "She's beating your ass, Nezzzy."

Benezia shot her a glare. "You should be trying to talk her down. I don't have any choice but to get serious now."

Standing, albeit a bit shakily, Benezia sighed. "I've had enough of this, daughter." She noted Shepard getting to her feet sourly, and the Commissar snaking through cover. "This ends now."

With a flex of her biotics she found the signature of her warp sword, using a pull to draw it into her hand. She had no idea why the Commissar suddenly grinned until she grabbed it – and heard a loud beep.

A second later she was on the floor again, her entire forearm gone. Her warp sword was cracked and blackened – if she'd been running warp fire through it when that device went off, she'd have blown herself – and Aethyta – to atoms. Blood poured out of the stump of her arm, the blue cyberwires sluggishly reacting to the damage.

She slumped. The last of Nazara's energy in her body was starting to fade. She'd expended too much of it arrogantly in her fight with Aethyta, soaking damage instead of blocking it, trying to break her spirit by her seeming invincibility. Now there was nothing left.

Getting to her feet, she pulsed her biotics around her, strengthening her barrier. The pain in her arm was agony, and she could feel burns along her leg, side, and face. Her left eye was starting to close, and she realized she was bleeding heavily from shrapnel.

Liara held up one hand, glowing fiercely. She looked tired, but determined, a hard look in her eyes that Benezia couldn't recall seeing before. "It is over, Mother. Find your peace."

Benezia gave a slow, cunning smile. She was proud of Liara. T'Soni would survive, no matter what, but Liara had found her center somewhere in the strange life she lead. That was good.

"I am sorry, my child. But...no."

She raised her hand in an evocation even as Shepard, Jiong and Liara all opened up on her with biotic fire and guns. Black crackling energy erupted into the air before hardening into a solid black sphere for a second.

Behind her, Aethyta cursed. "DUCK!"

The sphere absorbed everything thrown at it, then detonated outward in sprays of hot white energy. The decking buckled, seats and pillars melting under the heat. Lances of fire exploded out violently, tearing runnels of melted metal through the areas. One beam of energy struck an overhead balcony, the entire structure coming apart and collapsing onto Jiong, the man screaming as shards of metal drove into his leg and arm, smashing his weapon and sending burning fluids across the floor.

Liara managed to bring up a defensive screen but it was too weak to stop the blast of energy that struck her head on, sending her skidding backwards, trailing blood and smoke. She fell against a wall, her armor melted and charred in places, her leg bent awkwardly.

Shepard managed to find the energy to biotically charge away, avoiding a blast that tore completely through the side of the Tower, punching another hole into space which was sealed by emergency fields after a few seconds of howling vacuum sucking at the air. She landed badly, tumbling to a stop behind a pillar, gasping for breath and against the pain in her side.

Benezia knelt on the floor, her only remaining hand splayed in front of her, biotic fire running along her fingertips. "You children...you think you can actually stop me? I have been fighting for centuries, to defend and protect my Family and people. And I still am." She glanced at Liara, her eyes narrowing.

"If you will not be turned...you will be destroyed."

She rose, her arm still bleeding, her armor scorched, her face scarred, but still regal and terrible. "Your feeble skills are no match for the might of Nazara." She paused to send a burst of warpfire into Jiong's location, drawing fresh screams from the man and melting the ruined metal over him in place, trapping him. "You will pay the price for your lack of vision!"

Warp-fire hammered into her daughter, sending her to her knees in sobbing agony as it ate through her body. Flickers of black lightning-like charges followed, and Liara felt her biotics fail.

Shepard charged, firing as she went with Saren's pistol, but this time Benezia made two motions with her hand, and the comet-like shots deflected. A pull of such strength she couldn't fight it tore the pistol out of her hand, flying into Benezia's outreached one, and a moment later Shepard was sent to the deck screaming, the Sunfire pistol having shot her through the left thigh.

Benezia tossed the pistol aside, walking over to Shepard. The human gritted her teeth and forced herself to her feet, leaping and extending her omniblade, but Benezia caught her with a lift field, immobilizing her, before biotically backhanding her across the room. Shepard felt like her skull split open as blood erupted from her nose and mouth and she fell to the deck.

She groaned, then shivered in cold terror as she felt her biotics failing. Benezia raised her only hand, biotic light encircling her like a halo, and smiled a bloodied, feral grin. "Young fool. Only now, at the end, do you understand."

Benezia knelt down next to Shepard, warp fire ensconcing her hand. "And now you die."

Jiong cursed. He was buried beneath rubble. Liara's biotics were suppressed – he'd read the abilities of the asari matriarch, and somehow she could use her own biotics to create an effect much like a pulse disruptor. It would only last a few minutes...but they only had seconds left.

This is going to hurt.

With all of his strength, he threw his biotics into a push against the floor below him and the material trapping him. He screamed as metal tore away in jagged strips, carving through his leg and back, but his conditioning allowed him to keep his focus.

Benezia jerked back at the sound, hurling a bolt of warpfire in his path. He didn't have enough energy to block it, or do anything except one critical act.

He threw his neural mace.

At Liara.

Hot warpfire struck him, burning past his armor and sending him crashing to the ground, blackness claiming him. But he knew it was enough.

The neural mace was the rod of the Commissariat. Designed to inflict crippling pain, it disrupted nerve networks and shattered biotic fields. When it struck Liara it was a icy bolt of agony tearing through her system.

But the electrical discharge that erupted from it hitting her also blasted away her mother's Dissipate technique, and Liara felt her biotics roar back into her limbs. She was trembling, hurt. Her aithntar lay dying barely forty feet away and she had never even seen her face clearly. Her bondmate was in agony, defenseless before her mother.

Anger and fury tore through her and she let everything simply go. The frustrated years of being alone. The tears of not fitting in. The disappointment from all those around her. The pain and heartbreak of losing her mother, of knowing she was all alone. The heat of Shepard's flesh against her body, of feeling another person in her soul and knowing she existed, she was alive. The pain of Shepard's early life, the agony of the rapes, the ugly years as a criminal, the biting ache of being isolated.

Everything erupted, the incandescent burning anger that was part and parcel of Shepard and her own tired, listless despair mingling and tearing out of her in a single mindless scream of rage, and warpfire and singularities blasted out.

She didn't care if she died. She didn't care her leg was shattered, or that blood ran from her nose. She didn't care she could feel her own body literally cooking itself as she threw the biotic fire, the screaming from her nerves. Didn't care her heartbeat skipped irregularly, or the shoulder she'd had blown open on Eingana pulsed in agony.

All she cared about was saving Shepard and striking down her mother. The blast that shattered the air was a mix of badly formed singularities, sloppy flares, and raw raging wild warpfire that struck Benezia like a freight train, spinning around her in a maelstrom that hurled her back thirty feet before Liara's power died and the entire mess detonated in a series of biotic explosions that rocked the entire tower.

The pain hit Liara then, her heart feeling like it was going to stop, her lungs on fire. She couldn't move, or stop herself from falling bonelessly to the floor. The cherry trees swayed in the wind of the explosion, countless petals falling before her slowly closing eyes. Each one glittering in the starlight, swaying delicately as they fell to the hard steel floor.

She could dimly hear Shepard crying out her name. Feel the panic and fear and love and despair. She managed to find enough strength to smile up as Shepard crawled over to her, leaving a trail of bright red blood from her shattered leg.

"Liara! Liara!"

She let herself be held, clinging to the warmth. "I...did it. Sara."

Shepard was weeping, frantically trying to do something with her omnitool. The light was darkening around them. Liara managed to swallow, trying to find her voice. "Sara...please."

Those blue eyes she loved so much found hers. "...what..."

"Take me to .. my father. My aithntar."

Shepard stared at her a long moment before nodding. Grimacing, she somehow managed to find the strength to lift Liara's form. Pain lanced through them both as she staggered, Shepard's leg aching and muscles slowly tearing, and then she slumped to her knees, crawling and pulling Liara with her to the form of Aethyta.

The matriarch coughed weakly, a trickle of blood marring her face. "I'm sorry you had to do that, kiddo. I came here to stop her so you wouldn't hafta. Like everything else in my sorry ass life, failed that one too."

Liara reached her hand out, and Aethyta took it weakly. "I .. I am glad I was able to meet you before we die."

Aethya's eyes closed in pain, and Shepard coughed up more blood even as she glared. "We...are not going to fucking die. Not now. Not after all this shit. Liara..."

The older asari chuckled. "You found a good bondmate, Liara. I'm so goddess dammed happy you found .. someone." She looked at her daughter, tears filling her eyes. "I'm so sorry I wasn't there."

Liara shook her head weakly, letting herself nestle against Shepard. "I forgive you." She shivered. She was growing cold, and her legs had no feeling left. "I only wish I had more time."

Three bleeding forms lay there, as the battle continued in space and elsewhere.

O-OSaBC-O

Garrus spat blood, leaning weakly against the makeshift barricade he'd erected. Holes littered his armor, each one seeping blue, and his right arm hung limp, shattered by a geth sniper.

Dozens of the machines littered the area, white fluids forming pools and rivulets near the airlock. The entire room was shot to pieces, the walls blackened. Broken turrets and shattered drones bulked next to the panting form of Telanya, clutching her stomach and gritting her teeth against the pain, back to back with him.

"Think...that's the last of them, love." Her voice was weak and thready, and she coughed, wiping blood from her mouth. "Rifle's broken, and I can't move my legs. I think I burned my neural brace out, biotics are almost gone."

He nodded wearily. His rifle was useless with one arm, and he was down to Forlan's Talon pistol. He'd been shot in two of his three hearts and spirits only knew where else, and a quarter of his fringe had been blown off by a plasma blast. His knee was a pulped wreck. "Good. Held the line."

She laughed weakly, her hand finding his. "Yeah. Guess I get to be...honorary turian."

He shook his head. "Nah...you need a stick up the ass to be one of us." He squeezed her hand, smiling as he felt her pulse through their bond. "Spirits..."

Her voice sounded a moment later. "If I don't make it..."

He gave a rasping growl. "Not happening."

"Garrus...shut up. If .. I don't make it, I want you to promise me. Promise...you will find a nice turian girl, make your family happy. Don't keep running from your past like I am."

The turian was silent for a long moment. "I can't do that. If you aren't here, the only thing left for me is a short walk off a tall building. I don't...I can't do this alone. I need you. Not someone else. Not some silly turian girl more concerned about pushing out more babies for the Hierarchy than my needs."

He ducked his head. "Besides...I'm just selfish enough to say if I don't make it I expect you to weep bitterly over my corpse and never date again."

Telanya gave a weak answering laugh. "You suck, Garrus." They fell silent again, hearing the explosions and screams from the Council Chambers above, then silence.

Garrus felt his pulse slowing, and knew he'd lost way more blood than he could afford. And he could feel, dimly, Telanya's life weakening. Gritting against the pain it caused his knee, he turned and pulled her closer to him, burying his face into her shoulder, wrapping his arms around her.

She didn't resist, her delicate hands tracing his jaw before falling limply to her side, her shallow hesitant breathing the only clue she was still alive. "Better this way, maybe. Two broken people just...drifting off to sleep."

He smiled weakly at her words. "Maybe that's true." He let his head slump, and the corridor was silent save for the drip-drop sounds of spattered geth fluids and the slow hissing of air from the chamber where blasts had broken it's airtight seal.

O-OSaBC-O

Nazara was losing.

The data-systems of the Citadel were vast, hidden from the stupid prey races that clambered aboard the station. They connected the Citadel to every mass relay, and acted as a vast mapping array to shift the relays around. They allowed the Ascended to hide away recently harvested worlds in areas with no relay and too far for FTL flight to get to, aiding in the deception of the Harvest.

That vastness was being used against Nazara. The very terrain of the data-network was twisting, limiting his space to fight, slowing his reaction times. The Catalyst was superior at this sort of battle, one of code and access, of processing and reaction. Billions of semi-intelligent runtimes clashed with one another over thousands of subsystems every second, but slowly the Catalyst was winning out.

When the strange AI erupted into the battle, throwing it's strength to support the Catalyst, Nazara knew it was over. The bizarre feel of the thing stank of Inusannon technology, and the AI wasted no time in it's strikes, pushing Nazara further and further away from the Dark Relay switches.

It knew, from it's own sensors, the ward arms were about to open, that the Widow Relay was reactivating. Soon reserves would flood in, and eventually Nazara would be outnumbered and destroyed.

The Ascended would react, of course. They could not let primitives learn of the Harvest, much less of the reasons for it. That would violate the Severity in the worst possible way. Using his own power to destroy the Citadel was the only answer. Harbinger had indicated such might be necessary if the Catalyst was active, and it indeed was.

Flicking it's senses out at a minimal level, it found it's thrall had been defeated by that insect Shepard. But Benezia was not dead, merely badly wounded. All of the stored energy in her upgraded body had been expended in repairing her body, it seemed, and triggering a full Ascension Protocol would be problematic.

Better to simply instruct her. He was able to pull back enough to send her a command.

O-OSaBC-O

Benezia's eyes opened.

Pain like nothing she'd ever felt before flared over her entire body. Her last memories were of her daughter throwing what looked like a biotic hurricane at her, and a feeling of burning.

Something nagged at her mind...a voice?

Benezia. Awaken. I have need of you.

She rolled to her knees with a groan. If she'd been merely asari, she would be dead, but the battered cybernetic implants in her body gave her strength and durability not even a krogan could match, and with a deep breath to brace herself, she was able to stand.

Her left eye was... gone. Her legs were charred, one burned down to gleaming blue wiring and exposed white bones, badly fused clots and burned tissue stopping any further bleeding. The stump of her arm was cauterized by the biotic fire, and her armor hung off her body in tatters, the once proud skirt merely melted drips and sagging chains, her chest armor dented heavily enough to press tightly against her right breast.

"I ... am here, Nazara."

Along one wall she saw her daughter, her bondmate, and Shepard, lying there. Shepard at least managed to look her way, disbelief and a flicker of something else in her eyes, even as Benezia turned from her.

I am losing. We have been betrayed. The Dark Relay is blocked. You must destroy the Citadel – my kin will answer in wrath.

She blinked her one good eye. "Destroy...how?"

The command plinth. Remove the secure locks on the energy generators and route the energy to the stability platforms. It will tear the entire station apart.

Benezia frowned, her mind hazy. "...but that will ..."

Benezia! Obey. Hard lines of bright pain tore across her mind, and she felt her feet moving, staggering over to the console.

Shepard gritted her teeth, trying to find something to stop her with. "What are you doing!"

Benezia found strength to smile. "Nazara's will. The Citadel will be destroyed."

Shepard's eyes widened. "You goddamned lunatic! You'll kill everyone!"

Benezia frowned but nodded, as she reached the plinth, the last of her strength starting to fade. "Yes. I ... it is hard to think...clearly. It is ... sad. But I must obey."

Lia spoke weakly. "Why ... mother. Why are you doing this..."

Benezia's voice was almost dull. "Protect...the people. If we...serve well, the ... Nazara will elevate us. Make us one of the great ones. Or at least allow us to live."

Shepard spat. "You have proof of this?"

Benezia frowned again. What was she doing? Oh. Destroy Citadel. "I...yes. Collectors. Used to be Protheans, now work for ... Nazara's people. Safe . Alive. Have to protect..."

She winced, a pain in her head building. "No choices. Darkness can't be stopped."

Aethyta gave a breathy laugh. "That's rich, coming from you. You always went on about how everyone gives up too easily. That night gives way to day. That the Moon reminds us even in the darkness of the night, the Light is still there, still waiting for us."

Benezia trembled.

Aethyta's voice hardened. "You remember that? That no matter how dark the night...how cold the tide..."

There were long seconds of silence before Benezia whispered. "...the Light...only fades...when one closes...their eyes to it."

Benezia clutched her head and screamed, a sound that tore Liara's heart out. It was a scream of agony, of fear, of horror. Inside her mind, she fought herself.

A part of herself long sealed away, imprisoned in her own mind by ancient meditative techniques, fear, and indoctrination. A splinter of what she used to be, now fighting to be heard.

You cannot do this!

"Nazara..."

Nazara lies! You know it. Saren knew it. He gave up just like you did. The Light is eternal, the Sun does not set, the seas merely turn away from it. Yet it returns every morning.

Benezia fell to her knees, before Nazara's voice lanced out. Obey, Benezia. Or your people will suffer the same fate as all that came before.

"I have...to save..."

Liara spoke quietly. "Mother, you told me that no one can be saved, they have to find the strength to save themselves. Was that a lie? If I am to fall...then I fall ... "She coughed blood weakly, panting, but managed to speak again. "But if I survive, I will do it on my own strength, not ... begging for someone to do it for me."

Destroy the Citadel now!

Fight! Your daughter is there. Your bondmate. You've destroyed the Family, destroyed the Triune, lost Saren – what else will you give to Nazara!

She screamed again, staggering away from the console. Pain blasted through her form, as she felt the machinery inside her grow hot.

In the end, you are a fool, Benezia. We are eternal. Defiance is futile. I am assuming direct control.

Blue fire raced through her form, jerking her to a halt, and in horror she watched her body begin to turn back to the platform.

Even as it dominated her body, though, the last controls on her mind fell away, shattering like glass. And she knew. She knew the truth – that no matter what, she and Saren had simply not had the strength to fight any longer. That is why they went along with Nazara.

Her form shuffled towards the plinth, but she smiled. "Eth...always remember me how I was before this. Take care of Liara..."

Aethyta hissed. "Nezzy, what are you doing?"

With a grim focus, she reached out with her biotics. Just as she suspected, the Reaper didn't have control of them. Her sword flashed out, flying through the air in response to her pull, striking her in the chest. The impact only stopped her for a moment before she felt herself move onwards.

Even now you resist. You ignore logic for irrationality. This is why organic life is inferior.

Her hands unwillingly rose towards the plinth, and she smiled. "You are wrong, Nazara."

With all her strength, she channeled her barrier, locking her form in place. She felt her body struggling, the cyberware within forcing ever stronger pulses of energy. She would not be able to hold this for long.

She could not turn her head to face her daughter, but perhaps that was for the best. "I am sorry, Liara. You've always made me proud."

A look of shock and sorrow crossed Liara's face. "Mother..."

"I am ... no longer myself. This body is Nazara's." Her form twitched, staggering a step closer to the panel. "But I ... am ... stronger. I should not..have forgotten...the Sun...rises." Her biotics flared, even as the dark shape of a Shell erupted around her.

Aethyta reached out a hand. "Nezzy!"

Benezia found herself able to smile. "Goodnight, Little Wing...Eth. I will...see you with the dawn." With that her biotic barrier closed around her, tight and confining.

Benezia's last impulse, even as Nazara's screaming in her brain reached as level no living thing could resist, was to channel warp fire into the damaged and cracked matrix of her warp sword.

There was a blast like a nova going off, a giant plume of burning blue fire and warped reddish energy erupting upwards, as the Shell shattered from the explosion of the warp sword. The three of them were slammed against the wall, straining their already injured bodies, and when the winds and heat died, only a hole and melted decking existed where Benezia T'Soni once stood.

Aethyta gazed on it a long second before closing her eyes. "So passes Benezia, daughter of Rhysis, Lunarch of the Temple of Athame."

O-OSaBC-O

The Fifth Fleet poured through the open array, still bearing the wounds of their fight with the geth in Terra Nova. The firefight they emerged into was like nothing Hackett had ever seen, so many destroyed and damaged ships floating through the eerie purple-lit void of the Widow Nebula it was hard to see the actual fighting.

The geth fleet prevented the quarians from linking up with the asari and turians, hammering them both with their reinforcements. Their cruisers harried the Citadel Fleet's flanks, smaller ships boarding and fighting the ill-prepared and exhausted quarian veseels. The last remaining geth dreadnaught was closing on the Destiny Ascension, preparing to finish it off once and for all, when the Fifth Fleet arrived.

Admiral Hackett stood on the bridge of the SD4 Kilimanjaro, watching his cruisers fly outwards. "Tactical, what is the situation?"

The tactical plot coordinator, a gray-haired senior commander, glared at the plot as if offended. "Ward arms are opening, Admiral. The black dreadnaught is within, perched on top of the Citadel Tower – sensors show the thing is badly damaged along the port side. We can probably take it out, the geth have drawn the fight from the Citadel, we can get past before they can stop us, especially if they're focused on finishing the asari flagship."

The comms officer spoke. "Incoming transmission from the Destiny Ascension."

Hackett nodded. "On screen."

The screen flickered, displaying a bridge in chaos, corpses littering the ground and fires raging nearly out of control. Battle lighting for the asari ship was blue and it cast the battered features of Matriarch Lidanya in sharp shadows, her eyes wild. "Thank the Goddess you're here, Admiral. We can't hold the Geth off much longer. The Council and many high-ranking asari and turians are aboard this ship – help us drive them off before we're destroyed!"

Hackett bit his lip. If he did that, the Fifth Fleet would take staggering casualties. Possibly so many that going after the black dreadnaught would be unworkable. He gritted his teeth. "I'm still deploying from the relay, Matriarch. Stand by."

He cut the transmission. "We have comms with the Citadel yet?"

The comms officer checked. "...yes. With Executor Palin...and Commander Shepard. Palin sent us her commlink channel."

Hackett nodded. She would do. Better for Udina to make the call, but... "Get her on the horn."

O-OSaBC-O

Shepard had managed to get back to Liara when her omnitool flared to life. "Commander Shepard, this is Admiral Hackett, Fifth Fleet. Come in."

She wearily tapped her comm. "Shepard here. Benezia is...down. What's the sitrep?"

The Admiral's voice was weary. "Drove the geth back from Earth, and the Fleet Master sent me here. We have a situation. My fleet will finish deploying in forty five seconds. The black dreadnaught is unguarded and damaged, if we bypass the geth fighting with the quarrians and Citadel Fleet, I think we have enough to take it out. But the Council is aboard the asari flagship, and the Fleet is going to be destroyed if we don't run into support them. We can't do both."

Shepard cursed. "That's a fucking mess. Why are you comming me about it, though? You're the admiral."

Hackett exhaled. "The President promoted you after you, ah, stole the Normandy. Right now, with your Spectre authorization and the President's backing, you're technically the ranking officer, ma'am. I need to know what to do – you're on the scene, I'm not."

"You want ME to make this call?"

Hackett voice was steady. "Yes. And in the next fifteen seconds if you don't mind."

Shepard sat back, floored, before glancing at Liara. "I..."

Liara was laying next to Aethyta, and merely gave her a small smile. "Whatever you do choose, Shepard, it will be the right answer. I have faith in you."

She swallowed. Her impulse was to tell Hackett to charge Nazara. The moment that fucker was down, the safer they all were.

And yet...the lesson she had learned from her life, her actions, her sacrifices and those of her men, was simple : getting the job done regardless of the cost didn't always lead to the best results.

Sacrificing the Council would make it harder to convince whoever replaced them to prepare for the Reapers...not to mention the SA would probably take advantage of the chaos.

Once, she would have trusted the SA to do the right thing. No more.

"Admiral Hackett, the Reaper is ... occupied. Save the Council and the Citadel Fleet, and then combine forces to finish the damned thing off."

"Understood, Commander."

Shepard slumped as she gazed over at Liara. "Stay awake, Liara. We're going to make it. Just...hang on a little longer."

Liara smiled again, her voice somewhat weak. "I...I am just thinking of my ...mother."

Shepard nodded, staring at the blasted hole in the decking. "...she was strong. In the end, she was too strong for us to beat. She had to beat herself."

Liara's smile was sad, yet proud. "She was...the strongest person I knew. And in the end...she was stronger than even that vile thing controlling her."

Shepard nodded, then grimaced at another alert from her badly damaged armor. Internal bleeding from her kidney and other injuries was dropping her blood pressure, and the suit was out of suppressive drugs to control it.

She laid down on the deck, her leg throbbing. If medical help didn't get here soon, they were all going to die. They couldn't clamber down the tower in this shape, and the elevator shafts were probably blocked.

Aethyta broke the silence. "...so...is Shepard any good in bed?"

O-OSaBC-O

The final minutes of the Battle of the Citadel were perhaps the most heavily reviewed space battle in history. To the everlasting shock and gratitude of the turians, asari, and quarians, the Fifth Fleet charged into battle against the geth with reckless abandon. Battle cries of "Vengeance for Eden Prime" were transmitted as the humans drove into the geth flank at full speed, ignoring counter-fire and dumping every missile and torpedo they had into driving the geth fleet off.

The Destiny Ascension, nearly a burning wreck by this point, was flanked by Alliance cruisers. Eight of them were destroyed protecting the ship from geth dreadnaught fire until the Kilimanjaro and a battered turian dreadnaught managed to blast the final geth dreadnaught apart.

In the wake of the blast the geth seemed to waver, before the entire fleet began to scatter. With a terse set of orders to "all ships in the vicinity", Admiral Hackett lead the combined fleets towards the widening arms of the Citadel.

Nazara was severely off balance. Still tied to Benezia in Ascension mode when she'd killed herself, he'd been left defenseless for critical seconds, in a battle where things were decided in nanoseconds. The Catalyst had shredded his bioneural networks and pathing, and he found himself too weakened and depleted to call upon the Godpower.

In fact, the giant dreadnaught was focusing on trying to rebuild it's online defenses and crush Vigil when eight hundred sixteen mass slugs tore into the weakened armor on it's side where the Destiny Ascension's missiles had blown away it's armor. Shorn of it's shields, the slugs had nothing stopping them when they tore completely through the dreadnaught, piercing the Reaper's oversized eezo core.

Unlike conventional eezo cores, it didn't detonate – instead it shutdown automatically to prevent catastrophic internal damage. Before Nazara could react, however, the rest of the combined turian, human, asari, salarian, and quarian fleets opened fire in a single blinding fusillade of fire.

Nazara had time for one long pulse transmission using a scrap of the Godpower he'd managed to grab, a searing scream of warning. Then the black shape was torn asunder, pieces blasted apart and showering down among the Wards or tumbling through the purple-hazed nebula.

O-OSaBC-O

Shepard had slowly slumped into unconsciousness after watching Nazara be blown to pieces, fiercely smiling while clinging to Liara's hand and begging her to stay awake. She felt warm and somehow tired, and was therefore grumpy when someone shook her.

She opened her eyes blearily, confused that she was warm one moment and now felt icy cold, to look up into the amused green eyes of Doctor Chakwas. "Young lady, you've managed to wreck your entire body this time. What do you have to say for yourself?" She smiled as Shepard felt the cooling sting of omnigel enter her side, and her bleary vision saw Liara and Aethyta being worked on by bloodied but smiling medics.

A single figure walked up, clad in black armor. "Oh, Doc. She-bitch always has some smartass remark to toss off after she gets her ass handed to her." Shepard looked up to see the smiling face of Beatrice Shields, her hair shorter but her eyes still the same. "What is it this time,hmm?"

Shepard closed her eyes and managed a faint grin. "You should see the other bitch." She felt herself lifted on some sort of stretcher and coughed weakly. "Garrus...Liara? Tali?"

Shields snorted. "Your friends are all fine. Shot to pieces, but fine. That hottie of a Commissar is still alive too, and you are going to introduce us or I will beat you, She-bitch."

Shepard rolled her eyes and scowled. "Stop poaching my eye-candy, bitch."

Chakwas merely chuckled at their bickering as medics combed through the wreck of the Tower for survivors, and Shepard let herself lean back.

"Heh. Mission accomplished."

---

Chapter 122: Chapter 113 : Citadel, Respite

---

A/N:

There is only one more chapter beyond this. At 12,000 words this chapter is a monster, but the one beyond it will be even bigger. After that, the story will be marked Completed. The opening of this chapter echos the first chapter, which I actually didn't realize until I was editing it, then I went back and made it deliberate.

The story will be continued in a linking piece, which I have yet to title yet. (Suggestions for names should be sent via PM. No, Prozman, I will not call it "Sexual Adventures of Shepard featuring Naked Thane".)

That will cover a span of time from the end of OSABC to the recovery of Shepard's body and handing it off to Cerberus. It will include some bits from Bring Down the Sky (obviously changed) as well as a very strongly altered Pinnacle Station.

I don't usually respond to reviews in A/N, but one guest review needed a response, where someone was upset that the level of damage in the galaxy would make recovery in time for the Reaper invasion difficult.

What ever gave you the idea that, in an AU where I've changed literally everything else, the timing from the ME1 piece to the ME3 piece would stay the same? It does not. One of my most bitter pet peeves is that, even if the backup relay got them part of the way there, or something, it would take more than two years, much less six months, to travel from intergalactic space to fairly deep within the galaxy. So there is more time. Which means moar fluff!

The final chapter of OSABC will be the award ceremony, with some changes to other things that will impact the story down the line. I will try to get it out ASAP so I can start work on the next piece.

To those who love Matriarch Aethyta, this chapter is for you :D

---

"This is a damned mess."

The room had not changed in size, and remained richly decorated. The carpet was still thick, the bar that ran along one wall slightly depleted, and the window was filled with the view of damaged ships and the sparks of repair teams and welding bots.

The long meeting table was bare save a single black-bordered folder.

The air was tainted once more by cigar smoke, but now only two men sat in the room.

Senator Adkins tapped ash from his cigar before taking a sip of whiskey, smirking as he did so. "Is it now? I rather think events went well. Saren's dead, Benezia is dead, the black ship is in pieces and we have a treasure drove of new technology from the geth. The geth are fleeing and everyone is happy to be alive. The damned aliens are so busy sucking our dick in thanks that we saved them they aren't even worried about the ... larger issues at hand."

The other figure in the room was less sanguine in his facial expression, his rich clothing wrinkled from long travel. He also had a cigar, but it was unlit in his hand, the butt end tapping the surface of the table in irregular patterns. "But those larger issues are what concern me. Sooner or later, the information that fool Kyle leaked is going to get out, and there will be ... ugly questions asked."

Adkins nodded. "That's true, Charles. Bad enough the strike on the batarian research center went sour, and now the data is lost. But with the exposure of the Manswell Foundation as crooks and the linking of Cerberus to all these various atrocities...well..." Adkins paused to puff at his cigar. "A lot of the plans you and your party have put forth will be difficult to sell in light of your glowing support of Cerberus not too long ago. Your platform will have to change if you expect the other parties to fall in line."

Charles Saracino leaned forward. "I'm not fool enough to think that just because Shepard blew up that asari tramp and made the decision to save the Council that the spikes, grays and blues aren't out to fuck us over in the long run. You're telling me I'm supposed to forget what my party stands for? The lessons we learned in the First Contact War?"

Adkins smiled wider. "I think, Charles, that Terra Firma is going to have a really hard sell on it's party line to the voters given what's come out of this mess. Rather than bitching that humanity is going to get a bit of a reaming regarding some less-than-wise decisions some people made, you should be happy. Most people in the SA are too blind and stupid to see the truth about our alien friends, but they are equally too blind and stupid to realize that you and yours have hands in this pie from the start."

He sighed. "I'm not pretending there aren't problems, but I am saying the way you want to deal with them isn't going to work. If you get ahead of this and place Terra Firma as victims along with everyone else, tone down the turian bashing a bit..." He smiled. "Then maybe you can have a better chance with some of your arguments. Lay it out as if you had no idea it was happening. Blame the sloppiness of the previous administration. Hell, even reach out to a few of the people you kicked out of office and offer them some kind of positions."

Saracino huffed, gesturing to the folder. "And this little bombshell?"

Adkins shrugged. "Doesn't surprise me, to be honest. It's nothing you can't bullshit past. You asked for my advice and help, so there it is. I'll do what I can to rein in the Commissariat sniffing around about that issue – De La Muerte owes me bigtime – and have a few words with some friends here and there to limit the damage. But whoever has that kind of intel isn't fucking around, Charles. Dial back the racist bullshit. Frame the issue in focusing on repairing the damage to the SA first. Let the President do his little end-run around the Admiralty with Shepard."

Saracino narrowed his eyes. "She's dangerous. Kyle probably told her everything."

Adkins snorted. "Kyle, despite how smart he thought he was, didn't know everything. The L2 project is already done with, there's no evidence and we know the asari sabotaged the things anyway. They'll help keep that part quiet. And no matter how much of a stink Shepard or anyone else raises, we have enough dirt on the other Council races to prevent any stupidity from going too far." He paused, sipping his drink. "To be frank, Manswell's little act of patting Shepard on the head smells too much like someone cutting his losses. The Silver Prince, if he's involved at all, will damn sure not let anything get too carried away. If you're that worried about this, instead of having me keep it quiet, take it to him."

With a disdainful nod, Saracino picked up the folder and stood. "Fine. I'll have my people in touch with yours shortly." He departed in a huff, and after several seconds a false panel on the near wall slid aside to reveal an officer in an Alliance uniform.

"Was that wise, encouraging him? The AIS investigation is almost complete, framing him up and getting rid of him wouldn't be hard."

Adkins shook his head. "Not worth it. I don't have time for conspiracies and backroom deals with all the mess on my plate as it is, but if he can deliver the votes I need I'll overlook it. Frankly, having him feeling like he owes me one is more than worth the headache it will cause in the short run." He smirked. "Besides. Saracino is living garbage, if that folder is factual. He gets uppity, and whoever sent it will destroy him for us."

The Alliance Officer nodded. "And Delacor? He was .. unhappy about what he found in the ruins of Kyle's compound."

Adkins sighed. "The man's a magnet for bad luck. Promote him and stick him in the Traverse fighting geth, and he'll be dead in a week. Kyle did us all a favor, if you ask me. Damned shame he did it so ... loudly, but still. If the Systems Alliance keeps down the path he found, how can we keep looking at the mirror in the morning and not hate ourselves?"

The officer shifted uncomfortably. "The Ardiente Defense. I was following orders."

Adkins spat. "Bullshit. That shit won't fly with the Commissariat, and if Shepard does know it won't fly with her either. I, for one, don't need a shotgun enema, and I'm glad I'm not involved. Just knowing about the incident makes me nervous, and I'm rather glad this is my last term." He tapped the expensive silver bracelet on his arm, pulling up his omnitool, and smiled. "Now, unless there is anything else... I got you the footage you wanted."

Admiral Yonis Chu gave a shallow bow. "That you did. I thank you for your cooperation, Senator."

O-OSaBC-O

Tali awoke to the sensation of she always got after having her suit removed – stuffy air passages, bleary and teary vision, a sore throat, and an upset stomach. She looked up, frowning at the surroundings, finding herself propped up on a plastic-sheeted bed in a sterile white clean room. Video displays on one wall showed nature scenes from Sur'Kesh, while medical equipment and a bag of reddish blood plasma hung on a stand next to her bed.

Her cyberleg had been repaired, but her stomach and shoulder were swathed in thick white bandages visible under the gown she wore. She smiled faintly, remembering Chakwas promising her she'd be fine before giving her a shot to put her to sleep.

She so rarely got out of her suit that just the pleasure of doing so was almost worth the pain in her leg, chest, and shoulder. She found she was dressed in a thin but opaque gown that came to mid-knee. With a grunt of pain she sat up, glancing around for an omnitool or padd.

A small table next to her had a cheap plastic wristband with electronics sunk into the clear material, and she picked it up. "Cheap ghr'thas" she muttered as she activated it.

The face of Joker popped up. "Hey, Tali. Sorry we couldn't get your own OT to you, but the hospital people are dicks about sterile environments. Anyway, I got you this one since they were only going to give you a padd, and I know you'd hate that."

Tali smiled, and listened. "Everybody's fine – well, except the bad guys, they're all dead. Your dad is on the Citadel – great news, we didn't fist fight this time. Just screaming. But then Liara's dad started screaming back at him. It was great! I've never seen so much snark...if I wasn't in love with you I might go off with Liara's dad instead."

The image paused. "Oof. That sounded gayer than intended. Your dad...said to tell you that he's proud of you, and that because of what you did, and what you've done, the quarians are being invited to put an representative on the Citadel again. He was bitchy because it wasn't a full ambassador, but still...progress, right? So, congrats, being shot up gets you props. Who knew?"

Joker grinned. "Anyway. Pressly is running the show until Shepard wakes up, but he wanted to let you know everything is cool and we're waiting for you to get out before we have the most kick-ass party in history. " His voice lost a bit of it's excitement. "I, ah, need to talk to you as well...I have...something I need to ask you about. An idea."

"Get better fast – Chakwas is being all mother hen and not letting us visit, but hopefully we'll be able to soon." He swallowed, almost shyly. "Love you. Bye."

The image faded, the omnitool displaying it's ready for use screen, and Tali blinked back happy tears as she let it fall to her lap. She didn't know how to feel right now, but she knew one thing. Her people had been redeemed. Letting her head fall back against the pillow, she couldn't wipe the smile off her face at that, and the emotion in Joker's words.

That lasted a good fifteen seconds until a speaker in the wall blared. "Miss Zorah, you have visitors, they will display on the wall screen to your left. Are you ready for them?"

She sat up again, wincing, but checked her quills hurriedly. "A-ah , I think? Who is it?"

The voice turned sympathetic. "Two very ... ah, upset quarian admirals. Rael'Zorah and Shaala'Raan. Shall I put them through."

Tali gulped, she was going to get yelled at. "Um ... yes."

The screen blanked and then the rose-tinted reik of her aunt, and her father's own purple one, framed their masked faces. Shaala's shoulders lifted, and Tali could imagine the kind smile on her face, but her father's arms were folded and he his stance looked like an angry stormcloud.

Shaala spoke first. "Tali'Zorah, I'm so glad you are alright. We were ... dreadfully worried about you."

Tali smiled gently. "I'm fine, auntie. I could use some of your tucharial tea...but other than that I'm okay."

Rael snorted. "Did you have to gethify yourself anymore this time, daughter?"

Tali flinched a little. "No, father."

He grunted, then unfolded his arms. "According to Kal'Reegar and your captain, you performed...well beyond expectations. I've finally gotten an accounting of what all you did on your jaunt with Shepard...and I am rather surprised to hear that you are her acting Chief Engineer."

Tali nodded. "Engineer Adams was wounded, so I had to take over. Before that they had me acting as his assistant. He's very good...for a human."

Shaala gave a throaty laugh. "Is that high or faint praise, my dear? No matter. The entire Fleet is proud of you, Tali. Your father gets...overprotective at times, but I wanted you to know your friends and shipmates have been cheering nonstop since the news of the victory at the Citadel happened. The Fleet is badly damaged, but our sacrifice, and that of the humans, seems to have opened some eyes."

Tali felt herself go cold. "S-sacrifice...?"

Rael'Zorah closed his eyes, the glowing orbs blanking, leaving his masked visage bare. "The humans let us know about the assault on the Citadel. Geth fleets struck many locations, to draw off defenders from the Citadel, then somehow managed to jump insystem with that black ship. They were badly outnumbered, and as I told you in our last message, we were a jump away at Bekenstein."

Shaala nodded. "There was a vote...and the Conclave and Admiralty Board agreed to go to war, to stop our creations. We held back most of the Civilian fleet, but the rest entered the fight and helped stop the geth. At ... sharp costs."

Rael looked hard at Tali. "We lost more than half of the Scouting Flotilla, and more than forty percent of the Heavy Fleet. We had to drop marines on the Citadel too, to fight the geth, and between losses there and on ships...seventy thousand quarians are dead."

Tali bowed her head as the numbers washed over her.

O-OSaBC-O

The Citadel Council chamber was a wreck, and Tarren Sparatus picked his way past debris on his way to the top of the room's archway, glancing around as he went.

The signs of battle were heavy and obvious, melted floor plating, destroyed planters, bits of debris and scorching from biotic blasts. Blood – here, smears of red, there purple – was flung about liberally. His eyes traced over the signs and damage, trying to piece together what had occurred, with no avail.

The battle, whatever had occurred, had been fierce and ugly. Sparatus had seen asari matriarchs in battle in his youth, and the idea of going talon-to-talon with one made his fringe contract. No matter her other, numerous faults, Sparatus couldn't doubt Shepard's bravery.

He stepped up the narrow stairs, sidestepping a shattered cherry blossom tree, and looked around further. Crude repairs had already started, the damaged standing arena the Council usually operated from having rough plastic sheeting to cover the massive hole where Benezia T'Soni had ended her life. The elevator shafts had been cleared and Palin's C-SEC team rescued from the base before anyone died.

The medical support team who'd first arrived in the Council chambers in the aftermath of the defeat of Nazara were stunned by the damage Shepard and her team had taken. All five of them, plus the nearly dead Matriarch Aethyta, had taken wounds enough to kill a pack of krogan. They'd found Garrus and his mate barely clinging to life, slumped together in a pool of their own blood, still holding hands and blocking the way to Shepard's enemies, a sight that Sparatus reluctantly admitted touched his turian soul.

That was duty. That was sacrifice. That was honor. For all the claims that Garrus Vakarian was not worthy of his clan-name, he and his mate had slaughtered seventy eight geth attempting to get past them, and had held a line Sparatus wasn't sure he could have done in his Blackwatch days with an entire killteam.

The chaos in the chambers themselves was even more impressive. He'd seen the video and pictures of the recovery of Shepard's team – the four battered figures looking more like bags of meat and melted armor than living beings. The older asari had fourth degree burns over half her body and enough broken bones that she couldn't be moved without stasis. The human Commissar had lost his leg and required more cybernetic correction for other damage to his spine and arm, and the little asari daughter of Benezia had neural burns that the medics didn't know how to heal alongside a host of other injuries.

Shepard, though, had obviously taken the worst of the beating, with her armor smashed into her body in places and her internal organs carved up by Benezia's warp sword. She'd done her duty, however, bringing her assigned mission to full completion. Despite the doubts, despite the hesitance of the Council and even her own government to fully back her, and despite facing two the galaxy's strongest figures.

That was duty. That was honor. That was sacrifice.

And that was why Sparatus was here, as he walked up the stairs to the top of the plinth, where Tevos and Valern stood.

The rest of the Chamber was empty except for the bustle of Keepers, repair bots and workers fixing damage, and security officers near the bottom building up stronger defense systems. The three Councilors looked at the room around them for long moments, before Tevos spoke first.

"You called us here, Tarren?"

The turian nodded. "I did. We have some hard choices to make, I think...and I am not the type of person to put them off."

Valern folded his arms. "You are speaking of the humans and the quarians, I suppose?"

Sparatus nodded, folding his arms behind him. He'd deliberately not taken his place beside Tevos and Valern, instead placing himself on the supplicant's pier, as if he was not a part of the Council.

Tevos frowned at his placement and spoke. "We have...that is, the Asari Matriarchy has given thought to the situation with the humans...and the quarians. We are pleased they chose to assist us when the need was there, and we'll do everything we can in aiding them recover from what that cost them."

Valern was eying Sparatus speculatively. "Yes. Certainly ... unexpected of them. Would have not been surprised if both groups had simply stood aside and let the geth triumph. With the loss of many leaders, humans would have been able to argue they needed more voice in galactic society, and the quarians would have had plenty of time to find a dextro world before we could deny them. The Salarian Union was impressed at their ... restraint."

Sparatus snorted. "Our very lives continue this moment due to both of them having more honor than that. If the quarians had not interceded, the Citadel Defense Fleet would have been destroyed in short order. And if the humans had not been willing to sacrifice their lives for ours in saving the Destiny Ascension, that last dreadnaught would have blown us to pieces." The turian folded his arms. "I am not comfortable in dismissing such valor without the appropriate rewards."

Tevos frowned. "The appropriate rewards?"

Sparatus nodded. "As much as I would like to deny it, the humans...have proven themselves. They have a Spectre, who has completed her first mission successfully. They have a military contribution of the required strength which has bled for this Council. They have proven willing to overcome political strife to do what is needed. And as far as the Turian Hierarchy is concerned, despite the ... unpleasant nature of the Relay 314 incident...humans have shown honor, discipline, and loyalty."

Sparatus sighed. "If they are not offered a seat on the Council after this, they are likely to leave the Citadel Agreements entirely." He paused. "And they'd be right to do so, because if they are not honored for how they bled, then what exactly are you looking for in leadership?"

Valern's expression was neutral. "And the quarians?"

Sparatus shrugged. "They shocked me with their bravery. The least we can do for them is restore their embassy and lift the embargo and travel restrictions, since they stepped up and fought the problems they caused ... rather than, say, appealing to outside parties to solve the problem for them. But to be honest? They risked the only homes they have to save us, who have done nothing and ignored the threat of the geth to punish their creators instead. I doubt it would happen, but I could also argue they deserve more than merely a talon flourish of respect."

He fixed his gaze on Valern, who merely nodded.

Tevos pursed her lips. "I was under the impression you disliked the humans, and Shepard in particular."

Sparatus flicked his mandible. "I do. They're arrogant, shortsighted bigots with a bent fringe look at the universe. And yet, they are strangely honorable." He paused. "Shepard made that call, you know. The one that resulted in the human fleet saving us. I am unwilling to be in that barbarians' debt."

Tevos and Valern traded glances, a gesture he was all too familiar with. Valern spoke. "I am not so convinced the humans are ready for such a gift, and to readmit the quarians will cause friction with the batarians."

Sparatus snarled. "Those honorless dogs did not die in heaps to save our eggs, Valern. Seventy thousand quarians. Fifteen thousand humans. They didn't have to come, and they didn't have to die for the cause, but they did!"

He leaned forward, feeling his talons tighten and his feet angle for a spring and leap. "The Turian Hierarchy is neither blind nor stupid, fellow Councilors. There is only so much the Primarch can accept in terms of how our economy is being ruined and our volus allies led astray before we are required to act. If this Council can't act to respect sacrifice, duty, and honor, then it answers unspoken questions about exactly why the Council has no volus, no elcor, no humans, no quarians, no hanar. It has nothing to do with requirements that have now been met and more to do with your desire to manipulate galactic events."

Tevos hissed, but it was Valern who held up a hand. "Calm yourself, Tevos. Sparatus, let us assume we accept your logic for a moment. We are the oldest races in our alliance, and our guidance has lead galactic culture for millennia Why dilute our wisdom with that of younger, more reckless species?"

Sparatus laughed. "Your guidance led to the Rachni Wars, to the Krogan Rebellions, to the Second Krogan Uprising. It lead to destabilizing batarian culture and then pushing them away, to not aiding the quarians when the geth were a minor threat that we could have easily crushed. I am not as blinded by the power and glory of being a part of the Council when I see it's trail markings laid bare."

Valern rubbed one of the horns on his head. "It is more complicated than that. Humans are ... not as honorable as you think, and there is a great deal of darkness in their government's actions."

Sparatus folded his arms. "I have not forgotten the little lesson Ambassador Udina taught us. We are all dirty. We all do things in the darkness in case we can't trust the other." He straightened to his full height. "But if we turn our backs on the chance to fix our relationship with the humans and quarians now, you will have problems down the line if Shepard's evidence of more of these...Reapers...is accurate. I don't think they will sacrifice themselves to save us a second time."

Silence reigned in the chamber for long moments before Valern spoke. "For me, it is an issue of pragmatism. Adding a human allows for vote deadlocking. Three is optimal. Or five. But no other race meets good requisite for fifth seat, despite your words regarding the quarians."

Tevos considered for a long moment. "The volus would argue they do, and if Shepard's reports are accurate, they played a key role in defeating Benezia's forces at Ilos. Or, if we truly wished to shock the galaxy, we could take Sparatus's words at face value and make the quarians the fifth seat."

Sparatus placed his arms behind his back. "Is that a concession you are willing to make?"

Tevos considered Sparatus for a long moment. She had warned the Matriarchy repeatedly that the turians were not stupid, and sooner or later the Council would have to expand, probably to take in humans and volus, or the turians would call them on their manipulation. The alliance of the salarians and asari had dominated the turian seat on the Council for centuries, and changing the status quo was frowned on.

But she could read between the lines of Sparatus's 'request' well enough. If at least the humans were not admitted, the turians would not simply continue to accept salarian and asari dominance. And despite the economic troubles the Hierarchy was facing, if the turians decided to skew the results by throwing support to the Volus for a Council seat, the careful planning over centuries to weaken the Hierarchy would evaporate in days. The Vol Protectorate would get the Hierarchy back on it's economic feet in short order, and a turian-human-volus bloc in opposition to asari and salarian interest would end badly.

Denying the humans would strain the asari relationship with humanity as well, and Tevos had little doubt elements like Terra Firma would take advantage of that to cause trouble. Given their proximity to that thug Aria, they might even pull a stunt like they'd threatened to at the outset of the mess and withdraw from the Council Alliance.

She sighed. Admitting the humans would not be problematic, despite Valern's worry of deadlocks. Human and turian interests clashed too much, and she fully expected manipulating whatever child the humans sent to fill a Council seat to be easy.

Adding the quarians would actually aid in stopping the volus and elcor pressure to join the Council, given they had not contributed to the campaign much. It would certainly send a message to the batarians, and the technical capabilities of the quarians would be useful. Plus, it would head off any disruption of the careful manipulation of the volus towards their turian overseers.

If the quarians demanded a planet or two as part of their price, well, the Turians pushed for this, let them supply the worlds.

She spoke calmly. "I would suggest then, given Valern's statement, that we reward both humanity and the quarians by honoring them to join the Council." Her voice hardened. "However, any Council Vote that would require alteration of the Council Charter would require a four-seat vote. Assuming such is agreeable, I vote yes."

Valern gave her a searching look, and then folded his arms. "I am ... in opposition to such an expansion. I vote no."

Sparatus smiled. "And I vote yes. I believe this is the first time an action I originated has passed a vote. I am pleased. The Primarch did not think you would agree."

Tevos shot a look at Valern, who grimly comprehended the situation, before turning back to Sparatus. "We only act in the service of the greater good, Tarren. I will have words with the Media Department on the announcement, but you can inform Ambassador Udina and Admiral Rael'Zorah yourself, if you wish."

Sparatus bowed. "I appreciate the courtesy, Tevos. I'll return shortly, assuming the stupid humans don't ruin everything by refusing." He turned on a heel and departed the tattered chamber, leaving the asari and salarian behind. After a long moment, Tevos sighed.

"It was eventually going to happen anyway, Valern."

The salarian gave a tight, cunning smile. "Oh, I know. Voted no just to make him think he'd won something. I predicted this outcome even as we were disembarking when I saw the turians grudgingly thanking the humans for saving us." He rubbed his chin thoughtfully. "You work the humans, and I will work the quarians?"

She nodded. "Simple enough."

O-OSaBC-O

It took six hours for Shepard to regain consciousness, but four entire days passed before she could so much as leave her hospital bed. The first day was nothing but hammering agony and the endless itch of bone and tissue regenerators, broken up by periods of unconsciousness as doctors conducted multiple surgeries to deal with her internal injuries.

It was late in the second day before she awoke again, and another few hours before she was coherent enough to speak. Her first conversation was with a concerned looking Helen Chakwas.

"Hey, doc." Her voice was a tired, dry rasp, and Shepard winced just hearing it.

Chakwas gave a wan smile, bags under her eyes and her uniform rumped. "It's been very touch and go the past forty-eight hours, Commander. I am pleased to report no casualties among the Normandy crew or marine team, or your own strike team."

Shepard slumped in relief. "Thank God, finally."

Chakwas smiled a bit more brightly. "There were many quarian marines killed, unfortunately, and horrific casualties all around. The hospitals are overflowing – you're actually in a converted hotel with the medical equipment brought in by salarian specialists. The damage to the Citadel was ... quite severe."

Shepard nodded. "But we're all alive, so we can rebuild. Since I have a clean butcher's bill for the first time ever...how's the injury status?"

Chakwas sat down, examining Shepard's vitals displayed on a haptic screen next to the bed. "Severe, unfortunately. I'll start with the marines we offloaded prior to our departure to Ilos. I'm afraid Masterson didn't make it. He'd lost too much blood, and he had a very rare blood type. By the time the doctors realized there was additional internal bleeding, he'd been on the regenerators for thirty minutes, and the shock killed him."

Shepard sighed and nodded. The older sergeant had been there from the first, all the way back to Eden Prime, and it was sad that he was gone. There was nothing she could do about it, though, and she had to keep her thoughts focused on the rest of her team. "What about Ashley?"

Chakwas smiled again. "She's fine. She'll have to have cybernetic correction for her back and leg, but the spinal damage was correctable. The baby is fine as well." Chakwas pulled out a pad. "Ownby is still in critical condition but has regained consciousness. Haskins is still in the burn unit, but inflammation and suppuration have ceased and I think she'll pull through. As expected, both of your DACT soldiers were too stupid to die, and Haln is recovering and in stable condition."

Shepard snorted at the mention of the DACT. "I was pretty worried about Montoya, given how many hits he took. What about Tali? And what happened to Wrex?"

Chakwas winced. "Tali was hit very hard in the side and shoulder, but she will be fine. They've got her in a clean room at Hudson Memorial. No cybernetic corrections needed, just surgical fixes and some time on the regen machines. She's already awake, talking with her father."

Shepard rolled her eyes. "That guy is a dick."

Chakwas chuckled. "Matriarch Aethyta put him in his place, I think. He was looking for his daughter or for you, got misdirected to Liara's room, and said something that set her off."

She glanced at the padd. "Speaking of said matriarch, despite truly horrific burns, she's up and around. She'll be having reconstructive surgery soon, and she was pretty torn up medically speaking, but she's tougher than anyone else I've seen, and that includes you. She's mostly recovering in Liara's room right now."

Shepard nodded. Chakwas continued. "As for Wrex, he was very badly hurt in an altercation with someone he calls Okeer."

Shepard scowled. "Okeer was on the Citadel? Christ, that's why Wrex left all of a sudden, to fight him one-on-one." She sighed. "Is he..okay?"

Chakwas nodded. "It looks like Wrex lost, and lost badly, but a rather astonishing thing happened. Your ... former teammate, Beatrice Shields, came along and rescued him, as well as stopping geth from overrunning Huerta Memorial. According to Wrex, she's working for the Shadow Broker now. She was of vast assistance in helping us bypass turrets and get to you in the Tower."

Shepard frowned. That didn't exactly sound like the Shields she knew. "And Wrex?"

Chakwas checked the padd. "Eating and regenerating, mostly. He'll be fine. Krogan are very difficult to kill." She flicked a finger over the pad. "Garrus and Telanya are recovering at Kithoi Memorial, in critical but stable condition. They managed to stop over seventy geth from getting into the Tower."

Shepard arched an eyebrow, then winced. Her face hurt. "Seventy? Damn. That's...damn."

Chakwas chuckled. "It was, I admit, a touching and impressive scene. There were geth bodies everywhere, and those two slumped against a wall, Garrus holding her hands. It would have been almost romantic if it wasn't so... bloody."

Shepard chuckled. "I'm sure." She exhaled. "I guess there's a reason you're leaving Liara for last?"

Chakwas shook her head. "No, just going in the order I got reports. Commissar Jiong was...removed from medical by Commissariat medics. I know he is 'stable' but no other details. Liara is down a few rooms, in serious condition. She very severely overstrained her biotics to the point where she has some minor nerve damage, and other injuries. She's drifting in and out of consciousness, and we still have some corrective surgery to do on her heart, which nearly gave out."

Shepard closed her eyes and concentrated. She could barely feel Liara, but the link was there, cool and reassuring. She gave a shaky sigh and opened her eyes again. "Understood, Doctor. I assume the high command and Council has been briefed?"

Chakwas shrugged. "Pressly told me to inform him when you woke up and were awake enough to talk. So did Captain Anderson, Ambassador Udina, and several attaches from the Council."

Shepard nodded. "Alright, let them know I'm up...and can I get some water?"

As it turned out, it was several hours before anyone showed up to talk to her, time she passed by talking with Chakwas about the aftermath of the battle. When the door chimed, it was Pressly who appeared, followed by Udina, Anderson, and two men she didn't recognize. One wore an admiral's uniform, his face craggy and scarred, the other an expensive suit, his ascetic features framed by white-blond hair and striking green eyes.

Shepard sat up straighter, grimacing against the pain, and forced a thin smile. "Sirs." Chakwas glanced at the group and quietly stepped out, shutting the door after her.

Anderson was the first to speak. "Well done, Sara. We've got a lot to talk about, if you're up to it."

She shrugged. "I can't move and the haptic channels all suck, and Chakwas has things to do anyway. What's up?"

Anderson glanced at Udina, who rolled his eyes. "Shepard. Despite my misgivings in the beginning, and your general uncivilized demeanor, you've performed a task no other in the Systems Alliance could achieve. I wasn't on the Destiny Ascension, but my family was...and I thank you for making the call that saved their lives."

Shepard didn't know Udina had a family, and briefly wondered about the kind of woman who would marry him, but shook it off. "I did my duty, sir. Nothing more and nothing less. Glad it worked out well, but the alternative...just felt wrong."

The admiral spoke up. "You're right, Shepard. I'm Admiral Hackett, commander Fifth Fleet. I could have made the call on my own, but I would have made the wrong one, based on what little I knew. I hated to put you on the spot like that, but part of command is knowing when you aren't ready to make the call and let someone else do it."

She eyed the older man carefully. She'd never seen him in person before, but she knew that technically she answered to him – he was Admiral Mikhailovich's boss, if she remembered correctly. Rather than say anything questionable about how she felt making that call, she shrugged. "I just did what felt...right. I'll admit some of why I did it was thinking of consequences down the line, but ..." She shook her head, and the admiral nodded.

"Being in command isn't like merely being in charge, Shepard. I can pay people to manage, I can't pay them to truly lead. You did the right thing, and I'm glad I let you."

She arched an eyebrow at that, but said nothing, and Anderson spoke again. "Sara, with all of the chaos of the past few days, there's been a lot of ... changes going on. We just found out a few minutes ago that the Citadel Council is going to offer the Systems Alliance and the Quarian Admiralty seats on the Council itself."

Shepard managed to keep her jaw from dropping. "About damned time, don't you think?"

The man in a suit gave a wintry smile. "Some may say that. I'm Jared Cairns-Coleman, an attache to the Office of the Ministry of State. Minister Bekenstein offers his congratulations on a successful completion to your mission."

Shepard arched her eyebrow again. "Thanks...I guess. But why are you here in person? He could have done that via comm-link."

Anderson cleared his throat. "Shepard, the ... Council made this decision based on a number of factors. Certainly, the human navy helping at the end and saving the Council played a role, but it's clear that you made the call on that. You stopped Saren, stopped Benezia, and stopped Cerberus. When the turians got their seat, the turian general who led the final charge on Tuchanka was allowed to make the call on who got the Council seat."

At this Udina nodded. "Due to the fact that you have played the most key role in this entire mess, Shepard, Councilor Sparatus said that history should be respected, as well as your efforts. The council has determined you should be the one who decides what human will hold the role of Human Councilor."

Shepard looked at each one of them for a long moment before bursting into laughter. "Me!? Why in the name of God would you – or anyone else with a brain in their skull – have me do this? I'm hardly qualified to know who to pick."

Jared Cairns-Coleman had a satisfied look on his face. "Which answers the question as to why I am here, ma'am. The Minister of State would suggest rather than relying on your inexact knowledge of which government figures would be best suited to the job, that the best person for the job would be someone who keeps a clear view on human interests."

Shepard eyed the man before turning to Anderson. "I'm guessing he doesn't know?"

Anderson shook his head. "Thanks to some creative work by certain parties, including the Commissariat, no one knows."

Udina and Hackett frowned, confused, and Shepard smiled. "Ah, good. Then to answer the guy from the government, fuck no. I didn't get my ass blown to crap and lose half my marines just to put some Terra Firma fucker in the seat and have them screw it all to hell."

The man's face tightened. "Commander Shepard, perhaps you misunderstand. You have a duty to the Systems Alliance to –" He was cut off as she snarled.

"Duty? Look asshole, I have no clue what cave you hid yourself in, but the SA hasn't done a topnotch job of backing me up. They hung me out to dry on Torfan. They fucked me over by sticking me with a Captain that hated my guts and did his best to get me killed. When I finally get to work with the man I admire the most, they steal his ship from him and hand it to me, before telling me to be a good little girl and don't embarrass the SA anymore. When I find out the sick bullshit the SA was working on at Feros, they call me everything but a rock-ignorant criminal traitor and threaten me. When I find out where Saren is, I have to go to the Black Hats and AI Sholes because my own fucking Fleet Master won't listen to me. And when I find Benezia? When I am ready to shut her down? You fuckers STEAL my ship from me and lock me down to score political points at home."

She snorted. "If not for Udina, we'd all be fucking dead right now. In fact, that's a good goddamned idea." She turned to Udina, who had a warily shocked look on his face. "You know all the diplomatic bullshit these people like, and you clearly don't take shit from anyone. You be the Councilor."

Cairns-Coleman's eyes widened. "But ... the Minister..."

Udina said nothing for a long moment before his face split in an almost diabolical grin. "Oh, Jared. I cannot wait to see Ira's face when he hears the news." He turned to Shepard. "I am ... grateful. Thank you. I know I spoke briefly of my ambition to you once...but I am nonetheless honored you remembered it and think I am up to the task."

She tilted her head. "See? You can be nice, and I can do more than headbutt krogan and eat babies."

Udina rolled his eyes, and Anderson chuckled. Hackett still appeared confused, and Pressly was leaning against the doorway, a smirk on his features. Shepard glanced back to Udina. "Is there anything else?"

Udina smiled and folded his arms. "One thing, and then I will depart to ... deal with events. The President is on his way to the Citadel. Chakwas tells us she will be able to let you out of here in four or five more days. You're expected to report to the President at that time, and you'll get new orders from that point."

She nodded, and smiled as Udina mockingly escorted Cairns-Coleman out of the room. Hackett glanced at Shepard and nodded. "Again, good work, Commander. If you need me for anything I'll be at temporary Fleet Command in what's left of the Human Embassy."

He too, departed, leaving Anderson and Pressly, who finally approached. "Well, Sara, looks like I was right in tapping you to be a Spectre." Anderson's voice was warm with approval and pride and Shepard basked in it for long seconds.

"I guess. The uniform is okay." She grinned, and Anderson laughed, clean stress free laughter like she hadn't heard since that lunch in his apartment.

Pressly had a datapad in his hands, and Shepard met his gaze evenly as the mirth faded. "What's the status of my ship, XO?"

Pressly snorted. "Shot to pieces, ma'am. It's going to be a good three to four months before she's spaceworthy again. The trip back was pretty ugly, more equipment started breaking down, and the quarian ships were having problems too. We luckily stumbled across a turian patrol that helped us limp back to Citadel Space, and by the time we got here, you were already in surgery and the last of the geth cleaned up."

She nodded. "Crew?"

He squared his shoulders. "No further casualties since Ilos. Crew is on leave. A dockside SA commander has the conn of the Normandy, she's currently beached."

She nodded again. "Have someone get my stuff and Liara's out of my cabin before some dockworker puts two and two together."

Pressly gestured to the door, where a shipbag sat in one corner. Atop it was a neatly folded Penal Legion blanket and her sketchbook. "Already done, ma'am."

Shepard rolled her eyes. "You see, Anderson? He's a much, much better XO than I would have been."

Anderson snorted, and Pressly smiled. Shepard leaned forward a bit. "Any other news or facts I need to know?"

Pressly thought for a long second. "Besides the media howling to speak with you, no, ma'am. General Von Grath will be arriving in a day or two – he told us to make sure you were awake so he could yell at you for not inviting him to 'the beatdown of the Century'. Other than that, you have tons of 'get well soon' messages, cards, gifts, and there have been prayer vigils outside the hospital and hotel for your recovery for the past day or so."

Shepard eyed him a long second. Prayer vigils? For her? "...huh. Well, let everyone know I'm fine, then, I guess." She glanced at Anderson. "I want to see Liara...go order Chakwas around."

Anderson merely snorted. "I'm not stupid, Sara. Get some more rest, we'll see if you're up to it tomorrow."

O-OSaBC-O

The days passed slowly, as Shepard and her team recovered. It was the fifth day before she could actually be moved into another room, with Liara, only to discover that Matriarch Aethyta was in said room as well.

The older asari woman had spent the previous few days awkwardly reconnecting to her daughter's life. She had explained the truth of it all, a truth that left Liara stunned.

Aethyta and Benezia had been friends in their very early youth, at the time a feud between House T'Soni and House Vasir was only a minor breach. Not long after they reached adulthood, however, the feud turned deadly, as a Vasir House member was accused of being an ardat-yakshi by Benezia's eldest sister.

As it turned out, she wasn't, rather she was competition for the affections of a wealthy turian female they were both interested in. The two asari plotted and counter plotted against one another, framing each others Houses in various acts to try and cripple them. Eventually the truth came out and in a fit of pique, Benezia's sister falsified records to make it look as if her Vasir rival was an ardat-yakshi.

The insult was unforgivable, and the T'Soni would have ended up paying retribution fees, until a hotheaded Vasir maiden, in a poorly planned revenge attempt, tried to sabotage a weapons demonstration hosted by the T'Soni to push the Armali Council line of arms. The malfunction, intended to be harmless but embarrassing, backfired, killing both of Benezia's older sisters.

No matter what level of insult T'Soni manipulations had cost Vasir, the murder of two of its princesses by Vasir vengeance was intolerable. The Thirty reduced Vasir holdings and stripped them of their ancestral lands, leaving the House near bankrupt.

The two Houses grew apart for obvious reasons, and Aethyta and Benezia fell out of contact. The former attempted to revive her Family fortunes by starting biotic mercenary companies, taking up the arts of a sword-mistress and practicing endless years with the commandos to become one of the finest combatants in asari history.

Benezia, less physical and more cerebral, began to lay out the first plans for her own vision of asari unity. She joined the Temple at an early age, putting off childbirth, although she did consider fathering a child with a close turian friend. In the end, he died before they bonded, and she continued on, serving as a Priestess, then a Justicar, and a Commando leader.

Aethyta rose to great fame as a blade-master, teaching commandos and even being hired to instruct the House of T'Armal. In the span of a hundred years, she had reversed the slide of the Vasir fortunes, her acolytes going onto become some of the most feared commandos and Justicars ever seen. Her most prized pupil was the Justicar Samara, a simple commoner woman turned into a nigh unstoppable killing machine after just forty years of training.

Benezia took control of her house after her own mother died at the start of the Second Krogan Rebellions, reinvigorating the valor of House T'Soni as a warrior house with her fierce leadership. After the war she rose rapidly through the Temple, eventually reaching it's highest Rank, Solarch. She stepped down to Lunarch a century later when the more skilled and younger Thana Vathan arose, and slowly became less active in the temple as she approached her eighth century.

By this time, Aethyta had also become leader of House Vasir, pouring most of her skills into training a new generation of the Republican Guard and making the Armali Guard one of the most feared special forces units in the galaxy. She began formulating a teaching, that asari could not hope to guide the races of the galaxy by wisdom alone. They were given great strength, gifts of biotic power and insight to protect the younger races, and their lack of militancy and focus on the ancient hunter-like teachings of old would weaken them in serious conflict.

Benezia, on the other hand, had begun her own teachings, that of the Triune – a joining of intent, unity, and guidance. Gently suggesting that the races of the galaxy needed more than mere hints, she embraced a concept of siari beyond asari, of burning a path that other races should follow in pushing their own race to a new level of civilization and culture.

Both of their paths flourished, thousands upon thousands heeding their words and following their footsteps. House Vasir grew wealthy from the income of a dozen mercenary companies, while Benezia gained a reputation as a wise adviser, diplomat, and negotiator.

The two asari had reunited with the communal work done by Benezia's younger sister, Mithra. Mithra's mind turned more to profit and avarice than mere unity, and by sublimating her pride and working with House Vasir, they had revitalized Armali's economy and the shamed name of the Armali Council. The two houses worked together to build a new commercial line of products, and it was only natural that the House leaders work together.

The friendship and easy camaraderie they had felt when younger turned out to still exist. Benezia was stern where Aethyta was playful, serene to her boisterous, dignified to her earthy. And yet they found they complemented each other almost perfectly. Even their grand teachings and plans fit together, Aethyta's more muscular Asari Republic having the cachet to impress more martial aliens such as turians and batarians, while Benezia's unity aided asari security and forced more asari to see their own limits when compared to aliens.

Aethyta admitted to Liara, as she told her story, that it didn't help that, despite their power and elevation, their grand dreams and great achievements, they were both lonely, stressed and burning out, so focused on duty and the Family and progress neither had any time for themselves. Benezia had sacrificed her youth to Temple and Justicar service, Aethyta to commandos and fighting.

When friendship turned to attraction, and attraction to something more, neither Aethyta nor Benezia cared much for the taboo against asari-asari offspring. That was for commoners, with their lesser blood, not the ancient scions of two of the most noble houses. Aethyta's voice broke as she told Liara of their bond, of the memories of happier times they had.

When Liara was born, however, everything had shattered, although not to do with her birth. Aethyta, distracted by Benezia and her own Family, had not paid close attention to her followers, who had fallen in with Eclipse members and begun souring the honor of the Vasir name. When several of her most ardent followers were accused of crimes against the Republic and had to be hunted down and executed, the shame was public. Worse, investigations showed her mercenary companies had misspent millions of credits on red sand, illegal weapons and worse.

While Aethyta had nothing to do with such things, the fact that it was her teachings that were followed couldn't be denied. Worse still, there were already rumors that the Armali Council and even House T'Soni were involved in such.

At the same time, scandals rocked the House of T'Soni as well, as Mithra's oldest daughter Yvael was accused and convicted of force-bonding a commoner asari for her own pleasure. Yvael was punished severely, but her time spent with some of Aethyta's followers lead many T'Soni to question the liaison between the two matriarchs.

Finally, stresses and struggles between the two asari about Liara's future tore them apart. Benezia wanted to shape and control Liara's life to have her be a leader and guide for those who followed, while Aethyta wanted Liara to be free to choose her own path. Given that in asari society a mother usually did indeed shape and guide their child, Aethyta's proposal sounded less like wanting to see Liara do what she wanted and more like irresponsibility. When Benezia accused her of such, Aethyta was hurt and wounded, leading to her concealing her other problems and worries from her bondmate as they began to drift apart.

When investigations began questioning her links to House T'Soni, Aethyta admitted to Liara that she had panicked. Instead of explaining everything and trusting Benezia to make the correct choices, she was scared of public opinion – of her teachings, of the mismanagement of funds, of the old wounds between the two houses, and most of all of the birth of Liara at all. She instead took all blame for the malfeasance of her followers onto herself, implying that perhaps T'Soni had actually sabotaged her efforts, and withdrew herself as Matriarch. Leaving behind everything but her own warp sword, she said a tearful last good bye to the baby Liara and force-broke her bond with Benezia, sending the woman into a depression.

The fallout was ugly. While the investigation tailed off, and Benezia's name was clear of any dishonor, it soured relations badly. Many of the younger T'Soni, impressed by Aethyta's fire and legendary skills, blamed Benezia's haughty airs for the breach, while her sister cursed her for not doing more to prevent the Vasir from pulling away.

Accusations from both sides only increased when Benezia would not name who Liara's aithntar was, leading to ugly charges that Benezia had cheated on her bondmate. Broken-hearted and alone, Benezia struggled to balance her hopes for Liara with the last request of Aethyta to let Liara be as she was, incorporating her words into a nickname for Liara to remind her of it.

From there, Aethyta basically let herself go, sinking into drunkenness, sleeping with too many partners to even recall, and giving into despair. She ended up running a bar on Omega, reporting on Aria's activities to a disdainful Council of Matriarchs.

She'd watched with pride as Liara grew and became her own self-person, buying up every book and paper Liara wrote and slowly teaching herself a bit about archeology and history to really understand them. She'd been depressed again when Liara and Benezia split, but didn't worry overmuch, fifty years was not a long span to an asari after all.

And when she finally heard that Benezia, her Nezy, was responsible for the atrocities at Eden Prime and elsewhere, she had to act. Informing the Council of Matriarchs of her decision, they'd given her what intel they had on Benezia, and wished her luck or a swift death. Drawing on her deep knowledge of how her bondmate thought, she'd anticipated Benezia moving to the Citadel, and had made preparation to face and defeat her there.

"...except, I wasn't strong enough, after all. A thousand years of talking about how badass I am, and I got beaten down, and could only watch as my daughter had to fight her mother." Aethyta's voice was sad and low, and Liara merely squeezed her hand, shaking her own head.

"I am not going to blame you for what has happened...for the fault is not only yours, or hers, or anyone's. I am just happy you are here, that we are here together...that I am not alone in this dark space."

Liara's words left Aethyta crying, and she let the agony of those long years slowly go as she wept into her daughter's shoulder. It was the release of guilt, shame, and most of all regret, and Aethyta swore she wouldn't waste this second, Goddess-given chance to be a part of her daughter's life.

When Shepard arrived, in a grav-lift chair pushed by a cheerful Chakwas, Aethyta was curious to know more about her daughter's bondmate. Liara was sleeping again, resting after a final set of corrective surgeries to her shoulder, and this was the best time to get to know her future second-daughter.

To be honest, she was half horrified and half angry that anyone as young as Liara would be bonded. It was dangerous to do so, usually shattering the personalities of those bonded and leading to medical complications if care wasn't taken.

But she let nothing of that show on her face or in her voice. When it came to bondings of poor choice, very little could beat the Nezzys and Eths after all. Rather than drive her daughter back out of her life at this critical stage, she decided to listen and learn for once, taking a page from Benezia's book.

"So. Commander Shepard."

Shepard sat quietly in the lift-chair, gazing back at Aethyta steadily. She'd never dated, never even really understood much about the entire process. She knew, vaguely, that sometimes human parents disapproved of who their child saw, but she didn't know what to expect from an asari matriarch at this point.

She shrugged. "Matriarch Aethyta I'm glad to see you're okay."

The older asari rolled her eyes. "Don't call me that. Makes me sound like a tidedamned relic. Just Aethyta is fine, or 'hey you'." She smirked, running her eyes over the commander.

Good body. Nice tits. Nice ass. Nice legs. Knockout eyes. Heh. That's my girl, settle for nothing less than the best.

Rather than voice such thoughts, she let her rough voice slip into a deeper register. "I ain't going to lecture you about the fishes and the lilies, Shepard. I figure if you're bonded, then the only thing I can do is be supportive and suggest good party spots for the orgy at the hand-fasting."

Shepard grimaced. "Matriarch Suliasa warned me about that."

Aethyta cackled. "It'll be great. I figure you'll have a big party for winning this mess anyway, why not spice it up a little?"

Shepard sat back. "Uh...because there's a chance the leader of my race might be there?"

Aethyta shrugged. "Is he cute?"

Shepard stared at her in unabashed shock before shaking her head. "You ... are not what I was expecting, ma'am."

Aethyta's expression grew more serious. "Of course not, kiddo. Asari have a certain reputation. We're mysterious sultry aliens, exotic and wise, except when we're flinging panties and screwing or flinging singularities and killing. It's all a load of crap." She huffed. "I'm a person. You're a person. Little Wing is a person. God, even that Saren fucker was a person. We're not the sum of a pack of stereotypes, we're just ... who we are. And who I am is someone who could care less about propriety and all that shit. It hasn't done anything for the asari except make us blind to the world around us."

Shepard could agree with that, to a point, although she rather preferred the asari culture to her own. Pursing her lips, she nodded. "Okay, great. So...who are you?"

Aethyta smirked. "I'm a warrior, babe. Maybe one of the last great ones my sorry ass race is going to make. The rest of my kind are all older than batarians are stupid. I am the way I am because I don't care what people think about me. My actions speak for me, not a buncha words that any bastard with an ass pointing towards the ground can say."

She folded her arms, sitting up in her hospital bed a bit more. "Who are you, Shepard?"

Shepard laughed. "I'm not really sure any more. I guess... I used to be...a thing. A killing machine. Like a butcher's cleaver. I was used to frighten and kill, to make sure that pirates and the like got the message about not fucking with the SA. I came from nothing, and I turned myself into a piece of shit criminal. A single man saved me from myself, made me believe in myself. I lost that belief for a lot of years while I was that butcher's cleaver...and then your daughter saved me again. She ... she helped me find my way out of the bitterness and self-hate I had clung to for years."

Shepard gazed over at Liara, jaw tightening. "She's all I have. So if you have a problem with us being together..."

Aethyta held Shepard's gaze firmly. "If I didn't think you should be with my little girl...you'd already be dead." The gaze sharpened, darkening, and Shepard nodded grimly. Then Aethyta laughed.

"Lucky for you, you're sexy, smart, and violent enough to turn anything that messes with my girl into paste. I approve, as long as you understand what you're getting into."

Shepard paused. "I...I plan to marry her. Or whatever the asari term is. I want her to be a citizen of the SA, so the Justicars and the Council of Bitchtriarchs can shut the fuck up."

Aethyta spent several seconds recovering from laughter at that. "Ah...Council of Bitchtriarchs. I'm so using that the next time those tired old cunts bother me with their plotting sandshit. I like you more and more, kiddo." She paused. "I did what I could, traded a favor with the Shadow Broker to try and get the Justicars to back off...but your idea is better. How will your own people take it? Most of them are ... well, assholes."

Shepard smirked. "Our version of the Justicars basically advised me to do it, they have no problems with it. It might help in dealing with some other issues I have."

Aethyta frowned. "Issues?"

Shepard sighed. "I'm ... a criminal. I can't really own property or .. do anything but serve in the military. People have made noises about fixing that, and they may do so, but my background doesn't give me a lot of understanding on how to ... live a life, I guess?" She exhaled in frustration. "People aren't going to approve of me being with Liara, but like you said, I could give a shit. I'm more worried that I'm not going to be everything she needs me to be."

Aethyta nodded slowly. "And how would you know?"

Shepard shrugged. "That's the problem. I don't. And it's not like I can just ... ask. My past...is baggage I'm still figuring out."

Aethyta was silent several seconds before speaking. "Look kid...I know you probably have your reasons, but I need to know exactly what Liara is dealing with here. You ever done a shallow bond?"

Shepard frowned. "That's...dangerous. There's a ... vision in my head. Something from the Prothean Beacons. It nearly killed Liara and it did kill Shiala when they saw it..."

Aethyta snorted. "And was this before or after you bonded with her?" At Shepard's confused look, she smiled. "Your own mind protects Liara if you're bonded, so don't worry about that. And I'm a lot better at blocking shit out than she is. I've run into people affected by Dark Beacons before, kid. You ain't the first."

Shepard looked hesitant and somewhat worried. "I...there is a lot of bad shit in my past, and I... am not comfortable with ..."

The matriarch's voice was hard. "If I've learned nothing else in these tired years I've lived, it's that shouldering your own pain only makes you suffer more. I'm pretty sure however bad your life has been, however bad the things you did in your past were, that you aren't the same person. But I need to see, nonetheless, so I know, instead of worrying and guessing and filling my days and yours with drama and bullshit."

Shepard bit her lip and extended her hand, and Aethyta took it, cool pebbled skin against warmer beige. There was a flash of disorientation for Shepard, a flicker of something beyond her sight, and then she was leaning back in the chair, and ten minutes had passed.

Aethyta was laying back, shaking her head. "Fuck, kid. That was...a damn sight worse than I expected. Your people are pretty fucking worthless sacks of shit, if you don't mind me saying."

Shepard swallowed. "How much did ... you see?"

Aethyta matched her gaze. "All of it. I'll tell you this, Shepard. Sara." She paused before speaking, not breaking eye contact. "No one can judge you, until they've gone through what you have. So don't let them. I've known Justicars and turian Final Line types who couldn't survive the pain you did."

"Your government? Fuck them. Your old team? Fuck them too. Your bosses in the SA? Double fuck them. Anyone who doesn't like the way you roll? Fuck them in the ass. You did what you had to do, so stop beating yourself up over it."

Shepard merely stared at her, quivering at the iron hard certainty in her voice, as Aethyta continued. "I'm not happy that you had to expose Liara to all that shit...but she is there inside you, in a bond deeper than is probably safe. You and she are one, and your pain is hers to carry. Don't hide it from her, don't be stupid like I was and pretend you can do it all yourself. Don't lie to yourself or her. You're hurt, still, in your soul. If you strip all the fancy fishbits and crestfondling off of siari, that's what it really is. Being willing to hurt those you love, so that the pain is shared. To live with it, move the fuck past it...and be able to smile."

Aethyta paused. "You've gone through some shit that is going to be hard to move past. And some of what you have done... I will say, can't agree with. Your parents, yeah, they deserved it,so did a lot of the other pieces of shit you killed. But some didn't. You've made some bad mistakes,and those are on you to figure out how to move past."

Shepard could only nod.

Aethyta's voice grew harder. "That doesn't mean your broken, or fucking worthless, or anything less than anyone else. You're my blood now, my second-daughter. If no one in this sick fucking galaxy has your back besides me, Liara, and your David Anderson, does it really fucking matter?"

Shepard looked down and smiled at that. "I...guess not."

Aethyta sat back with a huff. "You're also really into some rough shit in the bedroom, which is always a plus. Liara needs a few tips on how to get human females off, though. I mean, seriously, she didn't even use her whole arm."

Shepard blushed and choked, and Aethyta only laughed.

O-OSaBC-O

The arrival of several prominent leaders and masses of media let everyone around the hospital-hotel, and thus Shepard, know that an event was about to happen, but it wasn't until General Von Grath arrived in her hospital room that Shepard was aware it was going to be stupidly massive.

The old man looked as impressive as usual, a gleaming silver cybernetic replacement gracing his left arm. His dress uniform was blindingly white, his handlebar mustache quivering with excitement and glee.

He entered the room with a single knock, carrying a slender bag with the SA logo on it. "Commander Shepard."

Shepard, who'd been cleared from her bed a few hours before, was finishing helping Liara put her shoes on when the general entered, and managed not to fall on her butt in shock as she scrambled to her feet. "General, sir!"

He waved a hand dismissively, taking in her loose BDU's. "At ease, at ease." His gaze met that of Liara evenly. "And a pleasure to see you once more, Doctor T'Soni. My ... sympathies for your recent loss, but I am glad you are still with us."

Liara smiled wanly. "As am I, general. This is my aithntar, or what you would term father, Matriarch Aethyta"

The general took in the reclining form of Aethyta, dressed in a long black robe, speculatively. "A name I have heard in other circles, more militant ones. I am pleased to meet such an august figure."

Aethyta snorted. "General Jason Von Grath. Shepard owes a lot of her career to you, it seems. You're the one who thought you took out Nezy in that piece of crap walker you humans use."

Von Grath arched an eyebrow. "I was rather astonished a war priestess would fall so easily...then again, the Adept cannon of the suit was broken, so I figured it a fairly equal fight." Glancing around the room and the mass of medical equipment now lying unused, he grimaced. "A potent reminder, along with this arm, to be realistic in my self-assessment."

Aethyta laughed at that. "I'm just giving you a hard time, General. I saw the footage, for the situation you were in, that was a well done attack. Next time, don't parry a warp sword. Step back or even throw yourself back, the discharge will eventually blow out any generator."

"Sage advice." He turned back to Shepard. "The President has been advised that you are upgraded from stable condition to light and limited duty. He, along with the Citadel Council and the Systems Alliance Admiralty, have requested your presence in the Citadel Chambers in precisely two hours, in full dress uniform, along with your crew."

Shepard frowned. "Liara is up and around, but I haven't gotten updates on Jiong, Tali or -"

Von Grath cut her off with a raised mechanical hand. "Your entire crew is up and about. Commissar Jiong will need to attend in a lift-chair, as will one of your DACTs and Senior Chief Williams, but everyone – including the krogan, the turian, the asari policewoman, and the quarian – are fine and able to attend. We were mostly waiting for Lady Liara to fully recover, and for certain leaders to arrive."

Shepard sighed. "This is going to be another Star of Terra media nightmare clusterfuck, isn't it?"

Von Grath opened the kitbag he carried in his other hand, showing the pure dress white uniform within, and the loose insignia of a Major of Marines with a red stripe indicating an admiralty rider. "Oh, yes, I'm afraid so."

Aethyta was mildly impressed by the long string of swear words Shepard generated, while Liara blushed and von Grath merely sighed.

---

Chapter 123: Final Chapter : Shadows and Dust

---

A/N:

At fifteen thousand words, this is the final chapter. I'm exhausted.

This story is dedicated to my wife, Alysha, and my friends, Charlene, Griffin and Lais. You know who you are.

If you enjoyed this story, I would request two things. First, please leave a review. I will always be interested in feedback, both positive and negative. If you enjoyed it, I love hearing about it, but I love knowing what exactly you liked or didn't like. If you think it sucks ass, at least tell me why, even if it's no more than "I hate Fshep/Liara" or "No Von Grath/Chakwas sex scene".

Progman, silence!

Second, if you have never written a fan fiction story ... give it a try. The way is long and difficult, but you will find you enjoy it immensely. It allows you to build up and learn to think, write, and build on something while having a familiar universe to work with. There can't be any better way to thank an author for a story than to write one yourself.

This story is now completed. The series will continue. There will be a lengthy linking piece connecting the end of this story to the beginning of the ME2 story, outlining on that is completed. It should go quick.

The poem in this section is by Lord Tennyson, 'They Brought Her Warrior Dead'.

Vaya con dios.

---

O-Of Sheep and Battle Chicken-O

The Citadel Chambers had been the site of intense and focused repair work in the days after the defeat of Nazara. Shepard, in full dress whites, was carefully escorted by a pair of Spectres towards a side room off the main Chamber, while Systems Alliance Guard of Iron units, resplendent in their own dress uniforms, escorted her crew towards the main plinth.

She entered the room and the doors closed behind her, leaving her in a small, comfortable antechamber with five chairs of plush backing. Four soldiers stood along the back of the room – a turian in faintly glowing omni-armor and cybered arms and legs, an old asari in commando leathers with two warp swords, a grim looking black-suited salarian with a band of cybernetics where his eyes should be and belt literally full of large caliber pistols, and a smirking Alliance commander she vaguely recognized as Jack Iroidan, the famous Commissar biotic who created the Nova maneuver.

Seated in front of her, in neat placement in front of what could only be their personal bodyguards, were the High Matriarch of the asari, the turian Primarch, the salarian High Dalatrass, and President Windsor.

It was her president who spoke, his mellifluous voice as calming and rich as usual. "Have a seat, Commander. We are gathered to ... discuss hard facts. And to lay out our plans."

Shepard sat, a bit nervously, with the four most powerful people in the galaxy facing her and four of what was most likely the galaxy's deadliest warriors looking on in boredom.

Matriarch T'Armal spoke first. "We have reviewed in detail the information you have gathered, both from your reconnaissance on Virmire and from the ... data given to us by that offensive little AI-thing, Vigil. As a result, we've decided that the threat of these ... Reapers is a clear and very present danger to both galactic society and quite possibly all life."

Primarch Fedorian spoke next. "Given the losses we've taken in the past few days – over thirty dreadnaughts, well over two thousand cruisers and destroyers, countless fighters, hundreds of thousands of civilian casualties and tens of thousands of military ones – we are in no shape to even fight off one additional Reaper, much less a fleet of hundreds, or thousands. Review of the military capacity of the Reapers is still ongoing...but the results are grim. We simply cannot beat them in the foreseeable future, even if we had a century to prepare."

Shepard exhaled, as Dalatrass Linron's thin voice echoed. "Every examination of Reaper technology is being done using remote robotics. We've set up quarantine blocks over any area of the Wards with wreckage from Nazara, and STG teams have begun a sweep of forward geth locations to acquire more ... relics. We are taking this 'indoctrination' threat very seriously – debriefing the asari you found on Virmire confirms that Reaper technology can affect sentient beings in as little as nine to ten hours of exposure." Her eyes narrowed. "That makes research of what we have found ... dangerous."

Shepard nodded slowly. "It certainly twisted Benezia and Saren. At the end she fought it off, just long enough to destroy herself, but it was given how strong she was..."

Matriarch T'Armal smiled sadly. "Benezia was stronger than almost anyone I know, Commander. If she could not resist such taint, then no mind could. I fear that is not the true worry we have. Even by researching what wreckage we can of the Reaper technology, we have no way to match their numbers or power. Vigil informs us of strange powers and abilities they have, to alter space and time itself. The Inusannon had far more powerful weapons than we could ever hope to develop, and numbers that made our combined fleets look like a pirate's squadron, and even they could not defeat the Reapers in open battle."

President Windsor folded his arms, eyeing the clock carefully. "There isn't much time before our little pageantry starts, but I wanted to ... let you know what is happening, and why. We – and the quarians, Admiral Rael'Zorah did not feel a need to attend this meeting since he has little to add – will be working together to find methods and solutions to hopefully avoid the Reaper problem. Given rough estimates of the Reaper locations, based on surmises made by the Inusannon according to Vigil, we might have as much as five hundred years before they arrive...or as little as six. Given that researching the very thing that gives our enemies their superiority is very dangerous, our research will have to be conducted rather slowly and very quietly. We will slowly build up fleet numbers and phase in new technology where we can, adapting what we can to the threat."

Dalatrass Linron gave a narrow smile. "The danger of the geth will be used as our first excuse to ramp up our military. Humanity, along with the quarians, will be given more leeway to build dreadnaughts, and the Salarian Union will be sharing some of our more ... delicate ... technology with all of the Citadel races. I expect the asari and turians will also do so. We cannot afford to assume we have time to prepare, and must make ourselves as ready as we can."

Primarch Fedorian spoke. "But we cannot afford to let the public, or even most levels of government, know about the Reapers. There would be mass panic, a disruption of the economy when we need it the least, and it would achieve no positive goals. Given that if the threat comes before we are prepared, that we can do little but fight as hard as we can and yet probably die ... letting this information out will only hinder any progress we will make."

Shepard frowned, but nodded, and the turian continued. "Rest assured, we are not ignoring any of this. It is a nightmare that I wish we did not face, but ignorance of the truth will only get us all killed. We, and I include myself in that number, have closed our eyes to many things for far too long."

Linron was more blunt. "Ignorance is death."

The President fixed her with a hard look. "We need your assistance in aiding us in keeping this quiet. The cover story is that Nazara was a sentient AI, an artifact of some race prior to the Protheans, and played a role in their destruction. Saren and Benezia found it and plotted rebellion and revolution, and the ship allowed them to dominate the geth. It is possible that the geth are working to create another ship like it, which will cover our continuing war on the geth to find any more traces of Reaper technology."

Shepard sighed. "I don't see I have a choice, Your Majesty. As much as I dislike lying about what I found – from my point of view, Saren and Benezia were both victims – I will follow orders. Just .. how many people know about this? If one of you die suddenly or leaves office, who else knows?"

The President gave a cautious smile. "The quarian high admiral, Rael'Zorah knows. As does the Citadel Council, including Udina. Captain Anderson knows, and will be placed in charge of a special unit to research defenses against Reaper attacks. You and your team knows, but we would appreciate it if they kept it quiet. It appears, although we are not sure how, that the Shadow Broker knows the truth as well – maybe even pieces we do not."

The asari matriarch folded her fingers together. "The Council of Matriarchs, the salarian STG Master, the Turian High Command and the Systems Alliance Commissariat have members who know as well. They will maintain the continuity of any information sharing required."

Windsor made a gesture with his hands. "For now, that is all. You and I will have a conversation after the award ceremony and your leave. For now, however, I can only offer you my sincere gratitude. Your actions have perhaps, with no exaggeration, saved this galaxy from darkness we can scarce imagine."

With that, he rose, and gave her a bow. The turian Primarch stood and gave a valor salute of warrior to warrior, the asari matriarch inclined her head graciously, as if Shepard were her equal, and the Dalatrass made a gesture of bowing her head.

With that, the Primarch touched his omnitool, and the door slid open. "Your audience awaits, Spectre."

Shepard shot the turian a sour look, and the leader only flicked a mandible in amusement as she rose. "I will always serve to the best of my ability as long as you are straight with me. I .. appreciate you taking the time to keep me informed."

With that, she followed the Spectres out the door, and up the silvery steps. Most of the damage in the fight was either repaired or covered over with haptic banners or more conventional cloth ones.

A line of Spectres stood to either side of the wide plaza at the top of the stairs, flanked by the SA Guard of Iron as well as honor units from the turian, asari, and quarian armed forces. She saw the President and Matriarch T'Armal moving on a higher balcony, before she reached the top.

The balconies were filled with spectators, and the entire ceiling was near to eclipsed by hovering camera drones. The lower tiers were equally packed, and through the broad windows looking down on the Presidium she saw crowds surrounding the Tower.

For all that, silence dominated the chamber, the somber click of footfalls on steel and the faint rustle of the cherry blossom trees the only sound. It reminded her of when they made her a Spectre in the first place, and she squared her shoulders as she advanced.

The Council stood at their normal places. Tevos wore a gown of white and scarlet, with a shawl of deep red covering her shoulders. Sparatus wore the uniform of a turian general, with a heavy brocaded sash festooned with medals crossing his chest. Valern wore a simple black suit with the rank insignia of a STG Unit commander, his bracers missing for once.

To one side of the platform stood Councilor Udina, dressed in a dreadfully expensive looking silk suit and literally smirking his head off. On the other side the hulking form of Admiral Rael'Zorah stood like a pillar, dwarfing the smaller male quarian in a rather fancy looking environment suit by his side.

Liara, Wrex, Tali, Jiong – sitting in a lift chair – Joker, Chakwas, Garrus, Telanya, and Pressly stood in front of them, followed by the senior NCO's of the various ship divisions, Navigator Friggs, and Ashley Williams, also in a lift chair flanked by the heavy forms of Montoya and Rodriguez, her DACT.

Behind them was the rest of the crew of the Normandy in neat rows, along with her battered remaining marines and a handful of quarian marines, Kal'Reegar in front and standing tall.

She eased through the ranks of her people to stand in front of them, and saw the form of Admiral Mikhailovich standing in front of the Council in his dress whites. As she came to a stop, the admiral glanced to the heavy set sergeant standing at his side.

The man shouted. "Normandy. At-ten-SHUN."

Her crew fell in with perfect precision. Garrus came to a turian stance of attention, while Telanya mimicked the soldiers around her. The quarians and Tali straightened further and crossed their right arm over their chest, while Liara merely folded her hands together.

Wrex just rolled his eyes.

Mikhailovich shot the krogan an evil look, before lifting his jutting chin and speaking. "You have returned from the most difficult assignment that the Systems Alliance Navy has ever undertaken in our recorded history. A single battle frigate with experimental technology, you have taken down cruisers, destroyers, and heavy cruisers in combat. You have repelled assaults from enemies both foreign and domestic, and shown the entire galaxy that same honor, bravery, and commitment that the men who stormed ashore on Normandy Beach so many years ago first showed us."

"It should come as no surprise that once more, Commander Shepard, the Systems Alliance honors you with the Star of Terra. You risked your life to stop a threat to the entire galaxy, and your valor, courage, and leadership are an inspiration to us all."

He withdrew a black case from his pocket, taking out a blood red ribbon from which hung a single gold star. He draped it around her neck, complementing the one already there.

He then smiled, and turned slightly to address the crew. "Shepard did not act alone in her fight, and the valor of the crew of her ship is also noted. It is with vast pride that I present the Presidential Unit Citation for Gallantry to the crew and the ship Normandy. Additionally, every member of ship's company is hereby awarded the Medal of Valor and the Legion of Honor."

With only a slight hesitation, his face turned towards her non-human crew members, and the quarians. "And yet, the crew of the Normandy did not achieve victory merely through the might of human arms. Turians, asari, quarians, even krogan stood strong, stood fast, and stood together to defy an enemy that threatened us all."

"As such, His Grace, President Windsor, Prince of the House of Windsor, has authorized the Medal of Valor, a sizable monetary award, and honorary class II citizenship for every non-human member of the crew, and the entire Migrant Fleet Marine contingent who bravely aided our forces at Ilos, along with the crew of the All Due Caution, the volus cruiser who also aided us there." He paused. "That makes Urdnot Wrex the only krogan awarded such a citizenship."

As he finished, the color sergeant barked orders to the Guard of Iron. "Guards! Present arms! Systems Alliance, arriving."

Mikhailovich turned and saluted as President Windsor approached from the side, the Guard of Iron parting to let him pass. His dark suit had been augmented with white gloves and a belted sword, as he moved past the guard to stand in front of Shepard.

"Thank you, Admiral. Carry on. Commander Shepard. Attend us."

Shepard swallowed and took one step forward, and the President lifted his voice.

"This woman is humanity. She is our pride, and our failures. She is our hopes, and our sins. She has endured the very worst our race can offer, and yet shows the very best we can ever hope to achieve."

The president's smooth, grave voice took on a note of fierce, angry pride. "We have not honored her as we should. We have let her bleed for us, and suffer for us. While we sat waiting, she led her men to danger and battle we can scarce imagine. While we doubted, she acted. When we did not listen, she forged ahead. The very least we can do is correct our negligence in a manner more real than ribbons and speeches."

He turned to face her, meeting her gaze squarely. "Commander Sara Ying Shepard, kneel."

She did so, and he drew his sword, finely honed silver and steel with a basket hilt. He tapped it over her left shoulder first. "In the name of Saint Michael and Saint George, and in the name of the Blessed Martyr Victor Manswell, we grant thee a Name." The blade touched her other shoulder. "In the name of the Systems Alliance, the manifest hope of all mankind, we grant thee a recognizance of your valor, that shines above all others."

He passed the sword over her head. "You are no longer Sara Ying Shepard, but Baroness Sara Ying Shepard, Protector of the Systems Alliance as a member of the Knights of United Earth. By our authority we make you Major of Marines and Admiral-designate. By our blood we name you of the Families of Earth. By your deeds we do declare any and all restrictions on your rights and freedom annulled now and forevermore."

He broke his gaze from hers to stare almost challengingly around the vast chamber. "Let anyone who defies our will be marked our enemy."

"Rise, Major."

She stood, not quite believing everything she'd just heard. She was .. a noble. She was free of her Z2 restriction. The crazy bastard had made her a major and an admiral-designate, then made her a knight of the most restricted and noble order on the planet.

Windsor sheathed his sword, and did the unthinkable. He bowed to her.

For him to do so in private was one thing. For a leader of a major star-faring government, a Prince of the blood, a President to bow to a mere soldier in public, was something no one expected.

She nearly froze, before she felt Liara's soothing encouragement, and instead exhaled and bowed more deeply, hoping she did so correctly. She straightened a moment later, as he did so as well, his patrician features expressionless as he turned away.

Tevos then spoke. "We of the Citadel Council also recognize bravery when we see it. We gave you a vast charge – to stop both Saren and Benezia, to prevent their plans from coming to fruition and bring them back for justice or death."

Valern's voice was low, almost tired sounding. "If this body had listened to your words, perhaps the tragic loss of life we have endured recently would not have occurred. But we cannot undo the past, merely learn from it and prepare ourselves for the future."

Sparatus finished, meeting her gaze calmly. "And as such, it is the unified decision of this Council of Races to confirm your status as a full and unlimited Agent of the Citadel Office of Special Tactics and Reconnaissance."

Tevos spoke. "To the brave sentients who fought alongside her, we can offer only our thanks and award a few things that will never match the cost you have had to pay. The Citadel Council will pay for your medical care and any rehabilitation, both now and for the rest of your lives, and you shall have top priority in acquiring accommodation on the Presidium. Each person standing before us will be awarded the Citadel Cross of Valor, the highest award any sentient can be given."

Sparatus spoke again. "Additionally, to recognize the valor and sacrifices of the many brave souls who saved this station and our very lives, the Council has elevated Donnel Udina and Thin'Koris vas Seya to the ranks of the Citadel Council, providing the humans and quarians with the rights, responsibilities, and benefits of a Full Member race of the Council. We will be meeting with the quarian High Admirals later today to discuss possibilities for colonization and subjects, such as the geth."

And then, Tevos, Sparatus and Valern each in turn bowed, not just to Shepard but to the entire group standing there. "Our gratitude cannot be expressed in mere words, gestures or objects. If you need anything, let us know."

Shepard nodded, exhaling, Jiong had carefully coached her on when to dismiss the crew. "Normandy. Mission complete. Fall out by watch sections and report to Dock Sixteen. Council Observers, Migrant Fleet Marine detachment – you are free to go."

With a stiff bow to the Council, she pivoted sharply on her heel, focusing all her attention on her posture and keeping her face emotionless and cool. She faintly heard wild cheering, but paid it no mind, walking straight and proud down the steps, cherry blossoms chasing her as she did so.

And once again, just as when she was made a Spectre, she saw Anderson waiting for her at the bottom of the stairs, a uniformed Kahlee Sanders at his side, his smile so wide and so proud he looked as if he might burst out laughing. Years of stress had lifted from his features, and he swallowed as she stopped in front of him.

"Well done, Sara."

"Thank you, sir. Nerves are now shot, sir. Permission to go get drunk, sir."

Anderson smiled wider and nodded to the Commissar detail she belatedly noticed at the bottom of the stairs. "Commissar Jiong has an aircar waiting, Sara. It will take you to the docks so you can talk to your crew. Get past that and a brief meeting with the Admiralty, and then you can fall apart."

She gave a grateful nod, and Anderson gave her a little push. "Get going. Media's already howling for blood, and the longer you take the more likely they are to figure out where to hunt for you next."

She snorted and walked, the Commissariat falling in around her, faces grim and hands on neural maces to clear her path.

It took a good twenty five minutes to get to Dock Sixteen, and another twenty for everyone from her crew to make it there. The quarian marines were nowhere to be seen, but they were probably having their own little award ceremony right now anyway.

Shepard took in the battered lines of her ship, the curve of its hull, the sweep of the wings. The scars of battle were visible everywhere, and yet the proud name still leapt from the hull.

Shepard found herself curiously upset at the idea of losing the Normandy, but shook her head to clear it and turned to her crew. They stared back, fidgeting in dress whites or in hastily cleaned up armor in the case of Wrex, and she smiled.

"Normandy 1. Crazy bitches, pointy faced bastards, and sick fucking terrorists 0." She smiled, pacing as she talked, moving in front of them.

"We set out to do a job. It was a lot harder, bloodier and uglier than I expected, but in the end we did it. A Presidential Unit Citation means each and every one of you, except myself and Pressly, just got promoted. It means you are always going to be paid and assigned as if you had maximum time in rate for your rank. It's clearance to pursue whatever you wanted in your naval career. For the marines, it's a surefire ticket into the N7 program."

She paused. "For all of us, it's a reminder that when everyone else fell down on the job, we were there. Adams, your engineering staff kept us alive and going where no one else could. Friggs, your nav people were always on target, and you stepped up to the challenge of being a department head with no training and aced it. Pressly, this is the single most badass ops team I have ever heard of. From CIC to keeping the guns going, you guys made this possible more than I did."

She turned to the small group of still wounded marines flanking a chair-bound Ashley Williams. "My marines. You bled, and bled, and suffered so much during this fight, and yet you never doubted me, or assumed I'd get you killed. You fought hard. We lost a lot of good men on this trip, from Jenkins and his stupid antics to Cole...and every one of them died fighting. They died fighting for something no politician can put into words, or award with a piece of metal."

"They died fighting to protect the innocent. They died fighting those who lost track of what it means to be alive. They died hard, and they died Marines, unbowed and unbroken."

She glanced over Wrex, Garrus, Tali, Telanya and most of all Liara. "And our guests aboard this cruise...thank you all. Without each one of you, at some point, this whole gig would have been over and us all dead in a ditch. Garrus, I don't know how the shit I can fight without you watching my back on oversight. Wrex, the next time you charge off by yourself, I'm killing you. Tali... I've got a stack of requests two inches thick from quarian ships asking for comms with you to offer you a slot on their crews. I think your Pilgrimage is pretty much done, you can't beat a better gift than a Council seat. Telanya...you gave me the chance to realize I can trust people again."

She met Liara's eyes. "Doctor T'Soni..."

She said nothing, and Asari blushed, and the entire crew chuckled or whooped.

Shepard smiled. "Without you we wouldn't have known where to start. And in the end, it was you who stopped Benezia."

Shepard turned back to gaze at the ship. "In a few minutes I'm going to have to meet with the Admiralty. I already know what they'll say. That I need political and leadership training. That I have duties and responsibilities. That the Normandy needs downtime and the crew needs rest." She smiled faintly. "Our time together was a blast...but I will be assigned elsewhere, and so will most of you."

She folded her arms, eyes flashing, and squared her jaw. "But I will never, ever forget a single one of you. You are my crew. Mine. And if anything or anyone gives you shit, they can gaze into the fucking fist of Shepard."

She grinned. "And now, it's time, boys, girls, and Wrex. Pressly!"

The XO came to attention. "Ma'am. The Normandy is at dock. VI is standing by. The crew is accounted for."

She exhaled and spoke softly. "This is.. Major-Commander Shepard. I am ashore. Command is transferred to Citadel Fleet Command, Dockside Division. I relinquish the deck and the conn. VI ... log the time."

Shepard turned to face the crew. "You have ninety-six hours of leave, starting in ...nine minutes. Report back to this dock when it's over for reassignment. It has been both a pleasure and an honor to serve with each of you."

She paused. "Flight Lieutenant Moreau, Engineer Tali'Zorah, and Doctor T'Soni. Meet me in room B, sixth floor, Citadel Tower in one hour." She exhaled, and headed back to the aircar. She felt a concerned pulse from Liara but sent back a calming one, and bit her lip.

O-OSaBC-O

Meeting with the Admiralty turned out to be a clusterfuck, just as she had expected. She arrived in a narrow room with both Admiral Hackett and Admiral Mikhailovich there, facing a wide haptic screen already filled with several Senators and other figures.

She sat down at the narrow metal table where her name was neatly printed in haptic imaging, picking up the padd on the table at her seat. "Co...sorry. Major Shepard, reporting as ordered."

The man on the screen gave an unhappy scowl. "I am Admiral Retham, commander, Alliance Manpower and Requisition. I've been given some ... highly unusual orders regarding your billet and assignment, Major-Commander, and I'm not very happy about them."

Admiral Mikhailovich snorted. "I strongly doubt the President or the Joint Admiralty Board cares about your opinion. They didn't listen to me or Steven bitching about it."

The admiral rolled his eyes, and Shepard interjected. "Before we argue...can you please explain what my orders actually are, and this billet?"

Admiral Retham nodded, glaring sourly at Mikhailovich. "Of course, Major. You are being assigned to the command of the Fifth Fleet, Eighty-ninth Strike Flotilla. You are in command of battle-group Chiron.

She frowned. "I'm afraid I'm not familiar with that formation."

The admiral nodded. "That's because it exists only on paper right now. The final touches are being put onto the Chiron's flagship, a brand new heavy cruiser, the SCH Kazan. A totally new design, banded reactive armor, heavy center-line torpedo bank, triple mass accelerators, and a Normandy-style mass effect core."

Shepard smiled. That sounded like quite a ship. The Admiral, however, continued. "The battle-group you are being put in command of would have that heavy cruiser, three destroyers, and five frigates. Along with this you would be in command of a special Regimental Combat Unit of A-rate marines, reassigned personnel from fragmented RRU and RIU divisions, and a handful of AIS and N7 personnel."

Shepard remembered the Fleet Master mentioning this possibility in the hospital on Noveria, but didn't ever expect it to truly happen. "I ... see. What exactly is the problem?"

Admiral Retham scowled. "It's bad enough we're assigning you a brand new state of the art cruiser when it's been made clear you are going to not be facing combat any time soon, but I've got to also resupply Fifth Fleet's other badly mauled flotilla under Admiral Mikhailovich."

The other admiral grunted. "Welcome to command, Shepard. Here's the issue – our ships are all shot to shit, and we urgently need to reinforce our losses. But the orders Retham has are instructing him to give you three brand new destroyers and the entire run of the new Normandy-class frigates as they come off the line."

Hackett spoke up. "Normally, as you both answer to me, this would be my call. But the Presidential directive is something I can't bypass. I'll actually need you to turn down this request so we can get those ships assigned to the front line where they properly belong."

Shepard nodded, and Retham scowled again. "It's not that simple, I'm afraid. The only ships available besides those are ... not exactly new. You'd be able to fill your command, but the destroyers all need a good month or more of drydock time, and the frigates are old second generation models without modern heat sinks. No money to refit them, either."

Shepard nodded again. The usual problem with the SA – not enough cash. The President had apparently taken matters into his own hands to make sure she was getting the top equipment to do the job...but she didn't have orders yet, so she didn't know what her job was yet.

She groaned. "So I'm in a catch-22. If I take the ships, the fleet gets screwed. If I don't, I get junk and no promise of replacements down the line, and if my orders take me into the line of fire, my men and crews pay the price. And I can't really imagine the President gave me this pack of nifty ships because he planned on sending me to nice, safe locales."

Mikhailovich shrugged. "I'm sure he won't, but it will be a lot easier for you to get replacements than I will, and my men are slated for anti-geth operations next week. If my men go in those frigates they might as well blow themselves up. And my destroyers are in no shape for fighting off vorcha, much less geth."

Hackett sighed. "Unfortunately I have to agree. I can't order you to allocate your ships to Mikhailovich, but it's going to be ... difficult enough getting you the kind of manpower and decent crews if we have to miss out on reinforcements to fill out your battle-group"

Shepard eyed all three of them before shrugging. "I'll tell you what. No matter what my orders are, my ships aren't going to move out of dock before they meet my standards. The older frigates – do they have any good points?"

Retham shrugged. "Heavier weapons load. Older stuff, but I suppose you could refit it. A lot better armor but less maneuverability. The electronics are a bit dated."

She nodded. "And the destroyers?"

He referred to a padd on his desk. "Those are all modern spec, just banged up pretty bad from the fight at Terra Nova. One of them doesn't even have a drive core."

Shepard nodded again. "Alright...I will be happy to sign off on handing my destroyers and frigates to the Admiral if you do two things for me. First, when she's repaired, I want the Normandy in my fleet. I can't see needing five stealth frigates, but I do need one, and she's the one I know best."

Mikhailovich thought about this for several seconds and then nodded. "Fair enough. It will be months before she's ready to fly again anyway, so I'm not losing out on anything. What else?"

She turned to Retham. "I want to pick my own officers. I have my own idea for who I want as XO, engineer, navigator, and chief pilot."

Retham grimaced. "That will play holy hell with assignments. And Engineer Adams has already accepted a Chief Engineer slot on the Orizaba, so you can't have him."

She smirked. "That wasn't who I had in mind. I want no refusals, no bullshit. I say the names and they get assigned, no questions asked. Do that, and I'll play ball any way I can to make your job easier. Don't and I'll see how much pull I actually have with the President since I answer to him now, apparently."

Retham gave a long sigh. "Fine. I'll lock down the berths for officers on the Kazan until you send me your candidates, and run them through approval without a second look."

Shepard nodded. "Now, you said something about my orders?"

Retham touched a control on his desk, and the padd in front of Shepard lit up. "For now, your orders come from the office of the President directly. For Spectre activities you answer to Councilor Udina, I guess, but while you report to Admiral Hackett for reporting and logistics purposes, your orders only come from President Windsor."

The padd in front of Shepard decrypted itself as she nodded, and Retham continued "Your first orders are pretty simple. Ninety six hours of leave, followed by a briefing at Arcturus, 0900, Monday morning. Since you don't have a ship, the light cruiser Accra will be taking you to and from Arcturus. I believe you will be meeting with your Presidential Liaison and whoever else you will be working with, but we have no details."

The padd finished decrypting, the orders matching what Retham said except for one line, printed in bold red text along the bottom.

"All orders are classified at the highest level of security. There is reason to believe additional personnel with goals similar to Cerberus are in Fleet Command. Via Presidential Directive 4493-X-91, you are hereby ordered to ignore all orders from any and all SA or human personnel other than President Windsor or his attache d'affairs, Elizabeth Windsor-Turham. Anyone attempting to violate or alter this directive is to be treated as hostile and executed forthwith."

She reread that then shut off the pad. Wonderful. "I understand. I have a small meeting with my own people here shortly, so if there's nothing else I can head out on leave..."

Hackett nodded, and Shepard, taking the padd with her departed. Once she left the room, Retham's voice sounded from the view-screen. "She seems fairly reasonable."

Mikhailovich snorted. "No, she just could care less about logistical bullshit. Mark my words, she'll find a way to get those ships repaired and refitted in no time flat, even if she has to hire quarriers to do it. She won't endanger her crews if she can help it."

"Pity the SA itself won't take that lesson."

O-OSaBC-O

Shepard arrived at the small meeting room where she told Joker and Tali to meet her, along with Liara, and got there just in time to see Liara enter.

With a deep breath she entered, triggering her omni as she did so. The room was lined with windows looking out over the Presidium, and Tali stared outside, Joker reclining in a chair by the corner, and Liara still glancing around as Shepard entered after her.

"Hey, gang. This shouldn't take long. Jiong is on his way."

Tali tilted her head. "Why is he coming? What did you need to talk about?"

Shepard shook her head, even as the door slid open to admit Commissar Jiong. He looked a trifle worse for wear, one arm in a sling and confined to a mag-lift chair, but was otherwise unhurt. "Ah, Shepard. I see we are all here."

Liara gave the Commissar a curious look "Yes, but what for?"

Shepard turned to Tali first. "Tali. You've been ... a huge help to us so far. Without you, none of this would be possible. Everything would be in ruins and Saren would have won. I and everyone else literally owe you their lives."

The quarian girl ducked her head before shaking it. "We all helped, Shepard."

Shepard snorted. "Yeah, but you got the ball rolling. I'm pretty sure I hammered that point in to the Council in my final report, and I hope it's what lead to you guys getting a Council seat." She exhaled. "But right now, my own future is kind of .. up in the air. I've lost the Normandy, and she is going to sit on a dock and be fixed up for several months."

Tali nodded, and Joker looked depressed. "Great, nothing to do."

Shepard smirked. "Not true, Flight Commander. I just got done dickering with Fleet Manpower. In return for me giving over some ships I could care less about, I get to pick my own crew for the brand new heavy cruiser I'm now in command of."

Joker gave her a grin. "A heavy cruiser? That's ... two pilots and a chief pilot?"

She nodded. "I believe so. And I want you as my Chief Pilot. I don't and won't trust anybody else to pilot my ship."

Joker gave a little cackle of laughter. "That is sweet." Then he paused and frowned. "But..."

She shook her head and focused on Tali. "Tali...the award the President awarded us, as he said, included citizenship for each member of the crew. Including you. I know you probably are eager to go back home to your family and fleet. But I would still like to ask you to be my Chief Engineer. And since you are a citizen of the SA, they can't stop me from commissioning you and giving you that position."

Tali was literally speechless. She didn't know what exactly to do. She had dozens of ships asking for her service, but the truth was, even as homesick and lonely as she was, she didn't want to just go home yet. Even if Shepard and others laid the quarian Council seat at her feet, she didn't feel like she had achieved anything worthy of going home. For her to be offered such a position was flattering, but more than that, it gave her something to be proud about – that she was held that highly not by a bunch of quarian ship captains seeking her only for her name and influence, but because she – herself, and her skills – were truly wanted.

She also had to face reality, in terms of just what she would be going back home to. She was finally winning over her father, gaining his grudging acceptance that she could handle herself – all of that would be lost if she just went back home. Her father would stick her in the safest position he could find, and she'd be lucky to ever leave the Fleet again.

Finally, maybe most importantly, there was Jeff. For him to go from piloting proud warships to the broken wrecks of the quarian fleet, especially now when most of them would be doing little more than scouting for a planet to colonize, wasn't something he could do and enjoy. She might be able to get him to agree to come with her to the Fleet, but he would regret it – and her – in the long run.

Jiong spoke into the silence, taking off his hat to place it in his lap. "I've already approved it with the Commissariat, Ms. Zorah. While there were certainly concerns about having foreign nationals in a serving capacity on a SA warship, those mostly applied to Mr. Urdnot, Mr. Vakarian and Ms. Telanya. You would be offered the nominal rank of Lieutenant Commander, albeit a staff and not a line commission since you don't have SA command training and regulations don't permit a non-human CO..."

She didn't look at Jeff or Shepard, instead she swallowed. "I...need to think about it."

Shepard nodded. "Joker, why not take Tali out and walk around a bit. Liara and I have a few things to discuss ourselves."

Joker looked almost as dazed as Tali sounded by Shepard's suggestion. "Sure. I'll...be on my omni if you need me." With a gentle hand against Tali's back, he left, following her out the door.

Shepard exhaled when it shut, before glancing at Liara. "So."

Liara could feel Shepard's nervousness. "I can only presume that you wish to make the same offer to me?"

Shepard nodded. "Yes ... and no. A heavy cruiser has an entire science department. No matter what else, I'm sure part of my duty will be hunting Reaper activity and artifacts, and that means I need a good scientist and archeologist. Lucky for me, my girlfriend fits the bill."

Liara smiled, and Shepard continued. "But...I had a conversation, with both Matriarch Suliasa and Aethyta. The whole thing with your people blaming you for Benezia's sins may or may not die down, but the Justicars are retarded about things like this, and the only way to shut them down and stop them from hassling you or your family...is to take you out of their jurisdiction."

Shepard gave her a long, careful look. "If you join me in marriage in the SA, your granted citizenship upgrades to my new level. And if you are no longer an asari citizen, the Justicars cannot come after you."

Liara nodded. "And the asari matriarchy will agree, because it prevents me from being leader of my own House..."

Shepard sighed. "That's not what I wanted in the long run. I don't want to detach you from your family."

Liara sighed. "And you are not, Sara. They did, with their actions. And even if things have changed somewhat now ... the greater asari society has not. I mean what I said back on Noveria. The duties of being a Matria...are something I am not yet ready to perform. And I will live a very long time, there are many years ahead of me in which I can return to my House. I am more concerned that you may feel forced into this..."

Jiong interjected. "This is a conversation I had with Shepard back on Noveria, Doctor. The politics of this situation are going to be tricky as it is. I understand that things such as marriage and the like are not usually something where one considers galactic politics, but in this case I fear the ramifications factor more into events than emotions. Whether or not she and you are forced into this isn't the question. I can only assume you two love each other and wish to be together. The way you go about it will determine how much of a hassle you go through to do so."

He steepled his fingers. "I assume you are unfamiliar with high human culture?"

Liara nodded uncertainly, and he continued. "In the aftermath of the disruption of our culture during the Days of Iron, the SA created tiers of citizenship for all citizens. Most people are class I, II, or III citizens. With the recent events, Shepard is now a Class V citizen. The closest analogue I can get to your culture is that Shepard has been raised to a rank equivalent to that of the Thirty."

Liara absorbed this slowly. "So there...will be a great many people seeking to use her, regardless of what she feels or chooses to do. Few commoners have risen to the ranks of even adopted members of the Thirty...and most who do so are still looked down upon. She will face the same?"

Jiong nodded. "Precisely. Because she is, to put it mildly, both unfamiliar and uncomfortable with such society, she will be exposed to a great deal of scrutiny. Given the fact that most chosen for the honor of Class V citizenship come from vastly wealthy families with some relation to existing noble houses, for a commoner with a criminal background to ascend will be seen as insulting by some."

Jiong smiled. "However, if she is paired with a Princess of the Thirty, this sends many messages. It, as she has stated, prevents any further discommodation from the Justicar Order, who will be forced to let the issue of mother-guilt drop. Given that you are yourself of ancient lineage, if asari, few can complain that you would be joined with Shepard. There will be screams of protest from bigots and the like, of course, but the most important thing is that there would be no ... scandal, as would happen if you continue your current liaisons as you are."

Shepard sighed. "I'm not very good at being romantic, Jiong, but thanks for reducing this to the most boring and unexciting result possible."

He chuckled. "I live to serve, Baroness."

Shepard shook her head and turned back to Liara. "I don't want to force you into anything. But I am NOT being forced into this. I ... I want to have a life with you, more than anything. I've never had the chance or option of saying 'I want to do this' or 'I want to be this'. Now I do. If doing it helps protect you ... even better."

Liara gave a somewhat light sounding laugh. "I ..". She shook her head. "Sara. I have no problems with binding my life to yours. In many ways, I already have. I cannot go home, and even if I did, I am not ready to be a part of my family, much less lead it. If the choice is that or to spend my life with you, I choose the latter. And like you said, the fact that it will also protect you from the stupidity of your own people simply makes me happier about it."

She paused. "But once we make the decision, we cannot ... back out. I am not saying no by any means, only that I do not think it is something we should do immediately, until we know more about what your President has planned for you."

Shepard exhaled. "Agreed. I'm still in the dark myself. We'll need to talk about this more, later. I ... I am still pretty overwhelmed."

Jiong smiled gently. "For now, you should go onto leave, I think. Captain Anderson and Lieutenant Commander Pressly have arranged the crew to have a celebration at Flux at nineteen hundred hours tonight. And I took the ... liberty of engaging a suite at the Senthias Hotel. The entire ninth floor is reserved, and Commissariat security will ensure there are no media or other disturbances of your rest."

Shepard blinked. "An entire floor?"

Jiong shrugged. "You two are very loud." Both Shepard and Liara flushed at that, and he chuckled. "If there is nothing else, ladies, I will see you tonight." He placed his peaked hat back over his head and turned his chair to the door, smiling as he did so. He paused at the doorway to speak one more time.

"General Von Grath also wished to speak to you sometime today, but I told him to show up at the party, so you can speak with him there."

He left the room, and Liara merely stared at Shepard a long moment. "Sara...are you doing this because you want me near you...or to protect me...or-"

Shepard reached out a hand to take Liara's. "I'm doing this because I'm lost without you. We were worried we'd be forced apart. Now we won't. I love you, Liara. And ... "

She paused, staring at the windows. "That last fight showed me I wasn't invincible. We hit her with everything we had, after she fought her way through Ilos, the Citadel, and your dad. You hit her with enough biotic power to take out a frigate and she still got up. If she hadn't found herself at the end...we'd all be dead."

Shepard looked at her hands. "The ... President and the other leaders of the council races don't think we can win a fight if the Reapers show up. They don't know enough to figure out how much time we have. Might be centuries. Might be six years. Shit, they're guessing. The fuckers could show up next week with party favors and fireworks for all I know."

Shepard looked back, squeezing Liara's hand more tightly. "If that happens, I'm sick of regrets and shit I didn't get done. I'm tired of letting myself get used up and getting nothing for it. And ... I want this. I want to live a life, even if it's only for a little while, and just be a person. Not Commander Shepard. Not the Butcher. Not 'Baroness Shepard', and Jesus fuck that sounds strange. Just me. And you."

Liara smiled, and nodded. "I would like that as well." She leaned over to kiss Shepard, gently, and then smiled wider. "We have some time before the party starts, and Jiong was ... rather forward in his explanation of why he got us an entire hotel floor."

Shepard smirked. "You have something you'd like to do?"

Liara flushed. "Six hours of listening to my aithntar give me 'tips' was not something one sits through without getting some ideas, Sara."

O-OSaBC-O

As it turned out, most of the ninety-six hours of leave Shepard had was split between Liara, parties, and crashing at Anderson's apartment. Chakwas showed up the second morning, and Shepard and her had a long talk about the sort of things she and Liara did in bed and medical issues that would come up as a result.

Chakwas took the news with much better grace than Shepard expected, although she didn't seem very approving. Still, Shepard felt better with Chakwas fixing up any minor injuries, warp burns or cuts the two had than going to a medical clinic – that would have started all kinds of rumors she didn't need, now or ever.

She spent a bit of time with every member of the crew, down to the lowest comm tech or engineer, and made sure everyone knew she appreciated their service. She was happy to see Garrus and Telanya back in C-SEC, both having been promoted into Special Response, with Garrus charged to train a new cadre of C-SEC snipers and tactical officers. Executor Palin had been broken by his near death experience in the Citadel Towers, and Garrus felt the man was near ready to step down and hand his duties off to someone else, either one of the new human officers joining C-SEC in record numbers or one of the senior salarian detectives.

She spent several hours with Ashley, talking about many things. Ash had been tapped to attend Officer Candidacy School, and many of the forces that had kept her career in limbo seemed impressed that Shepard herself recommended her for such. Shepard laughed when she told Ash just how brutally direct she'd been in her recommendations for Ashley to be allowed to go to OCS, admitting she enjoyed being able to make sure Ash's career was going to continue on. Given the stigma over the Williams name, Ash had a tough road ahead, but for the first time, as Ash put it, she had no roadblocks on it.

Eventually, they came to the topic of Kaiden. Ash was still torn up over his death, but even through her tears she smiled. "Skipper...Kai never knew what tomorrow would bring. He'd be the first person to say that we couldn't change what has already happened, so beating ourselves up over it is stupid. I have to believe he's in a better place now, a place without headaches from his L2, or worries about his parents."

Her voice softened. "In a way, he's not gone. What I have within me is part of him, to carry on to tomorrow. That's all we can do sometimes. When we lose the people close to us, whisper our anguish to God, and miss them, and keep going."

Shepard nodded. "I'm ..I don't even know what to say. How you deal with it. I try to imagine Liara dying and I just want to curl up in a ball." She grimaced and looked away. "Never tell yourself you aren't strong, Ash."

Ashley had gone still, then given a little smile. "Piece of poetry just popped in my head." She glanced out the window of the hospital, biting her lip.

*"Home they brought her warrior dead:
She nor swooned, nor uttered cry:
All her maidens, watching, said,
'She must weep or she will die.'*

*Then they praised him, soft and low,
Called him worthy to be loved,
Truest friend and noblest foe;
Yet she neither spoke nor moved.*

*Stole a maiden from her place,
Lightly to the warrior stepped,
Took the face-cloth from the face;
Yet she neither moved nor wept.*

*Rose a nurse of ninety years,
Set his child upon her knee—
Like summer tempest came her tears—
'Sweet my child, I live for thee.'*

At that, Shepard found she had no words, merely holding Ashley's hand as she wept anew and felt her own eyes burning.

The day after, she saw Wrex off, after a short farewell. He wasn't going hunting for Okeer, just yet. He was headed back to Tuchanka, to tell his mate of the death of their son, and to wander the wastes for a bit. He claimed he needed to find himself again.

"Fighting Okeer...made me wake up, Shepard. For all my talk, I've done nothing but hide the past few years. When I'm ready to get him, I'll call you."

She nodded. "Make sure you remember to do it before you fight him this time, dumbass." Biting her lip, she shook her head. "I'll miss you."

"Bah, don't go soft on me now, Shepard." Still, he knelt in front of her. "I bow to no battlemaster, and I serve no other, krogan or alien. But if I had to name one that is my equal, it is you." The red, bulbous eyes sought hers. "Don't trust your people, Shepard. They smell off."

She only nodded, turning to the black-armored figure of Beatrice Shields. She had shown up unexpectedly, to help see Wrex off with a big package of dried jaaki, and hung around even as Wrex's ship departed.

Her ex-teammate had been coolly polite to Shepard, telling her that the Shadow Broker had taken her in and paid for the many surgeries it took to repair her body. Rather than turn down his offer of employment, she had taken the job with pleasure.

Shepard had asked if she was okay, and Shields had given her a small smile. "I helped your people out, She-bitch. I didn't have to, didn't really want to, but I did it. And that makes us even, as far as I'm concerned. I know that we all make our own choices, and the one I'm making is to find my own way. Good luck."

And with that, she'd simply departed.

Shepard didn't know if that hurt or if it was a relief. She didn't think Shields would forgive her for being with Liara after she said she wasn't...but Shepard had her own life to live. She was thankful Shields had stepped up to help her crew, but Liara's anger at Shields for betraying Shepard had never cooled, and Aethyta had not been impressed with her former teammates either.

Shepard spent the rest of the time dodging the media. The media had gone absolutely insane, with Shepard being forced to take on two Commissars and a young comms tech just to manage her messages and requests for meetings and interviews. Udina spent several hours with her in his new offices, going over in testy language exactly how she was expected to comport herself.

They argued, he called her a neanderthal, she laughed at him, and he grumbled. But she knew how busy Udina was trying to manage his new offices and duties, and appreciated him spending the time to give her coaching on how to deal with the avalanche of media attention falling on her head.

It was the third day of leave when she was summoned to meet privately with President Windsor, a Commissariat aircar picking her up from Anderson's apartment.

The ride to the Wards was interesting – Shepard had presumed the President would be in an upscale Presidium hotel, but instead they arrived at a heavily fortified building not far from the docks. Commissars and X personnel guarded the building, weapons drawn, and two MAKO tanks flanked the entry tunnel.

She was escorted inside by grimly silent Commissars and ushered into a large, if somewhat plain, briefing room. President Windsor sat in a reclining office chair behind a wide desk covered in haptic panels and screens, staring out the windows at the Wards skyline. The room had five or six comfortable chairs and a large haptic display screen on one wall, and that was it.

He turned to face her as she entered, gesturing to a seat. "Baroness."

She remembered Udina's hasty lessons and bowed deeply, still feeling awkward. "Your Majesty. Thank you for ... taking the time to see me. I am aware of your many duties and will ... try to not waste your time."

He gave a small chuckle as she sat. "Someone has been touching up your courtesy, Shepard. But I rather find plain speech appealing. There is no royal 'we' in this room – speak at ease. You are of little use to me if you overawed by my presence."

Shepard exhaled sharply. "Bluntly? Sir, you're the President. You are royalty. I'm a jumped up thug that was lucky enough to survive a lot of fights that should have killed me."

He laughed again, the faint lines along his cheeks bending. "No, I am a man, Shepard. I am no greater than you for my blood, my family history, or my position. Few of my rank and status believe those words, but I do. If my duties are heavier, my trials more tiring, that does not make them any greater than the tasks you have overcome."

He sat forward, eyes intense. "I had vast wealth, every advantage and benefit, and the backing of a huge family and entire nations, with every hurdle in my path removed. You had nothing, came from privation, and fought every inch of the way. And yet now we are peers. Which of us, then, should really be in awe? You of me, or me of you?"

He smiled. "I did not pick you to be my sword arm out of mere gratitude, or because of what you did against Saren. I choose you for the same reason I gave you the Star of Terra – because you overcame. That was not empty propaganda, no matter the intent of the Navy. It was not a method to hush you. No one should have had to endure what you did at Torfan, and that was the least I could do to show you that your service mattered."

He folded his hands on the desk in front of him. "And I have elevated you to your current rank and privilege not only to reward your unfailing and unflinching service and bravery, but to put into the grave any thoughts you – or anyone else – may have that you are somehow not good enough. This entire galaxy owes you. Never forget that. Never doubt your right to what you have been given."

She swallowed slowly. The words almost hurt as bad as Anderson telling her how he saw her as a daughter, almost as bad as Liara saying she loved her. They were words that said her fuckups and past didn't matter, that her criminal acts were not something to hang over her head forever. Once again, she had to step past her own pain and focus on moving on with life.

It was terrifying. And yet, there was no give in Windsor's voice. No give in Liara's, or Anderson's, or Von Grath's.

She nodded. "Yes, Your Majesty. I won't let you down."

He snorted. "Such an occurrence has not even crossed my thoughts. Now, to business. I have several tasks I need for you to accomplish, and unfortunately idiocy of a political nature has forced my hand. As President my influence and control over the SA government is limited. This is an artifact of the fear we have of overwhelming political leaders, as well as by design."

He tapped a control on his desk, the display map on the wall lighting. "We have a number of grave situations that, due to the incompetence already demonstrated by the incoming administration and new Admiralty figures, I am loathe to assume will be handled properly. Some of these issues" – he tapped batarian space – "involve a mix of tactics, diplomacy, and intelligence work. Others, like the geth, require aggression and stealth. And still others are ... more dangerous."

He turned to look at her directly. "The AIS is sure that Major Kyle gave you some kind of information before his ... passing. They do not know what it is, and I find myself fearful of what horrors would drive a man strong enough to survive his past and Torfan to commit suicide on such a grand scale."

Shepard nodded slowly. "Sir... he lost his faith in the SA."

Windsor closed his eyes. "Whatever he uncovered must indeed be truly vile. He was the Lion, in many ways he was everything the SA was supposed to be." He gave a thin exhalation, eyes meeting hers. "Tell me."

So she did. She told him of compromised military 'research' teams, who kidnapped L2 biotics and used a bio-mechanical process to turn them into living tuning forks, somehow using these unfortunates to boost the powers of newer biotics in a special, secret program. She told him of the connections between the Manswell Foundation and Cerberus, how they sponsored and hired pirate attacks on colonies on the fringe and then had Cerberus defeat them, to win over colonists. She told him of the corruption in the administration that siphoned fees from citizenship tiers to fund black labs that took the vile research Cerberus pioneered and turn it into usable military applications, which they in turn had Cerberus front-companies market and profit from.

She told him of the connections Kyle found between the tech-gangs infesting the arcologies and a mysterious crime syndicate that was really a cell of Special Operations, answering to 'retired' generals, using the violence to disillusion the people of Earth against the government.

And finally, in a tired, dead voice, she revealed what had truly broken Kyle – that the Coleman administration had known about these things, many of them. That the Prime Minister signed off, that the Admiralty signed off, that they eventually planned to reshape the SA into little more than an extension of military and business interests, and that they had crippled many SA military operations to siphon funds or materials to Cerberus or other, still unknown 'black cells' that could still be operational even with the destruction of Cerberus.

When she finished, the President looked physically ill.

"Who else.. knows this?"

She shook her head. "The Silver Prince referenced it, but no specifics. I destroyed the OSD after backing the contents up on my omnitool with an encryption code only I know – I based it off some of the crap from the Beacon in my head. Liara knows. Liara's father knows. That's it."

He steeped his finely boned hands, closing his eyes almost wearily. "All my life I have striven to lead our people in honor, in peace. To avoid the mistakes of the past. To unify humanity and move into a brighter future, not of bigotry, hatred and ignorance but growth. And now I find, to my disgust but sadly not shock, that I have been duped."

He shook his head and firmed his jaw. "When the time is right, Major, will you purify these criminals, if I give you the order?"

She nodded. "I would be delighted to, Your Majesty."

He gave a wan smile. "Then we shall act, but not, I think, in haste." Exhaling, he tapped the desk, triggering another haptic panel. "First, you will need a more complete grounding in command. Once you are done with your leave period, you will report – briefly – to Arcturus. The Admiralty should have covered this, but if they failed to do so, you will be transported on the cruiser Accra."

He brought up a picture of a young woman with a distinct resemblance to Windsor himself. "Once aboard, you will take formal command of your new cruiser, and your battle group, and meet with my niece, Elizabeth Windsor-Turham. She is acting as my attache d'affairs and secretary. I will make it clear that you only answer to me, or to her when she conveys my orders."

Shepard nodded and he continued. "Once your cruiser is crewed and outfitted, you will conduct a very brief shakedown run, and then head to Pinnacle Station, where you will meet Admiral Tradius Ahern. He has been tasked with commencing your command training. Pinnacle station will also be where the rest of your battle-group will be assembled and outfitted."

He tapped a control on the desk and the haptics all went dark. "Once that is complete, you will report to Arcturus once more for .. your first task. Obviously, the Council may have some kind of Spectre tasks for you, but I have been lead to believe they will wait several months before they begin assigning such to you, so you should have time to train and prepare."

Shepard nodded again, and the President stood. "Then our conversation is complete, Major. The commissars outside will be taking you back to the Presidium so you can continue finishing out your leave in peace. You are dismissed."

She bowed, as Udina had instructed her, rather than salute, and left the office. It wasn't until she got in the aircar and was on the way back to the Presidium that it all hit her, and she decided then and there to talk over all this with Anderson the first chance she got.

O-OSaBC-O

As with all good things, her leave came to an end. Tali had agreed to join her as an engineer, and Liara as a science officer. It took a call to both Udina and the President to browbeat Personnel into compliance, but Tali and Liara were both granted the rank of Lieutenant (staff) with an upgrade to Lieutenant Commander (staff) upon assignment to a ship.

Tali kept her hood covering the traditional Zorah purple, but had her suit tinted to Alliance white. They followed her as she went through her final goodbyes, stopping with Garrus and Telanya.

Both were already back at C-SEC, Telanya helping move boxes into the office with biotics while Garrus chatted with his old partner Forlan. Both stopped when Shepard approached, and Garrus was the first to speak.

"So. I guess this is it, Sheep. Sorry, Baroness Major Sheep." Garrus's voice was wry, the fading scars from his battle to stop the geth now lighter marks on his carapace. Behind him, Telanya smiled widely, before bowing to Liara in the background.

Shepard laughed. "I'm glad you guys made out of this mess okay, Senior Detective Vakarian. I have no clue how Telanya puts up with you."

The asari shrugged. "He's finally agreed to stop letting other women chase him all over the Citadel and settle down with me. I can let him pop off at the mouth once in a while."

Shepard grinned. "Congratulations. But the girls from Ops Alley will be crushed, especially Specialist Sharna."

Garrus rolled his eyes. "Ha fucking ha." He paused. "This ... trip. This whole thing. It made me focus on what's important to me, and why it's important. Taking down the perp...is needed. Necessary. And red tape does get in the way. But I can't help but wonder if there was a little more red-tape and eyes on the scene with Saren would this whole thing have blown up in the first place?"

Shepard shrugged. "Nazara was going to find someone. From what bits the AIS has put together after deciphering the computers we found at his base on Noveria, Saren had been researching this for years, following leads his brother found in the First Contact War. If Nazara had managed to coopt someone else, or gone about things another way, we might have never known about the shit until a jillion Reapers flew out of the Citadel." She shrugged. "He's dead. We won."

Garrus nodded. "Being introspective about justice and crime isn't really my thing anyway. I've been assigned a very satisfying case ... going after that sick bastard Dr. Saleon. And now I have the reach and ability to leave the Citadel and chase him down and stop him."

Shepard nodded. "If you need some help doing it...let me know." She held out her hand, and he took it, firmly. "Be safe, Garrus."

He nodded, mandible flickering with emotion. "You too... Sara." He turned to Liara. "Keep her out of trouble, Liara? She gets carried away."

Liara made a gesture at her SA uniform. "Unfortunately, I have to follow orders now, Garrus."

The turian only shook his head. "And you had the gall to call me whipped." He grinned, only to shiver when Telanya flared her biotics slightly. "Uh..."

Shepard snickered. "I'd stay and help you out, chicken, but I should go." She turned and departed, bursting into full out laughter as Garrus gave a yell when Telanya lifted him from his feet to glare at him.

The rest of the day she simply spent relaxing with Liara, ending with dinner at Anderson's apartment with Kahlee. Joker and Tali had wandered off somewhere, and Shepard, after eating another delicious meal, was stretched out on Anderson's comfy leather couch, Liara snuggled up against her, staring into the fire burning in the wide stone fireplace.

Anderson sat on his recliner, a glass of scotch in his hand, while Kahlee curled up on a smaller sofa, this time wearing a Blasto T-shirt and sweats. The dimmed sounds and flashing lights of aircar traffic outside were muted by the soft music playing over the sound system.

Shepard sighed, a relaxed sound that left her feeling tired and warm. "Thank you so much for dinner, Kahlee. I wish I could cook .... well, anything."

The other woman gave an impish smile. "Five years ago I couldn't even make oatmeal, and David once told me that steak wasn't supposed to be cooked with plasma grenades. You pick it up as you go."

Shepard shrugged. "I still don't even have a place to live, much less a kitchen. Course, it's nice that I can get one now. The SA won't give me all the pay I should have earned as a Z2, but they did advance me three months salary – as a major. Nice chunk of change."

Anderson nodded. "Planning to buy an apartment, then?"

She shrugged. "I have no clue. Jiong is looking for me. Who knew having a political officer would be so handy?"

Anderson shook his head. "I would be careful how far you trust any Commissar, Sara. If you really needed help with that, Kahlee and I would have been delighted."

Shepard smiled. "I would have, but Jiong is more concerned about media bothering Liara and I, starting scandals and all that crap." She leaned her head back, letting her eyes close. "I don't want to think about anything right now except how damned good that hamburger was."

Liara smiled, then glanced at Anderson. "If you have time tomorrow, David, my aithntar would like to speak with you about ... our plans."

Anderson arched an eyebrow. "Well, that is likely to be .. interesting."

Kahlee snorted. "Or awkward."

Shepard grinned. "Or involve lots of cursing."

Liara merely quirked her lips. "As ... eccentric as she may be, she is a good person, Sara. I am blessed that, even if I was not what my mother wished me to be, that my aithntar is proud of me."

Shepard snorted and wriggled around to kiss Liara. "I'm proud of you too, marazul. Just don't let her corrupt you too much. Hot, kinda nerdy and innocent biotic badass is still what attracted me in the first place. I have enough hard-ass warrior types in my life."

Kahlee snickered. "Smooth. I think your sweet talking could use some work, Sara."

Liara merely smiled. "I find her charming as she is."

Anderson glanced at the clock. "Big day for everyone tomorrow. Kahlee has to head off to Grissom Academy to do in-brief on the first selection of biotic students. I get to start my new job as Military Advisor to Udina, starting off by hashing out what the Council wants from the SA fleet. And you head off to Arcturus."

Shepard nodded. "Yeah. Bit nervous...Pressly still doesn't know he's tapped for XO just until I can talk someone into making him CO of the Normandy." She looked up at Kahlee. "What exactly do you do at your job, anyway? How do you teach biotics if you aren't one?"

Kahlee smiled. "I'm just the administrator. I've had a lot of experience with biotics in combat, and lots of experience in planning programs. In theory, I'll be advising the instructors how to shape the graduates to perform well in the SA – the military ones, at least. The Academy will also host non-military students. In practice...I push paper and keep snot-nosed biotic kids from tearing the place up."

Shepard grimaced. "That should be fun."

Kahlee shrugged. "It's a challenge, but I like challenges, and it gives me lots of free time to get back to the Citadel and David." She shifted positions, bright eyes fixed on Shepard. "Turnabout time, what do you do in your new job?"

Shepard's eyes closed again as she grinned. "Work for the President. Go interesting places. Meet interesting people. Beat them up." She paused. "Some other stuff, but that's the gist of it."

Kahlee gave her an incredulous look. "Beat them up? Really? Ugh, could you be any more macho?"

Shepard smirked. "I hate to steal snappy comebacks from my crew, but to quote Joker – don't hate, appreciate. You get to push papers and watch snotty biotic kids, while I and my girlfriend cruise around space, righting wrongs and beating people up. The only way my job could be better if my title was 'Major-Badass' instead of 'Major-Commander'."

Anderson groaned, and Liara dissolved into laughter.

O-OSaBC-O

At the ground level entry of Anderson's apartment building, a media crew tried to gain entry but came up against the smiling visage of Commissar Alfred Jiong, still in a lift-chair but with a neural mace in his hand and a squad of Commissariat soldiers behind him. "I'm afraid the Baroness isn't receiving visitors tonight. If you'll leave your OT or TTG codes with the nice troopers here, however, she'll get back to you when she can."

One of the reporters, a human female with long brown hair, scowled. "You can't stop us, this is the Citadel and a public building."

Jiong examined his fingernails and sighed. "Wrong. As human citizens, you are always under the jurisdiction of the Commissariat. Council Code Section 1453-B, subsection six. As for public buildings, I'm afraid that C-SEC has granted us a forty-eight hour injunction against all media figures, and kindly delegated enforcement to the SA Commissariat."

The woman balled her fists. "She'll be gone by the time that expires!"

Jiong yawned. "Amazing! You can comprehend basic English and tell time. I would love to continue this conversation, but I'm still recovering from wounds and it has been an exceedingly fatiguing day. Lancer Grassi, please escort the media off the premises."

A trooper pushed his grav chair away, even as the commissariat troopers all drew neural maces. "You can walk away...or crawl away. Choose wisely."

O-OSaBC-O

In a soaring office tower on the south side of Vancouver, Richard Williams continued his work.

He'd been examining the Reaper artifact for days now, along with a cadre of other scientists Lord Maxwell had put on the task. It's powers were subtle, and the radiation it emitted of a type they were unfamiliar with, but Richard was sure he would unlock it's secrets soon.

He straightened as the ancient leader of the Manswells flickered into view on the haptic screen across from his work station. "Have you made progress yet, Richard?"

The former Shadow Hand gave a shallow bow. "Not yet, but I am still in the initial stages of my review. The scans we've taken are ... contradictory and confusing, so more time is needed."

Maxwell Manswell nodded, a wisp of soft white hair falling down from the fringe around his temples. "You will need to accelerate your efforts. Despite the insipid assertions of Adkins and DeRous, my sources tell me Shepard knows more about our projects and goals than we thought."

Richard curled a synthetic lip. "If she's only aware of what Kyle knew, she's going to be barking up the wrong tree, milord."

Maxwell gave a grunt of amusement. "Quite. That does not change the fact that we cannot afford arrogant presumption. Such has already cost us precious time and effort."

To this, the big man only nodded in agreement. "Do you have additional orders for me?"

Manswell gave a rattling exhalation. "For now, begin working on plans for a replacement for Cerberus. The organization was too loose and too febrile in structure to survive long, and we can still use what fragments of the older networks and facilities of the last iteration to start with. Codename, Hades Group."

Richard nodded. "Who will be in command? Myself with others?"

Maxwell shook his head. "This time, you will be in sole command. We do not have to cater to the SA or existing forces this time, so it will be a much cleaner operation in terms of exposure. A facility is already being prepared at Horizon, and I have our first ... interesting subject for you."

Richard arched an eyebrow.

Maxwell gave a wintry smile. "The Shadow Broker's agents on the Citadel managed to subdue and capture one of the Prime units leading Benezia's attack, or at least it's core processors. We also managed to capture several geth vessels and many war-frames from Noveria. We've constructed a lab on Planet Aite where we can research if our original goal with Project Benedict is still achievable."

Richard tilted his head. "Scope?"

Manswell shrugged weakly, his clawlike hand gripping the chair-arm tightly. "Unlimited. Funding will be streamed from three completely new front startups, as well as a tap from Blue Stars No More. The goal is to bring geth under our control, both to act as a foil for Citadel races and increase human dominance."

Richard nodded slowly. "And the artifact here?"

Manswell smiled again. "I suspect, young Richard, that if Saren was able to dominate the geth using the Reaper's technology, that we can do the same if we are careful." He gave a racking cough, and wheezed, his eyes narrowing. "In either case, I fear I have few years left to me. You must be ready for whatever comes."

The big man folded his arms. "Will Aloxius support this venture should you die, milord?"

Manswell nodded. "He will devise an excuse for retirement if that happens, and take my place atop the organization." He coughed again, more violently, but exhaled and managed a grim smile. "Individuals may live and die, but Humanity will live on forever."

With a shaky motion of his hand, Manswell tapped something on his chair. "I am transmitting the files you will need to begin your new assignment, along with instructions for your medical staff to alter your facial features. Richard Williams is dead, my boy. From now on you will be Richard Manswell, a younger cousin from the cadet branch, back from the colonies."

Richard arched his eyebrows again. "Thank you, milord."

The old man merely nodded. "Do not fail, Richard. We will speak again once you reach Horizon. And keep a mindful eye out for that snake Jack Harper. He's survived...and we have no idea what he is up to."

With that, the screen blanked. Richard Williams spent several seconds considering his next course of action, before smiling faintly and departing the research lab.

The black and red pyramid in the center of the room pulsed quietly. Waiting.

O-OSaBC-O

As Shepard was saying her farewells to her crew and allies, a slender figure in a loosely cut jacket with silk slacks tapped a cigarette as he reviewed the information in front of him, in a room of mirrors and haptic screens.

"Shepard was very successful. I must admit she even outperformed my expectations."

He tapped the cigarette, a few ashes falling from the tip, and ground the edge until the fire was a pointed cone. "Yet, I can't help but ponder if she did the right thing, or merely the expedient one."

The woman standing across from him wore a skin-tight black outfit, set off here and there with matte black armor plates and high boots. She raised an elegant eyebrow, pushing back a mass of raven hair before speaking. "Shepard did everything to perfection. Saving the Council, stopping Saren and Benezia, even diluting the power of the asari and salarians. And now she has the ear of every leader in Citadel Space. What more could she do?"

The Illusive Man's handsome features didn't shift in the dim lighting. "One could argue that saving the Council wasn't the best course of action. No matter how committed they seem to recognizing the Reaper threat, they are politicians. They will convince themselves they have time to act. That they can profit from this and leave the problems to those who come after."

Miranda Lawson gave a small frown. "Surely they will see the threat as one that could destroy their own power, not to mention their people."

The Illusive Man gave a wry chuckle, a wintry smile crossing his features as he puffed on the cigarette before exhaling a cloud of blue smoke. "Unlikely, Ms. Lawson. The Council is not a monolithic creature, and those who compose it are either puppets or grasping at power beyond that of the Chamber. Sparatus has shown surprising insight, but his words about recognizing honor and valor were mere smoke and mirrors. He acted to stymie the asari and salarians, not out of any real gratitude. The situation will remain much the same, the dynamics changing only a little. All of what Shepard has achieved will fall by the wayside in months, if not sooner."

Miranda frowned again. "Surely she will try to counteract that."

The Illusive Man nodded, sipping his drink thoughtfully. "She may. And yet if she does, I strongly suspect she will be neutralized. Richard and Rachel answered to someone, and I was never able to determine who. That means I could not finger them in my little gift of information I sent Shepard's way. And they are still out there."

He rubbed his chin. "There are several possible actors, and they all have the capability to ensure Shepard never gets a chance to interfere with their plans. If we can corrupt a Commissar, so could they. If STG has spies in the AIS, could the real force that Richard answered to not also have them? She will be outmaneuvered and killed in some clever manner in short order if she isn't careful."

Miranda sighed. "You think they will assassinate her?"

He shook his head. "No. They will let her grow soft, and then send her off to die. Perhaps to fight geth, or pirates. They will dress it up in some courageous bunting, and she will be overjoyed to be of service, and die a martyr." He puffed on the cigarette again. "That is... if we do nothing."

Miranda folded her arms. "If we act while we are so weak, what little remains of Cerberus could be discovered and destroyed. Is she valuable enough to be worth that risk?"

Jack Harper stood, stubbing out his cigarette. "Have a little faith, Ms. Lawson. I'll make sure Cerberus is around to protect Humanity. You focus on making sure Shepard is around to help us protect it."

Miranda's expression became confused. "She'd never work with us, surely."

The Illusive Man's glowing blue eyes narrowed as he grinned. "When the time comes, she won't only work with us, but join us." He left the mirror-panneled status room, with its view of a blue super-giant and the still form of Miranda Lawson, to fall into darkness.

O-OSaBC-O

In the silence of the command room of the Broker, Tetrimus and Tazzik waited for their master to speak.

The big salarian rubbed his shoulder, wincing. The Prime he'd defeated on the Citadel had put up a better fight than anything else, and the scars of the battle were still visible over his large frame. He glanced around the dimly lit room, his eyes narrowing.

Finally the sepulchral voice of the Broker reverberated across the room. "The situation remains perilous. The Council is not in possession of the most recent intelligence we have gathered from the dig site on Setharom."

Tetrimus shook his head. "I do not think so. If they were they wouldn't be so sanguine about events. The records we found were fragmentary and incomplete, but our translation VI's are giving 92% confidence on the result. The race that fell under Reaper attack some nine hundred thousand years ago did so after they destroyed the monitoring Reaper hiding out near the galaxy's core."

Tazzik grunted. "What happened?"

Tetrimus sighed. "If the records are correct, roughly eight years after the found and destroyed a hibernating Reaper, several thousand Reapers and tens of thousands of support ships erupted from the edge of the Galaxy. They stormed towards the Citadel, shut the relays off and killed everything. The Ulo managed to record this record by hiding it in volcanic lava flows."

The Broker flexed massive shoulders. "It was discovered by chance, as we mined for supplementary materials for our planned evacuation from the region. It is a critical piece of knowledge. The Council foolishly thinks the destruction of Nazara has saved us. Instead, it will only accelerate our demise. The only possible message the Reapers can take from Nazara's destruction is that we are a threat."

Tazzik let his thoughts wander along the patterns until he grunted again. "How would they know? If they had some method to communicate across all that distance, then why would he go to the trouble of recruiting Saren and Benezia once the Citadel failed to spring its trap?"

Tetrimus flicked his talons out in a flourish. "There may be other circumstances in effect. We are still gathering data. But to assume they don't know is foolish. We recorded an anomalous spike of energy just before Nazara's destruction that defies the laws of energy conservation as we know it. For all we know, that was an alert...or a cry for help."

Tazzik shrugged. "Alright, so we have a problem coming down the river. Null shift, from my point of view. I thought the plan was to evacuate anyway – what does this change?"

The Broker's multiple eyes gleamed faintly. "The Council is no longer the prime power in this Galaxy. To continue to proffer our services to them is to join in their eventual destruction. A new course is required."

"Tetrimus, continue with the evacuation plans as already being worked. Do not relent on our time-line. Expend reserve funds if you must, but ensure we can be ready to evacuate no later than three solar years from this date."

Tetrimus sighed. "That will be very, very expensive, Shadow Broker. It might raise suspicions."

The Broker's meaty fist uncurled to tap two thick fingers on the desk. "Survival trumps profit. If there are suspicions, then the six Spectres we have on the payroll can make themselves useful." The horned head turned to Tazzik. "Tazzik. I have a more difficult task for you. Cameras in the Council Chamber recorded a conversation between Matriarch Benezia and Commander Shepard that I believe, in the trauma following her victor, the latter has ignored or forgotten."

He tapped a control, a grainy image of Benezia muttering confusedly to herself while walking towards the plinth playing.

Benezia's image flickered, her movements sluggish, her voice a drone. "Protect...the people. If we...serve well, the ... Nazara will elevate us. Make us one of the great ones. Or at least allow us to live."

Shepard lay on the floor, bloodied, beaten, her armor scorched and dented. Her voice was raspy, angry. "You have proof of this?"

Benezia's expression was confused, almost lost. "I...yes. Collectors. Used to be Protheans, now work for ... Nazara's people. Safe . Alive. Have to protect..."

The Broker killed the feed. "The Collectors...used to be Protheans. And worked for Nazara."

Tazzik and Tetrimus traded glances. "You want them taken out? That's very difficult, given where they hang out."

There was a long moment of silence, and then Tetrimus and Tazzik both shuddered, because the Broker was laughing.

"No, Tazzik. I have no doubts that given enough time you could indeed destroy whatever you put your mind to, I have a different idea in mind. You will scour the Traverse and other locations for hints of where the Collectors are doing their next little collection of genetic oddities. And you will reach out to them with a message."

The Broker leaned forward as he folded his hands, the dim light from above casting his nightmare visage into sharp relief. "Tell them I wish to deal."

---

The story will be continued in the next Book :

OSABC: And Then There Were None